7. List of ten āveṇikabodhisattvadharmas:

A. – T 278, k. 40, p. 650c4-651b21. – T 279, k. 56, p. 296b20-297b1. – Tib. Trip., vol. 26, no. 761, p. 85-86, fol. 207b2-210b2.

8. List of ten bodhisattvasamādhis:

R. – T 660, k. 4, p. 301a11-17. – T 489, k. 7, p. 722a7-12. – Tib. Trip., vol. 35, no. 897, p. 192, fol. 50a1-3.

Vyut., no. 737-745.

9. List of twelve bodhisattvadhāraṇīs:

R. – T 660, k. 4, p. 301a18-25. – T 489, k. 7, p. 722a12-17. – Tib. Trip., vol. 35, no. 897, p. 192, fol. 50a3-6.

Vyut., no. 747-758.

10. List of six bodhisattvābhijñās:

R. – T 660, k. 4, p. 301a25-28. – T 489, k. 7, p. 722a17-20. – Tib. Trip., vol. 35, no. 897, p. 192, fol. 50a6-7.

11. List of ten bodhisattvavaśitas:

R. – T 660, k. 4, p. 301a28-b14. – T 489, k. 7, p. 722a20-b7. – Tib. Trip., vol. 35, no. 897, p. 192, fol. 50a7-50b5.

Vyut. – no. 771-780.

It may be noted that the lists of bodhisattva dharmas given here do not appear in the two oldest Chinese translations of the Ratnameghasūtra: the Pao yun king (T658) made by Mandrasena in 503, and the Ta tch'eng pao yun king (T 659) made by Mandrasena and Seng k'ie p'o lo.

[k. 25, p. 245c]

I. THE EMPTINESS OF NONEXISTENCE

Question. – In the Prajñāpāramitā it is said that [the dharmas], from the five aggregates (skandha) up to the ten balas, the four vaiśārādyas and the eighteen [245c] āveṇīkadharmas, are all empty (śūnya).⁷²³ Why then do you distinguish the characteristics here?

Answer. – In the Buddhādharma, the emptiness of non-existence (anupalambhaśūnyatā) is not an obstacle to any dharma. It is precisely because of the emptiness of non-existence that one can speak of the teachings of the Buddha or of the twelve classes of texts (dvādaśāṅgabuddhavadāna). In the same way, it is because space (ākāśa) is nothing at all that everything depends on it and develops.

Furthermore, if here we distinguish powers (bala) and fearlessnesses (vaiśārādyas), it is not that we are grasping characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇa) or that we are attaching our mind (cittābhiniveśa) to them; we want only to save beings, for knowing that the being comes from causes and conditions (hetupratyayotpanna) [and is not independent] is to obtain deliverance (vimukti). In the same way, the medicinal plant (ośadhi) is used only to cure the sickness and not at all to investigate the characteristics (nimitta) of the medicinal plant.

See what is said by the Tchong-louen (Madhyamakaśāstra):

If you believe in the emptiness of dharmas

You are in agreement with logic.

If you do not believe in the emptiness of dharmas,

Everything becomes contradictory.⁷²⁴

If one rejected emptiness,

There would be nothing more to do.

Activity would exist without being undertaken,

One would be agent without being active.⁷²⁵

⁷²⁴ Madh. kārikā, XXIV, 14, p. 55; Tchong louen, T 1564, k. 4, p. 33a22-23:

Sarvaṃ ca yujyate tasya śūnyatā yasya yujyate /

sarvaṃ na yujyate tasya śūnyaṃ na yujyate //

Transl. J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 234: “If emptiness is logical, everything is logical; if it is absurd, everything is absurd.”

The translator compares this stanza of the Vīgrahavyāvartanī, ed. Johnston and Kunst, p. 150:

Prabhavati ca śūnyateyaṃ yasya prabhavanti tasya sarvārthāḥ /

prabhavati na tasya kiṃcinna prabhavati śūnyatā yasya //

S. Yamaguchi, Pour écarter les vaines discussions, JA, 1929, p. 60. translates: “Where non-substantiality is possible, everything is possible. Where non-substantiality is not possible, nothing is possible.”

For the Madhyamaka, dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda) equals emptiness (śūnyatā) and, in this regard, Candrakīrti, in his Madh. vṛtti, p. 500, cites the well-known stanza:

Yaḥ pratyayair jāyati sa hy ajāto na tasya utpāda svabhāvato 'sti / yaḥ pratyayādhinu sa śūnya ukto yaḥ śūnyatam jānmati so 'pramattaḥ //

“That which arises from conditions is not born really; its production does not exist as intrinsic nature. That which depends on conditions is called empty. He who knows emptiness is free of mistakes.”

⁷²³ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 146, l. 9-20: Śatasahasrikā, p. 839, l. 13-842, l. 17; passage cited above, p. 1605F.

This [true] nature of dharma,

Who then would be able to conceive of it?

Only the pure and straight mind.

Here words have no foundation.⁷²⁶

Eliminate the views of existence and non-existence

And the mind will be exhausted inwardly by itself.⁷²⁷

Question. – This is how the śrāvaka system speaks of the ten powers (bala) and the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya). How does the Mahāyāna distinguish them in its turn?

Answer. – An exhaustive knowledge, a universal knowledge, is contained in these ten balas and four vaiśāradyas, and it is in this regard that the ten balas and four vaiśāradyas are spoken of in the Mahāyāna.

⁷²⁵ Madh. kārikā, XXIV, 37, p. 513; Tchong louen, T 1564, k. 4, p. 34b18-19:

*Na kartavyaṃ bhavet kiñcid anārabdhā bhavet kriyā /
kāraḥ syād akurvāṇaḥ śūnyatām pratibādhas //*

“There would be nothing to do; activity would exist without being undertaken; one could be agent without doing anything if one rejects emptiness.”

In other words, denying emptiness is to condemn oneself to imputing a sin that he has not committed (akṛtābhyāgama) to an innocent person and to considering as nothing and non-existent every accomplished action (kṛtavupraṇāsa): cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 325, l. 3, and note; Pañjikā, p. 469, l. 9; Mahāvīyut., no. 7529-7530.

⁷²⁶ Madh. kārikā, XVIII, 7, p. 365; Tchong louen, T 1564, k. 3, p. 24a3-4:

Nivṛtam abhidhātavyaṃ nivṛtte cittagocare / anupannāniruddhā hi nirvāṇam iva dharmatā //

“All that can be named is destroyed if the object of the mind is destroyed. Indeed the [true] nature of things in unborn, not destroyed, like nirvāṇa.”

⁷²⁷ Unidentified stanza, but several centuries later, Śāntideva expressed himself in almost the same terms (Bodhicaryāvatāra, IX, st. 35):

*Yadā na bhāvo nābhāvo mateḥ saṃtiṣṭhate puraḥ /
tadānayagatyabhāvena nirāmbā praśāmyati //*

“When existence or non-existence no longer arise to the mind, then without any other alternative, the mind, deprived of object, is exhausted.”

It is said that after having pronounced this stanza, Śāntideva rose up into the sky and disappeared.

Question. – But in the śrāvaka system it is also a question of this exhaustive knowledge, this universal knowledge.⁷²⁸ Why does the Mahāyāna return to it?

Answer. – The scholars (upadeśācārya) say the following: That the Buddha cognizes in an exhaustive way, a universal way, was not said by the Buddha himself; it is here in the Mahāyāna and in regard to the ten balas and the four vaiśāradyas that the Buddha himself declares that he cognizes in an exhaustive way, in a universal way.

Furthermore, when he preaches the ten balas and four vaiśāradyas to the śrāvakas, it is in connection with the four truths (catuḥsatya), the twelve causes (dvādaśasnidāna) and other śrāvaka theories all serving to arrive at nirvāṇa. But here in the Mahāyāna, when he preaches the ten balas and four vaiśāradyas, it is in connection with great compassion (mahākaruṇā), the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharma and the doctrine of non-arising (anutpāda) and non-cessation (anirōdha).

II. THE TEN POWERS OF THE BODHISATTVAS⁷²⁹

Question. – The Buddha possesses ten powers (bala) and four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya). Does the bodhisattva possess them?

Answer. – He does possess them. What are they?

1) He makes the resolution [to reach] omniscience (sarvajñatā): this is the power of high resolve (dṛḍhādhyāsayabala).

2) Because he is endowed with great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrīsamanvāgata), he possesses the power of not abandoning beings (sarvasattvāpariṭyāgabala).

3) Because he does not seek any benefit by way of worship (pūjā) or veneration (saṅkāra), he possesses the power of great compassion (mahākaruṇābala). [246a]

4) He believes in all the attributes of the Buddha and his mind never tires in order to reproduce them completely in himself; this is why he possesses the power of great exertion (mahāvīryabala).

5) He is mindful (smṛtimat) and he conducts himself intelligently⁷³⁰ and does not transgress the attitudes (īryāpatha); this is why he possesses the power of the concentrations (samādhibala).

6) He avoids the pairs of extremes (antadvaya), he acts in conformity with the twelve-membered [pratiṣayasamutpāda], he destroys false views (mithyādrṣṭi), he suppresses all thought (manasikāra), all discursiveness (vikalpa) and all idle proliferation (prapañca); this is why he possesses the power of wisdom (prajñābala).

⁷²⁸ Actually, in the definition of the ten balas, the canonical texts cited above, p. 1506F, each time use the word pratijānati to insist on the exhaustive and universal nature of these knowledges.

⁷²⁹ Here the Traité adopts the first list of 10 bodhisattvabalas already prepared by the Śūramgamasamādhi and the Vikurvaṇapariṣchā: see references cited above, p. 1606F.

⁷³⁰ Adopting the variant houei hing.

7) He ripens beings (sattvān pariṇāpayati), he takes on innumerable births and deaths (apramāṇāni jātīmaraṇāny ādadāti), he relentlessly accumulates the roots of good (kuśalamūlāny ācinoti), he knows that the whole world is like a dream (svapṇasama): this is why he possesses the power of being tireless in the voyage through transmigration (saṃsārāparikhedabala).

8) He sees the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas; he knows that there is neither one's self (ātman) nor beings (sattva); he is convinced (adhimucyate) that dharmas do not arise, are unborn: this is why he possesses the conviction that things are unborn (anutpattikadharmakṣāntibala).

9) He has passed through the gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha), namely, emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita); he knows and sees the liberation of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas: this is why he possesses the power of deliverance (vimuktibala).

10) He has mastery over the profound dharmas (gambhīradharmavaśita), he knows the wanderings of the mind and the behavior of beings (sattvavittacaritragati): this is why he possesses the power of the unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvidbala).

These are the ten powers of the bodhisattva.

III. THE FOUR FEARLESSNESSES OF THE BODHISATTVA⁷³¹

What are the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) of the bodhisattva?

1) He retains all that he has heard (śruta), he possesses the dhāraṇīś and he suffers no loss of memory (smṛtīhāni): this is why [he possesses] the fearlessness of preaching the Dharma in the assemblies (parṣatsu dharmanirdeśavaiśāradya).

2) He has obtained liberation in all things (sarvadarmeṣu vimukti), he distinguishes, cognizes and uses all the remedies of the Dharma (dharmabhaiṣajya) and he knows the spiritual faculties (indriya) of all beings: this is why he possesses the fearlessness of preaching the Dharma as is suitable in the great assemblies (mahāparṣatsu anukūladharmanirdeśavaiśāradya).

3) Having driven away every fear definitively, the bodhisattva never asks if there is anyone in the ten directions who could come and make objections (codana) to him and to whom he would be unable to answer. Not seeing any reason to fear that, he possesses the fearlessness of preaching the Dharma in the great assemblies.

⁷³¹ Resuming the definitions already given above, p. 339F, the Traité here adopts the list of the 4 bodhisattvavaiśāradhyas from the Vikurvaṇarājapariṣṭhā and the Ratnamegha, a list also repeated in Mahāvīyutpatti: see references above, p. 1607F.

4) He allows everyone to come and question him, and to each question he replies without the slightest hesitation (saṃśaya): this is why he has the fearlessness of preaching the Dharma in the great assemblies.

These are the four fearlessnesses of the bodhisattva.

Third Section THE FOUR UNHINDERED KNOWLEDGES (p. 1614F)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The pratisaṃvids, literally 'special knowledges', in Pāli, paṭisambhidā, in Tibetan so so yan dag par rig pa, in Chinese ngai kiai, wou nagi tche, wou, ngai pien, 'explanations, knowledges or unhindered speech' are the unimpeded, unfailing knowledges (asaktam avivartyaṃ jñānam) that make a good preacher.

The pratisaṃvids are four in number:

1. Arthapratisaṃvid: knowledge of the thing designated (bhāṣitārtha) or more precisely, knowledge of its self-nature (svalakṣaṇa): for example, knowing the thing designated by the word 'earth' the intrinsic nature of which is solidity.

2. Dharmapratisaṃvid: knowledge of the designation (bhāṣitadharma), or the names (nāman), phrases (pada), syllables (vyañjana) used to designate the thing: for example, knowing that the name 'prthivī' serves to designate the earth.

From the Buddhist perspective, dharma represents the teaching (deśanādharmā), the word of the Buddha having nine or twelve members: sūtra, geṇya, vyākaraṇa, etc., and especially the eight-membered Path (aṣṭāṅgamārga) that constitutes its essence.

3. Niruktiṭpratisaṃvid: knowledge of vocal expression (vāc, adhivācana). It is not enough to know the word in abstracto, but it is also necessary to express it with the appropriate number (singular, dual, or plural), gender (masculine, feminine, neuter) and case, taking account of its etymology. All of this varies according to the language used so that, considering everything, niruktiṭpratisaṃvid is none other than the knowledge of languages.

4. Pratibhānapratisaṃvid: knowledge of elocution or, more simply, eloquence. This is the ability to speak in a precise and easy way (yuktamuktaprtibhāna) resulting from mastery in regard to the Path (mārgavaśita) and unfailing attentiveness.

The pratisaṃvids are inseparable: the person who possesses one possesses all of them. On the other hand, they are the same in all, although realized to varying degrees. Thus, there is no way to make distinctions between the pratisaṃvid of the śrāvaka, the bodhisattva or the Buddha if this is not in the mind or intention governing their practice.

It is often a question of the pratisaṃvids in the canonical and scholastic literature, but the definitions given are rather rare and often divergent. Here I [Lamotte] will mention a few particularly interesting texts:

1) In the Nikāyas and the āgamas: Anguttara, I, p. 24, l. 29; II, p. 160; III, p. 113, 120; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 21, p. 656c26-657a17; Mahāniddeaa, I, p. 234; Paṭisambhīda, I, p. 88, 119, 132; II, p. 150, 157-158, 185, 193.

The Buddha accepts that bhikkus can have the pratisamvids and gives Mahākaṣṭhila as an example. But Śāriputra, the wisest of all, held them in only a limited way (odhiso) and in a manner of speaking (vyaññanaso); in these conditions, those who wish clarifications should speak to the Buddha rather than to him.

2) In the Pāli Abhidhamma: Vibhaṅga, p. 293-305, commented on in Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 372-376 (transl. Nanamoli, p. 485 seq.). The theory is well summarized in a note appearing in the appendix to Points of Controversy, p. 379-381).

3) In the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma and śāstras: Prakaraṇapāda, T 1542, k. 5, p. 712b11-12; Jhānaprasthāna, T 1544, k. 18, p. 1018b; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 180, p. 903c-906b; Kośa, VII, p. 89-94; Kośabhāṣya, p. 418-421 (very clear explanation); Abhidharmadīpa, p. 393.

4) In the Mahāyānasūtras: for example Pañcaviṃśati, p. 211, l. 15-16; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1449, l. 18-21; Daśabhūmika, p. 77. – Brief commentary in Āloka, p. 455, l. 25 seq.

5) In the Vijñānavādin treatises: Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 138-139; Saṃgraha, p. 293, with commentary as note; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 258, l. 4-17; Abhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā, T 1606, p. 759b23-c16; Siddhi, p. 652.

I. THE PRATISAMVIDS ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

The four pratisamvids ‘unhindered knowledges’ are: i) arthapratisamvid [bearing on the thing designated or bhāṣitārtha],⁷³² ii) dharmapratisamvid [bearing on the designation or bhāṣitadharma], iii) niruktipratisamvid [bearing on vocal expression or nirukti], iv) pratibhānapratisamvid [bearing on elocution or pratibhāna].⁷³³

1. Arthapratisamvid

⁷³² Artha has several meanings, but in the expression arthapratisamvid it means thing and not meaning or signification. However, out of long habit, the better Chinese translators, such as Kumārajīva and Hiuan-tsang, render it as yi, notion of a thing, idea, signification (in English, meaning, purport, interpretation). Without being so presumptuous as to try to correct these virtuosos of Chinese Buddhism, I [Lamotte] would prefer to read the character king, sometimes used by Hiuan-tsang to translate artha taken in the meaning of viśaya, ‘object’ (e.g., in his translation of the Kośa, T 1558, k.1, p. 2b7, corresponding to Kośabhāṣyā, p. 5, l. 20).

⁷³³ The Traité will put forward here the Abhidharmikas’ definitions for the main part: cf. Vibhaṅga, p. 293, l. 4-6; Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 372, l. 29-52; Vibhāṣā citing the Prakaraṇapāda, T 1545, k. 180, p. 904a8-13; Kośabhāṣya, p. 419, l. 17-18; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 76, p. 751a2 seq; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 393, l. 6-12; Āloka, p. 455, l. 25 seq.

The pratisamvid of the designated thing. – Things (vastu) expressed with the help of names (nāman) and by the voice (vāc) each have their own nature (lakṣaṇa): for example, the nature solidity (khakkhaṭalākṣaṇa).⁷³⁴

In this example, the solid nature (khakkhaṭalākṣaṇa) of the earth (prthivī) is the artha ‘the thing designated’; the name (nāman) ‘earth’ is the dharma ‘designation’; to say ‘earth’ using the voice (vāc) is the nirukti ‘expression’; the ease of speaking (muktābhipāṭitā), the mastery (vaśitva) over these three kinds of knowledge is the pratibhāna ‘elocution’. Penetrating these four things without difficulty constitutes the pratisamvid ‘unhindered knowledge’.

The solidity (khakkhaṭatva) characterizing earth (prthivī), the moistness (daratva) characterizing water (ap), the heat (uṣṇatva) characterizing fire (tejas), the movement (īraṇatva) characterizing wind (vāyu), the intelligent nature of the mind (citta), the impermanent (anitya) painful (duḥkha) and empty (śūnya) nature of the five aggregates of attachment (pañcopadānaskandha), the non-self nature (anātmaka) of all dharmas, those are general characteristics [246b] (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and specific characteristics (svalākṣaṇa). Distinguishing them in this way is called arthapratisamvid ‘unhindered knowledge of the [designated] thing’.

2. Dharmapratisamvid

The pratisamvid of designation. – Knowing the name (nāman) of the thing (artha), knowing that solidity is called earth (prthivī) and having no difficulty in distinguishing all the names of this type, is called dharmapratisamvid ‘unhindered knowledge of the designation’.⁷³⁵

⁷³⁴ The object of arthapratisamvid is the artha for the Vibhaṅga, the Kośa and the Nyāyānusāra; the paramārtha for the Vibhāṣā; the dharmalakṣaṇa for the Āloka. We can say with the Traité that it is the real thing, constituted by its own nature and capable of being designated.

⁷³⁵ The object of dharmapratisamvid is the dharma [taken in the sense of deśana] for the Vibhāṣā; the pariyāya ‘preaching’ for the Āloka; the nāman for the Nyāyānusāra; the nāma-pada-vyaññana-kāya ‘groups of names, phrases and syllables’ for the Vibhāṣā and the Kośa. It is a question therefore of a knowledge bearing upon the designation, the preaching. But in the Buddhist perspective, this designation, this preaching, is limited to the speech of the Buddha. This is why the Vibhaṅga, p. 294, l. 22-24, specifies: Idha bhikkhu dhammaṃ jānāti suttaṃ geyyaṃ veyyākaraṇaṃ gmathaṃ udānaṃ itivuttakaṃ jātakaṃ abbhutadhammaṃ vedallaṃ: ayaṃ vuccati dhammapaṭisambhīdā.

This is all well summarized in the definition in the Abhidharmadīpa (l.c.):

Dvādaśāṅgasamgrhīteṣu vakyaṃāñārthasambandhiṣu vivakṣiteṣu nāmakāyādiṣu yad avivartyaṃ jñānaṃ sā dharmapartiasamvid: “The unfailing knowledge of the groups of names, etc., contained in the twelve-membered [speech of the Buddha] referring to things to be expressed and brought into discussion is the dharmapratisamvid.”

Why? Because the thing is not grasped separately from the name (nāman) and one can recognize the thing only by the name. This is why the designation (dharma) comes immediately after the thing (artha).

Question. – Is the thing (artha) joined with the name (nāman) or separate from the name?⁷³⁶ If it were joined with the name, we would burn our mouth by saying “fire”. If it were separate from the name, we would get water by saying “fire”.

Answer. – The thing is neither joined with nor separate from the name. Out of convention (saṃvṛiti), the ancients fixed the names designating things, and their descendants, thanks to these names, recognized things. Thus for each thing there is a name called dharma [here].

3. Niruktipratisamṇvid

But what has to be done in order that beings can obtain the consciousness of this name (nāman) and this thing (artha)? Recourse must be made to expressions (nirukti), to various ornamentations, so that people can comprehend them.⁷³⁷ Penetrating these processes without difficulty is called niruktipratisamvid 'unhindered knowledge of expression'.

4. Pratibhānapratisaṃvid

⁷³⁶ A problem already asked by Plato at the beginning of the Cratylus (383A) and which preoccupied the sophists of his time: do words have a natural pertinence – which Cratylus, a disciple of Heraclitus, maintains, or, as Hermogenes would have it, are they due to convention? On this subject, see Leroy, Étymologie et linguistique chez Platon, Bull. Cl. Lettres de l'Ac. Roy. De Belgique, LIV, 1968, p. 121-152.

⁷³⁷ Niruktiṭṭhāsaṃvid has as object the atthadhammaniruttābhilāpa ‘the expression of language relating to the thing designated and to the designation’ according to the Vibhaṅga; the vāc ‘voice’ according to the Vibhāṣā, the Kośa and the Nyāyānusāra; the janapadabhāṣā ‘the speech of the region’ according to the Āloka.

By voice the Kośabhāṣya, p. 410, l. 17-18 means the [correct] expression of singular, dual, plural, masculine, feminine, etc. (ekadvibahustripuruṣādyadhivacan). But nirukti also means the etymological explanation (nirvacana): for example rūpyate tasmād rūpam.

If the speech (abhiḷāpa) is provided with logic (nyāya), if the account (prakāśana) is inexhaustible and also if the orator has obtained mastery over the concentrations (samādhiprasāṭa), there is then an ease [of speech] called pratibhānapratīsamvid ‘unhindered knowledge of elocution.’⁷³⁸

5. Levels, knowledges and types of pratisamvid

1) The first and the fourth pratisaṃvid occur in nine levels: [kāmadhātu, four dhyānas and four samāpattis].

The second and third pratisaṃvid occur in kāmādhātu and the four Brahmā heavens, [i.e., in the four dhyānas].⁷³⁹

2) The second and third pratisaṃvid are worldly knowledges (saṃvṛitjñāna).

The first pratisaṃvid is ten knowledges (daśajñāna).

The fourth pratisamvid is nine knowledges [by excluding the knowledge of cessation of suffering (nirodhajñāna)].⁷⁴⁰

738 For the Vibhāṣā, the Kośa and the Nyāyānusāra (l.c.), pratibhānapratīsamvid is the knowledge of correct and easy elocution and of mastery in regard to the path (mārgavaśita), which presupposes that the orator has mastery over the concentrations.

739 Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 418-419: Sā punar arthapratīsaṃvid sarvabhūmika... Dharmapratīsaṃvid pañcabhūmikā kāmādhātucaturthadhyānasamgrhītā, ūrdhvaṃ nāmākāyābhāvāt... Niruktipratīsaṃvid kāmādhātuprathamamadhyānabhūmikā, ūrdhvaṃ vitarkābhāvāt... Sarvabhūmikā [pratibhānapratīsaṃvit] kāmādhātu yāvā bhavāgre vānīmārgayor anyatārālambanāt. – “The arthapratīsaṃvid arises in all the levels... The dharmapratīsaṃvid is in five levels, in kāmādhātu and the four dhyānas; the nāmākāya is absent above [and consequently the pādakāya and vyañjanakāya also]... The niruktipratīsaṃvid had the kāmādhātu and the first dhyāna as levels; vitarka is absent above... The pratibhānapratīsaṃvid is in all the levels from kāmādhātu to bhavāgra, since it has as object either the voice or the Path.”

But according to the information of the Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 180, p. 904a25-b2, this opinion is not unanimous.

740 Cf. Kośabbhāṣyā, p. 418-419: Dharmaniruktiṭṭhasaṃvidau saṃvṛtījñānasvabhāva nāmākāyādivāgāmbanāsvabhāvatvāt... Arthapratibhāṇasamvit [should be corrected to: arthapratisaṃvit] sarvadharmāś ced artha dāśa jñānāni, nirvāṇaṃ ṣaḍ jñānāni dharmānvyayanirodha-kṣayānutoḍaṣaṃvṛtījñānāni... Navajñānasvabhāva pratibhānapratisaṃvid anyatta nirodhajñānāt. - “The dharmā- and the niruktiṭṭhasaṃvid are conventional knowledge because they have as object the nāmākāyas, etc., and the voice... The arthapratisaṃvid, if by artha is meant all dharmas, is ten knowledges; but if by artha is meant nirvāṇa, it is six knowledges: dharmā, anvaya, nirodha, kṣaya, anutpāda and saṃvṛtījñāna. The pratibhānapratisaṃvid is nine knowledges, excluding the nirodhajñāna.”

3) The pratisaṃvids are higher (agra), middling (madhya) or lower (avara): higher among the Buddhas, middling among the great bodhisattvas, lower among the great arhats.

Question. – The balas, the vaiśāradīyas and the pratisaṃvids are all knowledges (jñāna). Having the balas inwardly and the vaiśāradīyas outwardly would be complete (paripūrṇa). Why speak further of the pratisaṃvids?

Answer. – The balas and the vaiśāradīyas have been explained. There are people who, while fearlessly preaching the Dharma in the great assemblies, still have hesitations.⁷⁴¹ This is why particularly the pratisaṃvids are spoken of. The pratisaṃvids ‘adorn’ the vaiśāradīyas and the vaiśāradīyas adorn the balas.

Moreover, when we speak of the vaiśāradīyas, some people have doubts and ask how anyone would not experience any fear in the great assemblies. But the Buddha first experiences the ten balas and finally the four pratisaṃvids. This is why, in the great assemblies, he has no fear of preaching the Dharma.

This completes the explanation of the four pratisaṃvids.

II. THE PRATISAṂVIDS ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

Question. – Are there also four pratisaṃvids of the bodhisattva in the Mahāyāna?

Answer. Yes.⁷⁴² They are as follows:

1. Arthapratisaṃvid

Pratisaṃvid of the thing designated. – The thing designated (artha) is the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of all dharmas, which is inexpressible (anabhilāpya).

The thing designated (artha), the name (nāman) and the voice (vāc) are not different (abhinna), and this is so at the beginning (ādaū), at the end (paryavasāna) and in the middle (madhya): that is the artha.⁷⁴³ Apart from name (nāman) and voice (vāc), there can be no artha. It is as a result of the identity of the three things (vastutrayasamatā) that there is artha.

See also Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 180, p. 904b14-23, which mentions other opinions also.

⁷⁴¹ Hesitations about their capacity to preach the Dharma.

⁷⁴² Note that, in contrast to the balas and the vaiśāradīyas, the pratisaṃvids of the Buddhas, the bodhisattvas and the śrāvakas bear the same names but are practiced in a different spirit.

⁷⁴³ This is not a theory on the nature of language. If the word is mixed up with the thing, it is not that it is naturally tied to it, but because, from the point of view of the true nature of dharmas, words and things are alike empty and non-existent.

Furthermore, knowing clearly and penetrating without difficulty the [246c] reality (artha) of all dharmas is called arthapratisaṃvid ‘unhindered knowledge of the thing designated’.

2. Dharmapratisaṃvid

Pratisaṃvid of designation. – The designation (dharma) is applied to things (artha) because the name (nāman) serves to make known the thing (artha).

Furthermore, having entered into the dharmapratisaṃvid, the bodhisattva always believes the [authentic] teaching but does not believe in the person who is teaching (dharmāya śraddhadhātī na tu pudgale śraddadhātī);⁷⁴⁴ he takes refuge in the truth and does not take refuge in error (dharmapratisaṃvāna na tv adharmapratisaṃvānaḥ). Taking refuge in the truth, he is free of error. Why? Because he knows that the person (pudgala), names (nāman) and speech (vāc) are without intrinsic nature (svalakṣaṇahita).

Finally, by this pratisaṃvid, the bodhisattva distinguishes the three kinds of Vehicles (yānatraya), but while distinguishing them, ‘he does not contradict the fundamental element (dharmadhātum na vilomayati).’⁷⁴⁵ Why? “Because the fundamental element has but a single nature, namely, the absence of nature” (dharmadhātur ekalakṣaṇo yadutālakṣaṇaḥ).⁷⁴⁶ The bodhisattva who uses his voice (vāc) to preach the Dharma knows that the voice is empty (śūnya) like an echo (pratiśrutkāśama).⁷⁴⁷ The Dharma that he preaches to beings leads them to believe and recognize one and the same fundamental element (dharmadhātu).

Penetrating the names (nāman) and voices (vāc) to be uttered deeply and without difficulty, that is dharmapratisaṃvid ‘unhindered knowledge of the designation’.

3. Niruktipratisaṃvid

Pratisaṃvid of expression. – Using the voice (vāc), the bodhisattva expresses names (nāman) and things (artha). Adorning his discourse in various ways (nānāprakāreṇa) and in harmony with the needs of the ⁷⁴⁴ According to the Sūtra of the four refuges (catvāri pratisaṃvānāni): dharmapratisaṃvāna bhavitavyaṃ na pudgalapratisaṃvāna. See above, p. 536-539F.

⁷⁴⁵ According to the Sūtra of the four great teachings (mahāpadeśa) where it is said, more or less, in the Sanskrit version (Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, p. 4; Pañjikā, p. 431): Buddhavadānasyedaṃ lakṣaṇaṃ yat sūtre ‘vatarati vinaye saṃdrśyate dharmatām ca na vilomayati. – “The characteristic mark of the Word of the Buddha is that is found in the Sūtra, appears in the Vinaya and does not contradict the nature of things.” – For detail see: La critique dans le bouddhisme, India Antiqua, Leyden, 1947, p. 218-222.

⁷⁴⁶ See references in footnote 74 above.

⁷⁴⁷ Comparison developed at length in Vimalakīrti, p. 148-149 and Śūraṅgamasamādhi. p. 188-189.

circumstances, he makes beings find an understanding of all languages (nirukti): the language of the devas; the languages of the nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, mahoragas and other amanuṣyas; the languages of Śakra, Brahmā, Cāturmahārājika and other lords of the world, human languages; one language, two languages, or several languages; concise or prolix language; language of women or language of men; languages of the past, the present or the future. He causes everybody to understand all these languages and that there is no disharmony between one's own language and that of others.

How is that? The totality of things is not in language; language is not a true reality. If language were a true reality, it would be impossible to express evil by way of good words. It is solely in order to lead people to nirvāṇa that the bodhisattva speaks in a way that he can be understood, but without being attached to speech.

Finally, the bodhisattva uses speech so that beings may act in accordance with the authentic teaching (dharma) and reality (artha). His discourses all aim at the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. That is called niruktipratisaṃvid 'unhindered knowledge of expression'.

4. Pratibhānapratisaṃvid

Pratisaṃvid of elocution. – In a single phoneme (akṣara) the bodhisattva can express all the phonemes; in a single word (ghoṣa), he can express all words; in a single dharma, he can express all dharmas.⁷⁴⁸ Everything that he says is Dharma, is true, is real, and also useful, since it is adapted to beings to be converted (vaineaya).

To those who like sūtras, he preaches sūtras; to those who like geyas, he preaches geyas; to those who like vyākaraṇas, he preaches vyākaraṇas; to those who like gāthās, udānas, nidānas, avadānas, ityuktas, jātakas, vaipulyas, adbhutadharmas or upadeśas, he preaches all these texts.

He adapts himself to the spiritual faculties (indriya) of beings in order to preach to them: if they like faith, he preaches them the faculty of faith 247a; if they like exertion, he preaches to them the faculty of exertion (vīryendriya); if they like mindfulness, he preaches to them the faculty of mindfulness (smṛtyīndriya); if they like concentration, he preaches to them the faculty of concentration (saṃādhīndriya); if they like wisdom, he preaches to them the faculty of wisdom (prajñēndriya). And he does likewise for all the roots of good (kuśalamūla) as he does for these five faculties.

Moreover, there are 21,000 faculties (indriya) of passionate people (rāgacarita) and it was on this subject that the Buddha preached the 84,000 topics of the Dharma (dharmaskandha) as counteragents.⁷⁴⁹ In regard to these faculties, the bodhisattva speaks about the series of counteragents (pratipakṣadharmas): this is his 'elocution' (pratibhāna).

There are 21,000 faculties of the hateful person (dveṣacarita), etc.

There are 21,000 faculties of the foolish man (mohacarita), etc.

There are 21,000 faculties of the person with mixed passions, and on this subject the Buddha preached the 84,000 topics of the Dharma that counteract them: this is his 'elocution'.

This is what is called pratibhānapratisaṃvid 'unhindered knowledge of elocution'.

Furthermore, using this pratisaṃvid, during the course of a kalpa or half a kalpa, the bodhisattva adorns his preaching of the Dharma (dharmanirdeśa) but 'does not contradict the nature of the fundamental element' (dharmadhātum na vilomayati).

Sometimes this bodhisattva hides and becomes invisible, but preaches the Dharma through all his hair-pores (romakūpa),⁷⁵⁰ and, while adapting himself to the needs [of beings to be converted], he does not fail in his original practices (pūrvacārya).

The wisdom (prajñā) of the bodhisattva is immense: no scholar (upadeśācārya) is able to exhaust it or, even less, destroy it.

When, in possession of this pratisaṃvid, the bodhisattva transforms himself and takes on rebirths, he spontaneously and completely understands (svataḥ saṃjñānīte) the holy texts (sūtra), the mantras, the knowledges (jñāna) and the arts (kalā) possessed by sages having the five supranormal powers (pañcābhijñāṛṣi): for example, the four Vedas, the six Vedaṅgas, the Atharva, the [Jyotiṣka] dealing with the sun, the moon and the five planets, oniromancy [??], earthquakes, the language of the yakṣas, the language of birds, the language of hands,⁷⁵¹ the language of quadrupeds and of people possessed by demons, divination, abundance or famine, struggle against the sun, the moon and the five planets, pharmacology, calculus, spells, scenic plays, music. The bodhisattva knows deeply and penetrates poetry, the arts, the treatises of this kind better than anyone, better than the heretics, but he is not at all boastful and troubles no one. He knows that these ordinary sciences do not serve for nirvāṇa.

Because this bodhisattva is endowed with the four pratisaṃvids, his beauty, his power, his brilliance surpass those of the Brahmās. The Brahmās honor him, love him and respect him, but his mind is detached (asakta). Respected and honored by all these gods, he is without attachment. He produces only the ideas of impermanence (anitya), of suffering (duḥkha), of emptiness (śūnya) and of non-self (anātman). By means of his supranormal powers (abhijñā) he encourages the gods, leads them to aspire ardently and preaches them the Dharma inexhaustibly [247b] and impeccably. He destroys their doubts and establishes them in 'anuttarā samyakṣambodhi'.

According to the Mahāyāna, this is the power of the four pratisaṃvids of the bodhisattva, a power capable of saving beings, This is the meaning of the four pratisaṃvids.

⁷⁴⁸ Daśabhūmika, p. 77: Sarvadharmaprajñāptavyavacchedena dharmam deśayati.

⁷⁴⁹ On these 84,000 (or 80,000) dharmaskandhas preached by the Buddha, see Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 155, 162-163. They serve to cure the four groups of 21,000 beings dominated by lust (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), ignorance (moha) or a mixture of the three, respectively: cf. Kośa, I, p. 47; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 3, p. 346c; Satyasiddhiśāstra, Y 1656, k. 9, p. 314a.

⁷⁵⁰ Daśabhūmika, p. 80: Sarvaromakūpebhyo ghoṣān niścārayati.

⁷⁵¹ Adopting the variant cheou yu.

CHAPTER XLI: THE EIGHTEEN SPECIAL ATTRIBUTES OF THE BUDDHA

PRELIMINARY NOTE

I. THE EIGHTEEN ĀVEṆIKADHARMAS OF THE BUDDHAS

By special attributes (āveṇikadharmas) we mean the attributes possessed by the Buddha alone which are not shared with others.

As far as we know, they do not appear in the old canonical sūtras except for the Chinese translation of the Brahmāyūḥsūtra of the Madhyamāgama by Tche K'ien (T 76, p. 885b17-18).

On the other hand, eighteen āveṇikabuddhadharmas, the details of which are not given, are frequently mentioned in the Hīnayānist post-canonical literature and the Mahāyānasūtras. Most often they are cited equally with the ten balas and the four vaiśārādyas to which other categories of attributes came to be added, such as the three vidyās, the four pratisaṃvids, mahāmaitrī, mahākaruṇā, the sarvajñānas, etc.

In the Hīnayāna literature, see: Lieou tou tsi king, T 152, k. 7, p. 43b5-6; P'ou sa pen hing king, T 155, k. 1, p. 108c25; Hien yu king, T 202, k. 10, p. 418c29-419a1; k. 12, p. 433a9; Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, k. 10, p. 496b16; Abhinīṣkramaṇasūtra, T 190, k. 47, p. 871a2-3.

In the Mahāyānist or semi-Mahāyānist literature, see: Lalitavistara, ed. Lefmann, p. 5, l. 2; 403, l. 2; and T 186, k. 7, p. 528c28; T 187, k. 5, p. 565b16-17;; k. 8, p. 585a22-23; k. 11, p. 605b8-9, 611b6; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k.1, p. 219a17-19; k. 2, p. 228a19-20; k. 4, p. 243a22-23; k. 7, p. 266c17-19; k. 9, p. 285c18-20; k. 17, p. 345c19-20; k. 23, p. 384a25-26, and many other Mahāyānasūtras.

The Pāli texts, with the exception of those of late date, are practically silent about the Buddha's āveṇikas, but the Milindapañha should be mentioned which three times notes (p. 105, 216, 285) the 18 attributes of the Buddha (aṭṭhārasabuddhadahmmā) without, however, giving any further explanations.

When the sources do detail the 18 āveṇikas, we find three different lists, two of Sarvāstivādin or Vaibhāṣika origin and the third of Mahāyālist, probably Mahāsāṃghika, origin.

The first Sarvāstivādin list. – It is by far the best established and what is special about it is that it considers the 18 āveṇikas not as dharmas distinct from the other attributes of the Buddha but rather as a simple group of the four categories of buddhadharmas already appearing in the old canonical sūtras, namely, the 10 balas, 4 vaiśārādyas, 3 smṛtyupasthānas and mahākaruṇā, making up 18 āveṇikas. The balas and the vaiśārādyas have already been dealt with in the preceding chapters; as for the three smṛtyupasthānas belonging to the Buddha, they are also found “in the sūtra” (Pāli version in Majjhima, III, p. 221; Sanskrit version in Kośavyākhyā, p. 646, l. 34-647, l. 19).

This list is customary in the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharmas and the Vaibhāṣika Śāstras: Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 17, p. 85a26-27; k. 120, p. 624a14-15; k. 143, p. 735c16-18; T 1546, k. 37, p. 277b13-14; Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 1552, k. 6, p. 922c15-17; Kośa, VII, p. 66-67; Kośabhāṣya, p. 411; Kośavyākhyā, p. 640, l. 33-34; Nuāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 75, p. 746a11-12; Kośakārikāvibhāṣā, T 1563, k. 36, p. 955b2-3.

The Dīvyāvadāna, p. 182, l. 20; 268, l. 4, also mentions the 10 balas, 4 vaiśārādyas, 3 smṛtyupasthānas and mahākaruṇā as a group, but does not describe them as āveṇikabuddhadharmas.

A somewhat aberrant list is in Mañjuśrīpariṣcchā (T 468, k. 2, p. 505a28-29: the 18 āveṇikas are the 10 balas, the 4 vaiśārādyas plus the 4 great apramāṇas (maitrī, karuṇā, mudītā and upekṣā).

The second Sarvāstivādin list. – Here the āveṇikabuddhadharmas are not mixed in with the other categories of attributes but rather form an independent and distinct series. To my [Lamotte's] knowledge, the Traité is the only one to speak of it (see below, p. 1699F). It seems to attribute it to a group of Sarvāstivādin or Vaibhāṣika scholars and will comment that this list does not appear in the Tripiṭaka or in any of the other sūtras.

The Mahāyānist list. – Here also it is a matter of 18 āveṇikabuddhadharmas completely independent and distinct from the other categories of attributes of Buddha. Even though they are not of canonical origin, this list is by far the best known and is adopted by all the Mahāyānasūtras. Its title shows some divergences and the 18 āveṇikadharmas are not always cited in the same order.

The Sanskrit version of this list appears in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras and especially in the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 211, l. 17-212, l. 7, and the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1449, l. 22-1450, l. 14. The text of the editions contain some misprints which I [Lamotte] will take the liberty of correcting:

Punar aparāṃ Subhūte bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya mahāyānaṃ yad uthāṣṭādaśāveṇikabuddhadharmāḥ. katame 'ṣṭādaśa. Yāñ ca rātriṃ Subhūte tathāgato 'rhan anuttarāṃ samyaksambodhim abhisambuddho yāñ ca rātriṃ anupādāya parinirvāsyaty etasminn antare Subhūte.

1. nāsti tathāgasya skhalitaṃ,
2. nāsti ravitaṃ,
3. nāsti muṣitasmr̥tītā,
4. nāsti nānāvasaṃjñā,
5. nāsty asamāhitaṃ cittaṃ,
6. nāsty apratisaṃkhyāyopekṣa,
7. nāsti chandaparihāñir,
8. nāsti vīryaparihāñir,

9. nāsti smṛtiparihāṇir, <nāsti sammadhiparihāṇir>,
10. nāsti prajñāparihāṇir,
11. naŌti vimuktiparihāṇir,
12. nāsti vimuktijñānadarśanaparihāṇir,
13. sarvaṃ tathāgatasya kāyakarma jñānapūrvamgamam jñānānuparivartī,
14. sarvaṃ vākkarma jñānapūrvamgamam jñānānuparivartī,
15. sarvaṃ manaskarma jñānapūrvamgamam jñānānuparivartī,
16. atīte 'dhvany apratihataṃ asaṅgaṃ darśanam,
17. anāgate 'dhvany apratihataṃ asaṅgaṃ jñānaṃ darśanam,
18. pratyutpane 'dhvany apratihataṃ asaṅgaṃ jñānaṃ darśanam.

For the corresponding Chinese versions, see Kumārajīva's translation in Pañcaviṃśati (T 223, k. 5, p. 255c25-256a5; k. 24, p. 395b20-28) and Hsuan-tsang's translation in Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (T 220, vol. V, k. 53, p. 302a17-27; vol. VII, k. 415, p. 81b26-c4; k. 490, p. 489b4-14).

I [Lamotte] have described this list as Mahāyānist because it has been adopted by all the Mahāyānasūtras where it is discussed at length, e.g., in the Ratnakūṭa, section of the Bodhisattvapitaka (T 310, k. 40, p. 229b-233a; T 316, k. 15, p. 815b-818b). However, it was known by all Buddhists whatever their affiliation:

- 1) It appears in the Chinese version of the Lalitavistara by Dharmarakṣa: T 186, k. 6, p. 522c16-24.
- 2) It appears in the Mahāvastu, I, p. 160, l. 8-16.
- 3) It is mentioned in the Kośavyākhyā next to the first list of the Sarvāstivādins, p. 640, l. 34-641, l. 8.
- 4) It is repeated in the Vijñānavādin treatises: Sūtrālaṃkāra, XXI, 57, p. 187; Saṃgraha, p. 288-290, 302; Abhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā (T 1606, k. 14, p. 761c5-762a27) where it is commented on at length; Yogācārabhūmi, T 1579, k. 79, p. 738b18-c25. – We may note, however, that beside these 18 āveṇikas, the Yogācārabhūmi also accepts 40 others (T 1579, k. 50, p. 574b4; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 375, l. 3).
- 5) Glossaries such as the Dharmasaṃgraha, chap. 79, the Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 136-151 and the Arthaviniścaya, cap. 24, p. 579-580, list it.
- 6) It was known to the Ceylonese masters of late date such as Buddhārakkhita (5th cent.), author of the Jinālaṅkāra, and Moggallāna (12th cent.) author of the Abhidānappadīpikā: cf. Burnouf, Lotus, p. 649; Kern, Histoire, I, p. 283.

In the pages that will follow, the Traité will unreservedly adopt this Mahāyānist list and will criticize the two Sarvāstivādin lists which, in its opinion, include attributes not exclusively belonging to the Buddha himself.

II. THE EIGHTEEN ĀVEṆIKADHARMAS OF THE BODHISATTVAS

In the preceding chapter we have seen that the Traité, on the basis of various Mahāyānasūtras, juxtaposed the balas, vaiśāradyas and pratisaṃvids of the bodhisattva to the balas, vaiśāradyas and pratisaṃvids of the Buddha. We would expect it to do the same here and that, after having explained the āveṇikadharmas of the Buddha, it deals with the āveṇikadharmas of the bodhisattva. This omission is more odd in that some sources used by the Traité, such as the Ratnameghasūtra (cited at k. 100, p. 756b7-8) contained a list of 18 āveṇikabodhisattvadharmas (T 660, k. 4, p. 301b25-c12; T 489, k. 7, p. 722b19-c4; Tib. Trip., vol. 35, no. 897, fol. 51a3-51b2), the original Sanskrit of which has been reproduced by the Mahāvvyut., no. 787-804. Here is the text and the translation:

1. Bodhisattvā anupadiṣṭadānāḥ
2. anupadiṣṭaśīlāḥ,
3. anupadiṣṭakṣāntayāḥ,
4. anupadiṣṭavīryāḥ,
5. anupadiṣṭadhyānāḥ,
6. anupadiṣṭaprajñāḥ,
7. saṃgrahavastusarvastvasaṃgrāhakāḥ,
8. pariñānāmanavidhijñāḥ,
9. upāyakaśalya[ena] sarvastvacaritādhipat[a]ya[h] paramayayānaniryāṇasaṃdarśakāḥ
10. mahāyānācyutatāḥ,
11. saṃsāranirvāṇamukhasaṃdarśakāḥ,
12. yamakavyatyastāhārakuśalāḥ,
13. jñānapūrvamgamā [a]nabhisamṣkāranirvadye[na] sarvajanmābhimukhapravṛttāḥ,
14. daśakuśalopetakāyavagmanaskarmāntāḥ,
15. sarvaduḥkṣaṇdhasaḥ[mā]nātmopadānā[t] sarvasattvadhātvariparityāgināḥ,
16. sarvajagadabhirucisaṃdarśakāḥ,
17. kiyatkr̥cchrabālāśraṇavakamady[e] śubhavyūharatnakalpavṛkṣa[sama]dṛḍhasarvajñātā-cittāsaṃpramuṣītāḥ,
18. sarvadharmapaṭṭābhīṣekaprāpti[to] buddhadharmasaṃdarśanānirvṛttāḥ.

Transl. – 1- 6. The bodhisattvas possess a generosity, morality, patience, exertion, trance and wisdom which were not taught to them by others; 7. they charm beings by means of captivating means; 8. they know the rule of applying [merits]; 9. sovereign teachers of all the activities of beings by virtue of their skill in skillful means, they show how to escape from saṃsāra by way of the Greater Vehicle; 10. they do not regress from the Greater Vehicle; 11. they show the direction of saṃsāra and of nirvāṇa; 12. they are skilled in uttering reverse and inverse sounds (cf. Vimalakīrti, Introduction, p. 33-37); 13. preceded by knowledge, they impeccably go towards all [kinds] of rebirths; 14. their actions of body, speech and mind are endowed with the ten good [paths of action]; 15. taking up existences capable of supporting the mass of suffering, they never abandon the world of beings; 16. they load beings with contentment; 17. in the midst of fools and listeners no matter how difficult, they never forget the strong mind of omniscience towards the pure wonders such as the precious Kalpavṛkṣa ‘the wish-fulfilling tree’; 18. having acquired the crown and the anointing of all the dharmas, they never cease to preach the Buddhadharma.

Above (p. 1607F) I [Lamotte] have mentioned the other lists of āveṇīkabodhisattvadharmas.

First Section MAHĀYĀNIST LIST OF THE EIGHTEEN SPECIAL ATTRIBUTES OF THE BUDDHA

[k. 26, p. 247b]

I. TEXT OF THE LIST ACCORDING TO THE PRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀ

Here are the eighteen special attributes (aṣṭādaśāveṇīkadharma):

1. The Tathāgata has no bodily defect (nāsti tathāgatasya skhalitam).
2. He has no vocal defect (nāsti ravitam).
3. He has no failure of memory (nāsti muṣitasmr̥tītā).
4. He has no notion of variety (nāsti nāmāivasamjñā).
5. He does not have an unconcentrated mind (nāsty asamāhitam cittam).
6. He does not have thoughtless indifference (nāsty apratisamkhyāyopekṣā).
7. He has no loss of zealousness (nāsti chandaparihāṇiḥ).
8. He has no loss of exertion (nāsti vīryaparihāṇiḥ).
9. He has no loss of mindfulness (nāsti smṛtiparihāṇiḥ).
10. He has no loss of wisdom (nāsti prajñāparihāṇiḥ).
11. He has no loss of liberation (nāsti vimuktiparihāṇiḥ).
12. He has no loss of the knowledge and vision of deliverance (nāsti vimuktijñānadarśanaparihāṇiḥ).

13. Every bodily action of the Tathāgata is preceded by knowledge and accompanies knowledge (sarvaṃ tathāgatasya kāyakarma jñānapūrvamgamam jñānānuparivartī).

14. Every vocal action is preceded by knowledge and accompanies knowledge (sarvaṃ vākkarma jñānapūrvamgamam jñānānuparivartī).

15. Every mental action is preceded by knowledge and accompanies knowledge (sarvaṃ manaskarma jñānapūrvamgamam jñānānuparivartī).

16. He has non-attached and unobstructed knowledge about past time (atīte ‘dhvany asaṅgam apratihataṃ jñānam darśanam).

17. He has non-attached and unobstructed knowledge about future time (anāgate ‘dhvany asaṅgam apratihataṃ jñānam darśanam).

18. He has non-attached and unobstructed knowledge about the present time (pratyutpanne ‘dhvany asaṅgam apratihataṃ jñānam darśanam).

Question. - Thirty-six attributes⁷⁵² are all attributes of the Buddha. Why are just these eighteen special?

Answer. – The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas possess some of the eighteen first attributes, but they do not share this second series of eighteen attributes.

Thus, Śāriputra was able to answer any question whatsoever and always develop it with further words because he penetrated it without any obstacle, and the Buddha congratulated him saying that he understood the fundamental element well (dharmadhātū).⁷⁵³

Aniruddha was the foremost of those who possess the divine eye (divyacakṣukāṇām agryaḥ).⁷⁵⁴

⁷⁵² A first group of 18 buddha attributes consisting of the 10 balas (discussed in chap. XXXIX), the 4 vaiśāradyas and the 4 pratisamvids (discussed in chap. XL) plus a second group of 18 attributes that are the object of the present chapter. The Sarvāstivādins consider the first group to be the special attributes of the Buddha, whereas the Mahāyānists disagree with this affirmation: for them, the second group alone constitutes the all the special attributes of the Buddha.

⁷⁵³ Cf. Nidānasamyukta, p. 203-204 (Tsa a han, T 99, k. 14, p. 95c8-16); Saṃyutta, II, p. 54 and 56): Śāriputra says: Saced ekaṃ divasam, ekaṃ rātridivisam, saptāpi praṣṇam prṣṭo vyākurvām: “If for one day, for one night and one day, and even for seven nights and seven days, the Blessed One asked me a question on a given subject always with different phrases and different syllables, I would be able, for these seven nights seven days, to answer the Blessed One on this same subject for and seven nights and seven days, always with new phrases and new syllables.” And the Buddha declares: “It is indeed in this way that the fundamental element is well understood to its depths by the monk Śāriputra.”

If Śāriputra is able to preach the Dharma with such ‘assurance’, it is because he possesses the four vaiśāradyas. Therefore the vaiśāradyas are not attributes exclusively reserved for the Buddha.

⁷⁵⁴ Anguttara, I, p. 23: Etad aggaṃ mama sāvakānaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ dibbacakkukāṇām yadidaṃ anuruddho.

Such śrāvakas all shared the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), and since they shared them, the Buddha said: “Among my disciples who utter the lion’s roar (simhanāḍika), the foremost is Pin-t’ou-lo P’o-lo-to-che (Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja).”⁷⁵⁵

Śāriputra affirmed of himself: “For seven nights and seven days I was able to expand on the same subject”, so inexhaustible his knowledge on the four ways of answering (catvāriyākaraṇāni).

The arhats Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Pūrṇa, Ānanda, Kātyāyana, etc., also know things (artha), names (nāman), expressions (nirukti) and elocution (pratibhāna).⁷⁵⁶

This is why the eighteen first attributes [of the Buddha] do not merit the [247c][name of ‘special attributes of the Buddha’.

II. DETAILED COMMENTARY ON THE LIST

1-2. The Buddha has no bodily or vocal defect

Question. – Why does the Buddha have no bodily defect (skhalita) or vocal defect (ravita)?

Answer. – For innumerable incalculable periods (asamkhyeyakalpa) the Buddha has observed purity of morality (śīlaviśuddhi): this is why his bodily and vocal actions are faultless. The other arhats such as Śāriputra, etc., have cultivated the precepts for less time, sixty kalpas at maximum:⁷⁵⁷ this is why they have faults. For innumerable incalculable periods the Buddha has accumulated and perfected the pure precepts (viśuddhiśīla), he has always practiced the profound concentrations (gambhīrasamādhi), he has obtained all the marvelous knowledges and has properly cultivated the mind of great compassion (mahākaruṇacitta): this is why he is without faults.

Furthermore, the Buddha has uprooted all the root causes of the wrongdoings: this is why he is faultless. The root causes of the wrongdoings are of four kinds: i) lust (rāga), ii) hatred (dveṣa), iii) (bhaya), iv) ignorance (moha). The Buddha has uprooted these root causes and their traces (vāsanā). The arhats and pratyekabuddhas, although they have uprooted the causes of the wrongdoings, have not eliminated the traces (vāsanā): this is why they sometimes have faults. The Buddha himself knows all these dharmas fully and completely, ⁷⁵⁵ Ibid., p. 23: Etad aggaṃ mama sāvakānaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ sīhanāḍikānaṃ yadidampiṇḍola-Bhāradvājo.

One cannot utter the lion’s roar without having the vaiśāradyas. The fact that Piṇḍola utters it shows that the Buddha is not alone in possessing the vaiśāradyas.

⁷⁵⁶ If these disciples know these four things, it is because they had the four pratisamvids; therefore the Buddha is not alone in having them.

⁷⁵⁷ Cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 71, p. 366c11-12; k. 101, p. 525b19.

Those who do not know them [thus] commit faults. Thus, Śāriputra while walking with five bhikṣus came to an empty house where he spent the night. It was a day when the pratimokṣa is recited. Śāriputra was not familiar with the rules for the inner limits (anṭhasīmā) and the outer limits (bāhyasīmā).⁷⁵⁸ This was reported to the Buddha who said: When one leaves the residence (āvāsa) at the end of one night, there are no determined limits.

Another time Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana returned leading five hundred bhikṣus who uttered loud shouts and cries (uccaśabdā mahāśabdā abhūvan). Then the Buddha chased them away (praṇāmayati sma).⁷⁵⁹ This was a vocal fault [on the part of the disciples].

Another time Śāriputra had neglected the dietary rules and the Buddha said to him: You are eating impure food (aviśuddhāhāra).⁷⁶⁰

Thus, therefore, [the arhats] had bodily and vocal faults. But the Buddha who has eliminated the traces of the passions (kleśavāsanā) has no such faults.

Finally, in the Buddha, all the bodily and vocal actions accompany knowledge (jñānānuparivartin): this is why his body is faultless and his voice is faultless.

For all these kinds of reasons, the Buddha has no defect of body (nāsti skhalitam) and no defect of speech (nāsti ravitam).

3. The Buddha has no lapse of mindfulness

There is no failure of mindfulness (nāsty muusitasmr̥tītā). Indeed, during the long night (dīrgharātram) he developed the mind of the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), he developed the profound concentrations (gambhīrasamādhi), his mind was without any distractions (avikṣipta), he eliminated the thirst of desires (kāmaṭṭṣṇā) and joy of the dharma (dharmaprīti), his mind was not attached to any dharma and he attained the supreme safety of mind (paramacittakakṣemavihāra). If the mind is fearful or hasty, there are lapses of mindfulness; but the mind of the Buddha has none of these faults: this is why he has no lapses.

Furthermore, by means of the [memory of] former abodes (pūrvanivāsānusmṛti), the sciences (vidya) and the powers (bala), the Buddha has triply adorned his mindfulness which is perfect and without defect because his mindfulness often bears upon the past.

Furthermore, as his faculty of mindfulness (smṛtīndriya) is of immense and inexhaustible power, his memory has no lapses.

⁷⁵⁸ These are the precepts relating to the boundaries of the parishes (sīmā) and the celebration of the Upoṣāda in common: cf. Vinaya, I, p. 102-136.

⁷⁵⁹ Episode related in Majjhima, I, p. 456-457 and already mentioned above, p. 1575F.

⁷⁶⁰ Episode related in detail above, p. 120-121F

Finally, in the Buddha, all mental actions accompany knowledge (sarvaṃ manaskarma jhānānuparivartī): this is why his mindfulness has no lapses since at each moment it accompanies the mind.

This is what is understood by mindfulness without lapse. See what has been [248a] said in the T'ien wen king (Devatāparprcchāsūtra).⁷⁶¹

[The deity asked]:

Who is the man without fault?

Who is the man with unfailing mindfulness?

Who is the ever-attentive man (smṛtimat)

Who accomplishes what he must do?

[The Buddha answered]:

The man who knows all dharmas perfectly,

Who is freed of all obstacles

And is endowed with all the qualities:

He is unique: it is the Buddha.

4. The Buddha has no notion of variety

He has no notion of variety (nāsti nānāvasaṃjñā). The Buddha has no point of distinctions (vibhaṅga) among beings; he makes no difference between those who are far away and those who are close; he does not say: This one is noble and I can speak to him; that one is lowly and I must not speak to him. Just as the sun lights up everything, so the Buddha with the rays of his great compassion (mahākaruṇāraśmī) has pity for all and saves all alike. Whether one honors him or does not honor him, whether it concerns enemies or relatives, noblemen or scoundrels, all are alike to him.

See for example this stranger, the dung-sweeper called Ni-t'o (Nītha): the Buddha converted him and he became a great arhat.⁷⁶²

⁷⁶¹ Arahaṇ suttā of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 14, already cited above, p. 67-68F and notes.

⁷⁶² Nītha (?) was a refuse-sweeper. His long hair hung down in disorder; he was filthy and his clothes were in tatters. When he found a rag on his way, he used it to mend his garments. On his back he carried a jar full of refuse. One day when the Buddha was visiting Rājagṛha, Nītha, lowly and impure, did not dare to come near him for fear of increasing his misdeeds further. He took flight across the city, but at each corner the Buddha appeared before him. The Teacher said to him: “Although your body is impure, your heart possesses the excellent and wonderful perfume of the Dharma. You must not think of yourself as lowly.” Having received the Buddha’s teaching, Nītha entered the religious life and became an arhat.

See also the vaiśya Tō-hou (Śrīgupta) who wanted to harm the Buddha with a ditch full of fire and with poisoned rice. The same day, the Buddha liberated him from the threefold poison (triviṣa) and extinguished the fire of wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi) in him.⁷⁶³

Such examples show that the Buddha has no notion of variety (nānāvasaṃjñā).

Furthermore, the Buddha has no fondness (anunaya) for the practitioners of his doctrine such as Śāriputra, the bodhisattva Maitreya, etc.; he has no aversion (pratigha) either for people of wrong view such as Devadatta or the six heretic masters, Pūraṇa, etc. As the Buddha has formed his mind [in total impartiality] for innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakālpā), he is the Jewel (ratna) among beings and, like pure gold, he does not undergo variations.

Furthermore, “three times during the night and three times during the day, the Buddha considers beings with his Buddha eye” (trī rātreḥ trir divasasya śaṭkṛtvo rātriṃdivasena buddhacakṣuṣā lokam vyavalokayati)⁷⁶⁴ and never allows the time of asking himself who can be converted (vaineya) to pass by. Considering beings impartially, he has no notion of variety.

Furthermore, the Buddha has praised the good dharmas (kuśaladharma) in many ways (anekaparyāyeṇa) and criticized the bad dharmas (akuśaladharma) in many ways. However, faced with good or with bad, his mind shows no increase or decrease (anānādhika): it is only in order to save beings that he makes distinctions. Thus he has no notion of variety.

Furthermore, it is said in the Yi-ts'ie-pou-hing king (Sarvadharmāpravṛttinirdeśa):⁷⁶⁵ “The Buddha considers all beings as his own self, as having fulfilled their role (kṛtya) and having neither beginning, middle or end (anādimadhyaparyavasana).”⁷⁶⁶ That is why he has no notion of variety.

The name of the dung-sweeper is poorly established: Nītha or Nīthi in the fragments of the Kalpanāmaṇḍitīkā, Sunīta in Pāli, Ni-t'o and Ni-t'i in the Chinese transcriptions. His story is told in the following sources:

Kalpanāmaṇḍitīkā, p. 158-160 (very mutilated fragments) and Sutrālaṃkāra said to be by Aśvaghoṣa, T 201, no. 43, k. 7, p. 203c-297a (transl. Huber, p. 192-210); Theragāthā, p. 63-64, v. 620-631, and its commentary (tr. Rhys Davids, Psalm of the Brethren, p. 271-274); Hien yu king, T 202, k. 6, no. 35, p. 397a-390a; Tch'ou yao king, T 212, k. 19, p. 710a1-c1.

Nītha is also mentioned in passing in the Hien yu king, T 202, k. 4, p. 377a12, and the Sarvāstivādinayavibhaṅga, T 1442, k. 42, p. 858a28-29.

⁷⁶³ For Śrīgupta, see above, p. 184F, note 4.

⁷⁶⁴ Stock phrase: cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 95, 124, 265; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 16, 30, 72, etc.

⁷⁶⁵ The correct title is indeed Sarvadharmāpravṛttinirdeśa (cf. Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 6, l. 16; 90. l. 19; 99. l. 3; Mahāvīyut. no. 1362) ‘Teaching of the non-functioning of all dharmas’ and not Sarvadharmapṛavṛttinirdeśa as it is spelled most often in western lists. This sutra has come down to us in three Chinese translations and one Tibetan translation:

1) T 650: Tchou fa wou hing king, transl. by Kumārajīva.

Furthermore, the Buddha sees that all beings and all things are, from the beginning, unborn (anutpanna), unceasing (aniruddha), always pure (śuddha) and like nirvāṇa: thus he has no notion of variety.

Finally, the Pou-eul-jou fa-men (Advayapraveśadharmaparyāya) or the ‘Teaching on the entry into non-duality’⁷⁶⁷ is the doorway to the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇāṃ bhūtalakṣaṇa). Variety (nānātva) is duality (dvaya), and duality is wrong view (mithyādr̥ṣṭi). But the Buddha is not a deceiver (amāyāvin) and cannot commit a deception (māyā). He always applies the Teaching on the entry into non-duality, and deception is variety.

That is why he has no notion of variety.

5. The Buddha has no non-concentrated mind

He has no non-concentrated mind (nāsty asaṃhita-cittam). Concentration (saṃādhi) is the non-distraction of the mind (cittāvikṣepa). In a distracted mind, it [248b] is impossible to see the truth: distraction is like a body of water disturbed by waves where one cannot see one’s own face; it is like a lamp (dīpa) in the full wind which cannot illumine well. This is why it is said that the Buddha does not have a non-concentrated mind.

Question. – The concentrations go from the anāgāmya [preliminary concentration of the first dhyāna] on up to the absorption of cessation (nirodhasaṃāpatti). When one enters into these absorptions, it is impossible to assert any physical action (kāyakarman) or vocal action (vākkarman). Hence, if the Buddha is always concentrated (saṃāhita) and has no non-concentrated mind, how can he travel through the kingdoms, take up the four positions (īryāpatha) and preach the Dharma to the great assemblies with all kinds of nidānas and avadānas? Whether these actions are of the domain of the desire realm (kāmadhātuvavacara) or of the Brahmā world, the Buddha cannot enter into concentration if he wants to accomplish them.

Answer. – When we said that he has no non-concentrated mind, that can have several meanings.

2) Tchou fa pen wou king, transl. under the Souei by Jinagupta between the 6th and 7th month of the 15th k’ai houang year or August to September 595 (cf. Li, T 2034, k. 12, p. 103c6).

3) T 652: Ta tch’eng souei tchouan chouo tchou fa king, transl. under the Pei Song (960-1127) by Chao tō and others.

4) OKC 847: Chos thams cad lbyuñ ba med par bstan pa, transl. by Rin chen mtsho.

⁷⁶⁶ Cf. Tchou fa wou hing king, T 650, k. 1, p. 751a28-29: “Beings are Bodhi; Bodhi is beings. Bodhi and beings are one and the same thing, namely, the Bhagavat.”

⁷⁶⁷ According to the practice somewhat current at its time, the Traité here refers to the Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra by citing the title of one of its chapters instead of the title of the sūtra itself. It refers to chapter VIII: ‘Introduction to the doctrine of non-duality’ (p. 301-318 of my [Lamotte’s] translation of the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa).

Being concentrated means being fixed on the good dharmas with a mind that is always absorbed (sadāsamgrhācittena). Now the Buddha is fixed on the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and never strays from that. Therefore he does not have a non-concentrated mind.

Furthermore, in the desire realm (kāmadhātu) there are some concentrations where those who have entered into them are able to preach the Dharma. Thus, in the Abhidharma it is a question of [concentrations] belonging to the desire realm (kāmadhātuvavacara), such as the four levels of saints (āryavaṃśa),⁷⁶⁸ the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna), the four bases of magical power (ṛddhipāda), the five faculties (indriya), the five strengths (bala), the concentration preventing being attacked by others (araṇāsamādhi),⁷⁶⁹ the knowledge resulting from aspiration (praṇidhījñāna),⁷⁷⁰ and the four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid). There are marvelous qualities of this kind in which the Buddha is established while entering into the world of desire: this is why he has no non-concentrated mind.

When the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas emerge from concentration (saṃādher vyūthitāḥ), they enter into an undefined mind (avyākṛtacitta), they enter into a good mind (kuśalacitta) or they enter into a defiled mind (samālacitta). But when the Buddha comes out of concentration and enters into a concentration of the desire realm (kāmadhātusaṃādhi),⁷⁷¹ he has not a single moment of distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta): this is why he has no non-concentrated mind.

Furthermore, according to the śrāvaka system, when the magically created beings (nirmita) preach the Dharma, their creator (nirmātr), [namely, the śrāvaka, does not speak, and when the creator speaks, the magically created beings do not speak. It is not so with the Buddha: the magically created beings and their creator, [namely, the Buddha,] preach the Dharma together.⁷⁷² [In the śrāvakas, the mind in concentration (saṃādhicitta) is necessarily different [from the mind of creation (nirmāṇacitta)] and when the śrāvaka enters into concentration, he does not speak. The Buddha himself, while remaining in concentration, is able to preach the Dharma and to walk about (caṅkramitum). This is what is said in the Mi-tsi king (Guhyasūtra, ⁷⁶⁸ Being content with clothing (cīvara), food (piṇḍapāta), beds (śayanāsana) and delighting in renunciation and meditation (prahāṇabhāvanā): cf. Dīgha, III, p. 224-225; Anguttara, II, p. 27-28.

⁷⁶⁹ See above, p. 4F and note 1, 633F, 1041F; Kośa, VII, p. 86-87.

⁷⁷⁰ See Kośa, VII, p. 88-89.

⁷⁷¹ In other words, when the Buddha comes out of a dhyāna or a saṃāpatti of the two higher realms in order to enter into the concentrations of the desire realm so as to devote himself to the practice of the *bodhipāṅśikadharma*s.

⁷⁷² Here the Traité is repeating what it has already said above, p. 468-469F. Once more it seems to stray from the canonical sources in whose words the nirmitas of the śrāvakas speak when the śrāvaka speaks and remain silent when the śrāvaka is silent. Only the Buddha was able to converse with his nirmitas.

or Tathāgatacintyaḡuhyānirdeśa), in regard to the Secret of the mind (cittaguhyā):⁷⁷³ “The mind of the Buddhas is always in concentration”, but they are still able to preach the Dharma.

Furthermore, distractions (vikṣiptacitta), fetters (saṃyojana), doubts (vicikitsa) do not exist in the Buddha. Although he has no doubts concerning the four truths (catuḥsatya), the arhat often still has doubts about dharmas. The eternally concentrated Buddha has no doubts about dharmas: this is why he has no non-concentrated mind.

Moreover, the arhat who still has traces of the disturbing emotions (kleśavāsanā) and is capable of regressing (parihāṇadharman) has distractions. The Buddha who, in his omniscience, has complete knowledge, has no distractions. He is like a vessel (ghaṭa) full of water where there is neither sound (svara) nor movement (īraṇa). The Buddha is the only person who can be called free of deception (amāyāvin);⁷⁷⁴ he is the foremost of the three strong individuals (dr̥ḡhapudgala).⁷⁷⁵ His mind remains unchanged in suffering as in happiness.

All the characteristics of things (dharmalakṣaṇa), unity (ekārtha), multiplicity (nānārtha), production (utpāda), cessation (nirodha), interruption (uccheda), permanence (śāśvata), coming (āgama) and going (nirgama) are deceptions, [248c] the formation (saṃskāra) of a collection of falsehoods.⁷⁷⁶ Since the Buddha is well established (supraṭiṣṭhita) in the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, his mind is never non-concentrated and, being never non-concentrated, it does not change.

Moreover, among the five incomprehensible things (acintyadharmā), the attributes of the Buddha are the most incomprehensible:⁷⁷⁷ these eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā) are the profound treasure ⁷⁷³ Cf. T 310, k. 11, p. 59c8 and seq; T 312, k. 9, p. 724c14 and seq.: “From the night when the Tathāgata realized the Bodhi of the Buddhas until the day when he was nirvāṇized, during that interval, the Tathāgata is free of doubt and transformation: his mind is without thought, without movement, without instability, without mixing, without scattering, without distraction, without change...”.

For the Tathāgatacintyaḡuhyānirdeśa, one of the sources of the Traité, see above, p. 10F, note 3; p. 560F; amd later, k. 26, p. 253b3; k. 30, p. 284a17-18; k. 57, p. 466b6; k. 88, p. 684a22.

⁷⁷⁴ However, the bhikṣu who has destroyed the impurities (kṣīṇāsvara) is also without cheating or deceit (asaṅḡho hoti amāyāvi): cf. Majjhima, I, p. 97; II, p. 95, 25; Anguttara, III, p. 65; V, p. 15.

⁷⁷⁵ Accordiong to the Tseng yi a han (T 125, k. 12, p. 607a2-5), the three individuals worthy of homage (pūjā) are the Tathāgata, the disciple of the Tathāgata who has destroyed the impurities and is arhat, and the cakravartin king. For the pratyekabuddhas, these individuals are worthy of a stūpa (Dīgha, II, p. 142; Anguttara, II, p. 245).

⁷⁷⁶ The eight characteristics in question are rejected by Nāgārjuna in the dedication to his Madhyamakakārikā (cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 3, l. 11:

Anirodham anutpādam amucchedam aśāśvataṃ /

anekārtham anānārtham anādamam anirgamam //

These are the eight well-known Nāgārjunian negations.

⁷⁷⁷ The Traité lists five acintyas: cf. k. 30, p. 383c17-20: “The sūtra speaks of five incomprehensible things, namely: i) the number of beings, ii) retribution of action (karmavipāka), iii) the strength of a man

(gambhīranidhāna) of the Buddha. Who can understand them? This is why it is certain that the Buddha hs no non-concentrated mind.

Although the Buddha enters into concentration, he does not have these coarse minds (audārikacitta) of investigation (vitarka) and analysis (vicāra) and, having incomprehensible knowledge (acintyajñāna), he can preach the Dharma.

The heavenly musical instruments (dīvyatūrya) make all sorts of sounds dear to the gods, and they do so while being without mind (citta) or consciousness (viññāna) by virtue of the merits (punya) acquired by the gods.⁷⁷⁸ If these heavenly musical instruments that are without mind or consciousness do such things, how could it be said that the Buddha, who is endowed with mind, cannot preach the Dharma?

This is why it is said that the Buddha does not have a non-concentrated mind.

6. The Buddha has no unconsidered equanimity

He has no unconsidered equanimity (nāsty apratisaṃkhyopekṣā). – Beings have three types of sensations (vedanā): unpleasant (duḥkhavedanā), pleasant (sukhavedanā), neither unpleasant nor pleasant in trance (dhyāyibala), iv) the strength of the nāgas (nāgabala), v) the power of the Buddhas. Of these five incomprehensible things, the power of the Buddhas is the most incomprehensible.” – See also later, k. 90, p. 698b20; k. 93, p. 714a21; k. 98, p. 743b14. – The same list is repeated by T’an louan (476-542) in his notes on the Amitāyusūtra, T 1819, k. 2, p. 836b7-10.

However, the canonical sūtras list only four acintyas (in Pāli, acinteyya):

1) Anguttara, II, p. 80: Cattar’ imāni bhikkhave acinteyyāni na cintetabbāni yāni cintento ummāḍassa vighātassa bhāgī assa. katamāni cattāri? Buddhānaṃ buddhavisayo... jhāyissa jhānavisayo... kammavipako... lokacintā: “Here, O monks, are the four incomprehensible things about which you should not think, for the person who thinks about them will be prey to mistakes and trouble. What are these four things? The Buddha domain of the Buddhas, the domain of the person in trance, the retribution of action, and philosophical speculations about the world.”

2) Ekottarāgama, T 125, k. 18, p. 6406-9: i) lokadhātu, ii) sattva, iii) nāgaviśaya, iv) buddhaviśaya.

3. Ibid., k. 21, p. 657a2-21: i) sattva, ii) lokadhātu, iii) nāgaviśaya, iv) buddhaviśaya.

4) Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 8, p. 43c16-18; k. 86, p. 493c16-19: i) karmaviśaya, ii) nāgaviśaya, iii) dhyānaviśaya, iv) buddhaviśaya.

Contrary to the Traité, the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 113, p. 586b24; T 1546, k. 22, p. 163a8-9) considers that, of the five acintyas, karmavipāka is the most profound.

Finally, in the Hien yang cheng kiao louen (T 1602, k. 6, p. 510c2-6), Asaṅga postulates six acintyas: i) ātman, ii) sattva, iii) loka, iv) sarvasattvakarmavipāka, v) dhyānasākṣātkāra and dhyānaviśaya. vi) buddha and buddhaviśaya.

⁷⁷⁸ See above, p. 1049F, the comments on the lute of the Asuras.

(adḥkhāsukhavedanā). The unpleasant sensation produces hatred (dveṣa), the pleasant sensation produces love (rāga), the neither unpleasant nor pleasant produces confusion (moha). Of these three kinds of sensation, the unpleasant sensation produces suffering (duḥkha), abides in suffering and destroys happiness; the pleasant sensation produces happiness (sukha), abides in happiness and destroys suffering; as for the neither unpleasant nor pleasant sensation, one does not know if it is suffering or if it is happiness.

Other people who are of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) experience the unpleasant and the pleasant sensations especially, but they do not feel the neither unpleasant nor pleasant sensation, they do not know it and have only indifference (upekṣā) for it: they are fettered by the fetter of confusion (mohasaṃyojana). The Buddha, on the other hand, knows completely the moment of arising (utpāda), the moment of duration (sthiti) and the moment of cessation (bhaṅga) of the neither unpleasant nor pleasant sensation: this is why it is said that the Buddha has no unconsidered equanimity.

Question. – But what is equanimity (upekṣā) here? Is it the absence of suffering and happiness which is upekṣā, or is it a matter of the upekṣā that is one of the seven factors of enlightenment (sambodhyaṅga), or again is it the upekṣā that is one of the four immeasurables (apramāṇacitta)?

Answer. – The absence of suffering and of happiness constitutes the twofold domain (sthānadvaya) of upekṣā and the abandoning [of this domain] is also called upekṣā. How is that?

In the course of a neither unpleasant nor pleasant sensation, other people do not take into account, from moment to moment, the moments of arising (utpāda), of duration (sthiti) and cessation (bhaṅga) of this sensation: it takes a long time for them to notice it. But the Buddha cognizes [these three moments] completely each successive moment.

Upekṣā is also part of the seven factors of enlightenment (sambodhyaṅga); when the mind is completely balanced, when it is not sinking (nāvālīyate) or being scattered (na vikṣipyate), this is when equanimity (upekṣā) should be practiced. In the moments of sinking, one practices the notion of exertion (vīryasaṃjñā), and in the moments of distraction, one practices the notion of concentration of the mind (cittasaṃgrahaṇasaṃjñā).

In some circumstances, the arhats and pratyekabuddhas concentrate their mind wrongly or excite it wrongly, and their equanimity is thus in disequilibrium. The Buddha, however, is never without completely cognizing the coarseness or the subtleness, the profundity or the superficiality inherent in the instantaneous minds. Knowing that, he is [truly] indifferent.

Question. – If that is so, how was the Buddha able to talk to the bhikṣus about Nan-t’o, saying: “In Nanda, the sensations (vedanā) are completely conscious at the moment when they arise, completely conscious when they endure and completely conscious at the moment when they are destroyed, and it is the same for the notions (saṃjñā) and investigations (vitarka)”? [Is that not a privilege reserved to the Buddha?]

Answer. – There are two ways of being conscious: [249a]

1) When a duḥkhavedanā ‘unpleasant sensation’ arises, knowing that a duḥkhavedanā is arising; when a duḥkhavedanā continues, knowing that a duḥkhavedanā is continuing; when a duḥkhavedanā ceases, knowing that a duḥkhavedanā is ceasing. When a sukhavedanā ‘pleasant sensation’ arises, knowing that a sukhavedanā is arising; when a sukhavedanā continues, knowing that a sukhavedanā is continuing; when a sukhavedanā ceases, knowing that a sukhavedanā is ceasing. The same for a duḥkhāsukhavedanā ‘neither unpleasant nor pleasant sensation’. This is knowing only the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa), but not the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) of the sensation. [This way of being conscious was that of Nanda.]

2) Having full consciousness and full awareness from moment to moment of the duḥkha-, sukha- and aduḥkhāsukha-vedanā succeeding one another from moment to moment (kṣaneḥaṇā) and not ignoring the mental events (caitasikadharma) following one another from moment to moment. [This is the way of being conscious of the Buddha.] This is why it is said that he has no unconsidered indifference.

Furthermore, the Buddha sometimes went away from beings in order to enter into deep meditation (pratisaṃlayitum) for one or two months.⁷⁷⁹ There are people who doubt and wonder: The Buddha came into the world to save beings; why then is he always in concentration?

The Buddha tells them: “It is for many reasons and knowingly that I am leaving beings. There is no unconsidered indifference (apratisaṃkhyāyipekṣā) in me.”

Question. – What are the reasons why he leaves them knowingly?

Answer. – In the middle of the great assemblies, the Buddha is tired and that is why he wants to rest for a while.⁷⁸⁰

⁷⁷⁹ These retreats of the Buddha have been frequently mentioned in the texts: Vinaya, III, p. 68, 230; Dīgha, II, p. 237; Saṃyutta, V, p. 12-13, 320, 325. The Buddha always used the following expression to take leave: lccham’ ahaṃ addhamāsaṃ (or temāsaṃ, cattāro māse) paṭisaṃlayitum, n’amhi kenaci upasaṃkamitabbo aññatra piṇḍapātānīhārakena: “I wish to go into meditation for two weeks (three or four months); I do not wish to be approached by anyone except the person who will bring me food.”

⁷⁸⁰ Several times, having preached until late in the night, the Buddha was tired and asked one of his disciples, Śāriputra, Ānanda or Maudgalyāyana, to continue with the teaching. The episode is always related in the following words:

Dīgha, III, p. 209; Majjhima, I, p. 354; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 184; Anguttara, V, p. 126: Atha kho Bhagā... āyasmantaṃ sārīputtaṃ āmantesi: Vigatathīnamiddho kho Sārīputta bhikkhusaṃgho, paṭibhātū taṃ Sārīputta bhikkhūnaṃ dhammaikathā. Pitthi me āgilāyati, taṃ ahaṃ āyamiṣṣāmīti. – Evam bhante to kho āyasmā Sārīputto Bhagavato paccassosi. – Atha kho Bhagavā catugguṇaṃ saṃghāṭiṃ paññāpetvā dakkhiṇena passena sīhaseyyaṃ kappesi, pāde pādaṃ accādhāya sato sampajāno uṭṭhānasaññaṃ manasikaritvā.

“Then the Blessed One said to venerable Śāriputra: ‘The community of monks is free of langor and torpor, O Śāriputra; let the religious instruction [for it] come into your mind. My back is sore: I am going to lie down.’ Saying: ‘May it be so, O Lord’, the venerable Śāriputra gave his assent to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, having folded his cloak into four, lay down on his right side in the lion pose, one foot resting on top of the other, attentive, lucid, after having fixed his mind on the time to re-arise.”

Furthermore, from lifetime to lifetime, the Buddha has always liked solitude (naiṣkramya).

When, as a bodhisattva, he was in his mother's womb (mātrikuṣi), his mother loved solitude as well, and it was at forty li from the capital, in the forest of Lan-pi-ni (Lumbinīvana) she gave birth to him.⁷⁸¹

When the Buddha attained Bodhi, it was in the forest of Ngeou-leou-p'in lo (Uruvilvāvana) alone, at the foot of a tree that he became Buddha.⁷⁸²

When he turned the wheel of the Dharma for the first time, it was also at Sien-jen tchou-tch'ou (Rṣipatana) in the forest of Lou-lin (Mrgadāva).⁷⁸³

When he entered nirvāṇa, it was in the forest of So-lo trees (Śālavana) under two trees.

Thus, during the long night (dīrgharātram), he liked to practice solitude: this is why he entered into concentration.

Furthermore, the Buddha always has the mind of solitude (naiṣkramyacittasamanvāgata): that is why he entered into concentration.

Furthermore, the Buddha avoided crowds (saṃsarga) and places of unnecessary speech (saṃbhinnapralāpasthāna) and, by contemplating his own treasury of Buddha qualities (buddhaguṇanidhāna), he experienced happiness of supreme purity (paramaśuddhasukha): that is why he entered into concentration.

Furthermore, when the Buddha finished preaching the Dharma, he always advised the bhikṣus to practice solitary meditation (pratisaṃlayana) in the manner of having no regret (paścāttāpa) and, as he himself applied the advice that he gave (kaṇṭhokta), he entered into concentration.

Furthermore, he disliked homage (pīṭā) but, when he knew there were beings to be converted (vaineya), he entered into concentration and created fictive beings (nirmitapuruṣa) to come to save them.⁷⁸⁴

Furthermore, there are beings whose concentrations (samādhi) are rare and whose wisdoms (prajñā) are numerous. By giving them the example of his own practice of the dhyānas, the Buddha converts them.

Furthermore, there are people who get tired of always seeing the Buddha, and the Buddha withdraws a little so that they might aspire to see him again.⁷⁸⁵

For the corresponding Sanskrit wording, see Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 264, 286: Prṣṭhī ma āvilāyati tām tāvad āyāmayiṣye...Atha bhagavān gaṇaguṇāṃ saṃghātiṃ śirasi pratiṣṭhāpya dakṣiṇena pārśvena śayyāṃ kalpayati pāde pādān ādhāyālokaṃjñī pratismṛtaḥ saṃprajāna utthānasamjñāṃ manasi kurvāṇaḥ.

⁷⁸¹ See above, p. 21F, note 2.

⁷⁸² See above, p. 179F, 227-228F.

⁷⁸³ See above, p. 87F; 182F, note 1, 420F.

⁷⁸⁴ See the miracle of the multiplication of the fictive buddhas, p. 531-534F and notes; 1352-1353F.

⁷⁸⁵ Allusion to the schism at Kauśāmbī related above, p. 896-898F and notes.

Furthermore, when the Buddha wished to preach the Dharma to the devas, he went to a solitary place (vivikte sthāne).⁷⁸⁶

Furthermore, it is in order to establish a rule for future generations that the Buddha meditated and, when he turned the Wheel of Dharma, he passed this custom on to his disciples: this is why he entered into concentration.

Furthermore, the Buddha has shown a twofold path for gathering beings (sattvasaṃgrahāya): that of concentration (samādhi) and that of wisdom (prajñā). When the Buddha preaches the Dharma in the great assemblies, he illustrates the path of wisdom (prajñāmārga); but when he concentrates his mind in a solitary place (vivikte sthāne cittaṃ saṃgrhṇāti), he illustrates the path of concentration (samādhimārga). [249b]

Finally, in the face of the six sense objects (ṣaḍviśaya), beings have three kinds of reactions (saṃskāra): i) seeing beautiful colors (rūpa), they experience the happiness of joy (prītisukha); ii) seeing ugly colors, they experience the suffering of sadness (daurmanasyaduḥkha); iii) seeing neither unpleasant nor pleasant colors, they experience a feeling of indifference (upekṣacitta). And it is the same for [the other sense objects] on up to dharmas. The Buddha, however, has control (vaśīta) over the six sense objects (ṣaḍviśaya): in the face of pleasant or unpleasant objects, he is able to produce a feeling of indifference as has been said in regard to his holy magic (ṛddhi).

These are the various reasons why he enters into concentration and does not have any unconsidered indifference.

7. The Buddha has no loss of zeal

He has no loss of zeal (nāsti chandaparihāṇi). – Knowing the value of the good dharmas (kuśaladharma), the Buddha always wants to accumulate the good dharmas and since his mind never tires of cultivating the good dharmas, he has no loss of zeal.

[The Buddha helps a blind bhikṣu thread his needle.]⁷⁸⁷ – Thus there was once an partially blind old bhikṣu who was repairing his cloak (saṃghāṭi). Unable to thread his needle (sūcī), he said to people: “Would someone who wants to gain merit thread my needle for me?” The Buddha appeared before him and said: “I am someone who loves merit without ever tiring of it. Bring your needle.” Full of respect, the bhikṣu caught a glimpse of the Buddha's radiance and recognized his voice. He said to the Buddha: “The Buddha has exhausted the ends and the depths of the immense sea of qualities (apramāṇagaṇasāgara); why is he not yet satisfied?” The Buddha said to the bhikṣu: “The reward of the qualities (guṇavipāka) is very profound (gambhīra). There is nobody who knows their benefits as I do. Although I have exhausted the ends and the depths, my zeal (chandacitta) for merit is not yet satisfied (atṛpta): this is why I have become Buddha. Consequently, even now I do not stop. Although there are no further qualities that I might obtain, my zeal does not cease.” In fear, gods and men understood: “If the Buddha, [perfect as he is] is so insatiable for the qualities (guṇeṣv atṛptaḥ), what would it be for other people?” The Buddha preached the Dharma to the bhikṣu and at once his fleshly eye (māmsacakṣus) was enriched with the pure eye of wisdom (prajñācakus).

⁷⁸⁶ Thus Śakra devendra was converted in the Indraśailaguhā (above, p. 180F, note 2), and the four Caturmahārājakāyikadevas, on the shores of lake Mandākinī (Sarvāstivādin Vin., T 1435, k. 26, p. 193a; Mūlasarv. Vin., in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, I, p. 256-259; Tch'ou yao king, T 212, k. 23, p. 734b; Vibhhaṣā, T 1545, k. 79, p. 410a; T 1546, k. 41, p. 306c; T 1547, k. 9, p. 482c).

⁷⁸⁷ Anecdote taken from the Śibijātaka of the Avadānanaśataka, I, p. 182-183 which the Traité has already related above, p. 569-570F.

Question. - But the Buddha had previously eliminated the zeal for all the good dharmas (sarveṣu kuśaleṣu dharmaśuchandah); why is it said here that he has not lost zeal (nāsti chandapariñih)?

Answer. – When he ruled out zeal for all the good dharmas, he had in mind those who are “zealous to obtain good dharmas that have not yet been obtained” (anuttannānāṃ kuśalānāṃ dharmānāṃ utpādāya chandam janayanti) or who “are zealous so that good dharmas already obtained should develop” (upannānāṃ kuśalānāṃ dharmānāṃ bhūyobhāvāya chandam janayanti).⁷⁸⁸ But the Buddha does not have that type of zeal. Completely endowed with all the qualities (sarvagūṇasampanna), there is nothing that he has not obtained and he has nothing to increase. Here the word ‘zeal’ (chanda) means what I have said above: although the Buddha is endowed with all the qualities, his zeal for them has not come to a stop.

In the horse-jewel (aśvaratna),⁷⁸⁹ even if it has arrived at its destination, the desire to go forward never ceases and persists until death. It is the same for the Buddha-Jewel. When the great fire at the end of the kalpa (mahākalpoddāha) has burned and consumed the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu,⁷⁹⁰ the power of fire has not disappeared. It is the same for the fire of the Buddha’s wisdom: when he has burned up all the passions (kleśa) and illumined all things, the zeal associated with this wisdom (prajñāsamprayuktachanda) is not extinguished.

Moreover, although the Buddha fulfills all the good dharmas and all the qualities, beings are inexhaustible (akṣaya) in number and this is why the desire which the Buddha has to save them all does not stop.

Question. – If the desire that the Buddha has to save all beings never [249c] ceases, why then does he enter into nirvāṇa?

Answer. – There are two ways to save beings: some obtain salvation when the Buddha is present, others obtain salvation after his nirvāṇa.⁷⁹¹ Thus it is said in the Fa-houa king (Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra):

⁷⁸⁸ Two of the four samyakpradhānas.

⁷⁸⁹ One of the seven jewels of the cakravartin king.

⁷⁹⁰ Cf. Kośa, III, p. 184.

⁷⁹¹ In the view of the Mahāyāna, the nirvāṇa of the Buddha is not an historical fact but simply skillful means (upāya), a fiction destined to convert beings.

“When the master physician had given the medicinal plants he had gathered to his sons, he left them.”⁷⁹² This is why the Buddha enters into nirvāṇa.

Moreover, there are beings with weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) and slight virtues who are incapable of realizing the grand undertaking [of salvation] and who can only plant the causes of merits. This is why the Buddha enters into nirvāṇa [without waiting for them to reach their salvation].

Question. – But even after the death (nirodha) of the Buddha, there are still people who become arhat; why do you say that they can only plant the causes of merits?

Answer. – Although some become arhat, they are so rare that it is not worth mentioning. On the other hand, as soon as the Buddha preaches the Dharma, there are, in the ten directions, innumerable and incalculable beings who obtain Bodhi. After the death of the Buddha, it is the same. Similarly in a great kingdom, there are indeed some punitive military expeditions, but these are so rare that we do not speak about them. This is why, although beings are inexhaustible in number, the Buddha enters into nirvāṇa.

Finally, it is said in the Mo-ho-yen Cheou-leng-yen king (Mahāyāna Śūramgamasamādhisūtra): “In the Pratimaṇḍitā universe, the Buddha has a life-span of seven hundred incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa) during which he saves beings.”⁷⁹³ This is why it is said that the Buddha has no loss of zeal (chandapariñih).

⁷⁹² Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, p. 322, l. 5-6 (cf. Transl. of Kumārajīva, T 202, k. 6, p. 43a27-28: Sa (vaidyapuruṣa) evaṃ tān putrān upāyakaṣaḥ sālēnānuśiṣyānayataram janapadapradeśaṃ prakrāntaḥ).

A physician, having returned from a voyage, found his sons sick from a poisonous drink. He offered them an antidote. Some of his sons took it and were cured at once. Others, repulsed by the smell and taste of the remedy, refused to drink it. In order to make these recalcitrants take the potion, the physician resorted to a skillful stratagem. He gave them the antidote again, then he left for a foreign land. From there, he spread the rumor of his death, and his afflicted sons, in memory of their father, finally took the remedy and were cured. Knowing that his sons were free of their illness, the physician showed himself to them again.

Similarly, the Buddha preaches the path of salvation, but some of his listeners refuse to take it. Then the Buddha pretends to enter into nirvāṇa so that the obstinate ones, grieved by his death, finally consent to be converted. Actually this nirvāṇa is just a skillful stratagem.

⁷⁹³ T 642, k. 2, p. 644c16-645a13; Tib. Trip., vol. 32, no. 800, fol. 336a6-337b2; my [Lamotte] translation of the Śūramgamasamādhi, 1965, p. 267-270.

“The public ministry of the Buddha Śākyamuni lasted only 45 years. Working for such a short period of time for the good and happiness of beings, Śākyamuni experienced only a rather lukewarm zeal. How can you say that he had no loss of zeal?”

In order to answer this objection, the Traité appeals here to a passage from the Śūramgamasamādhi identifying the Śākyamuni of the Sahā universe, who entered nirvāṇa at the age of 48 years, with the buddha Vairocana of the Pratimaṇḍitā whose life-span is seven hundred incalculable periods.

8. The Buddha has no loss of exertion

He has no loss of exertion (nāsti vīryaparihāṇīh). – See what has been said about loss of zeal: zeal (chanda) is synonymous with exertion (vīrya).

Question. - If that is so, the special attributes (āveṇikadharmā) are no longer eighteen in number [but just seventeen]. Furthermore, in the list of mental events (cāitasikadharmā), a distinction is made between zeal and exertion.⁷⁹⁴ Then why do you say that zeal is confused with exertion?

Answer. – Zeal is the action taken at the beginning and, when zeal is developed, it has the name of exertion. This is what the Buddha said: “All dharmas have zeal as their root” (chandamūlakāḥ sarve dharmāḥ).⁷⁹⁵ Zeal is like a thirsty man who wants to find something to drink; exertion is like the means (upāya) used to seek something to drink. Zeal is mind (citta), desire to find; exertion serves to realize the thing. Zeal comes from a mental action (manakarmān); exertion comes from three actions: [mental action, vocal action and physical action]. Zeal is internal; exertion is external. These are the resemblances and the differences.

In the passage in question, the bodhisattva Dṛḍhamatī asks Śākyamuni: “How long is your life-span and when will you enter nirvāṇa?” Śākyamuni answers: “My life-span is exactly the same as that of the buddha Vairocana of the Pratimāṇḍitā.” Dṛḍhamatī then goes to this universe to ask Vairocana who replies that his life-span will be exactly seven hundred incalculable periods like that of the buddha Śākyamuni. Returning to the Sahā universe, Dṛḍhamatī communicates this information to the disciples of Śākyamuni and the latter finally acknowledges: “The buddha Vairocana is myself who, under a different name, assures the welfare and the happiness of all beings.”

The result is that the zeal of Śākyamuni is not limited to 45 years but extends over seven hundred incalculable periods.

Nevertheless, it would be a complete misunderstanding of the intent of the Mahāyāna to identify Śākyamuni with one or another Buddha in particular: in reality, he is mixed up with all the Buddhas whose true way of existing (tathatā) is an inconceivable ‘non-existence’.

In another passage (p. 129-131 of the translation), the Śūraṅgamasamādhi states that the Tathāgatas are non-existent in the past, the present and the future, and that they are identical in that they are like magic and a mirage, without coming or going. And the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa (p. 355-359) in turn affirms that the true manner of seeing the Tathāgata is ‘to see him as if there was nothing to see’.

⁷⁹⁴ The Pāli Abhidhamma (cf. Compendium of Philosophy, p. 237 and seq.) lists 52 mental events (cetasika); the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma (cf. Kośa, II, p. 150-165) has 46. Both make a distinction between chanda, defined as ‘desire for action’ (kartukamatā) and vīrya, defined as ‘endurance in the mind’ (cetaso ‘bhyutsāhah).

⁷⁹⁵ Anguttara, IV, p. 339, l. 4; V, p. 107, l. 6; T’chong a han, T 26, k. 28, p. 602c4: Chandamūlakā, āvuso, abbe dhammā.

Moreover, exertion is loved by the Buddhas: it is in this way that the Buddha Śākyamuni skipped over nine kalpas⁷⁹⁶ and quickly attained anuttara samyakṣambodhi.

[Śaīkṣasūtra.] – Moreover, it is said that one day the Buddha said to Ānanda: “Preach the Dharma to the bhikṣus; my back hurts (prṣṭhī ma āvilāyati); I am going to rest for a while.” Then the Bhagavat folded his upper garment in four (caturguṇam uttarāsaṅgam prajñāpya), spread it on the ground and with his cloak (saṃgāṭī) as a pillow (bimbohana), lay down. Ānanda preached the seven factors of enlightenment (saptasamḥbodhyaṅga). When he had come to the factor ‘exertion’ (vīryasamḥbodhyaṅga), the Buddha arose with a start and said to Ānanda: “Ānanda, are you praising exertion?” (pratibhātaṃ ta ānanda vīryam) Ānanda answered “I am praising it.” And this happened three times. Then the Buddha said: “Good, good! Exertion well cultivated leads to the supreme perfect enlightenment (vīryam āsevitam anuttarasamyakṣambodhaye) and all the more so to the other Bodhis.”⁷⁹⁷

This is why the Buddha has no loss of exertion and, if he does not stop [250a] even when he is sick, what can be said about when he is not sick?

Moreover, in order to save beings, the Buddha gives up the happiness of his very deep concentration (gambhīrasamādhi) and he saves beings by means of all kinds of bodies (kāya), by all kinds of voices (vāc), by all kinds of means (upāya). Sometimes he borrows dangerous paths; sometimes he eats bad food;⁷⁹⁸ sometimes he suffers cold and heat (śītoṣṇa); sometimes he encounters wicked objections (mithyācodana), harmful words (pāruṣyavāda) and curses. He endures them patiently without disgust. Although he has mastery (vaśīta) over all dharmas, the Buddha accomplishes these things without producing laziness (kausīdya).

[Conversion of Subhadra.]⁷⁹⁹ – Thus, after having saved beings, when the Buddha had lain down in the So-lo-lin (Śālavana) under two trees, the brahmācārīn Siu-p-t’o (Subhadra) said to Ānanda: “I have heard that this very night (adya rātrīyām) the Omniscient One (sarvajñā) will die: I would like to see the Buddha.” Ānanda stopped him, saying: “The Buddha has preached the Dharma far and wide to people and he is very sick (klānta).” The Buddha overheard and said to Ānanda: “Let Subhadra approach: he will be the last of my disciples (ayaṃ me paścīmo bhaviṣyati śrāvāṇām).” Subhadra was able to approach, questioned the ⁷⁹⁶ Normally a bodhisattva needs a hundred kalpas to accomplish the actions productive of the marks of the Great Man, but Śākyamuni, thanks to his exertion, accomplished them in 91 kalpas. On these nine kalpas skipped over thus by Śākyamuni, see the references above, p. 252, note 1.

⁷⁹⁷ This has already been cited twice, p. 243-244F and 942-943F. To the references given on p. 244F, the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 286-288, should be added and the Chinese version Pan ni yuan king (T 6, k. 2, p. 184b14-28) summarized by E. Waldschmidt, Lebensende des Buddha, p. 169-170. See also Tsa a han (T 99, no. 727, k. 27, p. 195b29-196a11).

⁷⁹⁸ Invited to Verañjā by the Brahmin Agnidatta, the Buddha was reduced to eating barley: see above, p. 124F and n. 1.

⁷⁹⁹ On the conversion of Subhadra, see above, p. 205-209F and n. To these references, add the account of this conversion given in the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 366-386.

Buddha on his doubts; the Buddha preached the Dharma to him as he wished and cut through his doubts. Subhadra obtained Bodhi.

Before the Buddha entered into nirvāṇa without residue (anupadhiśeṣa nirvāṇa), the bhikṣus said to the Buddha: “Bhagavat, it is wonderful (adbhuta) that, right at the end, you had compassion for this brahmecārin heretic and you spoke with him.” The Buddha said: “It is not just in the present lifetime (ihajanman) that I have saved him as I was dying. In an earlier lifetime (pūrvajanman), when I had not yet obtained Bodhi, I saved him as I was dying.”

[Jātaka of the deer who sacrificed himself]⁸⁰⁰ – Once, innumerable and incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa) ago, there was a great tree in the forest that sheltered many birds and animals. A forest fire (dāva) broke out which blazed on three sides at once: only one direction was saved, but it was blocked off by a river (nadī). All the animals crowded in there miserably without finding a way to save their lives by flight.

At that time there was a deer (mrga) who was big and strong. With my forefeet I leaned on one bank, with my hind feet I crouched on the other bank. I ordered the animals to cross over by walking on my back (prṣṭha). My skin (tvac) and my flesh (māṃsa) were completely torn, but by the power of my compassion (karuṇā), I supported them up to my death.

At the end, there was one hare (śaśaka) left. My strength was exhausted, but at the price of a supreme effort, I let him cross. When he had crossed over, my back broke and I fell into the river and died.

This happened a long time ago and it is not just today [that I have saved someone when I was at the end of my strength]. Those who at that time were the first to cross are my present disciples; the hare who crossed last is today Subhadra.

⁸⁰⁰ This Jātaka exists in three different versions: The first appears in the Tibetan version and the Chinese version of the Mūlasarv. Vinaya (T 1451, k. 38, p. 397b21-c13), the one edited and the other translated by E. Waldschmidt in the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra (p. 476-478). The original Sanskrit occurs in the Avadānaśataka, I, p. 235-236 (tr. Feer, p. 157-158): Bhūtapūrvam bhikṣavo 'tīte 'dhvani anyatarasyāṃ parvatadaryāṃ m rṅayūthapaṃ prativasati ... kauśināgarā Mallā mrgataśavako 'yaṃ Subhadraḥ.

The second version is that of the Traité. It differs slightly from the preceding. The herd of deer is not controlled by the king, but is forced to flee by a fire. The last animal to pass on the deer-king's back is not a baby deer but a hare. Finally the first animals to cross are not the actual Mallas of Kuśinagara but the actual disciples of the Buddha.

The third version, even more aberrant, is in the Lieou tou tsi king, T 152, no. 57, k. 6, p. 32c11-33a5 (transl. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 218-220). Here a herd of five hundred deer is encircled; the deer-king stands on the rope that encircles them and lets all the other deer escape by passing over on his back. There is no fire and no little animal that is the last.

Also, the deer is one of the favorite animals of Buddhist folklore and often appears in other Jātaka tales such as the Ruru and the Nigrodhamiga Jātaka (see above, p. 972-975F).

Therefore it is from lifetime to lifetime that the Buddha likes to use exertion, and it is not just today that he never stops. This is why it is said that he has no loss of exertion.

9. The Buddha has no loss of mindfulness

He has no loss of mindfulness (nāsti smṛtiparihāṇi). – Since he is endowed with all the knowledges (sarvajñāna) of the things of the three times (tryadvadharmā), his memory (smṛti) is perfect (sampūrṇa) and without lapse (aparihāṇi).

Question. – First it was said that the Buddha has no failure of mindfulness (muṣitasmṛtitā) and now it is said that he has no loss of mindfulness (smṛtiparihāṇi). Are the absence of failure of mindfulness and the absence of loss of mindfulness the same or different? If they are the same, why repeat it; if they are different, what does the difference (viśeṣa) consist of?

Answer. – Failure of mindfulness (muṣitasmṛtitā) is a mistake (viparyaya); loss of mindfulness (smṛtiparihāṇi) is a defect (abhibhava). Failure of mindfulness is an error in the postures (īryāpatha), the way one holds one's head, comes or goes; non-loss of mindfulness is the mindfulness lasting during the concentrations (samādhi) and the superknowledges (abhijñā), the unhindered penetration (apratītaprativedha) of the past and the present. [250b]

Question. – Why is just non-loss of mindfulness (smṛtyuparihāṇi) itself a special attribute of the Buddha?

Answer. – The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas who practice the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) well have strong mindfulness; but, strong as it is, it still has lows (ānatva) and obstacles (vighna) and does not penetrate deeply. As I have said in regard to the power of the mindfulness of former abodes (pūrvanivāsānusmṛtijñānabala),⁸⁰¹ the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas remember their former abodes for a maximum of 84,000 kalpas: beyond that they have lapses of memory. Moreover, in the path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga), they cannot distinguish the successive moments [of the sixteen minds making up this path]. The Buddha himself distinguishes the three characteristics of each of these moments: [arising, duration and cessation]. There is not a single thing that the Buddha does not remember: this is why he alone has no loss of mindfulness.

Moreover, the power of knowledge of the former abodes is a knowledge (jñāna) depending on the memory. That is what the Buddha has power (bala) in. The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not possess this power of memory (smṛtibala) and other people still less.

Finally, the Buddha guards his mindfulness by his unobstructed deliverance (apratīhatavimukta) and his omniscience: this is why he has no loss of mindfulness.

For all these reasons, the Buddha has no loss of mindfulness.

⁸⁰¹ Above, p. 1555F.

10. The Buddha has no loss of wisdom

He has no loss of wisdom (nāsti prajñāparihāṇīh). – As the Buddha has obtained all these wisdoms (prajñā), he has no loss of wisdom; as his wisdom of the three times (tryadvajñāna) is unobstructed, he has no loss of wisdom.

Moreover, he is endowed with the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) and the four unhindered wisdoms (pratisamvid): this is why he has no loss of wisdom. If the oil (taila) is plentiful and the wick (vartikā) is clean, the flame of the lamp (dīpajvāla) is excellent.⁸⁰² It is the same for the Buddha who has concentrations such as the Samādhirājasamādhi as oil and, as clean wick, the absence of loss of mindfulness. This is why the radiance of his wisdom is immense and uneclipsed.

Moreover, since his first production of the mind of awakening (prathamacittotpāda) and for innumerable and incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa), the Buddha has accumulated all the wisdoms and, in accordance with his high resolution (adhyāśaya), he has sacrificed his head (śiras), his eyes (nayana), his marrow (majjā) and his skull (mastaka), he has given all his inner and outer possessions, he has entered into fire, he has thrown himself down from mountains, he has flayed his skin, he has nailed his body, etc.,⁸⁰³ there is no suffering that he has not endured, careful to accumulate wisdom. This is why he has no loss of wisdom.

Furthermore, the wisdom of the Buddha is aided by all the qualities: morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi), etc. This is why he has no loss of wisdom.

Furthermore, from lifetime to lifetime, he has studied all the books, whether it is the conventional sciences (saṃvṛtidharma) or the Buddha dharma, coarse (audārika) or subtle (sūkṣma), good (kuśala) or bad (akuśala), he has studied it all and understands it all. This is why he has no loss of wisdom.

Furthermore, he has read, thought about, meditated on and investigated the teachings heard from the mouths of the innumerable Buddhas of the ten directions. This is why he has no loss of wisdom.

Furthermore, in the interest of beings and to increase all the good dharmas, he has destroyed ignorance (avidyā) everywhere. This is why he has no loss of wisdom.

Furthermore, his wisdom really understands the [true] nature of dharmas, non-arising (anutpāda), non-cessation (amirodha), non-defilement (asaṃkleśa), non-purification (avyavādāna), non-action (anabhisamskāra), non-functioning (asamudācāra). He makes no distinction between true knowledge and false knowledge.⁸⁰⁴ He knows that the dharmas are identical and equally pure (viśuddha), without jhāyeyya.

⁸⁰² Cf. Saṃyutta, II, p. 86: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave telam ca paṭicca vaṭṭim ca paṭicca telappadīpo

⁸⁰³ These deeds of the future Buddha have been told in preceding poages (143-144F, 688-691F, 714-720F, 755-766F, 889-890F, 972-977F, etc.). Most took place in the north-west of India.

⁸⁰⁴ An idea often developed by the Traité, e.g., p. 1058F, 1106F.

defilement (akliṣṭa) and without stain (nirupalepa) like space (ākāśa). Disregarding all duality, he acquires the [true] nature of the Dharma, i.e., [250c] entry into non-duality (advaya-praveśa). This entry into non-duality, characteristic of the Dharma, is immense (apramāṇa) and infinite (ananta). This is why he has no loss of wisdom.

For various reasons of this kind, the Buddha has no loss of wisdom.

11. The Buddha has no loss of deliverance

He has no loss of deliverance (nāsti vimukti-parihāṇīh). – Deliverance (vimukti) is twofold: i) conditioned (samskrta) and ii) unconditioned (asamskrta).⁸⁰⁵ Conditioned deliverance is the deliverance associated with pure wisdom (anāsravaprajñāsamprayukta). Unconditioned deliverance is the cessation without residue of all the disturbing emotions (kleśa) with their residues (vāsanā). In the Buddha there is no loss of this twofold deliverance. Why? The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas whose wisdom is not very keen (tikṣṇā) and whose disturbing emotions have not been entirely destroyed have loss of deliverance, but the Buddhas whose wisdom is supremely keen and whose disturbing emotions and the traces of the emotions have ceased definitively without residue have no loss of deliverance.

Moreover, as I have said above (p. 1560F) in regard to the power of the destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣaya-bala), there are differences between the deliverance of the Buddhas and that of the śrāvakas. The Buddha has the power of the destruction of the impurities and therefore has no loss of deliverance; the adepts of the two Vehicles, (i.e., the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas), do not have this power and therefore have loss of deliverance.

12. The Buddha has no loss of the wisdom and the vision of deliverance

There is no loss of the wisdom and the vision of deliverance (nāsti vimuktijñānadarśanaparihāṇīh). – In regard to these deliverances, the wisdom of the Buddha is immense (apramāṇa), infinite (ananta) and pure (viśuddha): this is why he has no loss of the wisdom and the vision of deliverance.

Question. – The Buddha has no loss of anything; why would it be only in regard to such things [chanda, vīrya, smṛti, prajñā, vimukti and vimuktijñānadarśana mentioned in the special attributes no. 7 to 12] that there is no loss?

Answer. – In order to realize one's own benefit (svārtha) and the benefit of others (parārtha), the first four things are enough: i) chanda 'zeal' is the basis (mūla) for seeking all the good dharmas; ii) vīrya 'exertion' is capable of acting; iii) smṛti 'mindfulness' mounts guard like a gatekeeper (dauvārika): it lets the good enter but keeps out the bad; iv) prajñā 'wisdom' illumines all the teachings (dharmamukha) and destroys the disturbing emotions (kleśa). Using these four things allows the realization of the goal: [the benefit of oneself and that of others].

⁸⁰⁵ Cf. Kośa, VI, p. 296 seq.

The fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) of these four things is twofold: i) vimukti, ‘deliverance’; ii) vimuktijñānadarśana, ‘knowledge and vision of deliverance’. The meaning of vimukti has been defined above. As for vimuktijñānadarśana, it is by using it that one understands the two kinds of deliverance, i.e., conditioned deliverance (saṃskṛta) and unconditioned deliverance (asaṃskṛta), and one also understands the other kinds of deliverance; occasional deliverance (sāmayikī vimukti), non-occasional deliverance (asāmayikī vimukti), deliverance of mind (cetovimukti), deliverance by wisdom (prajñāvimukti), twofold deliverance (ubhayatobhāgavimukti), destructible deliverance (bhedyavimukti), indestructible deliverance (abhedyavimukti), the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the inconceivable liberations (acintyavimokṣa), the unobstructed liberations (avyāhatavimokṣa), etc.

The Buddha distinguishes all these deliverances, solid or non-solid: that is why ‘he has no loss of the knowledge and the vision of deliverance.’

As has been said above (p. 1358F) in regard to the recollection of the Buddha, among the five elements of sainthood (āśaikṣaśāṇḍha), the latter possesses the element consisting of the knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśanaśāṇḍha). Here it is necessary to speak about it at length.

Question. – We say ‘knowledge and vision of deliverance’: it should be enough to say ‘knowledge’ (jñāna); why add ‘vision’ (darśana) as well?

Answer. – By saying knowledge and vision, we reinforce the matter. It is like with ropes (rajju): when two ropes are joined together into one, it is stronger.

Moreover, to say only ‘knowledge’ would not include all the wisdoms (prajñā). See what the Abhidharma says:

“The wisdoms (prajñā) are of three types: i) involving knowledge (jñāna) and not vision (darśana); ii) involving vision and not knowledge; iii) involving both knowledge and vision. Those that involve knowledge and not vision are: the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (āśravakṣayañāna), the knowledge of non-arising (anutpādayñāna) and the knowledge associated with the [251a] first five consciousnesses (pañcaviññānasamprayuktajñāna). Those that involve vision and not knowledge are the eight kṣāntis [of the path of seeing the truths], right worldly vision (laukikā samyagdr̥ṣṭi) and the five wrong views (mithyadr̥ṣṭi). Those that involve both knowledge and vision are all the other wisdoms.”⁸⁰⁶

[In the case we are dealing with here] simply saying ‘knowledge’ would exclude vision; simply saying ‘vision’ would exclude knowledge. This is why we say ‘knowledge and vision’: that makes it complete (sampanna).

Moreover, whatever is conceived (vikalpita) and determined (vicārita) as a function of the teachings of a third person is called knowledge (jñāna); what one realizes by oneself (svataḥ śākṣātkṛta) is called vision (darśana). Similarly, if the ear hears something but still has doubts, that is called knowledge; on the other hand, if the eye sees and perceives by itself unhesitatingly, that is called vision. These are the differences (viśeṣa) between knowledge and vision.

Furthermore, according to some, arhats still doubt their own deliverance (vimukti) and do not recognize it personally. But such arhats are not real arhats. Also, in order to cut this wrong view (mithyadr̥ṣṭi), the Buddha said that the saints (āryapudgala) recognize and see deliverance. But although these arhats may have obtained the knowledge and vision of deliverance, they can lose this knowledge and vision of deliverance because they do not have omniscience (sarvajñmarā), they are not endowed with an absolutely superior wisdom (nādhimātraprajñendriyasamvāgata) and they cannot recognize the various special characteristics (bhinnalakṣaṇaviśeṣa) of things, [namely], the moments of instantaneous arising and cessation (kṣaṇikotpādanirodha).

The Buddha, on the other hand, is endowed with an absolutely pure faculty of wisdom (adhimātraprajñendriyasamvāgata) and cognizes the instantaneous arisings and cessations (kṣaṇikotpādanirodha) belonging to each dharma. This is why he ‘has no loss of knowledge and vision of deliverance’.

Finally, the Buddha is endowed with the perfection of the Dharma eye (dharmacakṣurviśuddhi) and, as is said in regard to this Dharma eye, the Buddha knows the beings who enter nirvāṇa either by the gate of deliverance of emptiness (śūnyatāvimokṣamukha) or by the gate of deliverance of signlessness (ānimittavimokṣamukha) or by the gate of deliverance of wishlessness (apraṇihitavimokṣamukha). He knows those who see the five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) and the eighteen elements (dhātu), and who, by these various teachings (nānāvidhadharmamukha), obtain deliverance. In this knowledge and this vision of deliverance, the Buddha has a complete and universal knowledge. This is why it is said that he has no loss of the knowledge and vision of deliverance.

13-15. Every physical, vocal or mental action of the Buddha accompanies knowledge

All his bodily actions, all his vocal actions and all his mental actions accompany knowledge (sarvāṇi kāyavāgmanaskarmāṇi jñānānuparivartini). - In the Buddha, all bodily, vocal and mental actions are preceded by knowledge (jñānapūrvamgama) and, subsequently, accompany knowledge (jñānānuparivartin).

Of all the bodily, vocal or mental actions of the Buddha, there is not one that is not useful to beings: this is why it is said that his actions are preceded by knowledge and accompany knowledge.

Thus it is said in a sūtra: “In the Buddhas, even the outbreath (praśvāsa) and the inbreath (āśvāsa) are useful to beings.” How, then, would their bodily, vocal and mental actions not be useful to them? The wicked who smell the perfume (gandha) of the breath (ānāpāna) of the Buddha obtain pure faith (cittaprasāda) and love the Buddha. The gods who breathe the perfume of his breath renounce the five objects of desire (pañcakāmaguṇa) and resolve to practice the good. This is why it is said that his bodily, vocal and mental actions accompany knowledge.

⁸⁰⁶ See the detail in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 95, p. 490b-c.

The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not have this privilege. First they do good in their mind and then only afterwards by means of bodily or vocal actions.⁸⁰⁷ Sometimes even their mental action (manaskarman) is indeterminate (avyākṛta) and is produced without accompanying knowledge. [If that is so for [251b] them], what can be said for other people?

Take for example the bhikṣu Kiao-fan-po-t'i (Gavāmpati): although he was arhat, he spit up his own food and then swallowed it again.⁸⁰⁸ Such an action does not accompany knowledge.

See also the bhikṣu-arhat Mo-t'eou-po-sseu-tcho (Madhuvāsiṣṭha) who climbed onto scaffolding (gosāraka), walls (bhitti) and trees (vrkṣa).⁸⁰⁹

⁸⁰⁷ According to the principle: Cetanāhaṃ, bhikkhave, kammaṃ vadāmi; cetayitvā kammaṃ karoti kāyena manasā: “I say that action is volition, and it is after having willed that one does an action by the body, speech or mind” (Anguttara, III, p. 415; Kathāvatthu, p. 393; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 27, p. 600a24). In ordinary beings, volition must be followed by a bodily or vocal ‘gesture’ in order to be effective; in higher beings, volition is enough to realize the intention.

⁸⁰⁸ For Gavāmpati, see above, p. 97f and n. 2. In his earlier existences, he had been a ruminant and later, becoming an arhat, he always re-swallowed his food.

⁸⁰⁹ Unknown in the Pāli sources, the legend of Madhuvāsiṣṭha, ‘Excellent Honey’, appears in fragmentary state in the Chinese texts, but can easily be reconstituted:

A. Tchong a han, T 26, k. 8, p. 471a16-29.

B. Mahāsaṃghika Vin., T 1425, k. 29, p. 464a13-27.

C. Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, k. 12, p. 163c8-164a12.

D. Anavatāpataḡāthā (ed. Bechert, p. 188-191; transl. Hofinger, p. 275-278): Mūlasarv. Vin., Bhaiṣajavastu, T 1448, k. 18, p. 90a12-b27; Fo wou po ti tseu, T 199, p. 200b22-201a6.

E. Hien yu king, T 202, no. 54, k. 12, p. 429c10-430c3; Dzan-lun, transl. I.J. Schmidt, Der Weise und der Thor, chap. XL.

F. Mahāvastu, T 1545, k. 99, p. 514c29-515a14.

G. Vibhāṣā, T 1546, k. 49, p. 372a13-27.

H. Traité, T 1508, k. 26, p. 251b2-4; k. 38, p. 337a6-8; k. 84, p. 649c10-13.

I. Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 4, p. 890b19-c3 (transl. Watters, I, p. 309).

J. Ibid., T 2087, k. 7, p. 908b16-21 (transl. Watters, II, p. 65).

Once, at the time of the buddha Kāśyapa, a young bhikṣu, on seeing another śramaṇa leaping over a canal, shouted: “This man is as agile as a monkey!” Bad luck overtook him: this irreverent comment brought him rebirth in the form of a monkey for five hundred lifetimes (sources E, H).

It was only during his last lifetime as a monkey that he met the Buddha Śākyamuni. A Brahmin named Vasiṣṭha was grieving because he had no son and the heretical teachers whom he consulted held out no hope for him. On his wife’s advice, he went to find the Buddha and offered him a new robe. The Teacher consoled him and predicted that he would soon have a son called to high destinies. Full of gratitude, the brahmin Vasiṣṭha invited the Buddha and the Sangha to a meal. On their return, Śākyamuni and his monks stopped near a pool and set down their bowls on the ground. It was then that there took place the meeting between the Buddha and a monkey who was none other than the young monk who had been insolent in past times (source E).

The texts are not in agreement on the place where this meeting took place and have proposed, respectively:

Vaiśālī and more precisely, the Markaṭāhradatīra ‘Edge of the Monkey Pool’ in the Kūṭāgāraśāla ‘Hall of the Belvedere’ (sources A, D, F, J).

The shore of the Li-k'i-tcho river, not otherwise identified (source B).

Nādikā Kuṇḡikāvasatha (in Pāli, Nādikā Giṇḡikāvasatha), i.e., ‘Nādikā, in the Tiled House’, a village in the land of the Vṛjīs between Koṭigrama and Vaiśālī (sources C, G).

Śrāvastī (source E).

A dried-up pool near Mathurā (source I).

Whatever the exact place, the monkey in question seized the Buddha’s bowl. The monks were afraid that he would break it and started off in pursuit, but the Buddha called them back. The monkey went off with the bowl, climbed up into a śāla tree (Vatica robusta), took some honey with which he filled the bowl, came back down carefully and gravely presented the pot of honey to the Buddha but the latter did not accept it. The monkey retreated several paces and, with a bamboo stem, took out the insects caught in the honey, came back again and presented the bowl anew, but again without any success. Not discouraged, he went to a clear spring, washed the honey with water and for the third time offered it to the Buddha who finally accepted it and shared it with his disciples (sources A, B, C, D, E, F, G, I).

Seeing his offering accepted, the monkey leapt with joy, but while he went away dancing, he lost his footing, fell into a ditch or hole where he died (sources B, C, E, F, G, I). One source (B) has it that he gained the Trāyastriṃśa heaven, but it is generally thought that he took birth directly into the world of humans (sources C, D, R, F, G, I).

He was incarnated in the womb of Vasiṣṭha’s wife and, as a reward for his merit, great wonders were realized: during the months of his gestation, a rain of madhu i.e., honey, fell from the sky (source C); on the day of his birth, all the utensils in the house were spontaneously filled with honey (source E). As honey seemed to follow him everywhere and his father was called Vasiṣṭha, he was given the name Madhu-Vāsiṣṭha (sources C, E).

At the required age, Madhuvāsiṣṭha, triumphing over the resistance of his parents, entered the religious life, and the Buddha gave him ordination according to the quick procedure of ehibhikṣukā (source E). He practiced brahmacarya and became arhat (source B, C, D, E, F, G). But the miracle of honey followed him throughout his religious life: every day he was miraculously gratified by three pots of honey which he gave respectively to the Buddha, the Saṃgha and to his parents (source C); when he was walking with his colleagues and when he saw them faltering, it was enough for him to hold out his bowl and it became filled immediately by the gods (sources C, D).

Nevertheless, his great holiness had not liberated him from the traces of his passions (kleśavāsanā) and, retaining the habits of monkeys, he was often seen climbing on walls and in trees (source H).

Finally, see Pi-ling-k'ie-p'o-ts'o (Pilindavatsa) who insulted the Ganges and treated it as a little slave (vatsala)⁸¹⁰⁸¹¹

Such bodily and vocal actions are not preceded by knowledge (jñānpūrvamgama) and do not accompany knowledge (jñānāparivartin). The Buddha himself has none of these things.

*** **

Digression on a case brought against the Buddha⁸¹²

It has long been noticed that, in the Si-yu-ki, Hiuan-tsang locates the monkey's offering at a dried-up pool near Mathurā (source I) and locates farther east, at Vaiśālī, the place where the monkeys dug the pool that bears their name (markaṭahrada) and, not far from there, filled the Buddha's bowl with honey (source J). The dividing up of the legend and the multiplying of the monkeys poses a twofold problem which has been resolved wisely by A. Foucher (AgbG, I, p. 512-515; La Vie du Bouddha, p. 291-293).

The offering of the monkey has been identified on the following monuments: 1) North gate of the great stūpa of Sañcī (Monuments of Sanchi, I, p. 219; II, pl. 36c2). 2) Stūpa of Sikrī (AgbG, I, p. 513, fig. 254; Lyons and Ingholt, Gandhāran Art in Pakistan, p. 82, fig. 115). 3) Stela in Gupta style at Benares (AgbG, II, p. 539, fig., 498; Majumdar, Guide to Sārnāth, pl. XIII). 4) Medieval sculpture at Magadha (AgbG, II, p. 545, fig. 500). 5) Nepalese miniatures (Foucher, Iconographie bouddhique, I, p. 168 and pl. VII 1 and X 4).

⁸¹⁰ [Note by Migme Chodron: Edgerton's Dictionary gives vatsa = 'dear little child'.

⁸¹¹ See above, p. 121-122F and notes.

⁸¹² Above (p. 507-517), there was a accusation against the Buddha: it was asked if the nine or ten torments that the Buddha had to suffer were not the punishment for faults committed by him in the course of his previous lifetimes. To the references collected at that place should now be added a Sanskrit fragment related to torments 5 to 8, published in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part I, p. 211-218.

But here it is a matter of an infinitely more serious case concerning the alleged bodily, vocal or mental faults which Śākyamuni may have committed after his enlightenment when he was already buddha. If these grievances proved to be justified, they might cause the validity to be disputed of the āveṇikadharmas numbers 13 to 15 in the words of which: " Every bodily, vocal or mental dharma of the Buddha is preceded by knowledge and accompanied by knowledge."

I [Lamotte] do not think that the criticisms raised against Śākyamuni here are the deeds of heretics trying to sully the memory of the last Buddha to have appeared on this earth. They might have come from sincere disciples, but the reading of some texts had made them perplexed and anxiously wondering if the Buddha had not acted badly in such and such a circumstance.

In this imaginary case, we should note that the defense produces unknown pieces of accusation evidently borrowed from more recent sources. The impression is inescapable that some schools, mainly

1. The Accusation

Question. – So be it! But the Buddha sometimes has physical and vocal actions (kāyavākkarman) that do not seem to accompany knowledge (na jñānānuparivartin). How is that?

1. He goes into the assemblies of heretics (tīrthikapariṣad) to preach the Dharma, but nobody believes him or accepts him.

2. One day when he was preaching the Dharma in the great assembly (mahŌaṃgha), he bared his breast and showed it to Ni-k'ien-tseu (Nirgranthīputra).

3. When some doubted the two physical marks (lakṣāṇa) that were not visible to them, in the middle of the great assembly the Buddha showed the mark of his tongue (jihvālakṣaṇa) and the mark of his cryptorchidia (kośagatavastiguḥya).

4. He insults his disciples and treats them like foolish men (mohapurusa).

5. He insults Devadatta and says to him: "You are a fool (mūḍha), a corpse (śava), a spit-swallower (kheṭṭāśika)."

6. The Buddha forbids the possession (dhāraṇa) of eight kinds of begging-bowls (pātra) and authorizes the bhikṣus to use only two kinds of bowls: i) fired clay (mṛttikāpātra) and ii) iron (ayaḥpātra) but he himself uses a stone bowl (śailapātra).

7. One day when the heretics (tīrthika) were questioning him, he remained silent and did not respond.

8. In various places, the Buddha says that the ātman exists and, in other places, he says that it does not exist.

9. In various places he speaks of the existence of dharmas and, in other places, he speaks of the non-existence of dharmas.

Such physical and vocal actions do not seem to accompany knowledge and since physical and vocal actions (kāyavākkarman) are inseparable from mental action (manaskarman), the result is that his mental actions, as well, did not accompany knowledge. Then why is it said that his actions always accompany knowledge (sadājñānānuparivartin)?

2. The Defense

that of the Sarvāstivādin, have reviewed and corrected the Āgamas and the Vinayas in such a way as to be able to justify the actions of Śākyamuni on every point and to answer in advance any blame to which he might have been exposed.

Answer. – That does not hold (ayuktam etad). In all of those circumstances, all of the Buddha's actions were preceded by knowledge (jñānapūrvamgama) and accompanied knowledge (jñānānuparivartin). Why is that?

A. Meeting With The Heretics

Entering into an assembly of heretics, the Buddha knew well that he would not be believed nor accepted in the present lifetime (ihajanman), but he wanted to plant great roots of good (mahānidāna) for future lifetimes (parajanmani).

Moreover, he wanted to put an end to the slander of the heretics who said: “The Buddha is proud (unnata).” This is the reason why he went personally into their assemblies.

Moreover, the heretics said: “The Buddha claims to have great compassion (mahākaruṇā), the same for all, but he preaches the Dharma only to the fourfold [Buddhist] assembly. And yet we too are religious mendicants (pravrajita) who are seeking the path and he does not preach to us!”

Finally, according to the sūtra [to which you allude], the Buddha went to an assembly of heretics and preached the Dharma there, but the sūtra does not say that nobody believed him and nobody accepted him:

[Śramanasatyasiṭṭha.]⁸¹³. Seeing at a distance a great assembly of heretics (tīrthikapariṣad)⁸¹⁴ who were debating in loud voices (uccaśabda), the Buddha wanted to go elsewhere and was turning around to leave.

The scholars (upadeśācārya) who had seen the Buddha approaching from afar said to their assembly: “Be quiet! The Buddha is a person who likes solitude (vivekākāma). If you look quiet and are silent, perhaps he ⁸¹³ This sūtra has come down to us in numerous very divergent versions and bears various titles:

A. Samaṇasaccasutta, in Anguttara, II, p. 176-177.

B. Brāhmaṇaparivrajakasūtra, in Tsa a han, T 99, no. 972, k. 35, p. 251a20-b19. Sanskrit fragments of this version have been published by R. Pischel, Bruchstücke des Sanskritkanons... aus Idyaksari, 1904, p. 817-818.

C. Pie yi tsa a han, T 100, no. 206, k. 11, p. 450c5-451a10.

D. Vibhhaṣā, T 1545, k. 77, p. 400b5-c12 (transl. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Les deux vérités, MCB, V, 167-169.

E. Nyāyanusāra, T 1562, k. 58, p. 667c2-21 (transl. Idem, ibid., p. 183-185.

The comparison with Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 18, p. 639a1-11, proposed in the edition of Taisho, is to be avoided.

⁸¹⁴ These were very illustrious Paribbājakas, living on the banks of the Sappinī river in Paribbājakārama, namely, Antabhāra, Varadhara, Sakuludāyin, and other famous medicants Version A. Versions B and C locate them at Magadha on the shores of the Sumangādhā pool.

will come here.” [251c] The assembly maintained silence. The Buddha entered into this assembly and preached the three truths of the brāhmaṇas (brāhmaṇasatya).⁸¹⁵

The heretic assembly remained silent (tūṣṇīmbhūta). The Buddha thought: “These angry people are in Māra Pāpīmat's grasp. This teaching is so wondrous that none of them will try to become my disciple.”⁸¹⁶ Having had this thought, the Buddha arose from his seat and went away.

But the heretics, free from the grasp of Māra, thought: “We have been able to hear a marvelous Dharma; how can we profit from it?” At once they went to the Buddha, became his disciples, found the Path and escaped from suffering.⁸¹⁷ ⁸¹⁵ Here the Traité introduces an episode not found in the other sources; it is, in fact, a stock phrase (cf. Dīgha, I, p.179; III, p. 37, 39; Majjhima, I p. 514; II, p. 2, 3, 30; Anguttara, V, p. 185, 190): Appasaddā bhonto hontu, mā bhonto saddamakattha. Ayaṃ Samaṇo Gotamao āgacchati, appasaddakāmo kho pana so āyasmā, appasaddassa vaṇṇavādī, appeva nāma appasaddaṃ parisam veditvā upasamkamitabbaṃ maññeyyāti.

By ‘brāhmaṇa truths’, we should understand here the truths of the adepts of the Buddhist religion (buddhadharmastha). Remember that the Wheel of the Buddha is often called Brahmacakra and that the Buddha described himself sometimes as Brāhmaṇa (cf. Udānavarga, XXXIII, stanza 68-73). Version A lists four brāhmaṇa truths, but the text of the PTS is faulty and should be corrected by that of the Commentary of the Anguttara, III, p. 162: Brāhmaṇo evam āha: 1) Sabbe pāṇā avajjhā ti..., 2) Sabbe kmama aniccā dukkhā vipariṇāmadhammā ti..., 3) Sabbe bhavā aniccā dukkhā vipariṇāmadhammā ti..., 4) Nāhaṃ kbacana kassaci kiṇcana tasmiṃ na ca mama kvacana katthaci kiṇcanaṃ n' atthīti. – “The Brāhmaṇa says: 1) No being should be killed; 2-3) All pleasures (all existences) are impermanent, suffering and perishable; 4) I am in no way whatsoever an individual, and in no way whatsoever is there anything whatsoever that is me. (p. 1664F, n. 3)

The other versions that list only three truths boil down to this: No being should be killed; everything that is subject to production is subject to destruction; I am not that and that is not me.

These three truths are in contrast with the practices and beliefs of the traditional Brahmanism. In the words of the Vibhhaṣā (l.c.), the brāhmins sacrifice cattle and sheep, accept nihilism or eternalism, and practice continence in order to be reborn in heaven and enjoy heavenly pleasure.

⁸¹⁶ This disillusioned reflection is also noted in versions B and C.

⁸¹⁷ The Pie yi Tsa a han (version C) is the only canonical source coming out in favor of the conversion of the heretics, and here are its words:

The Buddha had not long gone when the deity of the Summagadhā pool pronounced these gāthās: “Just as soon trace designs on the water, harvest a crop by seeding a salt-pan, spray a dung-heap with perfume, dive into the water moistening the bank, make beautiful music by blowing into an iron pipe, hope for a mirage in the middle of winter: these heretics are so blunt that even if they hear the wondrous Dharma, they do not believe and do not accept it.”

Finally, the disciples of the heretics did not dare to go to the Buddha out of fear of their teachers. This is why the Buddha entered into their assemblies. When they hear the Dharma, their faith is strengthened; they no longer fear their teachers, they become disciples of the Buddha and sometimes they obtain ‘the traces of the Path’.⁸¹⁸

It is for all these wise reasons that the Buddha enters into the assemblies of the heretics.

B. Display of His Breast

[Cūḍā-Satyakasūtra.]⁸¹⁹ – Moreover, Sa-tchō-k’i (tche) Ni-k’ien-tseu (Satyaka Nirgranthīputra), his breast covered with copper plates, proclaimed: “There is no one who, engaged in debate with me (mayā vādena vādaṃ samārabdhaḥ), would not be sweating (sveda) in streams and would not be defeated. Even a big elephant, a piece of wood, a stone, that would hear my objections, would sweat in streams.”⁸²⁰

Having made this declaration, he went to the Buddha and debated with him. The Buddha questioned him but Nirgrantha was unable to respond. His sweat flowed until it moistened the ground and his whole body was soaked. The Buddha said to him: “You just said: ‘There is no one who, engaged in debate with me, would not be sweating o streams.’ Now it is your sweat that is flowing and that moistens the ground. Do you want to examine the Buddha and see if he has any signs of sweat?” Immediately the Buddha took off his upper robe (uttarāsaṅga) and asked: “Where is the sweat?”

However, there are people who say: “It is possible to be sweating on the forehead but the body is not sweating. Although the Buddha does not have a sweaty brow, certainly his body sweats.” This is why the Buddha removed his upper robe and showed his body.⁸²¹ As a result of this, the heretics directed themselves to the faith and all entered into the Buddha Dharma.

Therefore this physical action of the Buddha was in accordance with knowledge.

Hearing the deity of the pool pronounce these gāthās, the brāhmaṇas quickly went to join the Buddha and asked to be allowed to enter the religious life. The Buddha accepted them and, having gone forth from the world, they cultivated the Path with exertion and obtained arhathood.

⁸¹⁸ The characters tao tsi are often used to render the expression dharmābhisamaya ‘understanding of the Dharma’ (cf. T 1462, k. 2, p. 688c5).

⁸¹⁹ Cūḷasaccasutta of the Majjhima, I, p. 227-237; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 5, p. 35a-37b; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 30, p. 715a-717b.

⁸²⁰ Cf. Majjhima, I, p. 227.

⁸²¹ According to Majjhima (l.c.), the Bhagavat, in this assembly, uncovered his golden-colored body (Bhagavā tasmīṃ parisatiṃ suvaṇṇavaṇṇaṃ kāyaṃ vivari). – According to the Tsa a han, T 99, k. 5, p. 36b23, he opened his upper garment (uttarāsaṅga) and showed his breast. – According to the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 30, p. 716b4-5, he removed his three robes (tricīvara) and said to Nirgrantha: “Determine if the arm-pits of the Tathāgata have any sweat.”

C. Display of His Tongue and His Cryptorchidia⁸²²

The Buddha showed the mark of his tongue (jīhvālakṣaṇa) and the mark of his cryptorchidia (kośagatavastiguhyā). Some people had doubts about these two marks of the Buddha’s body; they should have obtained the Path but because of these doubts, they did not obtain it. This is why the Buddha showed them these two marks. He put out his tongue and covered his whole face with it: although his tongue was so great, it easily went back into his mouth. Those who saw it had their doubts satisfied.

Some people, seeing the Buddha put out his tongue, still had feelings of scorn, for putting out one’s tongue is what little children do; but when they saw him withdraw his tongue and preach the Dharma without any difficulty, they felt respect and cried out at the wonder.

Some people had doubts about the Buddha’s cryptorchidia which is an invisible mark; then the Buddha created by magic a wondrous elephant or a wondrous stallion and, showing them, he declared: “My cryptorchidia is an invisible mark just like that.”

Some even said that the Buddha made his secret organs come out and showed them to someone to suppress his doubts. Scholars (upadśācārya) say that, [by acting in this way], the Buddha was manifesting his great compassion [252a] (mahākaruṇā) for, if a man sees the Buddha’s cryptorchidia, he is able to accumulate the roots of good (kuśalamūla) and produce the thought of anuttarasamyaksambodhi. And those who can rejoice greatly and produce a mind of faith and veneration obtain the sight of the Buddha’s cryptorchidia and cut through their doubts; but other than them, nobody can see it.

Out of great compassion and in order to save beings, the Buddha showed himself three times in the space of a flash of lightning, and the beings who saw him knew that the Buddha has great compassion and that he really has no blind attachment (parāmarśa) or prejudice (abhiniveśa) towards the moral precepts (śīla).

It is for these reasons that the Buddha showed these two marks: it was neither out of play nor out of a sense of modesty.

D. Insults to the Disciples

The Buddha had hard words for the bhikṣus and treated them like fools (mohapurusa).⁸²³

⁸²² According to the sources noted above (p. 275-276F), the Buddha showed these two secret marks to Ambaṭṭha, Brahmāyū and Sela. The fact is not contested; it only proves that the Buddha was not embarrassed by prejudice when it was a matter of converting beings.

⁸²³ For various breaches of discipline, the Buddha frequently treated the bhikṣus as ‘foolish people’ (in Sanskrit, mohapurusa; in Pāli, moghaparisa). The adjective is so commonplace that it makes up the formulary style and is the custom in stock phrases (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 45, 58, 60, 78, 154, 159-160, 189, 301, 305; II, p. 1, 14, 105, 161; III, p. 20-21, 45, 111, 188): Kathaṃ hi nāma tvaṃ moghapurisa...; m’etaṃ moghapurisa appasannānaṃ vā pasādāya pasannānaṃ vā bhiyyobhāvāya. - “How then, you

There are two kinds of hard words: i) insult coming from an evil intention (duṣcitta); ii) insult out of compassion for beings and with the intention of converting them (paripācana).

In the person detached from desire (virakta), there is no insult coming from a bad intention; how then would there be one in the Buddha? It is out of pity for beings and in order to convert them (paripācanārtham) that the Buddha had these strong words.

There are beings who are not introduced into the path by gentle words (ślakṣṇavāc) or by friendly instructions. They need strong words and heavy instructions for them to enter into the Dharma. They are like a good horse (aśva) who starts up when he sees the shadow of the whip (kaśācchāyā) or the stupid donkey (gardabha) who starts walking only when he receives a blow. There are wounds that are cured only by a gentle herb (mṛdvoṣadhi), by saliva (kheṭa) or a magic spell (mantra): there are wounds that are cured only when the sick flesh is cut out with a knife and a strong medicine applied to it.

Moreover, there are five kinds of strong words:

- 1) Merely idle speech (saṃbhinnapralāpa).
- 2) Harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda) plus idle speech (saṃbhinnapralāpa).
- 3) Harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda) plus idle speech (saṃbhinnapralāpa) plus falsehood (mṛṣāvāda).
- 4) Harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda) plus idle speech (saṃbhinnapralāpa), falsehood (mṛṣāvāda) plus malicious gossip (paiśūnyavāda).
- 5) Hard speech coming from a pure mind (akliṣṭacitta) the aim of which is to teach beings to distinguish the good (kuśala) from the bad (akuśala) and to remove them from this level of suffering.

[The strong speech] that combines the four vocal faults (cf. no. 4) is the most serious. The third, second and first are [respectively and in order] smaller and smaller faults.

If a lay disciple of the Buddha (śrāvaka avadātavasana) who has obtained the first or the second paths [i.e., the state of srotaāpanna or sakṛdāgāmin] uses harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda) to command his slaves (dāsa), for him this is not a bad path of action (akuśalakarmapatha).⁸²⁴

He who has accepted the discipline (samāttasaṃvara) is capable of committing two kinds [of harsh words]: either merely idle speech (saṃbhinnapralāpa) (cf. no. 1) or harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda) plus idle speech (cf. no. 2).

foolish man, can you...; that does not contribute, O foolish man, to the conversion of unbelievers or the increase of believers.”

The Buddha cannot be blamed for having used this strong language. In the view of the two Vehicles, all the words of the Buddha, rough as well as gentle, have only the purpose of benefiting beings; in the perspective of the Greater Vehicle, the Buddha never loses the view of the twofold non-existence of beings and of things (pudgala and dharma nairātmya): there is no one to be insulted and there is nothing to be blamed for; see Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, p. 171-176, on this subject.

⁸²⁴ See above, p. 820F.

The anāgamins and the arhats utter harmful words (pāruṣyavāda) without any passion (kleśa); only with pure intention and when reproach is needed to convert beings do they speak harmful words (pāruṣyavāda) and idle words (saṃbhinnapralāpa). If the harmful speech is uttered without passion by the anāgamins and the arhats, it is the same and even more so in the Buddha.

Moreover, if the Buddha speaks harsh words, there is no need to hesitate and ask whether the Buddha utters these words with a bad intention (duṣṭacittena). Why? The Buddha long ago destroyed any bad intentions and it is only with the best intentions (adhyādaya) that he thinks of beings. He is like a loving father teaching his sons; when he reprimands them, it is to correct them; it is not with a bad intention.

When the Buddha was still a bodhisattva and had not yet destroyed the threefold poison (triviṣa), he was the ṛṣi named Tch'an-t'i (Kṣānti) and, when the wicked king cut off his ears, nose, hands and feet, he did not feel any bad feeling [252b] and did not utter any harmful words.⁸²⁵ At that time he had not attained bodhi, but he had no bad feelings. And now that he has attained anuttarasamyaksambodhi, destroyed the three poisons (triviṣa) and is endowed with great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā), can one still ask if he has bad feelings and rough words?

Moreover, when the Buddha treats [the bhikṣus] as fools (mohapuruṣa), it is gentle speech (ślakṣṇavāc) and true speech (satyavāc). These disciples are fools, under the power of the threefold poison (triviṣa): they are fools because the Buddha wants to benefit them and they do not accept it because they do not understand the Buddha's intentions and do not accept his words.

Moreover, in regard to lower things (adhyātmam), the Buddha always puts into action his knowledge of non-existence of self (anātmajñāna) and, in regard to external things, he always contemplates the emptiness of dharmas (dharmaśūnyatā). In these conditions [where there is nobody to speak to and nothing to say], why would the Buddha have harmful words (pāruṣyavāda)?

But beings who do not understand the mind of the Buddha seek out faults in his words. If beings knew with what good intentions (adhyāśaya) the Buddha has pity on them, they would joyously throw themselves into a great fire if he asked them to, and that with as much enthusiasm as a person tormented by heat (gharmārta) throws himself into a clear cool pool. And all the more so, why not accept his words?

But beings, under the grasp of Māra, do not know with what good intention the Buddha thinks of them; this is why they do not accept the words of the Buddha and this is why the Buddha treats them as fools.

Finally, there are people who, on hearing the reprimands of the Buddha, rejoice and say: “It is because he loves me that he speaks so.” That is why the Buddha had treated them as foolish people.

E. Insults to Devadatta ⁸²⁶

⁸²⁵ The Kṣāntijātaka has been fully narrated, p. 264F, 889-890F.

⁸²⁶ The story of Devadatta, cousin and rival of the Buddha, has been told above (p. 868-878F), but here we must return to the detail of why the Buddha treated him as kheḷāpaka (kheḷāsika, kheḷopaka) in the Pāli Vinaya (II, p. 188, 333), kheḷāsaka in the Samantapāsādikā (VI, p. 1275), kheḷāsika in the Commentary of the Dhammapada (I, p. 118).

In his Samantapāsādikā (I.c.), Buddhaghosa has the following explanation: Kheḷāsako 'ti micchājīvena uppannapaccayā ariyehi vantagebbā kheḷasadisā, tathārupe paccaye ayaṃ ajjoharatī 'ti katvā keḷāsako 'ti bhagavatā vutto: “The foods which are procured by wrong livelihood must be spat out up by the Noble Ones like spit. In regard to the fact that Devadatta ate such food. Devadatta was treated by the Lord as kheḷasaka ‘to be spat out like spit’. Hence the translation of ‘evil-living’ proposed by Rhys-Davids and Oldenberg (Vinaya Texts, III, p. 239) and the translation ‘to be vomited like spittle’, better and more literal, given by I. B. Horner (The Book of the Discipline, V, p. 264). Thus it would seem to be just a ‘swear word’ not corresponding to an actual fact.

Nevertheless, taken literally, the expression kheḷapaka or kheḷāsika can mean ‘eater of spit’ and Rhys Davids-Stede in their Pāli-English Dictionary render it as ‘an abusive term meaning eating phlegm’.

I. In the case with which we are dealing here, the accusation claims that Devadatta never swallowed spit and as a result, treating him as kheḷāpaka is an unwarranted insult and a falsehood. The accusation can be based on an entire series of canonical texts:

1) According to the Pāli Vinaya (II, p. 184-185), the Dhammapada Commentary (I, p. 118), the Mahīśāsaka Vinaya (T 1421, k. 3, p. 17c21-25), the Dharmaguptaka Vinaya (T 1428, k. 4, p. 592a9-18) and the Ekottarāgama (T 125, k. 47, p. 802c21-24), Devadatta, in order to win over prince Ajātaśatru, transformed himself into a youth clothed with a waistband of snakes and appeared on the lap of the prince. The latter, frightened, asked who he was, and Devadatta made himself known. The prince said: “If you are really Devadatta, take your original form.” Putting off the form of a youth, Devadatta reappeared dressed in monastic robes and carrying a begging bowl in his hand. From then on, the favors of Ajātaśatru were granted to him.

2) According to the same sources, several days later, Devadatta asked the Buddha to retire and hand over the Community to him. The Buddha, indignant, said to him: “I would not entrust the Community even to Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, so why should I entrust it to you, you corpse (chava), to be spat out like spit (kheḷāsaka).” – This is the version of the Pāli Vinaya (II, p. 188-189) and it is confirmed by the Mahīśāsaka Vinaya (T 1421, k. 3, p. 18b20) which, in the edition of the Souei and the Ming, render the expression kheḷāsaka by jou sien t'o, ‘like spit’, as does the Dharmaguptaka Vinaya (T 1428, k. 4, p. 592b13-14) which translates it as t'i t'o tche chen ‘a mass of tears and spit’.

Nothing in Devadatta’s previous conduct seems to justify such an outrage. Thus the accusation would seem to be an unwarranted insult and lie. However, the matter is more serious in that the Buddha himself said in the Majjhima, I, p. 395: Yaṃ Tathāgato vācaṃ jānāti abhūtaṃ... na taṃ Tathāgato vācaṃ bhāsati: “The Tathāgata never pronounces a word that is false”, no matter whether that word is pleasant or unpleasant to others.

II. In order to refute this major accusation, the defense produces here some articles unknown to the prosecutor and apparently taken from more recent canonical sources. These articles allow it to be established that Devadatta really had swallowed Ajātaśatru’s spit and that consequently the Buddha, treating him as kheḷāsaka (in Sanskrit kheḷāsika) spoke the truth.

The Buddha said to Devadatta: “You are a fool (mūḍha), a corpse (śava), a swallower of spit (kheḷāsika).”

1) In the words of this source, the intention of Devadatta was not to frighten but to seduce the crown prince. For this purpose, he multiplied the transformations and changed successively into an elephant, a horse, an ox, which came to Ajātaśatru by passing through the wall and going out through the door or vice versa. He also changed into a monk and even into a veil or a hat, which Ajātaśatru made into a turban. Finally he took the form of a child adorned with a necklace of precious stones. Charmed, the crown prince took him in his arms, played with him and invariably ended up by putting some spit into his mouth. Out of love for honor and gain, Devadatta agreed to swallow it.

This new version first appeared in the Chinese Udāna (T 212, k. 14, p. 687c23-28) and a Vinaya of unknown origin (T 1464, k. 2, p. 859b22-29), each translated into Chinese in the years 382 and 383 by Tchou Fo-nien.

It also appears in the Saṃyuktāgama of the Kāśyapīya school (T 100, k. 1, p. 374b13-19), translated by a translator, whose name has not been preserved, about 400 C.E.

Finally, it was repeated and developed in the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya (T 1435, k. 36, p. 257c4-12) translated between 404 and 405 by Kumārajīva, and the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya (T 1450, k. 13, p. 168c7-16) of which an incomplete translation was made by Yi-tsing between 700 and 712.

It was to this evidence that the great exegetists of the 4th century turned, the five hundred Kaśmīrian arhats who compiled the Mahāvibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 85, p. 443a1-8) and, as we will see, the author or the authors of the Traité.

2. When Devadatta asked the Buddha to retire and entrust the Community to him, the Buddha refused curtly and treated his cousin as mūḍha ‘fool’, śava ‘corpse’ and kheḷāsika ‘eater of spit’. Those who remembered the kiss exchanged between Ajātaśatru and Devadatta could not help but see an allusion in it to this repugnant action. This is why the translators of the previously cited sources translated kheḷāsika by the following characters:

- a. Tan t'o ‘eater of spit’ (Sarv. Vin, T 1435, k. 36, p. 258b7),
- b. Che t'o tchō ‘eater of spit’ (Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, k. 13, p. 169b26).
- c. Che jen t'o tchō ‘eater of human spit’ (Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 85, p. 443a6-7).
- d. Seou t'o jen ‘swallower of spit’ (Traité, T 1509, k. 26, p. 252c3).

If the Buddha treated Devadatta as a swallower of spit, it is because the latter took Ajātaśatru’s spit, and because the Buddha spoke only the truth.

In the Majjhima, I, p. 395, the Buddha stated: Yaṃ ca kho Tathāgato vācaṃ jānāti bhūtaṃ..., tatra kālaṇṇā Tathāgato hoti tassā vācāya veyyākaraṇāya: “Every word that the Buddha knows to be true, he waits for the opportunity to offer it”, whether it be pleasant or unpleasant for someone else.

In this case, the Buddha had the perfect right to treat Devadatta as kheḷāsika and the accusation made against him is invalid. In the words of the 14th āveṇikadharmā, all vocal actions of the Buddha are preceded by knowledge and accompanied by knowledge.

A ‘fool’ because, due to the gravity of his sins, Devadatta had to fall into the Avīci hell: hence the triple insult.

A ‘corpse’ because, in the appearance of a living man, Devadatta did not accumulate the roots of good (kuśalanūla). With his shaved head and his monk’s robes, one would have said he was a saint (āryapudgala), but inwardly he had no wisdom: he was, therefore, a corpse.

Corpses are adorned in many ways, but they gradually decompose and it is impossible to revive them. This was the case for Devadatta. Each day the Buddha taught him in many ways, but his bad intentions (duṣṭacitta) increased, his evil tendencies (pāpakuśalacitta) grew from day to day, and he finally committed three sins of immediate retribution (ānantarya):⁸²⁷ he was therefore a corpse.

He was also a ‘swallower of spit’. Devadatta, coveting gain (lābha) and honor (saṅkāra), changed himself into a young boy (kumāraka) of heavenly appearance and appeared in the arms of prince Ajātaśatru. The prince breathed into his mouth and gave him his spit to swallow. This is why Devadatta was a swallower of spit.

Question. – Devadatta who possessed the concentrations (samādhi) had renounced sensual desires (vītarāga). Why would he still swallow another’s spit?

Answer. – In this individual, the evil tendencies (duṣṭacitta) were deep, but his faculties were keen (tīkṣhendriya). Having renounced sensual desires (vītarāga), he could change himself. When he swallowed the spit, he lost his sharp faculties, but when he wanted to, he recovered them. This is why he was called ‘swallower of spit’.

Furthermore Devadatta said to the Buddha: “The Buddha is worn out [252c] (jīrṇa). Since he has always loved retreat (viveka), let him go into the forest and enjoy dhyāna there and let him entrust the Community to me.” The Buddha replied: “Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana have great wisdom, are good, gentle and pure men, and yet I would not entrust the Community to them. Why then would I entrust it to you who are a fool, a corpse, a swallower of spit?”⁸²⁸

It is for these reasons that the Buddha, although he had no attachment toward things, offered harsh words (on occasion), but with the sole purpose of converting beings.

F. Use of a Stone Bowl

“The Buddha forbade the bhikṣus to use eight kinds of bowls (pātra).”⁸²⁹

⁸²⁷ He fomented a schism, injured the Buddha’s foot and mortally struck the nun Uṭpalavarnā: see above, p. 873-876f.

⁸²⁸ Ibid., II, p. 188: Śāriputtamogallānānaṃ pi kho ahaṃ, Devadatta, bhikkhusaṃghaṃ na nissajjeeyyaṃ. Kim pana tuyhaṃ chavassa kheḷāpakassā ‘ti.

⁸²⁹ According to its custom when it deals with disciplinary matters, here the Traité again refers to the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya, T 1435, k. 37, p. 260b6-8, where the Buddha says to the bhikṣus: “Starting from [Bowls 1-4]: Precious bowls of gold (suvarṇa), silver (rūpya), [beryl (vaidūrya) and pearl (maṇi)]. – Since people covet precious things, since the latter are hard to find (durlabha) and because people are attached to them, the Buddha prohibits the keeping (dhāraṇa) of these precious substances.

He does not allow even touching (sparśana) that which is ‘precious’ and neither does he allow keeping it.⁸³⁰ If such a gift is made [to the bhikṣus], he allows them to realize their value, but not too expensive.⁸³¹ [Bowl 7]: The wooden (dāru) bowl. – Since it retains grease (meda) and is not clean, the Buddha does not permit it to be kept.

Bowls 5, 6, 8]: The other three bowls [copper (tāmra), tin (trapu) and stone (śaila) do not have such disadvantages.

Question. – But the baked clay (mṛttikā) bowl and the iron (ayas) bowl [permitted by the Buddha] also retain grease and are no different from the wooden bowl. Why does the Buddha allow them?

Answer. – If the baked clay bowl and the iron bowl are not steamed (vāsita), the Buddha does not permit them either, for they should be steamed in order not to retain grease.

As for the stone (śaila) bowl, it is thick (audārika) or thin (sūkṣma). Thin, it does not retain bad grease and that is why the Buddha used it himself, but he does not allow the bhikṣus to keep them because of their weight. A swallow of milk by the Buddha surpasses in power that of a myriad of perfumed white elephants (gandahastin); this is why [the stone bowl] does not seem heavy for him, but out of compassion (karuṇā) for the bhikṣus, he does not allow them to keep them.

Question. – But the assistants (upasthāyaka) such as Lo-t’o (Rādhā), Mi-hi-kia (Meghika), Siu-na-tch’a-to-lo (Sunakṣetra), Na-k’ie-so-p’o-lo (Nāgasamāla), A-nan (Ānanda), etc., who followed the Buddha, brought him his utensils.⁸³² Why did the Buddha not have pity on them?

today on, I forbid you to have (dhāraṇa) eight kinds of bowls (pātra); bowls made of gold (suvarṇa), silver (rūpya), beryl (vaidūrya), pearl (maṇi), copper (tāmra), tin (trapa), wood (dāru) and stone (śaila). He who keeps (dhārayati) such a one commits a duṣkṛta. But I allow you to keep two kinds of bowls: iron (ayas) and baked clay (mṛttikā).” - Compare Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 112; Mahīśasaka Vin., T 1421, k. 26, p. 169c-170a; Mahāsaṃghika Vin., T 1425, k. 29, p. 462a; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1451, k. 2, p. 213c.

⁸³⁰ The 18th naihsargikā pāyantika of the Sarvāstivādins: Yaḥ punar bhikṣuḥ svahaṣṭaṃ rūpyam udgrhṇīyad vā udgrāhayed vā nikṣiptam vā sādḥayen nihsargikā pātayantikā: “If a bhikṣu takes in his hand a precious object (gold or silver), or causes it to be taken, or tolerates it being placed in his hand, there is a fault involving surrender of the object.” – For the other Vinayas, see W. Pachow, Comparative Study of the Prātimokṣa, p. 112; Prātimokṣa-Sūtra of the Mahāsaṃghikas, p. 18.

⁸³¹ For this bit of casuistry, see Sarv. Vinayavibhaṅga, p. 103; P. Demiéville, A propos de Concile de Vaiśālī, T’oung Pao, p. 272-275.

⁸³² Each Buddha had his assistant (upasthāyaka), a monk specially attached to his person, entrusted with fanning him, carrying his robe and bowl for alms-round, introducing visitors. The Sanskrit Mahāvadānasūtra, ed. by S. Waldschmidt, Anhang, p. 172, has drawn up a list of the assistants who Answer. – If these assistants carried the Buddha's bowl, it was with the miraculous intervention (prātihāryabala) of the Buddha. Besides, they honored and venerated the Buddha so highly that they did not find his bowl too heavy. And also, the physical strength of Ānanda was great.

Furthermore, the Buddha does not allow the use of stone bowls (śailapātra) because fine ones (sūkṣma) are hard to find (durlabha) and because thick ones (audārika) retain grease. The Buddha's bowl arose spontaneously (svatas) on the four summits of the mountains on which the four kings of the gods served the last seven Buddhas: Aśoka for Vipāśyin, Kṣemakāra for Śikhin, Upāsanta for Viśvabhuj, Bhadrīka for Krakasunda (or Krakucchanda), Svastika for Kanakamuni, Sarvamitra for Kāśyapa, and finally Ānanda for Śākyamuni.

We know under what circumstances the last one chose Ānanda: in the twentieth year of his public ministry, the Buddha, feeling old age coming on, felt the need for a servant who would be attached to his residence, and he named Ānanda as his assistant. Having accepted this responsibility, the disciple set certain conditions: never to share the food and robes of the Buddha, not to accompany him among the lay-adepts but to have access to him at any hour of the day (cf. Upasthāyakaśūtra of the T'chong a han, T 26, k. 8, p. 471c-475a; Mūlasarv. Vinaya, in W. W. Rockhill, Life of the Buddha, p. 88; Fo pao ngen king, T 156, k. 6, p. 155c22-25; Hien yu king, T 202, k. 8, p. 404b-c; Tch'ou tch'ou king, T 730, p. 526a-b; Vinayavinhāṣā, Y 1440, k. 1, p. 504c12-15; Comm. of Anguttara, I, p. 292-296; Comm. of Theragāthā in Psalm of the Brethren, p. 350-352; Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 192; Sanskrit Mahāvadānasūtra, p. 78; Divyavadāna, p. 612). - Ānanda fulfilled his mission with the greatest devotion for the last twenty-five years of the Teacher's life (Tch'ang a han, T 1, k. 3, p. 19c5; T 5, k. 2, p. 169a15; Traité, above, p. 94f). However, the Northern Mahāparinirvāṇa (T 374, k. 40, p. 601b26) notes only twenty years or more.

Before Ānanda took charge, other disciples functioned temporarily. The Comm. of the Theragāthā (Psalm of the Brethren, p. 350) and that of the Udāna (p. 217) record seven of them and the old canonical sources confirm this: 1) Nāgasamāla (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 83, l. 19); 2) Nāgita (Dīgha, I, p. 151, l. 8); 3) Upavāna (Dīgha, II, p. 139, l. 1; Saṃyutta, I, p. 174, l. 25); 4) Sunakkhatta (Jātaka, I, p. 389, l. 16); 5) the novice Cunda (Saṃyutta, V, p. 161, l. 23); 6) Sāgata (Vinaya, I, p. 179, l. 26); 7) Meghiya (Udāna, p. 34, l. 4).

On the other hand, the Vinayamātrkā of the Haimavatas (T 1463, k. 5, p. 827c12-14) knows of eight disciples who, "fan in hand, fanned the Buddha". These were: 1) Kāśyapa; 2) Hāladāyīn; 3) Sāgata; 4) Meghiya; 5) Nāgasamāla; 6) [Mahā]cunda; 7) Sunakṣatra; 8) Ānanda.

In the present passage, the Traité mentions, by way of example, only five upasthāyakas, but later (k. 33, p. 303b) it will complete the list:

"When the Buddha Śākyamuni had not yet gone forth (pravrajita), he had Chandaka as assistant (upasthāyaka) and Kāladāyīn as playmate (sahakrīḍanaka): cf. Mahāvastu, III, p. 91; Jātaka, I, p. 86); his wives Gopīyā, Yaśodharā, etc., were his close entourage (abhyantaraparivāra). – Having left home, during the six years of austerity (duṣkaracaryā), he had the group of five [Kauṇḍinya, etc.] as assistants. – Having once attained enlightenment (abhisambuddha), Meghiyā, Rādha, Sunakṣatra, Ānanda, Guhyaka the Malla, etc., formed his close entourage (abhyantaraparivāra)."

(cāturmahārājakakāyikadeva) dwell. But other people do not have these bowls that arise by themselves; to try to make one would be very difficult and very complicated. This is why the Buddha did not allow [the bhikṣus] to have stone bowls but used one himself to distinguish himself from his disciples, in the same way that the king venerated by people uses special utensils (bhājana) himself. Seeing the Buddha use a special bowl, people's veneration (gurukāra) and respect (satkāra) is increased and they develop pure faith (cittaprasāda).

Question. – If it is fitting for the Buddha's bowl to be special, why should his robe (cīvara) be the same [as those of the other bhikṣus]?

Answer. – But the clothing of the Buddha is also different from that of others. Thus, when the Buddha attained bodhi, he knew that Kāśyapa's robe should be worn by the Buddha, and Kāśyapa's robe was worth ten myriad ounces of gold.⁸³³

Next, Jīvaka offered the Buddha a chen-mo-ken cotton robe also worth ten myriad ounces of gold. The Buddha asked Ānanda to take this robe away, cut it up and make a cloak out of it.⁸³⁴ This being done, the Buddha put it on and this [253a] outfit differed [from all the rest].

Question. – However, it was following this event that the Buddha said to the bhikṣus: "Starting from today, provided that a bhikṣu mindfully seeks nirvāṇa and turns his back on saṃsāra, I allow him, if he so wishes, to wear a robe worth ten myriad ounces of gold, and I also allow him to eat the food of a hundred flavors (śatarasabhojana)."⁸³⁵ [Therefore at the beginning] his robe was different and it was only later that he

⁸³³ See above, p. 1399f.

⁸³⁴ As a fee for his medical attentions, Jīvaka received a great raincoat (bṛhatikāprāvaraṇa) worth a hundred thousand kārṣāpanas from the king of the Videhas. It was in fact a piece of impermeable cloth. Jīvaka offered it to the Buddha who asked Ānanda to cut it up and make a cloak out of it. Ānanda stretched it out on the ground and measured it: the material was so long that it could be made into numerous garments. Ānanda sewed the three robes (tricīvara) for the Buddha, an upper and a lower garment (sāntarottara) for himself and a cloak (kusūlaka) for Rāhula. The rest, hundreds of pieces (paṭaśatāni), was given to the community of bhikṣus who did not know what to do with it. The Buddha said to them: "I allow the bhikṣus to keep robes offered by the householders, but only after having cut them up and dirtied them."

All this is told in the Cīvaravastu of the Mūlasarv. Vinaya (Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part 2, p. 48): Jīvakaḥ kumārābhṛto Bhagavantam idam avoca. ācaritaṃ bhadanta mama yasya rājño vā rājāmātyasya anujānaṃ bhikṣubhir gṛhaticīvarakāni śāstralīnāni duṣvarṇīkṛtya dhāraitavyāni.

⁸³⁵ In fact, it was after another event that the Buddha permitted his monks to wear fine robes offered to them by householders. This event is told in most of the Vinayas:

Sarvāstivādin Vinaya, T 1435, k. 27, p. 194b25-c11: Jīvaka, wearing a robe of chen-mo-ken (material not yet identified) worth a hundred thousand [kārṣāpanas], wished to offer it to the Buddha. Bowing down at the feet of the Buddha, he stood to one side and said to him: "When I care for a king or a great minister, everyone favors me. Today, when I have cared for the Buddha, I would like the Bhagavat to grant me a favor." The Buddha said to Jīvaka: "The Tathāgatas, arhat and allowed [the bhikṣus to wear one similar to his].⁸³⁶ His bowl [was unique of its type] and he never allowed [the bhikṣus to have a similar one].

Answer. – Here we must repeat what has been said before (p. 1676F) in regard to the stone bowl (śailapātra). The Buddha did not receive this bowl from human hands. When he attained bodhi and when meal-time came, he needed a utensil. Knowing the Buddha's mind, the four kings of the gods (cāturmahārājakāyikadeva) brought four bowls and offered them to him.⁸³⁷ Among the Buddhas of the samyaksambuddha, are atikrāntavara [i.e., have unsurpassed favors, or, do not grant favors without knowing what it is about]. Jīvaka said to the Buddha: It is something fitting (yad kalpati) that I beg you to grant me." The Buddha said to Jīvaka: "What favor are you asking?" Jīvaka answered: "Bhadanta, here is a garment of chen-mo-ken worth a hundred thousand [kāṛṣāpanas]: I would like the Buddha to accept it out of compassion for me." In silence, the Buddha accepted it. Knowing that the Buddha accepted silently, Jīvaka gave to the Buddha the garment of chen-mo-ken worth a hundred thousand [kāṛṣāpanas], then, having bowed his head to the Buddha's feet, he went away. Because of this, the Buddha called the Saṃgha together and, having gathered the Saṃgha, he said to the bhikṣus: "This very day Jīvaka has given me a garment of chen-mo-ken worth a hundred thousand [kāṛṣāpanas]. From today on, if someone gives a garment of this kind to a bhikṣu, he will be able to wear it as he wishes. From today on, if a bhikṣu wishes to wear rags gathered from the dust-heap (pāṃśukūla), I permit him; but if he wishes to wear [fine] robes received from the householders (grhapaticīvārāṇi), I permit that likewise."

Other Vinayas (Pāli Vin., I, p. 280; Mahīśāsaka Vin., T 1431, k. 20, p. 134a28-b11; Dharmagupta Vin., T 1428, k. 40, p.854c2-21) which likewise tell this episode add several details: it was Pradyota, king of Avanti, who made the gift to Jīvaka of the precious garment, or rather two pieces of cloth coming from the land of the Sivi (Siveyyakam dussayugam). In Pāli (Vin. I, p. 280; III, p. 172) the rule stated by the Buddha was formulated as follows: Anujānāmi bhikkhave gahapaticīvaram, yo icchati paṃsukūliko hotu, yo icchati gahapaticīvaram sādīyatu.

⁸³⁶ A passage from the Samantapāsādikā, V, p. 1119, noted by Horner, Book of the Discipline, IV, p. 296, remarks that, during the twenty years following his enlightenment until the event related here, neither the Lord nor any monk accepted robes offered by the householders; all wore rags. However, according to the Traité, for some time at least, the Lord wore the fine robe of Kāśyapa.

⁸³⁷ See Catuspariśatsūtra, p. 84-87, and the many similar texts collected by E. Waldschmidt: When the merchants Tripusa and Bhallika offered a honey-cake to the Buddha, the latter needed a bowl to receive it. Then the four great kings of the gods, understanding his wish, brought from the stone mountain (pāṣānamayāt parvatāt) four stone bowls (catvāri pātrāṇi) made and crafted by non-human beings (amanuṣyakṛtāny amanuṣyasniṣṭhītāni), completely transparent (svacchāni), pure (śucīni), with no bad odors (niṣpratigandhāni), and offered them to the Buddha. But the latter needed only one vessel, and in the words of the Mahāvastu, III, p.304, with a touch of his thumb, he made the bowls dissolve into one another; thus the four bowls became one bowl, but the rims of the other three were always to be distinguished on the last bowl. Hence, comments A. Foucher, AggB, I, p. 420, the three lines that encircle the upper rim of the bowl on many bas-reliefs at Gandhāra three times, it has been customary to receive their bowl from the hands of the four kings of the gods. At that time, the Community (saṃgha) did not yet exist; how could the Buddha authorize [a bowl to anyone]? And if, later, [after the beginning of the Community], the Buddha had allowed the use [of a fine stone bowl], nobody could have made one. Besides, in Jambudvīpa, people do not like stone bowls, so nobody would have given him one.

Besides, the Buddha advised the bhikṣus to keep their own qualities (guṇa) secret.⁸³⁸ If the bhikṣus received stone bowls, people would say that they had received them from the god realm or from the nāgas. If the bhikṣus asked people to make them, the work would have been difficult. Furthermore, it might be feared that people would say that the bhikṣus wanted to equal the Buddha; this is why the Buddha did not permit them.

With regard to the garment, some say: "In the very midst of the Saṃgha, the Buddha receives magnificent garments offered to him by the dānapatis, but he is the only one to wear them and does not allow the bhikṣus to have any." This is why the Buddha allowed the bhikṣus to have fine ones also.

Moreover, the bhikṣus do not wear [these fine robes], given the rarity of benefactors (dāyaka) [so generous] and the rarity of recipients (pratigrāhaka) [so lucky]. People do not give [such fine clothing] to impure bhikṣus: as for the pure (śuddha) bhikṣus⁸³⁹, as they had few desires (alpeccha) and were content with their lot (saṃtuṣṭa), they did not wear [those that had been given to them].

It is to cut people's doubts (saṃśayacchedana) that the Buddha allowed the bhikṣus to wear [fine] robes; as for the [stone] bowls that they could not expect to receive, he did not allow them.

Question. – It is said in the sūtras: "The Buddha, who has a diamond body (vajrakāya), has no need of food." Then why did he keep a bowl?

Answer. – The Buddhadharmā consists of two Paths: i) the path of the śrāvakas; ii) the path of the Buddha. In the śrāvaka system, the Buddha conforms to human customs and needs food; in the Mahāyāna system, he resorts to skillful means (upāya) to save beings; this is why he appears to eat whereas in truth he does not eat.

Question. – What is this skillful means?

Answer. – Wishing to save people, the Buddha borrows the customs of humans. If he did not do this, people would take him for a non-human (amanuṣya) and would wonder why they follow his Dharma.

Moreover, there are people who find salvation in generosity (dāna); out of respect for them, the Buddha accepts their offerings of food. Then these people say: "The food I offer contributes to sustaining the body of the Buddha.” Their mind becomes very joyful (mahāmudītā), and as a result of this joy, they welcome the Buddha’s words with faith.

⁸³⁸ See, for example, Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 112: Na bhikkhave gihīnaṃ uttarimanussadhammaṃ iddhipāṭihāriyaṃ dassetabbam.

⁸³⁹ Horner, Book of the Discipline, IV, p. 449: "Suddha in such a connection means that a monk has committed no offences, or that, if he has, he has confessed them and so is 'pure' to take his place at the Pātimokkha recitation."

It is like a great sovereign who is invited to dine by his ministers and subjects. The king has no need for it, but to win over his people, he eats enough so they they are made happy. For similar reasons, the Buddha takes nourishment.

Question. – If the Buddha does not eat, where is the food that he does accept? [253b]

Answer. – The workings of the Buddha (buddhakārya) are inconceivable (acintya): they should not be investigated.

Furthermore, there are people who are saved when they find food for the Buddha; there are others who are saved when they hear his sounds (śabda), see his color (rūpa), touch his body (kāya) or smell his smell (gandha). If they need [the Buddha’s] food to be saved, the Buddha gives it to them.

It is said in the Mi tsi kin kang king (Guhyakavajrapāṇisūtra or Tathāgatacintyaguhyā-nirdeśa): “When the Buddha brings food to his mouth, there are devas seeking the Buddhist Path who carry it to the ten directions and distribute it.”⁸⁴⁰

Question. – If that is so, what did you mean when you said above (p. 1402F) in regard to Saṃghānusr̥ṣṭi⁸⁴¹ that nobody can eat the Buddha’s food?

Answer. – When the Buddha does not give his food away, it is because nobody is capable is able to eat to eat it, but here, if he gives it, it is because it can be eaten. How do we know that?

When the Buddha ate oats (yava), he gave this food to Ānanda,⁸⁴² and when the śramaṇa Eul-che-yi-eul (Śroṇa Kotvīmśa) offered the Buddha some good soup (yūṣa), the latter gave the leftovers to king Bimbisāra.

Thus we know that if the Buddha makes a gift of his food after having accepted it, it is that one is able to eat it; if he does not make a gift of it, it is that one cannot digest it.

Furthermore, if food is offered to the Buddha and the latter does not eat it, people would be unable to digest it, but if, after having eaten, the Buddha gives the leftovers, it is that people are able to digest it. Therefore, actually, the Buddha does not eat, but in order to save beings, he pretends to accept food and he keeps a bowl (pātraṃ dhārayati) [for that purpose].

G. Silence on the Fourteen Difficult Questions

The Buddha did not answer fourteen difficult questions.⁸⁴³ -

The Buddha has four ways of answering (vyākaraṇa): i) answering in a categorical manner (ekāmiṣeṇa vyākaraṇam); ii) answering by distinguishing (vibhajya vyākaraṇam); iii) answering by asking a question (paripṛcchāvvyākaraṇam); iv) answering by not replying (sthānāṇiyavyākaraṇam).⁸⁴⁴ Now these fourteen difficult questions had to be answered by not replying.

Moreover, when it is useful, the Buddha does answer. But questions asked by the heretics (nīrthika) do not lead to nirvāṇa (na nirvāṇāya saṃvartante) and increase doubt (saṃśayān vardhayanti). Therefore the Buddha answers by not replying to them. If he knew that they have a definite usefulness, he would reply by distinguishing (vibhajya), but as they have no use, he stops and does not reply. This is why we know that the Buddha is omniscient (sarvajña).

Furthermore, the Buddha spoke of three kinds of things: i) conditioned things (saṃskṛtadharma), ii) unconditioned things (asaṃskṛtadharma) and iii) inexpressible things (avācyaadharma): in doing this, he has spoken of all dharmas.

Furthermore, being based (āśṛīya) on the eternalist view (śāśvatadr̥ṣṭi) or the nihilist view (ucchedadr̥ṣṭi), the heretics asked the questions of eternalism or nihilism, but since any real nature (satyalakṣaṇa) is absent in them, the Buddha did not reply. The eternal nature (nityalakṣaṇa) and the non-eternal nature (anityalakṣaṇa) seen by these heretics have no reality. Why? The heretics grasp (udgr̥hṇanti) these natures and become attached to them (āsajyante), saying: “This is eternal, that is nothingness.” As for the Buddha, he too speaks of eternal nature and non-eternal nature, but merely by way of refutation (pratipakṣa).

Furthermore, people say: “Nothingness (nāstitva) exists; existence (astitva) does not exist.” They are making a mistake, and the Buddha does not make a mistake by not answering.

The sun (sūrya) lights up the earth, but it can neither lower the mountains nor elevate the valleys: it is limited to making them visible. In the same way, the Buddha has no action on dharmas. If they exist, he says that they exist; if they do not exist, he says that they do not exist. Thus he said:

“Old age and death have birth as condition (jātipratyayaṃ jarāmaraṇam), etc. [253c] on up to: the formations have ignorance as condition (yāvād avidyāpratyaṃh saṃskārah). Whether there is a Buddha or there is no Buddha, this causality (idaṃpratyaṃyātā), this nature of things (dharmatā), is always present in the world. Buddhas appear in the world in order to teach this Dharma to beings.”⁸⁴⁵

Furthermore, if the Buddha talked about eternalism (śāśvata) or nihilism (uccheda), this would be a mistake. If you were asked what is the size or the physical appearance of the son of a barren woman and a eunuch (vandhyāṣaṇḍhaputra), this question would not deserve an answer. It is the same for the fourteen difficult questions: only in hypothesis do eternalism and nihilism have a basis to which response may be made, but since there is no eternity or nothingness, the Buddha does not respond.

⁸⁴⁰ On these feasts of immortality, see also the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, p. 319-324 and the appendix, p. 430-437.

⁸⁴¹ Adopting the variant nien-seng.

⁸⁴² See above, p. 1530F, n. 3.

⁸⁴³ For the fifth time, the Traité returns to this subject: see above, p. 154-158F, 421F, 423F, 529F.

⁸⁴⁴ See references above, p. 158F, note 2; 1378F

⁸⁴⁵ A free citation of a canonical passage: Tsa a han, T 99, no. 296, k. 12, p. 84b-c. See above, p. 157F, note 1 and references to be added from the Nidānasamyukta, p. 147-149.

For all these reasons the Buddha does not make the mistake of answering the fourteen difficult questions.

H. Simultaneous Teaching of the Self and the Non-self

In some places the Buddha says that the ātman exists and in other places he says that it does not exist. –

People who understand the meaning (artha) of the Buddhist doctrine and know the designation (prajñapti) say that the ātman exists. People who do not understand the meaning of the Buddhist doctrine and do not know the designation say that the ātman does not exist.

Furthermore, if a person is about to fall into the view of nihilism (ucchedaḍḍhī), the Buddha says to him: “There is an ātman which, in future existences, undergoes [the retribution] of its wrongdoings (āpatti) and its merits (puṇya).” On the other hand, if a person is about to fall into the view of eternalism (śāśvatadṛṣṭi), the Buddha says to him: “There is neither an ātman, nor someone who acts (kāraka) nor a patient (?) (vedaka),⁸⁴⁶ and there is no autonomous dharma (svatantra) existing separate from what are called the five aggregates (pañcaskandha).”⁸⁴⁷

Question. – If that is so, where is the truth?

Answer. – It is the anātman that is true,⁸⁴⁸ for the Seals of the Dharma (dharmamudrā) say: “All conditioned dharmas are impermanent; all dharmas are without self; nirvāṇa is peace” (sarvasaṃskārāṇāṃ anityāḥ, sarvadharmāṇāṃ anātmānaḥ, śantaṃ nirvāṇam).⁸⁴⁹ Now the Dharma seal called nirvāṇa is the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. But if someone has not yet planted the roots of good (anavaropitakuśaladharmā), if his wisdom is not yet sharp (atīkṣṇaprajñā), the Buddha does not preach the profound doctrine of anātman (gambhīrānātmadharmā) to him because, if he did, this person would fall into the view of nihilism (ucchedaḍḍhī).

Question. – So be it. But in the Kia-chō-wen (Kāśyapapariprecchā), the Buddha said: “The ātman is one extreme, the anātman is the other extreme: avoiding these two extremes is called the Middle Way” (ātmety ayam eka antaḥ, anātmety ayam dvitīya antaḥ. ity etāv ubhāv antāv anupagamyā madhyamā pratipad ity ucyate).⁸⁵⁰ Therefore why do you say here that the anātman is true and that the ātman is just a manner of speaking [that constitutes] a skillful means (upāyappravacana)?

Answer. – 1) The partisans of anātman (anātmavādin) are of two kinds: i) those who grasp (udgrhṇanti) at the nature of anātman (anātmalakṣaṇa) and cling (āsīyante) to the anātman; ii) those who destroy the ātman without, however, grasping at the anātman or clinging to it so that the anātman disappears by itself (svataḥ).

For the first, the anātman is an extreme (anata); for the second, the anātman is the Middle Way (madhyamā pratipad).

2) Furthermore, if the Buddha speaks of the ātman or the anātman, he has two reasons for doing so: i) if he is speaking from the conventional point of view (saṃvṛtitaḥ), there is an ātman; ii) if he is speaking from the absolute point of view (paramārthataḥ), there is no ātman.

This is why he is not wrong in speaking sometimes of ātman and sometimes of anātman.

I. Simultaneous Teaching of Existence and Non-existence

In some places the Buddha speaks of the existence of dharmas and in other places he speaks of their non-existence. –

Question. – You should not speak separately of existence (astitā) and non-existence (nāstitā): existence is ātman and non-existence is anātman. Why return [to a subject already dealt with]?

Answer. – 1) That is not correct (ayuktaṃ etad). In the Buddhadharmā there are two kinds of emptiness (śūnyatā): i) the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā); ii) the emptiness of things (dharmāśūnyatā).

Saying that there is no ātman is stating the emptiness of beings; saying that there are no dharmas is stating the emptiness of things. [254a]

Saying that there is an ātman and knowing the nature of pure designation (prajñaptilakṣaṇa) is not clinging to the ātman; saying that there is an ātman within the five aggregates (pañcaskandha) is clinging to the ātman. In order to destroy this clinging to the ātman, it is said: “There is only the five aggregates. Impermanence, suffering, emptiness, non-self, peace and nirvāṇa, that is existence.”

2) Furthermore, there are two kinds of views of nothingness (ucchedaḍḍhī):

a. “There is no future existence (aparājanman) where one undergoes suffering (duḥkha) or happiness (sukha) as a result of wrongdoings (āpatti) or merit (puṇya).” For those people, it is said: “There is an ātman that, from the present existence (ihajanman) to the future existence (aparājanman), undergoes the retribution for wrongdoings and merits.

b. “All dharmas are empty (śūnya) and without attachment (nirāsaṅga).” This is a wrong view (mithyāḍḍhī) and, for these people, it is said: “There are [two kinds of] dharmas, namely conditioned (saṃskṛta) dharmas and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) dharmas.

3) For beings of dull faculties (atīkṣṇendriya), it is said that there is no ātman; for beings of sharp faculties (tīkṣṇendriya) and deep wisdom (gambhīraprajñā), it is said that dharmas are empty from beginning to end. Why? Because anātman involves the rejection of dharmas. Thus it is said:

If he knows anātman well,

⁸⁴⁶ Monier-Williams: vedaka = proclaiming, making known

⁸⁴⁷ These two apparently contradictory sūtras have been cited above, p. 32F, notes 1 and 2.

⁸⁴⁸ A peremptory affirmation which ought to draw the attention of western literary circles trying desperately to introduce the notion of a soul into Buddhism.

⁸⁴⁹ See above, p. 1369F.

⁸⁵⁰ Cf. Saṃyutta, II, p. 17; III, p. 135: Sabbam atthūti kho Kaccāyana ayam eko anto, sabbaṃ natthūti ayam dutiyo anto. Ete te Kaccāyana ubho ante anupagamma majjhena Tathāgato dhammaṃ deseti.

Every person who thinks in this way

Does not rejoice on hearing about existent dharmas,

Does not grieve on hearing about nonexistent dharmas.

Actually, to speak about ātman is to give support (āśraya) to things; to speak about anātman is to stop any support.

4) Moreover, the Buddhist doctrine has two ways of expressing itself: i) if it speaks clearly, it says that dharmas are empty; ii) if it expresses itself as skillful means (upāya), it says that there is no ātman. These two ways of teaching the Dharma end up in the same nature of Prajñāpāramitā. This is why the Buddha says in the sūtra: “The paths (mārga) that lead to nirvāṇa are absolutely identical: it is not that there are different paths.”⁸⁵¹

5) Moreover, the existent ātman, existent dharmas, parents, wrongdoings (āpatti) and merit (puṇya), greater or lesser karmic retribution, are spoken of particularly to lay people (grhasṭha). Why? Because lay people generally do not seek nirvāṇa but cling to retribution of actions (phalavipāka) in future existences. On the other hand, the nonexistent ātman and non-existent dharmas are spoken of mainly to monastics (pravrajita). Why? Because generally monastics tend toward nirvāṇa, do not assume dharmas, nirvāṇa being the destruction of self.

6) Moreover, there are people whose spiritual faculties, faith, etc. (śraddhādīndriya) are not yet ripe (paripakva) and who first seek perceptible [benefits] and later abandon them. For these people the Buddha advises [the accumulation] of good dharmas and the rejection of bad dharmas. By contrast, there are people whose spiritual faculties, faith, etc. (śraddhādīndriya) are already ripe (paripakva) and who seek no perceptible [benefit] (upalabdha) in dharmas; they seek only to avoid the saṃsāric destinies. For these people the Buddha teaches emptiness (śūnyatā) and the non-existence (anupalabdhitā) of dharmas.

Both teachings are true (satya). Thus the ring finger (aṅgulī) is both long (dīrgha) and short (hrasva); compared to the middle finger (madhyamā), it is short and compared to the little finger (kaniṣṭhā), it is long; its longness and its shortness are both true. It is the same for the doctrine of existence (astitvāvāda) and the doctrine of non-existence (nāstitvāvāda). To speak of existence is sometimes conventional (saṃvṛti) and sometimes absolute (paramārtha); to speak of non-existence is sometimes conventional and sometimes absolute. That the Buddha [254b] speaks of ātman or of anātman, both are true.

Question. – If both these things are true, why, as a general rule, does the Buddha praise emptiness (śūnyatā) and criticize existence (astitā)?

Answer. – Emptiness (śūnyatā), non-existence (anupalabdhitā) is the treasure of the Dharma (dharmaṇidhāna) of the Buddhas of the ten directions, noble amongst all. Thus it is said in the ⁸⁵¹ For this idea, see Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 40: Ekam evāhaṃ Śāriputra yānam ārabhya sattvānāṃ dharmāṃ deśayāmi yadidaṃ buddhayānam. na kiṃcic Śāriputra dvitīyaṃ vā tṛtīyaṃ samvidyate.

Prajñāpāramitā, in the Tchou-lei-p'in (Parīdanāparivarta): “The Prajñāpāramitā is the treasure of the Dharma of the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions.”⁸⁵²

The Prajñāpāramitā is the emptiness of non-existence (anupalambhaśūnyatā). If the Buddha sometimes speaks of non-existent dharmas, it is in order to ripen beings (sattvapariṣkānātham) who, long afterwards, will all enter into the treasure of the Dharma of non-existence.

Question. – If that is so, why does the Prajñāpāramitā say: “Seeing the emptiness (śūnyatā), the non-existence (anupalabdhitā) of the five aggregates (pañcaskandha) is not bodhi”?

Answer. - It is said in the Prajñāpāramitā that existence and non-existence do not exist.

[Dīrghanakhasūtra.]⁸⁵³ – Similarly the Tch'ang-tchao fan-tche king (Dīrghanakha-brahmacārisūtra) says:

There are three kinds of wrong view: i) everything exists; ii) nothing exists; iii) things are partly existent and partly non-existent.⁸⁵⁴

The Buddha said to the brahmacārin Dīrghanakha: The view that ‘everything exists’ is tied to desire, aversion and ignorance (moha). The view that ‘nothing exists’ is not tied to desire, or aversion, or ignorance. The view that ‘things partly exist and partly do not exist’ is partially tied and partially not tied to the aforementioned faults.⁸⁵⁵

Faced with these three views, the noble disciple has the following thought: “If I adopt the view that ‘everything exists’, I will be in debate with two people: the one for whom nothing exists and the other for whom things partly exist and partly do not exist. If I adopt the view that ‘nothing exists’, I will also be in debate with two people: the one for whom nothing exists and the other for whom things partly exist and partly do not exist. If I adopt the view that ‘things partly exist and partly do not exist’, I will be in debate with two people: the one for whom everything exists and the other for whom nothing exists.”⁸⁵⁶

From that arises conflict, from conflict arises disagreement, from disagreement arises violence. Foreseeing conflict, disagreement and violence for himself, the disciple gives up this view of non-existence and adopt no other view.⁸⁵⁷ Not taking up any view, he enters into the path.

⁸⁵² Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 20, p. 363b4: Ānanda, these six pāramitās are the inexhaustible treasure of the Dharma of all the Buddhas. The Buddhas of the ten directions who presently preach the Dharma are all derived from the six pāramitās. The same in the past and the future.

⁸⁵³ An extract from the Dīrghanakhasutta of the Majjhima, I, p. 497-501 (cf. Tsa a han, T 99, no. 969, k. 34, p. 249a-250a; Pie yi tsa a han, T 100, no. 203, k. 11, p. 449a-b), the original Sanskrit of which is reproduced partially in the Avadānaśataka, II, p. 187 seq.

⁸⁵⁴ Avadānaśataka, II, p. 188.

⁸⁵⁵ Ibid., p. 188-189.

⁸⁵⁶ Ibid., p. 189-190.

⁸⁵⁷ Ibid., p. 190

If one does not cling to the emptiness of dharma, the mind does not arouse debate (vivāda) and merely drives out the fetters (samyojana): this is true knowledge. But if one grasps (udgrhṇāti) the empty nature (śūnyanimitta) of dharma, one provokes debate and one does not destroy the fetters; holding on to that wisdom is not true wisdom.

Everything that the Buddha says is aimed at saving beings; that is why there is not a single one of them that is not true. According to whether people cling (abhinivāṣante) or do not cling to them to them, they are sometimes in the right and sometimes in the wrong. For all these reasons, the bodily, vocal or mental actions of the Buddha are ‘preceded by knowledge’ (jñānapūrvamgama) and ‘accompany knowledge’ (jñānānuparivartin).

*** **

Question. – You said at the beginning that the Buddha has neither physical defect nor vocal defect nor mental defect (cf. *āveṇikadharma*s no. 1-3), and here [254c] you say again that his bodily, vocal and mental actions accompany knowledge (cf. *āveṇikadharma*s no. 13-15). What is the difference in meaning (arthaviśeṣa)?

Answer. – The first three attributes in terms of which the Buddha has no defect did not give a reason. These do give the reason: because his actions accompany knowledge (jñānānuparivartin). If the Buddha did not reflect before carrying out his bodily, vocal or mental actions, he would make mistakes, but since the Buddha first uses knowledge before carrying out his bodily, vocal or mental actions, he is faultless.

Furthermore, the Buddha is endowed with three kinds of pure action (pariśuddhakarma), three kinds of pacified actions (praśantakarma), three kinds of actions not requiring secrecy (āraṅgyakarma).⁸⁵⁸ Some people wonder why the Buddha has such actions and this is why the Buddha says: “All my bodily, vocal and mental acts (kāyavāgmanaskarma) are preceded by knowledge (jñānapūrvamgama) and accompany knowledge (jñānānuparivartin).”

16-18. The Buddha penetrates the past, the future and the present

The Buddha knows the past (atīta), the future (anāgata) and the present (pratyutpanna) by means of his knowledge, and his penetration is without obstacle (apratihata).

⁸⁵⁸ The physical, vocal and mental conduct of the Buddha being perfectly pure, he has no bodily, vocal or mental misdeeds to be hidden for fear that somebody should find it out: these are the three or four arakkheyya (ārakkheyya) in Pāli (Dīgha, III, p. 217; Anguttara, IV, p. 82-84), the araṅkya (araṅkana, araṅkaṇṇiya, āraṅkya, āraṅkana) in Sanskrit: Mahāvvyut., no. 192-195; Bodh, bhūmi, p. 403; Sūtrālamkāra, XXI, v. 53; Saṃgraha, p. 287, 299; Abhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā, T 1606, k. 14, p. 761b14; Āloka, p. 915.

His threefold knowledge bears upon the three times and his penetration is without obstacles because his three actions accompany knowledge.⁸⁵⁹

A. Sarvāstivādin-Sautrāntika Debate on Time

⁸⁵⁹ The author of the Traité finds himself in a difficult position in regard to the problem of the three times, and he must use all his subtlety to get out of it with honor.

On the one hand, he has adopted the Mahāyāna list of the eighteen *āveṇikadharma*s. But in this list, numbers 16-18 say that the Buddha knows and penetrates unobstructedly the past, present and future. If he knows them, it is because they exist. Thus the author is forced to accept the existence of the three times.

On the other hand, the author is a Mādhyamikan for whom time does not exist either as an immutable entity or in dependence on causes. Thus the author is forced to deny the existence of the three times.

Here is how the author will proceed:

1) Well before his period, the problem of time had been discussed by the great Hīnayāna schools and a controversy had opposed the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas to the Sautrāntikas, a debate fully set forth in the Vibhāṣā, the Abhidharmakośa and the Nyāyānusāra, wisely translated and commented on by L. de La Vallée Poussin in his translation of the Kośa, V, p. 50-65 and in his article entitled Documents d'Abhidharma, MCB, V, 1936-37, p. 7-158.

The Sarvāstivādins affirmed the existence of the dharma of the three times “because the Bhagavat said so, because the mental consciousness proceeds from the organ and the object, because it has an object and because the past bears a fruit.” The Sautrāntikas criticized it “because if past and future things really existed, the dharma coming from causes (saṃskṛta) would always exist and would therefore be eternal. Now scripture and logic proclaim them to be impermanent.”

Brought at this point to intervene in the debate, the author of the Traité comes out on the side of the Sarvāstivādins and recognizes the existence of the three times. The result is that the list of the Mahāyāna *āveṇikadharma*s can legitimately claim that the Buddha knows the past, the future and the present.

2) By means of s second procedure and by referring particularly to the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras, the Traité claims that all dharma, no matter to which category they belong, “have but a single nature, namely, the absence of absence.” Therefore it is absurd to attribute temporal characteristics to them.

By denying now that which it previously asserted, the Traité is not contradicting itself in any way. When it recognizes temporal or other characteristics in dharma, it is out of regard for the beings who are to be converted by certain considerations of temporal order. By refusing any characteristic to dharma, it is referring simply to the universal and ungraspable emptiness (anupalambhaśūnyatā). In the first case and with the example of the Buddha, it is using skillful means (upāya); in the second case, it is restricted to wisdom (prajñā).

[The Sautrāntikan.] – Past dharmas, already destroyed, no longer exist; future dharmas, not yet come, are not formed; the present which lasts but an instant (ekakṣaṇika) has no period of duration (sthitikāla). Then how can the Buddha know the three times with an unhindered penetration?

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – The Buddha affirms unobstructed penetration of the past, the future and the present. How can his word be wrong?

Moreover, if there were no past or future and if there was only an instant of the present, the Buddha would never realize his innumerable qualities (apramāṅguṇa) such as the ten knowledges (daśajñāna) or the ten [powers] (daśabala). There cannot be ten simultaneous knowledges in one single mind. If that were the case, the Buddha would never fulfill the ten powers. This is how we know that there is a past and a future.

[The Sautrāntika]. – If the past, the future and the present existed, what could there not be? But the Buddha preached the four truths (catuḥsatya) and, in the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya), he saw the aspects of impermanence, etc. (anityādyaḥkāra). Impermanence (anityatā) is death after birth, ruin (vipariṇāma), vanishing (anupalabdhī). If past dharmas existed actually in truth, there would no longer be impermanence, ruin, vanishing.

Moreover, [to claim] that the past, future and present exist is to fall into eternalism (śāśvatadr̥ṣṭi). Why? If the dharma exists in the future, it necessarily exists in the present and from the present it goes into the past. If a man were to leave one house to enter another, we would not say that he has disappeared.

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – What is wrong in saying that he has not disappeared?

[The Sautrāntika]. – If there were no impermanence (anityatā), there would be neither sin (āpatti) nor merit (punya), neither birth (jāti) nor death (maraṇa), neither bondage (bandhana) nor liberation (mokṣa).

Sins (āpatti) are the ten bad paths of action (daśakuśalakarmapatha), killing (prāṇātīpāta), etc. If there were no impermanence [in other words, if the victim of the killing were eternal], there would be no sin of killing, etc., and, as is said in the Fen-pie-sie-kien (Mithyādr̥ṣṭivibhaṅga): “A knife driven into the body and impaling the seven places would do no harm.”

Merits (punya) are the ten good paths of action (daśakuśalakarmapatha), abstaining from killing (prāṇātīpātavirati), etc.

Impermanence (anityatā) is the distinct births and deaths. If there were no [255a] impermanence, there would be neither birth nor death, there would be neither bondage (bandhana) nor deliverance (mokṣa). These are the innumerable errors (apramāṇadoṣa) [resulting from the eternalist system].

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – The dharmas of the three times each have their own characteristic (lakṣaṇa): the past dharma has the characteristic of the past, the future dharma has the characteristic of the future, the present dharma has the characteristic of the present. If the past and the future had the characteristic of the present, there would be the difficulties [that you have raised], but here past, future and present each have their own characteristic.

Furthermore, if there really was neither past nor future, the condition of being a monastic (pravrajitasaṃvara) would not exist either. Why? As soon as he would be in a bad state of mind (duṣṭacitta) and would break his earlier commitments (śīla), this monk would no longer be a bhikṣu. And as soon as a saint (āryapudgala) would return in mind to worldly things (lokasaṃvṛti), he would be just an ordinary person (prthagjana) since, [according to your hypothesis], there is neither past nor future nor present.

In the same way, sins (āpatti) also, beginning with the five ānantarya ‘sins of immediate retribution’, would not exist. Why? It is necessary for the five ānantaryas to be actions already past (atītakarman) and for their doer to be dead, for the latter to enter into hell (naraka). Now if these five ānantaryas are still to come (anāgata), there is no action (karman) and, as a result, no retribution (vipāka); and, in the present existence (pratyutpannātmabhāva), they are not ‘of immediate retribution’ [since the death of their perpetrator has not yet occurred]. Therefore, if the past did not exist, there would be no ānantarya sins and, still less, any other sins. The same reasoning holds for merits (punya).⁸⁶⁰ To deny the existence of sin and of merit is a bad view (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) and those who hold it are no different from birds and beasts.

Moreover, I do not say that past and future exist like the present. I say that the past, although vanished, is capable of producing a memory (smṛti) and of giving birth to a mind (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharmā).

Thus, the fire that was extinguished yesterday can today give rise to a memory, but it is impossible that this fire be revived by virtue of this memory. If I see that someone is gathering kindling (indhana), I know that they will light the fire and I say to myself that today’s fire is like yesterday’s fire, but it is not possible for the fire to be re-kindled by virtue of this memory that I have of the fire. It is the same for that which is things of the future. Although the present mind (pratyutpannacitta) is instantaneous (kṣaṇika) and without duration (asthitika), it re-arises in series (saṃtāna) and is able to recognize dharmas. Inwardly (adhyātmam) using the actual mind (manas) as cause (hetu) and outwardly (using the dharmas as object (ālambana), a mental consciousness (manovijñāna) takes up its job.⁸⁶¹ This mental consciousness, which is sovereign (adhipati), cognizes (viñānāti) past, future and present dharmas. There is only the mind and the actual mental (pratyutpanna) events that it does not cognize;⁸⁶² it cognizes all the rest.

⁸⁶⁰ Kośabhāṣya, p. 295, summarizes the debate thus: Yadi cātītaṃ na syāt śubhāśubhasya karmaṇaḥ phalam āyatyaṃ kathaṃ syāt. na hi phalotpattikāle vartamāno vipākahetur astīti, tasmād asy evātītānāgatam iti Vaibhāṣikāḥ. – “If the past does not exist, how would the retribution in the future of a good or bad action exist? Actually, at the moment when the fruit of retribution is produced, the cause of the retribution is no longer present. This is why the Vaibhāṣikas say that the past and the future exist.”

⁸⁶¹ Kośabhāṣya, p. 295, presents the argument thus: Dvayaṃ pratīya vijñānasyotpāda ity uktam. dvayaṃ katamat. cakṣū rūpaṇi yāvan mano dharmā iti. asati vātītānmagate tadālanbanam vijñānaṃ dvayaṃ pratīya na syāt. - Paraphrased translation: It is said by the Buddha (Saṃyutta, II, p. 72) that it is because of two things, [organ and object], that consciousnesses arise. What are these two things? The eye and colors for the eye consciousness, and so on up to: the mind (manas) and things (dharmā) for the mental consciousness (manovijñāna). If past and future things did not exist, the mental consciousness, which has them as object and which arises as a result of two things – as the Buddha has it – would not arise.

B. The Non-existence of Time According to the Mahāyāna

Question. – In the Prajñāpāramitā, in the Jou-siang p'in (Tathātālakṣaṇaparivarta), it is said: “The three times (tryadhvan) have but a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), namely, the absence of nature (alakṣaṇa).”⁸⁶³ Then why is it said here that the Buddha’s knowledge knows the three times with an unhindered penetration?

Answer. – The Buddhas have two ways of preaching the Dharma (dharmanirdeśa): i) first, analysis of the dharmas (dharmavibhaṅga); ii) then, the preaching of unlimited emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā).⁸⁶⁴

When the Buddha claims that he penetrates dharmas of the three times without any obstacle, this is an analytical teaching (vibhajya nirdeśa). When he says that the three times have but a single nature, namely, the absence of nature, he is teaching unlimited emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā).

Moreover, those who are not omniscient (sarvajñā) come up against obstacles (pratigha) in the consciousness of the three times. Thus saints such as [255b] Avalokiteśvara, Mañjuśrī, Maitreya, Śāriputra, etc., have all encountered obstacles in the consciousness of the three times.

Therefore when it is said that the Buddha cognizes the three times with an unhindered penetration, we are not referring to emptiness [but simply to the analysis of dharmas].

Finally, there are people who produce wrong views (mithyadr̥ṣṭi) in regard to the three times and who say: “Past (atīta) dharmas and beings (satva) have a beginning (pūrvānta), do not have a beginning, etc.”

If they have a beginning, then there are new beings, and the dharmas also arise without cause or condition (hetupratyaya).⁸⁶⁵

⁸⁶² For the Sarvāstivādin, the present mind does not cognize itself: it is the manas that is just past that is cognized by the immediately following manovijñāna; cf. Kośa, I, p. 31; IX, p. 231 and note.

⁸⁶³ In agreement with the other Prajñāpāramitāsūtras, the Pañcaviṃśati speaks of the adhasūnyatā ‘emptiness of time’, excluding any beginning (pūrvānta), any end (āparānta) and any present (p. 49, l. 5-19): it proclaims the tryadhasamatā ‘the identity of the three times’ (p. 242, l. 6, 10, 19) and concludes from it that all dharmas are without characteristics: Sarva ete dharmā na saṃyuktā ni viśaṃyuktā arūpiṇo ‘nidarśanā apratighā ekalakṣaṇā yadutālakṣaṇāḥ.

⁸⁶⁴ The ninth of the eighteen emptinesses. The Pañcaviṃśati, p. 196, l. 17-18, defines it thus: Tatra katamātyantaśūnyatā. yasya anto nopalabhyate tad atyantam atyantena śūnyam akūṭasthāvināśitām upādāya. tat kasya hetoḥ prakṛtir asya eṣā. Kumārajīva translates (T 223, k. 5, p. 250c2-4): What is atyantaśūnyatā? Atyanta means that the limit of dharmas is ungraspable because they are neither eternal (akūṭasthā) nor destroyed (avināśita). Why? Because that is their nature.

If they do not have a beginning (pūrvānta), neither do they have an end (aparānta), they have neither end nor middle (madhyānta). Or else not having a beginning means having a middle and having an end; not having an end means having a beginning and a middle; not having a middle means having a beginning and an end.

But if beings (satva) and things (dharma) are without beginning, they are also without middle and without end and, since the three times (tryadhvan) do not exist, there is nothing (akimcid).⁸⁶⁶

Furthermore, if there is no beginning, how can there be this Omniscient One (sarvajñā) who, in order to destroy all these wrong views, declares that “the dharmas of the three times (tryadbadharma) have but a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), namely, the absence of nature (alakṣaṇa)” and who, in order not to destroy the threefold time, declares that “the Buddha knows it”?

Question. – But absence of nature (alakṣaṇa) is has limits (antavat)!

Answer. – No. Absence of nature is limitless (ananta), inexpressible (anabhilāpya) and unquestionable. Why do you say it is limited? If one grasps characteristics in the absence of characteristics, this would no longer be an absence of characteristics (yady alakṣaṇe nimittāny udgrhṇīyād alakṣaṇam na syāt). By absence of nature we mean the ungraspable emptiness (anupalambhaśūnyatā). Here, absence of nature is ungraspable and emptiness itself is ungraspable. This is why absence of characteristics is called ungraspable emptiness.

Furthermore, the Buddha has two kinds of paths (pratipad).⁸⁶⁷

1. The path of merit (puṇyapratipad), if a person, hearing about the ten powers (bala) of the Buddha, his four fearlessnesses (vaiśārāḍya), his four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid) and his eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā), produces minds of veneration (satkāra) and faith (prasāda).

2. The path of wisdom (prajñāpratipad), if a person hearing that dharmas coming from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagryutpanna) are without self-nature (niḥsvabhāva), abandons all these dharmas, but does not become attached in mind to emptiness.

Thus the moon (candra) moistens objects (vastu) and the sun (sūrya) ripens them, and thanks to this twofold action, everything prospers. The path of merit (puṇyapratipad) and the path of wisdom (prajñāpratipad) do the same: the path of merit gives rise to qualities (guṇa), and the path of wisdom, acting on the path of merit, expels attachment to wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭyabhiniveśa).

This is why, although he preaches the limitless emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā) of dharmas, the Buddha also speaks of his unhindered penetration of the three times; there is nothing wrong in this.

⁸⁶⁵ An absurd consequence, for the transmigration of beings has had no beginning (anamataggāyaṃ bhikkave saṃsāro) and conditioned dharmas by definition are the result of causes and conditions (hetusaṃpanna, hetuppabhāva, idappaccayatāpāṭiccasamuppanna).

⁸⁶⁶ Cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 240: Nāsyā yānasya pūrvānta upalabhyate nāparānta upalabhyate na madhya upalabhyate. tryadhasamaṃ tad yānaṃ. tasmād mahāyānaṃ mahāyānam ity ucyate.

⁸⁶⁷ For this twofold path, see below, k. 29, p. 274a10.

This is a brief explanation (saṃkṣepanirdeśa) of the meaning of the eighteen special attributes of the Buddhas.

Second Section REFUTATION OF THE SARVĀSTIVĀDIN THEORIES ON THE SPECIAL ATTRIBUTES OF THE BUDDHA

I. REFUTATION OF THE FIRST SARVĀSTIVĀDIN LIST⁸⁶⁸

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – If that is so, why did Kātyāyanīputra give the name āveṇikadharmā to the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the great compassion (mahākāruṇā) and the three special equanimities (āveṇikasmṛtyupasthāna) of the Buddha? If the eighteen special attributes that you mentioned above, [namely, nāsti tathāgatasya skhalitam, etc.] were really true, why did Kātyāyanīputra list others?

[The Mahāyānist]. – This is why he is called Kātyāyanīputra ‘son of Kātyāyana’. If he was truly Śākyaputrīya ‘son or disciple of the Buddha’ [like [255e] us], he would not say that. The Śākyaputrīyas have defined the real special attributes. Moreover, the attributes of the Buddha are numberless and the 36 attributes [mentioned by us, namely, the 18 non-special attributes studied in chapters XXXIX and XL, plus the 18 special attributes studied in chapter XLI] are, amongst all the Buddha’s attributes, like a drop of water (bindu) in the great ocean (mahāsamudra). The attributes of the Buddha are not rare. Why enumerate eighteen [like Kātyāyanīputra]?

Moreover, the arhats, pratyekabuddhas and bodhisattvas [share to some degree in the ten balas that Kātyāyanīputra reserves as special attributes of the Buddha]; they too know what is possible and what is impossible (bala no. 1); they reveal the retribution of action in the three times (bala no. 2); they distinguish the dhyānas and the samāpattis (bala no. 3) and they reach āśravakṣayajñāna (bala no. 10). Under these conditions, how could [Kātyāyanīputra] say that these attributes are special to the Buddha?

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – Yes, but the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and bodhisattvas do not have ‘an exhaustive knowledge, a universal knowledge’ (cf. above, p. 1526-7F) of these things. They have only the cognition (abhiññā) and the knowing (vidyā) of them, but do not have the power of knowledge (jñānabala) like the Buddha. Only the Buddha knows all that ‘in an exhaustive manner, in a universal manner’, and this is why these knowledges are ‘special’ to him. Therefore refer back to what has been said about the ten powers (above, p. 1556-7F).

[The Mahāyānist]. – When the Buddha explained the meaning (artha) of these ten powers, he did not emphasize his ‘exhaustive and universal’ knowledge of them; he simply said that he knew what is possible and what is impossible (sthānāsthāna), etc. Those who have spoken of his ‘exhaustive and universal knowledge’ are the scholars (upadeśācarārya).

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – I beg your pardon! As you yourself said above (p. 1557F) they are spoken of in the Mahāyāna and the Buddha, being still a bodhisattva, claimed to know all ‘in an exhaustive and universal way’.

[The Mahāyānist]. – Yes, we talk about them in the Mahāyāna, but what does that matter to you? You do not believe in the Mahāyāna, you refuse the evidence and you yourself say that the śrāvaka system is the [only] valid one.

Moreover, although the Buddha has this ‘exhaustive knowledge’, this ‘universal knowledge’ of the ten powers, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have a small portion of it. [Therefore Kātyāyanīputra is wrong in considering the ten powers (bala) as special attributes of the Buddha.] But śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have absolutely no part of the eighteen special attributes [which we propose in the Mahāyānist list: nāsti tathāgatasya skhalitam, etc.]. This is why we describe them as truly special attributes.

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – But the practitioners of the two Vehicles, [namely, the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas] also share in the eighteen special attributes [of the Mahāyānist list: nāsti tathāgatasya skhalitam, etc.]. The Buddha alone never has bodily, vocal or mental faults (attributes no. 1 to 3 of the Mahāyānist list); but sometimes the practitioners of the two Vehicles do not have them either. Therefore they share in these attributes [and these do not belong exclusively to the Buddha].

[The Mahāyānist]. – Your objections do not hold (ayuktam etad). Why? What constitutes the special attribute is the fact of never having faults and not the fact of not having them [from time to time]. The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not share the perpetual harmlessness of the Buddha. [Thus this perpetual harmlessness is indeed a special attribute of the Buddha.]

Furthermore, the arhats are indeed said to possess the powers in question, but nowhere do they qualify them as special attributes (āveṇika). And you who do not believe in the Mahāyāna reject the eighteen truly special attributes [proposed in our Mahāyānist list: nāsti tathāgatasya skhalitam] and you count the ten powers (bala) [in the list of attributes drawn up by your Kātyāyanīputra]. This procedure is inadmissible!

Then look at these 80 secondary physical marks (aśīty anuvyañjanāni) of the Buddha in which you believe but which are not mentioned in the Tripiṭaka. Why not reject them [since you reject the powers, etc., in your list of special attributes]?

II. REFUTATION OF THE SECOND SARVĀSTIVĀDIN LIST

[The Sarvāstivādin]. – However, we have drawn up [a list] of eighteen special attributes where we do not count [the ten powers]. What are these eighteen?

1. The Buddha knows the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas; thus he is omniscient (sarvajñā).

⁸⁶⁸ For this first list prepared by Kātyāyanīputra, see references above, p. 1626F.

2. The nature of the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddha is difficult to probe (durvigāhya): thus his qualities are immense.

3. Animated by a lofty aspiration (adyāśaya), he thinks of others lovingly: thus he is greatly compassionate (mahākaruṇika).

4. He has acquired incomparable knowledges (asamajñāna): thus he has mastery in knowledge (jñānavaśita).

5. He penetrates well the nature of the mind (cittalakṣaṇa): thus he has mastery of concentration (samādhivaśita).

6. He has found the means (upāya) of saving beings: thus he has mastery in metamorphosis (nirmāṇavaśita).

7. He knows well the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) of dharmas: [256a] thus his teaching (vyākaraṇa) is immense.

8. He preaches the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas: thus his teaching is not wrong.

9. He speaks by distinguishing (vibhajya) and evaluating (mitvā): thus he has no vocal fault (nāsti tathāgatasya ravitam).⁸⁶⁹

10. He has attained the perfection of the ten powers (daśabalasampad): thus he has no loss of wisdom (prajñāparihāṇi).⁸⁷⁰

11. In every conditioned dharma (samskṛtadharma) he sees only a mass of things (dharmasaṃcaya) and non-self (anātman): thus his actions are always generous.

13. Knowing the favorable occasion (kāla) and the unfavorable occasion (vikāla), he has established the threefold Vehicle (yānatraya) for he always sees beings.

14. He is always mindful (sadāsmṛtmat): thus he has no lapses (muṣitasmṛtitā).⁸⁷¹

14. For innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa) he has deepened the good minds (kuśalacitta): thus he is free of traces of the disturbing emotions (kleśavāśana).

15. He has attained perfectly pure knowledge (pariśuddhajñāna): thus there is nobody who can legitimately (saha dharmena) find any faults in him.⁸⁷²

16. From lifetime to lifetime, he has venerated honorable individuals: thus the top of his head is invisible (anavalokitamūrdhatā).⁸⁷³

⁸⁶⁹ This is the 2nd attribute in the Mahāyānist list.

⁸⁷⁰ This is the 10th attribute in the Mahāyānist list.

⁸⁷¹ This is the 3rd attribute in the Mahāyānist list.

⁸⁷² This is equivalent to introducing the four vaiśāradīyas into the list of special attributes.

⁸⁷³ This is the first of the 80 anuvyañjanas according to the list drawn up by the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras: see above, p. 1346F.

17. He cultivates the mind of great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā): thus he brings down his feet quietly, the soles of his feet are soft and delicate (mṛdutaruṇapādātala)⁸⁷⁴ and beings who meet him find happiness.

18. He has acquired the supernatural powers (abhijñā) and the perfections (pāramitā): thus he transforms the minds of beings and leads them to rejoice and find salvation. When he enters a city, he manifests the power of his transformations (vikurvaṇabala).

[The Mahāyānist]. – These eighteen special attributes [proposed in your list] are not mentioned in the Tripiṭaka and even less so in other sūtras. As some people are on the lookout for the attributes of the Buddha, the śrāvakas and the scholars (upadeśācārya) gather a few from everywhere to celebrate the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddha.

Thus the absence of vocal fault (nāsti tathāgatasya ravitam), the non-loss of wisdom (nāsti prajñāparihāṇih) and the absence of memory lapses (nāsti muṣitasmṛtitā) [mentioned in no. 9, 10 and 13 of your list] are borrowed from the eighteen special dharmas of Mahāyānist origin [no. 2, 10, and 3 of our list], and having chosen them, you comment on them.

The invisible top of the head (anavalokitamūrdhatā) and the soft and delicate soles of the feet (mṛdutaruṇapādātala) [mentioned in no. 16 and 17 of your list] are very frequent marks⁸⁷⁵ and cannot be counted among the eighteen special attributes of the Buddha.

The [real] special attributes have knowledge (jñāna) as essence and there can be no question there either of the physical strength (kāyabala) of the Buddha – a strength comparable to that of ten myriads of perfumed white elephants (śvetagandhajaṣṭin)⁸⁷⁶ – or of the strength of his supernatural powers (abhijñābala). This is why we must know that, in the eighteen special attributes, it is only a matter of the qualities of knowledge (jñānagūṇa) and not attributes consisting of the automatic fruits of retribution (vipākaphala).⁸⁷⁷

Third Section CLASSIFICATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF THE EIGHTEEN SPECIAL ATTRIBUTES OF THE BUDDHA RECORDED IN THE MAHĀYĀNIST LIST

⁸⁷⁴ This is the 6th of the 32 lakṣaṇas according to the list prepared by the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras above, p. 274F

⁸⁷⁵ The 32 physical marks (lakṣaṇa) in their entirety or partially, were possessed by others than the Buddha: see above, p. 285-286F and notes.

⁸⁷⁶ See above, p. 1348F.

⁸⁷⁷ Normally the lakṣaṇas are the reward for ‘actions productive of the 32 marks’ (dvātriṃśallakṣaṇakarman) accomplished by the Bodhisattva during the hundred kalpas following the three asaṃkhyeyakalpas of his career: see above, p. 246-255F.

1. According to the A-p'i-t'an-fen-pie (Abhidharmavibhaṅga), the eighteen special attributes [of the Mahāyāna list] are included (saṃgrhīta) in the five aggregates (skandha):

a. The absence of physical fault (no. 1) and of vocal fault (no. 2), the physical action accompanying knowledge (no. 13) and the vocal action accompanying knowledge (no. 14) are included in the aggregate of form (rūpaskandha).

b. The absence of the concept of variety (no. 4) is included in the aggregate of concept (saṃjñāskandha).

c. The absence of non-concentrated mind (no. 5) is included in the aggregate of consciousness (viññānaskandha).

d. The other attributes are included in the aggregate of volition (saṃskāraskandha).

2. All the attributes are in the fourth dhyāna for it is in the fourth dhyāna that the Buddha attained enlightenment (sambodhi) and attained nirvāṇa.

3. Some say that the four material special attributes (no. 1, 2, 13, 14) are included in the desire realm (kāmadhātu) and the form realm (rūpadhātu) and that the other attributes are included in the nine levels [rūpadhātu, 4 dhyānas, 4 saṃāpattis].

4. All the attributes are good (kuśala) and are pure dharma (anāsravadharma).

5. The four material dharmas (no. 1, 2, 13, 14) are the result of two conditions (pratyaṃ): the causal condition (hetupratyaṃ) and the governing condition (adhipatipratyaṃ). – The other attributes are the result of four conditions [by adding to the previous two the immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaṃ) and the object condition (ālambanapratyaṃ).

6. Four attributes (no. 1, 2, 13, 14) are without object (anālambana); the other four have an object (sālambana).

7. Four attributes are accompaniments to mind (cittānuparivartin) but are non-associated with mind (na cittasamprayukta). – Thirteen attributes are associated with mind (cittasamprayukta) and accompany mind (cittānuparivartin). - [256b] One attribute is non-associated with mind (na cittasamprayukta) and does not accompany mind (na cittānuparivartin).

All of this is explained in the Abhidharmavibhaṅga. To understand this is to penetrate into the Perfection of Wisdom (prajñāpāramitā) and the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. All these dharmas have a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), namely, the absence of nature (alakṣaṇa): in the mind of the Buddha, they have one characteristic, namely, pacification (śanta).

CHAPTER XLII THE GREAT LOVING-KINDNESS AND THE GREAT COMPASSION OF THE BUDDHAS

PRELIMINARY NOTE

Loving-kindness and compassion are included in the four immeasurables (apramāṇa) also called brahmāvihāras which are abundantly commented on in the old canonical texts and have been treated in detail in Chapter XXXIII. The Prajñāpāramitā considers them to be complementary dharmas of the Buddhist path, usually practiced by the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas and also advised for the bodhisattvas. It is recognized by all that the practice of the four immeasurables exclusively profits the practitioner who nourishes them in the state of meditation but is of no benefit to the beings who are their object. In other words, loving-kindness and compassion are purely platonic feelings the sole result of which is the purification of the mind of the one who experiences them.

The great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaraṇā) of the Buddhas is quite different. These truly profit those who are taken as their object.

I. GREAT LOVING-KINDNESS AND GREAT COMPASSION ACCORDING TO THE ŚRĀVAKAYĀNA

1. There is practically no mention of them in the Nikāyas and the Āgamas which adhere to the law of karma in all its strictness. If a being has his own actions as his sole good, his sole heritage and sole recourse, it is hard to see how the loving-kindness and compassion of the Buddhas would be of any benefit whatsoever to him.

But as always, an exception must be made for the Ekottarikāgama, a late text loaded with Mahāyānist interpolations. In a sūtra which has no correspondent in Pāli (T 125, k. 32, p. 725c7-9), it comments that “the Tathāgata, endowed with great loving-kindness and great compassion, thinks with pity about beings, contemplates them all and everywhere, seeks to save those who are not yet saved, never abandons them like a loving mother for her child.” Besides, in the Balasūtra (T 125, k. 31, p. 717b13-23), reviewing the characteristic strengths of beings, it states that the strength of a young boy are tears (ruṇḍa), that of women is anger (krodha), that of śramaṇas and brāhmanas patience (kṣānti), that of kings pride and inflexibility (mānastambha), that of arhats effort (vyāyāma), and finally, that of the Buddha Bhagavats mahāmaitrī and mahākaraṇā. – This latter comment does not appear in the correspondent Balasūtra of the Saṃyuktāgama (T 99, k. 26, p. 188a2-7) and of the Anguttaranikāya (IV, p. 223).

The Paṭisambhidāmagga (I, p. 126-131), which is part of the fifth Nikāya, lists no less than 82 miseries of human society (lokasannivāsa), miseries provoking the great compassion of the Buddha with regard to beings, but it does not mention the practical effects of this great compassion.

2. The late Vinayas, such as that of the Mūlasarvāstivādins, and the post-canonical literature show the evidence of a growing interest in regard to these two attributes of the Buddha. In three places in the Divyāvadāna (p. 95-96, 124-125, 264-265) and in fourteen places in the Avadānāśataka (I, p. 16-17; 30-31; 72-73. etc), there is a stock phrase in honor of these great compassionate ones (mahākaruṇika) who are the Buddha Bhagavats, endowed with all the qualities and who, three times during the night and three times during the day, i.e., six times in a day and night, look at the world with their Buddha-eye (trī rātre trirdivasasya śatkr̥tvo rātriṃdivasena buddhacakṣuṣā lokaṃ vyavalokayanti) and ask themselves: In whom should I plant seeds of good not yet planted (kasyānavaripitāni kuśalamūlāny avaropayāmi), in whom should I make the roots of good grow that are already planted (kasyāvaropitāni kuśalamūlāni vivardhayāmi), etc?

This classic stock phrase is often followed by stanzas where it says that the Buddha never loses the opportunity of converting beings, watching over them and protecting them with the care of a loving mother for her only son, looks for them like a ‘cow of compassion’ seeking her calves that are in danger. See for example, Divyāvadāna, p. 96.

3. Faced with the almost complete silence of the Pāli Abhidhamma, it was the task of Kātyāyanīputra and his disciples to fix the position of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika school in regard to the great compassion of the Buddhas and to note the similarities and differences in the karuṇā practiced during the course of the four apramāṇas and the mahākaruṇā reserved for the Buddhas and great bodhisattvas. The explanation is practically identical in the Mahāvibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 31, p. 159b13-160b18; k. 83, p. 428a5-431b3), the Kośa (VII, p. 77-79) and the Kośabhāṣya (p. 414-415), the Nyāyānusāra (T 1562, k. 75, p. 749b7-29) and the Kārikāvibhāṣā (T 1563, k. 36, p. 957b13-c7).

a. Karuṇā and mahākaruṇā are by nature conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtijiñāna), therefore impure (sāsrava), because they concern beings conventionally and not really existing.

b. Mahākaruṇā is ‘great’ for five reasons: i) by its accessories (saṃbhāra) for it is produced by a great accumulation of merit and knowledge (mahāpunyajñānasam̐bharasamudāgamāi); ii) by its aspect (ākāra) for it considers things under the aspect of the three sufferings (triduḥkhataḥkaravāt), namely, the suffering of suffering (duḥkhaduḥkhatā), the suffering of existence (saṃskāraduḥkhatā) and the suffering of change (pariṇāmaduḥkhatā); iii) by its object (ālambana) for it has as object the beings of the threefold world (traidhānukālambanāt); iv) by its equality (śamatava) for it concerns all beings equally; v) by its superiority (adhimātratva) for no other compassion is superior to it.

c. Karuṇā and mahākaruṇā differ in their nature (svabhāva), their aspect (ākāra), their object (ālambana), the level (bhūmi) on which they are noticed, the mental series (saṃtāna) in which they dwell, their mode of acquisition (lābha), the protection (paritrāṇa) which they exert or do not exert, and finally, the extent to which their impartiality (tulyatva) is extended.

Karuṇā is the absence of hatred (adveṣa); mahākaruṇā is the absence of delusion (amoha).

Karuṇā takes the aspect of a single suffering, namely, the suffering of suffering (duḥkhaduḥkhatā); mahākaruṇā takes the aspect of the threefold suffering, i.e., suffering of suffering, suffering of existence (saṃskāraduḥkhatā), suffering of change (pariṇāmaduḥkhatā).

Karuṇā has as object the beings of the world of desire (kāmadhātu); mahākaruṇā has as object the beings of the threefold world (traidhātuka).

Karuṇā is practiced in the anāgāmya, the dhyānāntara and the four dhyānas; mahākaruṇā is practiced in the fourth dhyāna alone.

Karuṇā dwells in the mental series of pr̥thagjanas, śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas; mahākaruṇā arises only in the mental series of Buddhas.

Karuṇā is obtained by detachment from the desire realm (kāmadhātu); mahākaruṇā by detachment from the threefold world including the sphere of bhavāgṛa.

Karuṇā, the simple feeling of pity, does not protect beings; mahākaruṇā is an efficacious compassion and protects beings from the terror of saṃsāra.

Karuṇā is a partial pity that sympathizes only with suffering beings; mahākaruṇā extends impartially to all beings impartially.

d. Why does the Buddha speak only of great compassion whereas he does not mention great loving-kindness, great joy, great equanimity? These should also be described as great because all the qualities (guṇa) present in the Buddha are great since they come from the wish to assure the benefit and happiness of innumerable beings...Besides, there are sutras where great loving-kindness, etc., is spoken of.

II. GREAT LOVING-KINDNESS AND GREAT COMPASSION ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

Taken separately or together, the mahāmaitrī and mahākaruṇā of the Buddha literally invade the Mahāyāna sūtras where they appear on almost every page. It will suffice here to refer to the citations collected by Śāntideva in his Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 286-290.

In their way of dealing with the subject, the śāstras of the Greater Vehicle are evidently inspired by the Sarvāstivādin masters mentioned above: see, e.g., the Abhidharmasamuccayavākyā, T 1606, k. 14, -p. 761c1-4, the Bodhi. bhūmi, p. 247-248, and above all, the Upanibandhana on the Saṃgraha, p. 301-302 as note. The Two Vehicles agree on an essential point: the lesser karuṇā practiced in the course of the apramāṇas is of no use to beings, whereas the mahākaruṇā of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas is an efficacious skillful means.

There are, however, important points on the subject of which the Hināyāna and Mahāyāna scholars disagree:

2) In contrast to the Sarvāstivādins, they do not accept that the great compassion of the Buddhas is a conventional (saṃvṛtījñāna) and impure (sāsrava) knowledge on the pretext that it deals with non-existent beings. For the Mahāyānists, all the attributes of the Buddha are pure (anāsrava).

The Bodh. bhūmi, p. 247-248, says in turn: Suviśuddhā ca bhavati tadvyathā niṣṭhāgatānām bodhisattvānām bodhisattvabhūmiviśuddhyā tathāgatānām ca tathāgatabhūmiviśuddhyā. – “Great compassion is also very pure as is the case among the bodhisattvas who have attained the summit and in the Tathāgatas, by virtue of their respective levels.”

3) Finally, the Mahāyānist, instead of locating mahāmaitrī and mahākaraṇā in the fourth dhyaṇa as the Sarvāstivādins do, place it in the great samādhis of the Buddhas, the Samadhirājasamādhi and Sīmḥavikrīḍīṭasamādhi.

Sūtra. – [The bodhisattva-mahôattva who wishes to cognize perfectly] great loving-kindness and great compassion must practice the Perfection of wisdom (bodhisattvena mahāstvena mahāmaitrīṃ mahākaruṇāṃ parijñātukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).⁸⁷⁸

1. Great loving-kindness and great compassion

Great loving-kindness assures the happiness (sukha) of all beings; great compassion uproots the suffering (duḥkha) of all beings. Great loving-kindness gives beings the causes and conditions for happiness; great compassion gives beings the causes and conditions that eliminate suffering.

2. Degrees of loving-kindness and compassion ⁸⁸⁰

Answer. – The loving-kindness and compassion that are part of the four immeasurables (apramāṇacitta) are lesser; but here the loving-kindness and compassion that are concerned in the eighteen special attributes (āvenikadharmā) are great.

⁸⁷⁸ This version departs from the revised Pañcaviṃśati (ed. Dutt, p. 21, l. 4-5) where it is said that mahāmaitrī, mahākaruṇā, mahāmuditā and mahopekṣā should be cultivated by the bodhisattva.

879 Adopting the variant p'i in place of tsouei.

880 In this section, the Traité partially adopts the Sarvāstivādin views on lesser and great compassion: see above, p. 1717F.

Question. – If that is so, why is it said that the bodhisattva practices great loving-kindness and great compassion?

Answer. – The great loving-kindness of the bodhisattva is lesser compared with that of the Buddha, but compared with that of adepts of the two Vehicles [śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha], it is great. The magnitude is a question of words (prajñapti).⁸⁸¹ The great loving-kindness and great compassion of the Buddha are truly very great.

Furthermore, lesser loving-kindness gives happiness to beings only in theory; actually, it has no happy effect. Lesser compassion considers the various physical and mental sufferings of beings and has pity on them, but is incapable of freeing them from suffering. On the other hand, the great loving-kindness not [256c] only wishes that beings find happiness, but also assures them of happy things; and great compassion not only has pity for the suffering of beings but also frees them from sufferings.⁸⁸²

Furthermore, in worldly people (prthagjana), śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and bodhisattvas, the loving-kindness and compassion are described as lesser, whereas in the Buddhas they attain the epithet of great.

Furthermore, great loving-kindness arises in the mind of great men (mahāpuruṣa), appears suddenly within the great dharmas which are the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) the four unobstructed knowledges (pratisaṃvid) and the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā): it is able to destroy the great sufferings of the three bad destinies (durgati)⁸⁸³ and can bring the three kinds of great happiness: i) happiness of the gods (divyasukha), ii) human happiness (manuṣyasukha), iii) the happiness of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasukha).⁸⁸⁴

In addition, this great loving-kindness is extended to all the beings of the ten directions and three times, including insects (prāṇin).⁸⁸⁵ Loving-kindness penetrates the marrow of the bones (asthimajjan) and the mind never renounces it.

Suppose that the beings of the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu had fallen into the three bad destinies (durgati) and in their place a single man underwent the sufferings of each of them; suppose that after having repaid these sufferings, this man took the happiness of the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇasukha), the happiness of the trances and absorptions (dhyānasamāpattisukha), the supreme happiness of this world (laukikāgrasukha) and distributed them liberally to beings to make up for it. Well then! This man would not reach the ten-millionth part of the loving-kindness and compassion

⁸⁸¹ Since coarseness and subtlety, big and small, are relative notions (parasparāpekṣika), as has been said above (p. 729F, 1687F).

⁸⁸² See above, p. 1707F, 1709F.

⁸⁸³ The tiṣṣo dukkhatā, namely, dukkhadukkhataṁ, saṃkhāradukkhataṁ and vipariṇāmadukkhataṁ: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 216; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 259; V, p. 56.

⁸⁸⁴ Cf. Commentary of the Dhammapada, III, p. 51 which also distinguishes manussasukham, dibbasukham and paramatthabhūtaṁ nibbānasukham.

⁸⁸⁵ In contrast to the lesser loving-kindness which bears upon only beings of Kāmadhātu of the Buddha. Why? Because the happiness of the world is deceptive, false and does not free from saṃsāra.

3. Epithet ‘great’ reserved for loving-kindness and compassion

Question. – All that resides in the mind of the Buddha is great; why do you say that only his loving-kindness and compassion are great?

Answer. – All the qualities (guṇa) belonging to the Buddha are necessarily great.

Question. – If that is so, why do you say only that his loving-kindness and compassion are great?

Answer. – The loving-kindness and compassion are the root (mūla) of the enlightenment (saṃbodhi) of the Buddhas. Why is that?

The bodhisattva sees beings tormented by all the sufferings (duḥkha): suffering of birth (jāti), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa), bodily suffering (kāyika), and mental suffering (caitasika), suffering in this life and in the next life (ihaparatraduḥkha). Feeling great loving-kindness and great compassion, he comes to save beings from these sufferings, and subsequently he forms the resolution (cittam utpādayati) of seeking anuttarā samyaksambodhi. By the power of his great loving-kindness and great compassion, in the course of saṃsāra in innumerable incalculable lifetimes, his courage never sinks (cittam asya nāvalīyate). By the power of his great loving-kindness and his great compassion and although he could have attained nirvāṇa long ago, he does not give the evidence of it (na sāḁṣātkaroti).⁸⁸⁶ This is why, among all the attributes of the Buddha, loving-kindness and compassion are great. If he did not have this great loving-kindness and this great compassion, he would enter nirvāṇa too soon.

Next, when he attains enlightenment, he realizes innumerable very profound concentrations (samādhi): trances (dhyāna), absorptions (samāpatti) and liberations (vimokṣa). Experiencing this pure happiness (viśuddhasukha), he abandons it and does not keep it. He goes into the villages (grāma) and the towns (nagara) and preaches the Dharma with all kinds of avadānas and nidānas. He changes his form and guides beings by an infinity of vocal sounds (ghoṣa); he endures curses, injuries, criticisms and slander on the part of beings and goes so far as to become a female musician: all that thanks to his great loving-kindness and great compassion.

Furthermore, the epithet ‘great’ attached to great loving-kindness and great compassion does not come from the Buddha: it is beings who describe them thus. In the same way, the lion (siṃha) that is very strong never boasts of the greatness of its strength, but all the beasts remember it. [257a] ⁸⁸⁶ This is what the Vijñānavādin later will call apratisthita nirvāṇa: cf. Sūtrālamkāra, p. 41, 47, 147, 171; Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 4, 108, 200.

Beings have heard speak of the many marvelous attributes of the Buddha and they know that the Buddha, in order to save beings, can accomplish austerities (duṣkaracaryā) for innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa). Hearing and seeing such exploits, they have given the names of great loving-kindness and great compassion to these attributes.

A man who had two friends was thrown into prison (kārā) for some misdeed. One of his friends provided the necessities and the other died in his place. Everybody declared that the friend who died in his place was full of loving-kindness and compassion. It is the same for the Buddha who, from lifetime to lifetime has sacrificed his head (śiras), eyes (nayana) marrow (majja) and skull (mastaka) for beings.⁸⁸⁷ Beings hearing and seeing these things in one accord have called him the great loving-kindness one and the great compassionate one.

[Śibijātaka]⁸⁸⁸. – As king Che-p'i (Śibi), he wanted to save a pigeon (kapota) by replacing his own flesh as [an equivalent] and as the piece of his flesh did not reach the weight of the pigeon, he climbed onto the balance (tulā) and ransomed the pigeon at the cost of his body. Then the earth shook in six ways (prthivī ṣaḍvikāram akampata), the water of the sea rose in waves and the devas offered the king perfumed flowers. Beings cried out: “He is truly a great loving-kindness one and great compassionate one to be so concerned for a little bird at this point.”

The Buddha receives the epithet of great loving-kindness and great compassion from beings. There are many jātakas of the same type that could be told fully here.

4. Epithet ‘great’ refused for the wisdom of the Buddhas

Question. – There are yet other qualities (guṇa) in the Buddha, such as concentration (samādhi), etc., and people do not know them, do not describe them as great. But the Buddha’s wisdom (prajñā), his preaching of the Dharma (dharmanirdeśa), etc., make beings find the Path; why are they not called great?

Answer. – Nobody fully knows the power of the Buddha’s wisdom but, in his great loving-kindness and great compassion, the Buddha, from lifetime to lifetime, sacrifices his life and abandons the bliss of the concentrations in order to save beings and this everyone knows. The Buddha’s wisdom is cognizable by induction (anumaya), it cannot be cognized directly. But his loving-kindness and compassion are visible to the eye and audible to the ear; they are cognizable, for the Buddha has uttered his lion’s roar (siṃhanāda) several times.

Furthermore, the Buddha’s wisdom is subtle (sūkṣma) and wonderful and if the bodhisattvas and Śāriputra do not know it, what can be said of other people? Loving-kindness and compassion are visible and audible and people can believe them and accept them. The wisdom of the Buddha is so subtle that it cannot be probed (durvigāhya).

Furthermore, great loving-kindness and great compassion are loved by everyone: they are like a delicious medicine (oṣadhi) that people like to swallow. Wisdom is like an unpleasant medicine that many do not like at all. But because they like loving-kindness and compassion so much, they have described them as great.

Furthermore, there are hardly any beings already enlightened (abhisambuddha) who are able to believe and accept the Buddha’s wisdom. In contrast, great loving-kindness and great compassion are of such a different kind that everybody can believe them and accept them. As they have seen a picture of them or heard the voice, they can believe and accept them and, since they have derived much benefit (hita) from them, they call them great loving-kindness and great compassion.

Furthermore, great wisdom has as its nature the relinquishment (parityāga), the rejection (parivarjana) of dharmas; great loving-kindness and great compassion have as their nature pity for (anukampā) and service (upakāra) to beings. [257b] This pity and service are loved by all beings; that is why they call them great loving-kindness and great compassion of the Buddha.

In the Tch'e-sin king (Viśeṣaśāntisūtra or Brahmaviśeṣaśāntipariṣeṣā) it is said that great loving-kindness and great compassion have thirty-two ways of acting on beings.⁸⁸⁹ On the extent (saṃgraha), nature (lakṣaṇa) and object (ālambana) of this great loving-kindness and great compassion, see above (p. 1269F) what has been said in regard to the four immeasurables.

5. Loving-kindness and compassion are pure among the Buddhas

Moreover, the great loving-kindness, great compassion and the other qualities (guṇa) of the Buddha should not be multiplied. The system of Kātyāyana tries to distinguish the natures (lakṣaṇa), and great scholars, basing themselves on Kātyāyana’s system, comment on these distinctions.⁸⁹⁰ all of that should not be accepted. Why?

Kātyāyana says that great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī), great compassion (mahākaruṇā), omniscience (sarvajñatā) are impure dharmas (sāsravadharma), bonds (grantha), worldly dharmas (laukikadharma). But that is not correct. Why?

Great loving-kindness and great compassion are the root (mūla) of all the Buddha’s attributes; how can it be said that they are impure dharmas (sāsravadharma), bonds (grantha), worldly dharmas (laukikadharma)?

⁸⁸⁷ For this detail, see above, p. 143-144F and n.

⁸⁸⁸ Jātaka told in full above, p. 255-260F.

⁸⁸⁹ See references above, p. 1269F, n. 1.

⁸⁹⁰ See the preliminary note to the present chapter.

Question. – Although great loving-kindness and great compassion are the root of the Buddha’s attributes, they are impure. Although the lotus (padma) grows in the mud (pañka), we cannot, however, describe the mud as marvelous. It is the same for great loving-kindness and great compassion; even though they are the root of the attributes of the Buddha, they cannot be pure (anāsrava).

Answer. – As long as the bodhisattva has not become Buddha, his great loving-kindness and great compassion can be called impure (sāsrava) and still show faults (doṣa), but as soon as he has attained, as Buddha, the knowledge of unhindered deliverance (apratihatavimuktijñāna), all his attributes are pure (śuddha); all the disturbing emotions (kleśa) and their traces (vāsanā) have disappeared. The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not possess the knowledge of unobstructed deliverance and do not eliminate the traces of the disturbing emotions (kleśavāsanā). Often even their doubts (saṃśaya) on this subject have not been destroyed and this is why their mind is impure. The Buddhas themselves have none of that. So why then do you say that their great loving-kindness and great compassion are impure?

Question. – I do not wish to be lacking in respect but, since the minds of loving-kindness and compassion in the Buddha concern beings, they are necessarily impure (sāsrava).⁸⁹¹

Answer. – The power (prabhāva) of the Buddhas is inconceivable (acintya). The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas feel loving-kindness and compassion without being able to eliminate the notion of being (sattvasaṃjñā), whereas the Buddhas feel loving-kindness and compassion beyond any notion of being. Why is that?

In the arhats and pratyekabuddhas, the nature of ‘beings of the ten directions’ (daśadiksattvanimitta) does not exist (nopalabhyate) and yet, when they feel loving-kindness and compassion, they grasp the nature of being (sattvanimittam udgrhṇanti). The Buddhas would have to look hard for a single being in the ten directions and they would not find him, and when they feel loving-kindness and compassion they do not grasp the nature of being (sattvanimittam nodgrhṇanti).

This is what is said in the Wou-tsin-yi king (Akṣayamatisūtra): “There are three kinds of loving-kindness and compassion: i) those that have beings as object (sattvāḷambana); ii) those that have things as object (dharmāḷambana); iii) those that have no object (anāḷambana).”⁸⁹²

Finally, Buddha is the only one among all beings to cultivate the non-deceptive Dharma exclusively (aśathyadharma). If the Buddha practiced loving-kindness and compassion among beings by way of grasping the nature of being, we could not say that he practices the non-deceptive Dharma. Why? Because beings are absolutely non-existent (atyāntanupalabdha).

It does not say that śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas cultivate exclusively [257c] the non-deceptive Dharma and this is also so in regard to beings (sattva) and things (dharma), insofar as they sometimes grasp characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇanti) and sometimes they do not grasp them.

⁸⁹¹ Impure in that they still involve belief in the individual (satkāyadrṣṭi).

⁸⁹² A passage already referred to above, p. 1245F, 1272F.

It is impossible to make the objection to us that the Buddha does not cultivate the non-deceptive Dharma. His omniscience (sarvajñāna) destroys all the impurities; it can come from impure dharmas (sāsrava) and itself play the part of a pure cause (anāsrava). How could such an attribute be impure (sāsrava)?

Question. – The pure knowledges (anāsravajñāna) each have their object (ālambana); there is not one that can completely bear upon all dharmas. Only conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtijñāna) bears upon all dharmas.⁸⁹³ This is why we say that omniscience is impure (sāsrava).

Answer. – That is what is said in your system, but it is not said in the system of the Buddha. If a man carrying his own bushel-measure (droṇa) went to the market and this bushel-measure did not correspond to the official bushel-measure, there would be nobody who would use it. It is the same for you. You are using a system that does not correspond to the system of the Buddha and so nobody wants to apply it.

Why would not pure wisdom (anāsravaprajñā) bear upon all dharmas? This impure knowledge [this conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtijñāna) which, according to you, bears upon all dharmas] is conventional (saṃketika), deceptive (mṛṣāvādin) and weak: consequently it cannot bear upon all dharmas correctly and exactly. It is you who claim, in your system, that it bears upon all dharmas.

Furthermore, the system of the śrāvakas includes ten knowledges (jñāna), but in the Mahāyāna there is an eleventh called ‘knowledge conforming to reality (yathābhūtajñāna)’.⁸⁹⁴ The ten [traditional] knowledges end up in this knowledge conforming to reality in order that they form only a single knowledge, i.e., pure knowledge (anāsravajñāna). In the same way, the rivers (nadi) of the ten directions empty into the great sea (mahāsamudra) where they all take on one and the same taste, that of salt.⁸⁹⁵

Great loving-kindness and great compassion are included (saṃgrhīta) in the Samādhirājasamādhi and the Sīṃhaviṛḍitasamādhi of the Buddhas.

This briefly (saṃkṣepeṇa) explains the meaning of great loving-kindness and great compassion.

⁸⁹³ For the Sarvāstivādiins, saṃvṛtijñāna is impure and bears upon all dharmas. See above, p. 1474-1475F

⁸⁹⁴ Adopting the variant jou che tche. This eleventh knowledge added by the Mahāyānists to the traditional ten knowledges has been defined above, p. 1483F, 1486F.

⁸⁹⁵ Mahāsamuddo ekaraso loṇaraso: cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 199, 203.

THE TREATISE ON THE GREAT VIRTUE OF WISDOM

OF NĀGĀRJUNA

(MAHĀPRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀŚĀSTRA)

with a study on Emptiness

ÉTIENNE LAMOTTE

VOL. IV

CHAPTERS XLII (continuation) – XLVIII

Composed by the Bodhisattva Nāgārjuna and translated by the Tripiṭakadharmācārya Kumārajīva

Translated from the French
by Gelongma Karma Migme Chodron
Gampo Abbey

INTRODUCTION.....	1412
CHAPTER XLII (continued) THE GREAT LOVING-KINDNESS AND THE GREAT
COMPASSION OF THE BUDDHAS.....	1425
First Section ACQUIRING THE KNOWLEDGES OF THE PATHS AND THE ASPECTS OF THE PATHS	1425
I. KNOWLEDGE OF THE PATHS	1426
II. KNOWLEDGE OF THE ASPECT OF THE PATHS	1429
1. The aspect of the paths is absence of nature	1430
2. Worldly path and supraworldly path are mingled into one single non-existence	1430
Second Section WINNING OMNISCIENCE AND THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ASPECTS	1431
I. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN OMNISCIENCE AND THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ASPECTS	1432
II. KNOWLEDGE OF THE PATHS LEADING TO OMNISCIENCE.....	1434
III. DHARMAS KNOWN BY OMNISCIENCE	1435
1. The two bases of consciousness	1435
2. Names and forms (or five aggregates).....	1436
3. Groups of two dharmas.....	1437
4. Groups of three dharmas.....	1437
5. Groups of four dharmas	1438
6. Groups of five dharmas	1438
7. Groups of six dharmas	1438
8. Other groups of dharmas	1438
IV. TRUE OMNISCIENCE BELONGS TO THE BUDDHA	1439
V. ETYMOLOGY OF SARVAJÑATĀ	1440
VI. THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ASPECTS IS PRACTICED AFTER OMNISCIENCE	1441
Third Section DESTROYING THE TRACES OF THE CONFLICTING EMOTIONS	1441
I. THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE ASPECTS LEADS IMMEDIATELY TO THE DESTRUCTION OF
THE TRACES OF CONFLICTING EMOTIONS	1444
II. CONFLICTING EMPTIONS AND THE TRACES OF CONFLICTING EMOTIONS	1445
III. THE TRACES OF PASSION PERSIST IN THE SAINTS	1446
IV. THE TRACES OF PASSION ARE DESTROYED IN THE BUDDHA	1447
V. WHY THE BUDDHA ELIMINATES THE TRACES	1458
VI. WHERE THE DESTRUCTION OF THE TRACES IS LOCATED	1459
1. Report on and criticism of four wrong theories	1459
2. Report on the correct theory	1463
3. Criticism of two Mahāyāna theories.....	1463
Fourth Section ENTERING INTO THE ASSURANCE OF BODHISATTVA	1465
I. POSITION OF BODHISATTVA	1471
II. 'POSITION' AND 'POSITION OF SALVATION'	1475
III. PREPARATORY PRACTICES FOR THE BODHISATTVANIYĀMA	1476
1. Production of the mind of bodhi.....	1478
2. Carrying out practices.....	1478
3. Great compassion	1478
4. Skillful means.....	1478
IV. SKILLFUL MEANS AND WISDOM.....	1479
Fifth Section SURPASSING THE LOWER VEHICLES AND ACCEDING TO THE IRREVERSIBLE
GROUND	1480
I. SURPASSING THE STAGE OF ŚRĀVAKA AND PRATYEKABUDDHA	1480
II. BECOMING ESTABLISHED ON THE IRREVERSIBLE GROUND	1482
III. THE TWO KINDS OF IRREVERSIBLE BODHISATTVAS.....	1483
CHAPTER XLIII (p. 1809f) THE PURSUIT OF THE SIX SUPERKNOWLEDGES.....	1486
First Section BECOMING ESTABLISHED IN THE SIX SUPERKNOWLEDGES.....	1486
NOTE ON THE ABHIJÑĀS	1486
1. Canonical definition of the abhijñās	1486
2. The Abhijñās in the Abhidharma.....	1489

3. The Abhijñās in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras	1490
I. QUALITIES OF THE SIXTH SUPERKNOWLEDGE	1491
II. ORDER OF THE SUPERKNOWLEDGES	1492
1. Order generally accepted by the canonical sūtras	1493
A. Abhijñā of magical power	1493
B. Abhijñā of divine hearing	1495
2. Order proposed by the Dhyaṇasūtra	1495
3. Order followed by the Buddha on the night of bodhi.	1497
Second Section DISTINGUISHING THE MOVEMENTS OF MIND OF ALL BEINGS	1499
I. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE KNOWLEDGE OF ANOTHER'S MIND AND THE AWARENESS OF THE MOVEMENTS OF MIND OF ALL BEINGS	1500
II. THE MOVEMENTS OF MIND ARE COGNIZED BY AN INFALLIBLE LIBERATION	1501
III. ARE THE BEINGS TO BE KNOWN INFINITE IN NUMBER?	1504
Third Section OUTSHINING THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ŚRĀVAKAS AND PRATYEKABUDDHAS	1509
I. KNOWLEDGE OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS	1509
II. KNOWLEDGE OF THE PRATYEKABUDDHAS	1512
III. EMINENT KNOWLEDGE OF THE BODHISATTVA	1513
IV. OUTSTANDING QUALITIES OF THE BODHISATTVA	1521
Fourth Section OBTAINING THE GATES OF RECOLLECTION AND CONCENTRATION	1522
NOTE ON DHĀRAṆĪ	1522
1. Weak dhāraṇī	1524
2. Middling dhāraṇī	1527
3. Higher Dharanī	1528
I. GATES OF REMEMBRANCE (DHĀRAṆIMUKHA)	1532
1. Śrutadharadhāraṇī 'dhāraṇī for retaining what one has heard'	1532
2. Ghosapraṇādhāraṇī	1533
3. Aksarapraṇādhāraṇī 'the dhāraṇī of penetrating the phonemes'	1534
II. GATES OF CONCENTRATION (SAMĀDHIMUKHA)	1536
1. Śrāvaka concentrations	1536
2. Mahāyāna concentrations	1537
III. DIFFERENCES BETWEEN DHĀRAṆIMUKHA AND SAMĀDHIMUKHA	1541
IV. SILENCE OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS ON THE DHĀRANIS	1541
CHAPTER XLIV SYMPATHETIC JOY AND TRANSFER OF MERIT	1543
First Section SURPASSING THE HIGH QUALITIES OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS	1544
I. DEFINITION OF SYMPATHETIC JOY	1544
II. SUPERIORITY OF SYMPATHETIC JOY OVER GOOD ACTION	1545
III. SUPERIORITY OF THE BODHISATTVA OVER THE OTHER DISCIPLES	1546
Second Section SURPASSING THE HIGH CONCENTRATIONS OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS	1548
I. HIGHER CONCENTRATIONS	1548
II. CONCENTRATION OF THE DOUBLY LIBERATED SAINT	1549
III. WISDOM, INSEPARABLE FROM CONCENTRATION	1551
IV. THE MIND OF SYMPATHETIC JOY CAN BE DIRECTED TO THE CONCENTRATIONS	1552
CHAPTER XLV (p. 1891F) APPLICATION OF MERIT	1553
First Section OBTAINING EASILY AN IMMENSE QUALIFICATION	1553
I. THE ESSENCE OF THE PERFECTIONS RESIDES IN THE MIND	1553
II. THE PRACTICE OF THE 'MINOR' PERFECTIONS	1554
1. Lesser practice of generosity	1554
2. Efficacy of the application of merit	1556
3. Minor practice of the other perfections	1558
Second Section PRACTICING THE SIX PERFECTIONS	1561
I. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PRAJÑĀ AND THE OTHER PERFECTIONS	1561
II. PRAJÑĀ AND GENEROSITY	1562
1. Impure generosity	1562
2. Pure generosity	1562

III. POWER OF PRAJÑĀ	1563
Third Section POSSESSING A BODY ENDOWED WITH THE MARKS	1564
I. THE PHYSICAL MARKS ARE NOT 'PLANTED' JUST AT THE END OF THE CAREER	1564
II. THE BODHISATTVA IS ABLE TO CREATE FOR HIMSELF A BODY ENDOWED WITH THE MARKS	1565
III. BODHISATTVA BODY AND BUDDHA BODY	1566
IV. THE PERFECTIONS ARE CAUSES AND CONDITIONS OF THE MARKS	1567
V. BODY WITH MARKS AND BODY WITHOUT MARKS	1570
VI. JUSTIFICATION OF THE NUMBER OF MARKS	1573
VII. WHY IS THE BUDDHA ADORNED WITH NON-EXISTENT MARKS?	1574
Fourth Section BEING BORN INTO THE FAMILY OF THE BODHISATTVAS, ETC.	1576
I. BEING BORN INTO THE FAMILY OF THE BODHISATTVAS	1576
II. OBTAINING THE LEVEL OF THE KUMĀRAKA	1578
III. NEVER BEING SEPARATED FROM THE BUDDHAS	1579
1. Benefits of the presence of the Buddhas	1579
2. Subjective nature of the appearance of the Buddhas	1582
CHAPTER XLVI (p. 1931F) VENERATING WITH THE ROOTS OF GOOD	1586
First Section HONORING ALL THE BUDDHAS	1586
I. THE DESIRE TO OFFER	1586
II. METONYMICAL MEANING OF 'ROOTS OF GOOD'	1587
III. SIGNS OF HONOR, RESPECT, VENERATION AND PRAISE	1588
IV. HAVING OFFERINGS AT ONE'S DISPOSAL AS ONE LIKES	1588
Second Section FULFILLING THE WISHES OF ALL BEINGS	1590
I. WHAT IS FULFILLING THE WISHES?	1590
II. DO THE BUDDHAS AND BODHISATTVAS FULFILL WISHES WITHOUT EXCEPTION?	1592
III. MATERIAL BENEFITS GRANTED BY THE BODHISATTVA	1597
IV. GENEROSITY INFORMED BY THE PERFECTION OF WISDOM	1599
Third Section ESTABLISHING BEINGS IN THE SIX PERFECTIONS	1599
I. ESTABLISHING IN THE SIX PERFECTIONS	1600
II. BEINGS TO BE ESTABLISHED IN THE SIX PERFECTIONS	1601
1. Their number	1601
2. The various categories of beings	1601
3. The destiny of the asuras	1603
III. EXHORTATIONS TO THE PRACTICE OF THE PERFECTIONS	1608
1. Perfection of generosity	1608
2. Perfection of morality	1609
3. Perfection of patience	1610
4. Perfection of exertion	1611
5. Perfection of trance	1613
6. Perfection of wisdom	1614
Fourth Section PLANTING INEXHAUSTIBLE ROOTS OF GOOD	1615
I. ONE SINGLE ROOT TO BE PLANTED IN THE FIELD OF THE BUDDHAS	1615
II. 'INEXHAUSTIBLE' ROOT	1617
CHAPTER XLVII PRAISES MADE BY THE BUDDHAS	1620
First Section WINNING THE PRAISES OF THE BUDDHAS	1620
I. CONVENTIONAL NATURE OF THE DESIRE FOR PRAISE	1620
II. VALUE OF THE PRAISES GIVEN BY THE BUDDHAS	1620
III. ALTHOUGH NON-EXISTENT, THE BODHISATTVA MERITS SPECIAL PRAISES	1621
Second Section ACCEDING TO INNUMERABLE UNIVERSES	1626
I. MAGICAL POWERS OF MULTIPLICATION AND DISPLACEMENT	1626
II. THE POWER OF THE BUDDHA IS DEPENDENT ON THAT OF THE BODHISATTVA	1627
Third Section SPEAKING TO INNUMERABLE UNIVERSES BY MEANS OF A SINGLE SOUND	1628
I. RANGE OF VOICE OF THE BUDDHAS AND BODHISATTVAS	1628
II. THE THREEFOLD VOICE OF THE BUDDHAS AND THE BODHISATTVAS	1629

III. WHO CAN HEAR THE VOICE OF THE BUDDHAS?	1630
Fourth Section ASSURING THE CONTINUITY OF THE BUDDHA UNIVERSES	1630
I. PRECISE RANGE OF THIS WISH	1631
II. PURELY SUBJECTIVE RESULT OF THIS WISH	1631
III. LIMITS TO THE SALVIFIC ACTION OF THE BUDDHAS	1632
IV. HOW TO PREVENT THE INTERRUPTION OF THE BUDDHA FIELDS	1633
V. VALUE OF THE BUDDHA FIELDS	1633
CHAPTER XLVIII THE EIGHTEEN EMPTINESSES	1636
First Section NOTE ON EMPTINESS	1636
I. THE TWOFOLD EMPTINESS IN THE CANONICAL SŪTRAS	1636
1. Sattvaśūnyatā or Puḍgalanairātmya	1636
A. The worldly point of view (laukika siddhanta)	1641
B. The individual (prātipauruṣika) and therapeutic (prātipakṣika) point of view	1643
C. The refused questions	1644
2. Dharmāśūnyatā	1647
A. Sūtra concerning the emptiness of things	1647
B. Supremacy of samādhi	1647
C. Interpretation of the Middle Way	1648
II. EMPTINESS IN THE HINAYĀNIST SECTS	1650
1. The Personalists (puḍgalavādin). –	1651
2. The Realists. –	1651
3. The Nominalists	1654
III. EMPTINESS ACCORDING TO THE MADHYAMAKA	1655
1. Rejection of realism	1657
2. Rejection of nihilism	1660
3. Emptiness and the Middle Way	1661
4. Progression to silence	1663
IV. THE EMPTINESSES IN THE GREAT PRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀSŪTRAS	1669
1. Some partial lists	1670
2. Related lists of eighteen and four emptinesses	1671
A. Lexicographical indications	1671
B. Tibetan-Sanskrit synopsis	1673
C. Translation from the French	1675
D. Comparative table of recensions (p. 2040F)	1679
Second Section EMPTINESSES 1-3: EMPTINESSES OF INNER, OUTER AND BOTH INNER AND OUTER DHARMAS	1681
I. SUMMARY DEFINITION OF THE THREE EMPTINESSES	1681
II. WHY DISTINGUISH EIGHTEEN EMPTINESSES	1681
III. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE PERFECTION OF WISDOM AND THE EIGHTEEN EMPTINESSES	1682
IV. THE FIRST THREE EMPTINESSES AND THE FOUR FOUNDATIONS OF MINDFULNESS	1683
V. THE THREE EMPTINESSES RESULT FROM CONCENTRATION	1690
VI. RELATIONSHIPS OF THE FOUR GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF CONDITIONED DHARMAS AND THE FOUR VIEW-POINTS OF THE FOUNDATIONS OF MINDFULNESS	1691
VII. THE PROBLEM OF THE WHOLE AND THE PART	1692
VIII. EMPTINESS ACCORDING TO THE TWO VEHICLES	1693
IX. METHOD OF TEACHING EMPTINESS	1695
Third Section EMPTINESS 4: EMPTINESS OF EMPTINESS	1696
I. DEFINITION OF THE EMPTINESS OF EMPTINESSES	1696
II. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN EMPTINESSES AND EMPTINESS OF EMPTINESSES	1698
Fourth Section EMPTINESS 5: GREAT EMPTINESS OR EMPTINESS OF THE TEN DIRECTIONS	1699
I. GREAT EMPTINESS IN THE TWO VEHICLES	1699
II. SIZE OF THE DIRECTIONS	1700
III. THE DIRECTIONS EXIST ONLY IN RELATIVE TRUTH	1701

IV. WRONG VIEWS DESTROYED BY GREAT EMPTINESS	1702
Fifth Section EMPTINESS 6: EMPTINESS OF THE ABSOLUTE OR OF NIRVĀṆA	1703
I. DEFINITION AND SYNONYMS OF THE ABSOLUTE	1703
II. EMPTINESS OF NIRVĀṆA	1705
Sixth Section EMPTINESSES 7 AND 8: EMPTINESS OF THE CONDITIONED AND EMPTINESS OF THE UNCONDITIONED	1708
I. THE TWOFOLD EMPTINESS OF THE CONDITIONED	1708
II. CONDITIONED AND UNCONDITIONED ARE INTERDEPENDENT IN EMPTINESS	1710
III. EMPTINESS OF THE UNCONDITIONED	1712
IV. THE EMPTINESS OF THE UNCONDITIONED IS NOT WRONG VIEW	1713
Seventh Section EMPTINESS 9: ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS	1714
I. EVERYTHING IS COMPLETELY EMPTY	1714
II. ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS DOES NOT LEAD TO RENOUNCING NIRVĀṆA	1715
III. ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS DOES NOT LEAD TO ANY REALITY	1716
1. Falsity does not create truth	1716
2. Dharmas are empty even in their causes and conditions	1717
3. Magician and magical object likewise are empty	1717
4. Nothing is taken away from emptiness	1718
5. Difference between impermanence and absolute emptiness	1720
Eighth Section EMPTINESS 10: EMPTINESS OF DHARMAS WITHOUT BEGINNING	1721
I. DHARMAS ARE WITHOUT BEGINNING	1722
II. THE CONCEPT OF DHARMA WITHOUT BEGINNING IS ABSURD	1723
III. FALSE IN ABSOLUTE TRUTH, THE NOTION OF DHARMA WITHOUT BEGINNING IS USED FOR SALVIFIC PURPOSES	1724
1. Sūtras mentioning dharmas without beginning	1725
2. These sūtras pursue a salvific goal	1726
3. If it is useful, a false doctrine is justified	1728
4. Why are dharmas with beginning not expressly refuted?	1728
Ninth Section EMPTINESS 11: EMPTINESS OF DISPERSED DHARMAS	1730
I. EMPTINESS OF ASSEMBLED DHARMAS	1731
II. EMPTINESS OF DISPERSED DHARMAS	1731
Tenth Section EMPTINESS 12: EMPTINESS OF ESSENCES	1734
I. THE CONCEPT OF PRAKṚTI	1734
II. EMPTINESS OF PRAKṚTI AND ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS	1738
III. SHARED PRAKṚTIS AND SPECIFIC PRAKṚTIS	1738
IV. ABSURDITY OF THE SHARED PRAKṚTIS	1738
V. ABSURDITY OF SPECIFIC PRAKṚTIS	1740
VI. LONG DURATION IS NOT ETERNITY	1742
Eleventh Section EMPTINESS 13: EMPTINESS OF SPECIFIC CHARACTERISTICS	1742
I. THE TWO TYPES OF CHARACTERISTICS	1742
II. CONNECTIONS BETWEEN CHARACTERISTICS AND ESSENCES	1743
III. SHARED CHARACTERISTICS	1744
1. Impermanence	1744
2. Suffering	1744
3. Empty	1744
4. Without self	1745
IV. SPECIFIC CHARACTERISTICS	1746
V. WHY INSIST ON THE EMPTINESS OF ‘SPECIFIC’ CHARACTERISTICS?	1746
VI. WHY CARRY ON ABOUT EMPTY DHARMAS?	1747
Twelfth Section EMPTINESS 14: EMPTINESS OF ALL DHARMAS	1747
I. UNITARY CATEGORIES IN EVERY DHARMA	1747
II. GROUPS OF SEVERAL DHARMAS	1750
III. WHAT IS THE USE OF MAKING LISTS OF EMPTY DHARMAS?	1750
IV. NEW CONTROVERSY IN REGARD TO EMPTINESS	1751
1. The specific characteristics of conditioned dharmas are empty and indeterminate	1751
2. Unconditioned dharmas are without characteristics	1752
3. Even the dharmas known by the saints are empty	1753

4. Emptiness itself is empty	1754
6. The non-self leads logically to emptiness of dharmas	1757
7. The Buddha adapts his teaching to the preferences and capacities of beings	1757
8. Canonical sūtras teaching the emptiness of dharmas	1758
Thirteenth Section EMPTINESS 15: EMPTINESS CONSISTING OF NON-PERCEPTION	1762
I. VARIOUS DEFINITIONS OF NON-PERCEPTION	1762
II. IF DHARMAS ARE NOT PERCEIVED, IT IS BECAUSE THEY DO NOT EXIST	1762
III. USEFULNESS OF THE EMPTINESS OF NON-PERCEPTION	1763
IV. THE NON-PERCEPTION OF DHARMAS	1763
Fourteenth Section EMPTINESSES 16 TO 18: EMPTINESS OF NON-EXISTENCE, OF EXISTENCE ITSELF, OF BOTH NON-EXISTENCE AND EXISTENCE ITSELF	1765
I. FIRST EXPLANATION	1765
II. SECOND EXPLANATION	1766
III. THIRD EXPLANATION	1767

INTRODUCTION

Volume I of the Traité described the conditions of time, place and individuals under which the Perfection of Wisdom was revealed. Volume II stated the spirit in which the bodhisattva should practice the virtues of his state. Volume III described the new concepts, in contrast to the old Abhidharma, in regard to that which concerns the practices auxiliary to enlightenment (bodhipakṣikadharmas) and the attributes of the Buddhas. Here in volume IV, the Great Sūtra of the Perfection of Wisdom and the Traité which comments on it, tackle a new section which could be entitled ‘the Ideal of the Bodhisattva’. It is concerned with the desires or aspirations of the bodhisattva which can be realized only by the practice (śikṣā) of Prajñāpāramitā. Here we will touch upon the very heart of the Middle Way (madhyamaka) as it was conceived by the first Mahāyānasūtras.

At the time of his ordination, the Bodhisattva ‘produced the mind of Bodhi’ (bodhicittam utpādayati) by forming the intention of some day arriving at supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi) to save the infinite world of beings, to free them from the suffering of saṃsāra and establish them in the supreme knowledge of omniscience (anuttara sarvajñāna). Thus his objective is twofold: to acquire supreme wisdom himself and, at the same time, to assure the welfare and happiness of all beings.

In order to attain this end, the bodhisattva must travel a long career which, after a stage of preparation, extends over ten successive stages designated by the name ‘levels’ (bhūmi). It is only in the tenth level, that of Cloud of Dharma (dharmamegha), that he will accede to anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi, to the omniscience (sarvajñatā) belonging to the Buddhas involving the knowledge of things in all their aspects (sarvākārajñatā) and leading to the destruction of the disturbing emotions (kleśa) and their residues or ‘traces’ (vāsanā).

Having reached Buddhahood, the bodhisattva would be led straightaway to entering complete nirvāṇa (parinirvāṇa), without any residual conditioning, where he would be able to do nothing more for gods or for men. Realizing his own good, he would be sacrificing the second part <vi> of his ideal, that of working for the good and happiness of an infinite number of beings. This is why, relegating his access to anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi, he urgently seeks to acquire wisdom similar to but slightly inferior to that of the Buddhas, which allows him to remain for a long time in saṃsāra in order to dedicate himself to salvific activity by many and varied skillful means. Whereas the wisdom of the Buddhas is perfect omniscience (sarvajñatā) bearing upon all the aspects of things (sarvākārajñatā) and eliminating the disturbing emotions (kleśa) as well as their traces (vāsanā), the wisdom sought by the beginning bodhisattva is improperly called omniscience: it is concerned with the general characteristics of things without discerning all the particular aspects; it cuts the base of the passions and assures deliverance (vimukti), but leaves the traces of the passions intact, and it is as a result of the latter that the bodhisattva, abandoning his fleshly body (māṃsakāya), takes on a body arisen from the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya) and appears in the most varied forms in innumerable universes of the ten directions in order to ‘ripen’ beings (sattvapariṇāpana).

Of all the wishes that the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra attributes to the bodhisattva, that of beneficial wisdom is incontestably the main one. Exactly what does it consist of and at what stage of his career does the bodhisattva take possession of it?

It is, in its most complete form, the anutpattikadharmakṣānti, a cryptic expression the exact meaning of which has long escaped western exegesis. This kṣānti is the conviction, the certitude, that dharmas do not arise, that things deprived of birth and, as a result, of destruction, are not subject to becoming. By means of this kṣānti, the bodhisattva penetrates the single nature of dharmas, namely, absence of natures (alakṣaṇa), the true nature of dharmas (dharmatā, bhūtalakṣaṇa) “unborn and unceasing, neither defiled nor purified, neither existent nor non-existent, neither accepted nor rejected, always pacified, completely pure, like space, undefinable, inexpressible; it is the disappearance of all paths of speech, it goes beyond the domain of all minds and mental events; it is like nirvāṇa: this is the Dharma of the Buddhas” (Traité, p. 1501F).

The practitioner definitively acquires this kṣānti in the eighth level, the Unmoveable Stage (acalā). That is where he takes up the assured position of bodhisattva (bodhisattvaniyāma). Certain of his future buddhahood, for three more levels he will pursue his salvific activity, but spontaneously and effortlessly (anābhogena), for his mind will no longer be disturbed by objects <vii> or concepts. Quite rightly, the sūtra considers entry into niyāma (niyāmāvakrānti) as the great conquest of the bodhisattva: this position where wisdom (prajñā) and skillful means (upāyakaśālyā) are perfectly balanced is the beginning of supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyakṣambodhi) which makes the Buddhas (cf. p. 1787-88F). However, the zeal of the bodhisattva is insatiable and, although above all he seeks this state of perfection, he still makes other wishes. The seven chapters translated in the present volume include no less than twenty-four of these (see Table of Contents). All are not solely of Mahāyānist invention. Some are repeated from the old canons, such as the wish to become established in the six abhijñās (p. 1809F), to possess a body endowed with the marks (p. 1905F), to hold extensive magical powers (p. 1982F), or even to assure the continuity of the Buddha universes (p. 1988F). Others, by adapting them, take up the doctrines already formulated by the Hināyānist schools during the five centuries following the parinirvāṇa of the Buddha. But in this area, the problem of the influences is especially delicate for it cannot be decided whether the Mahāyāna borrowed from the śrāvakas or vice versa. Whatever it may be, there are numerous points in common between the old schools and the teachings of the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra. Some postcanonical biographies, some Vinayas, had already established a distinction between the disturbing emotions (kleśa) and the traces (vāsanā) of disturbing emotions which the Buddhas have eliminated but which still persist in the saints (p. 1756F). The Mahāsāṃghika canon includes a basket of magical spells (mantrapīṭaka), distant beginnings of the dhāraṇī of the Mahāyāna (p. 1862F) and the Dharmaguptakas used the magical syllabary of the Arapacana for didactic ends (p. 1868F). The Mahāsāṃghikas, Andhakas, Uttarapāthakas and Vātsīputrīyas accepted the existence of a sixth destiny, that of the asuras (p. 1956F). The Vibhajyavādins and the Mahāsāṃghikas believed in the possibility of preaching the Dharma by means of a single sound (p. 1380F, 1985F). The Prajñaptivādins had drawn up a list of ten emptinesses which will appear, partially at least, in the list of eighteen emptinesses presented by the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (p. 2013F).

All considered, the wishes that the bodhisattva attempts to realize by practicing the Prajñāpāramitā make up a not quite coherent mixture of original ideas and borrowed pieces. It is incumbent on <viii> the Traité to put some order into this important section of the sūtra.

In my [Lamotte] introduction to volume III of the Traité (p. viiiF-xlivF), I have dedicated a few pages to the author of this work. A learned monk, he knew the canonical scriptures thoroughly and specialized in the study of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma (Śatpādābhidharma and Mahāvibhāṣā); later, having become aware of the Mahāyānasūtras, in particular the Prajñā sūtras and the philosophical treatises composed by the first Mādhyamikas (Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva and Rāhulabhadra), he became converted to the Mahāyāna without, however, renouncing his monastic role or even leaving his monastery. He then composed a long commentary on a great sūtra of the Perfection of Wisdom, the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā.

He noted that the doctrines of this sūtra in no way contradicted the canonical sūtras of the Tripiṭaka and were limited to explaining them. This made him very happy because, since his entry into religion, he held the sūtras as the very expression of the infallible word of the Buddha. This is why, in his commentary, he calls upon endlessly it to show the complete orthodoxy of the Mahāyāna Prajñā.

On the other hand, he had to recognize that the sūtra teachings, for the most part, were incompatible with the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma and, more particularly, with Kātyāyanīputra’s Jñānaprasthāna. We may guess that for him this was a disillusionment for he knew this system thoroughly and appreciated the clarity and coherence of its scholasticism. By comparison, the explanatory techniques adopted by the Mahāyāna sūtras presented a very sorry appearance: their disorder, their disjointedness, their interminable enumerations and their incessant repetitions which end up by tiring the best disposed reader. But the author of the Traité had been won over to their doctrines and he found himself faced with the difficult and unrewarding task of commenting on a sūtra the ideas of which he accepted but the didactic methods of which he reproved. Having specialized in the study of the Śatpāda and the Vibhāṣā, he decided to teach the doctrines of the Prajñā according to the explanatory techniques customary in the Abhidharmas. But bound to the text on which he was commenting, he was prevented from presenting it as a coherent and structured synthesis in the manner of a Mādhyamakaśāstra or an Abhisamayālamkāra. Tackling each subject in the order in which the sūtra presented them, he tried to schematize them in the old way and, each <ix> time the subject was approached, he contrasted this pattern with the corresponding Sarvāstivādin pattern.

The present volume abounds in antitheses of this kind: to the four roots of good ‘favorable to penetration’ (nirvedhabhāgīya kuśalamūla) practiced by the śrāvaka in the course of the prayogamārga, there is the corresponding four preparatory practices required of the bodhisattva before his accession to the eighth bhūmi (p. 1795-98F); to the predestination to salvation (samyaktvaniyāma) of the śrāvaka, there is the predestination to Dharma (dharmāniyāma) of the bodhisattva; before their respective predestinations, both risk mūrdhabhyāḥ pāta, or ‘falling back from the summits’ (p. 1790-93F); by an act of taking pleasure (anumodanā) in a good action, the bodhisattva gains merit infinitely superior to that of the śrāvaka who performs this good action (p. 1880F); the advised practice of the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) leads favorably to meditation on the first three emptinesses (p.2047-55F).

We cannot avoid the impression that by writing his Traité, the author, an Abhidharmika who has gone over to the Mahāyāna, had set himself the main goal of converting the Sarvāstivādins.

Here, as in the preceding volumes, the Traité revives the world of the gods and men who moved around Śākyamuni from his first appearance on earth: king Ajātaśatru (p. 1767F), the brāhmaṇa Ākrośaka-Bhāradvāja (p. 1762), the recluse Asita (p. 1915), the emperor Aśoka in his previous lifetime (p. 1934F), Bakkula (p. 1984F), Bāvari (p. 1906F), the vaiśya Bindu (p. 1938F), Brahmā Devarāja (p. 2079F), the brāhmaṇa Ciñcā (p. 1764F), Cūdapanthaka (p. 1865), Devadatta (p. 1767F), the buddha Dīpaṃkara (p. 1775, 1777, 1921, 1931F), Gavāmpati (p. 1761F), the buddha Kāśyapa (p. 1778F), the śramaṇa Koṭṭiṃśa (p. 1894F), Lo p'in tcheou, perhaps Losaka-tiśya (p. 1944F), Madhuvāsiṣṭha (p. 1761F), Mahākāśyapa (p. 1761F), the demon Māra (p. 1776, 1825, 1937F), Maudgalyāyana (p. 1944, 1985F), the buddha Nāgavaṃśāgra (p. 1907F), Nanda (p. 1760, 1905, 1910F), the Pāpīyaka bhikṣus (p. 1837F), Pilindavatsa (p. 1761F), king Prasenajit (p. 1774F), Rādhā (p. 2108, 2143F), Rāhu, king of the asuras (p. 2091F0, Rāhula (p. 1767F), Śakra Devendra (p. 2090F), Śāriputra (p. 1746, 1760, 1849, 1944F), the parivṛājaka Śrenika (p. 2141-42F), king Śuddhodana (p. 1826, 1915F), the bhikṣu Sumana or Kaṇṇasumana (p. 1894-95F), Sumati alias Sumedha or Megha (p. 1775, n. 1; 1931F), Sundarī (p. 1764F), Sunetra (p. 2092F), the bhikṣu Uttara (p. 1778F), the brahmaṇa from Verañja (p. 1767F), the buddha Vipśyin (p. 1894, 1895F). <x>

Among the rare bodhisattva appearing in the present volume, we may mention Samantapuṣpa (p. 1849-52F), Vimalakīrti (p. 1852F), Mañjuśrī (p. 1907F), Sadāprarudita (p. 1977F) and, mentioned together, Mañjuśrī, Vimalakīrti, Avalokiteśvara, Mahāsthāmaprāpta and Samantabhadra (p. 1982F).

Volume IV makes use of the same sources as the preceding volumes: the canonical Sūtrapīṭaka, the Mahāyānasūtras and especially the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā), the Abhidharmas of the various schools and the śāstras of the first Mādhyamika masters.

1. The canonical sūtras known by the author solely in their Sanskrit version, that of the Āgamacatuṣṭaya and the Kṣudrakapīṭaka, contain the teachings of the last Buddha Śākyamuni and, in this capacity, enjoy incontestable authority recognized by all Buddhists, whatever their Vehicle. It is to them that the author resorts preferentially in order to support his arguments. His work literally swarms with canonical logia and frequently cites whole sūtras, with greater or lesser accuracy.

Canonical sūtras cited by their titles. – Arthavargyāṇi sūtrāṇi (p. 1749,2143-44F), Daśabala (p. 2116F), Dharmapada (p. 1943F), Jātaka (p. 1853F), Kātyāyana (p. 2109F), Kolopama (p. 2094, 2143F), Mahāśūnyatā (p. 2094, 2143F), Pārāyana (p. 2143F), Preta (p. 1950F), Rādhā (p. 2143F), Saptasūryodaya cited Saptasūryopama (p. 2091-92F).

Canonical sūtras mentioned without title. – Acchariyā adbhutadhammā (p. 1992F), Akkosa (p. 1762F, n. 1). Ākāvaka (p. 1765F, n. 1), Anamatagga nakha (p. 2142F, n. 1), Assu (p. 1837F, n. 3, no. 1; 2099F, n. 1), Dīghanakha (p. 2142F, n. 1), Kevaddha (p. 2079F, n. 2), Khīra (p. 1837F, n. 3), no. 2; 2099F, n. 2), Laṭṭukikopama (p. 1899, n. 2), Mūla (p. 2074F, n. 3), Paramārthaśūnyatā (p. 1831F, n. 2; 2135F, n. 2), Pasāda (p. 1753F, n. 1; 2075F, n. 2), Paṭhavi, called Mrdguḷika in Sanskrit (p. 2100F, n. 1), Phena (p. 2053-54F, n. 3; 2062F, n. 1), Puṇṇamā (p. 2107F, n. 3), Sabba, called Hastatāḍopama in Sanskrit (p. 1748F, n. 2), Samgīti (p. 1946F, n. 1), Samṛddhi called Suṇa in Pāli (p. 2112F, n. 1), Satta (p. 2108F, n. 1; 2143F, n. 2), Sīha (p. 1960F, n. 1), Śreṇikaparivṛājaka called Kutūhasālā in Pāli (p. 2141F, n. 1), Susīma (p. 1839, n. 3), Tiṃsamattā called Lohita in Sanskrit (p. 1835F, n. 4; 20998F, n. 2), Tiṇakatṭha (p. 2099F, n. 4); Verañja (p. 1767F).

2. A convinced and professed Mahāyānist, the author of the Traité could not help but recognize the authenticity of the Mahāyānasūtras. There is frequent reference to them in his commentary. Nevertheless, even to his eyes, they do not enjoy the same credibility as the sūtras of the Tripiṭaka. The latter came from the very mouth (kaṇṭhokta) of the Buddha during the forty-five years of his public ministry and were heard and collected by his immediate disciples: they were facts historically witnessed. The sūtras of the Mahāyāna, however, come from a meeting in samādhi between one or several clairvoyants and the Buddhas of the three times and ten directions; having come out of samādhi, the clairvoyant records, most often in writing, the conversations he held with the Buddhas, but he knows perfectly well that the Buddhas come from nowhere and that he himself has gone nowhere, that the visions and things heard bestowed on him took place in his mind and that this mind itself does not exist, With a candor for which we will be grateful, the author will insist later (p. 1927-1930F) on the purely subjective nature of the appearance of Buddhas. Canonical sūtras and Mahāyānasūtras also differ in that the former, more or less, have only a didactic value whereas the latter present themselves from the very beginning as great magical spells (mahāvidyā) assuring their readers spiritual and material benefits (cf. 1862-1863F).

In the present volume, the author cites long extracts from the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra, in this case the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā in order to expand his commentary and, in general, mentions the title of the chapter (parivarta = p'in) from which the extract is taken: cf. p. 1759F, n. 1; 1793F, n.2; 1800F, n. 3; 1807F, n. 1 and 2; 1817F, n. 1 and 2; 1818F; 1831F, n. 1; 1832F, n. 2; 1880F, n. 2; 1892F, n. 2; 1904F, n. 1; 1910F; 1975F, n. 1; 2046F, n. 3; 2060F, n. 1; 2102F, n. 1; 2146F, n. 2.

Other Mahāyānasūtras cited by their titles. - Bhadrakalpika (p. 1892F), Daśabhūmika, the Chinese title of which is borrowed from Dharmarakṣa's translation (p. 1897F), Pratyutpannabuddhasaṃmukhāvasthitasamādhi cited as Pratyutpannasamādhi (p. 1927F); see also p. 1789F, n. 1), Ramakūṭa (p. 1843F), Saddharmapuṇḍarīka (p. 1957F), Śūraṃgamasamādhi cited as Śūraṃgamasūtra (p. 1907F), Tathāgatācintyaḡuhyanirdeśa cited as Guhyakasūtra (p. 1985F), Vimalakīrtinirdeśa cited as Vimalakīrtisūtra (p. 1852F, 1942F, 1984F), Viśeṣacintibrahmapariṣcchā cited as Jālanīprabhasūtra (p. 1848F), Viśeṣasūtra (p. 1921F).

3. As we have seen in the Introduction to volume III of the Traité <xii> (p. xix-xxii), the author had specialized in the study of the Sarvāstivādin scholasticism but, nevertheless, did not approve of it. However, although he energetically debated against the doctrines of Kātyāyanīputra and his disciples on many points (cf. p. 283F seq., 614F, 1383F, 1697F, 1905F), he did not entirely reject the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma. In the present volume, he calls five times on the authority of an “Abhidharma” not otherwise specified and of which he quotes long extracts. In the five cases, it is a question of the Abhidharmaprakaraṇapāda (cf. p. 1750F, n. 2: 1752F, n. 1; 1870F, n. 3; 2083F, n. 1). This work consists of eight chapters, the first four of which were the work of the bodhisattva Vasumitra and the last four that of the Kāśmīr arhats (p. 111-112F). For E. Frauwallner (Abhidharma-Studien, WZKSÖ, VIII, 1964, p. 92-99), it would be the most recent and the best constructed pāda of the Śaṭpādābhidharma of the Sarvāstivādins, but earlier than the Jñānaprasthāna of Kātyāyanīputra. Be that as it may, the Prakaraṇapāda always enjoyed a special esteem. It is the most frequently cited Abhidharma in the Saṃgītiparyāya (cf. Taisho Index, no. 15, p. 213c), the Mahāvibhāṣā (Taisho Index, no. 14, p. 313c), the Kośa and the Nyāyānusāra (Taisho Index, no. 16, p. 174b; Kośa Index, p. 242 under Prakaraṇa).

4. In the chapter dedicated to the eighteen emptinesses, the author is inspired mainly by Nāgārjuna’s Madhyamakaśāstra. He even introduces into his prose two Mūlamadhyamakakārikās without informing the reader of his borrowing (p. 2095F, n. 1). In several places, his argumentation closely follows that of Nāgārjuna (cf. p. 2057F, n. 1; 2058F, n. 1; 2062F, n. 1; 2063F note; 2075 note; 2076F n. 1; 2084F, n. 2; 2107F, n. 2; 2119F, n. 1).

It would be rather naïve to accept that all the texts attributed by the Indian, Chinese and Tibetan traditions to Nāgārjuna come from one and the same hand, the well-known author of the Madhyamakaśāstra. This would be to forget that, in the matter of literary attribution, India is open only to the wealthy and that the worry of the old writers was not to keep their rights of authorship but to dissimulate modestly behind great names. In volume III (p. xxxix-xL F, 1370-1375F, note), I [Lamotte] expressed the opinion that the author of the Traité is not the Nāgārjuna of the Madhyamakaśāstra and that he was <xiii> significantly later than the first Mādhyamika scholars, Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva and Rāhulabhadra. Without wishing to repeat myself [Lamotte], I would only comment that the Traité which calls upon a good thirty voluminous Mahāyānasūtras (cf. volume III, p. xxxivF-xxxviiF) cannot be placed at the very origins of the Buddhist Madhyamaka, that the Traité itself cites a mass of Nāgārjunian kārikās and reproduces in full (p. 1060-1065F) the Prajñāpāramitāstotra by Rāhulabhadra and therefore is later than them.

There remains Āryadeva. On p. 1370F, without mentioning a particular work, the Traité presents a chapter entitled P’o-wo-p’in ‘Chapter on the Refutation of the Self’. To what work should it be attributed? To a Prajñāpāramitāsūtra? But no chapter in the Tables Comparatives des versions des Prajñāpāramitā prepared by Professor Hikata in his edition of the Suvikrāntavikrāmipariṣcchā bears this name. Could it be a chapter of the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā of Nāgārjuna? De Jong (Asia Major, XVII, 1972, p. 109): “It is certainly possible that P’o-wo-p’in refers to the eighteenth chapter of the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā.” Alas, this eighteenth chapter bears the title Ātmapariṣkā ‘Examination of the Self’. I [Lamotte] accept and still believe that the P’o-wo-p’in in question designates the chapter of the Catuṣṣataka by Āryadeva entitled P’o-wo-p’in in the two Chinese versions (T 1570, k. 1, p. 182c18; T 1571, k. 2, p. 194a27), Bdag dgag par bsgom pa bstan pa in the Tibetan version (Tib. Trip., vol. 95, no. 5246, p. 137-1-5). According to the Chinese versions, the Sanskrit title would have been Ātmapariṣedhaprakaraṇam ‘Chapter on the Refutation of the Self’.

A new piece of information may now be added to the file. From a letter dated May 14, 1976, two young Danish scholars, C. Lindtner and P. Sorensen inform me [Lamotte] that they have discovered two stanzas of the Āryadeva’s Catuṣṣataka in my [Lamotte] French translation of the Traité, p. 69F and 1686F.

1. On page 69F (cf. T 1509, k. 1, p. 64b11-18), the writer expresses himself as follows:

In the Tchong-louen (Madhyamakaśāstra) some stanzas say:

If there were something non-empty

There would have to be something empty.

But if the non-empty does not exist,

How would the empty exist?

The fools who see non-emptiness

Then also see emptiness.

Not having positive views (drṣṭi) or negative views (adrṣṭi),

That is truly nirvāṇa.

Non-duality, the door to bliss,

The destruction of wrong views,

The realm traveled by all the Buddhas

That is what is called Non-self.

Only the first two stanzas are taken from the Madhyamakaśāstra. The first is Madhyamakakārikā XIII, 7 (Madh. vṛtti, p. 245):

Yady aśūnyam bhavet kiṃcit

syāc śūnyam iti kiṃcana/

na kiṃcid asty aśūnyaṃ ca

kutaḥ śūnyaṃ bhaviṣyati//

The second may be compared to the Madhyamakakārikā V, 8 (Madh, vṛtti, p. 135):

Astitvaṃ ye tu paśyanti

nāstitvaṃ cālpabuddhayaḥ/

bhāvānaṃ te na paśyanti

draṣṭavyopaśamaṃ śivam//

“People of little intelligence who see the existence or also the non-existence of essences do not see the blessed peacefulness of the visible [peacefulness consisting of the cessation of knowledge and of the object to be known]”.

The third stanza cited does not come from the Madhyamakaśāstra but from Āryadeva’s Catuḥśataka, chap. XII, stanza 13 (ed. P. L. Vaidya, no. 288, p. 99; ed. V. Bhattacharya, no. 288, p. 151):

Advitīyaṃ śivadvāraṃ kudṛṣṭīnāṃ bhayaṃkaram/

viśayaḥ sarvabuddhānām

iti nairātmyam ucyate//

“Non-duality, gateway to bliss, the scare-crow for wrong views, the domain of all the Buddhas: that is what is called Non-self”.

2. Having affirmed that the anātman (or the nairātmya) involves the rejection of all dharmas, the Traité, p.1686F (cf. T 1509, k. 26, p. 254a10-12) continues with the following citation:

This is what is said:

If a person knows the nairātmya well

He is thus advised

Not to be happy by hearing about existent things

Not to be sad by hearing about non-existent things.

This citation is borrowed from Āryadeva’s Catuḥśataka, chapter XII, stanza 17. Its original Sanskrit title has not come down to us, but the stanza is known by its Chinese translations (T 1570, p. 184b8-9; T 1571, k. 6, p. 220b14-15) and its Tibetan translation, much more faithful (ed. P. L. Vaidya, no. 292, p. 100; ed. V. Bhattacharya, no. 292, p. 156):

de ñīd du bdag sñam du / de ltar gañs gnas pa //

de ni yod pas ga la dgaḥ /

med pas hjiṅs par ga la hgyur //

V. Bhattacharya (l. c.) restores the Sanskrit as follows:

Tattvato nairātmyam iti

yasyaivaṃ vartate matiḥ /

tasya bhāvāt kutaḥ prītir

abhāvena kuto bhayaṃ //

“He who considers the non-self to be real, how could he experience joy in the face of existence, fear in the face of non-existence?”

Thus the discovery of Lindtner and Sorenson adds to and confirms our earlier conclusions. The author who cites Nāgārjuna’s Madhyamakaśāstra, Āryadeva’s Catuḥśataka and Rāhula’s Stotra postdates the first line of great Mādhyamika scholars and cannot be identified with any of them. Indeed, he is considerably later than them for, by referring to a mass of Mahāyāna sūtras, he is from an epoch where the Madhyamaka had already undergone a long elaboration.

If, as its translator Kumārajīva would have it, the author of the Traité went under the name of Nāgārjuna, this was not the Nāgārjuna of the Madhyamakaśāstra, but one of the many other ‘Nāgārjunas’ known to the literary tradition. On this subject, see the comments of G. Tucci, in East and West, vol. 22 (1972), p. 366-367. <xvi>

Professor Jacques May of the Université de Lausanne, a great specialist of the Madhyamaka, has dedicated an entire week of his precious time to rereading with me the translation of chapter XLVIII which deals with the eighteen emptinesses, and Professor Robert Shih of the Université de Louvain has made valuable suggestions in regard to the same chapter. My former pupil, Marcel Van Velthem, graduate in philology and eastern history, has spontaneously offered to help me in correcting the proofs and his assistance has been very efficient. I give my heartiest thanks to these friends, as devoted as they are wise.

For more than fifteen years, I benefited from the care and favors of the Fondation Universitaire de Belgique. After having subsidized most of my earlier publications, it has generously intervened in the fresh printings of the present volume. The debt of gratitude that I owe to the members of this great institution and to its distinguished Secretary General, Marcel Grosjean is great indeed.

My gratitude also goes to Emmanuel Peeters, director of the Imprimerie Orientaliste of Louvain whose judicious advice considerably facilitated the execution of the present work.

Étienne Lamotte

Louvain, August 15, 1976.

SUPPLEMENT TO BIBLIOGRAPHY

ed. = edition; rec. = reconstruction of Sanskrit; tr. = translation.

Abhidharmasamuccaya, tr. W. RAHULA = Le Compendium de la Super-doctrine d'Asanga (Publications de l'Ecole Francaise d'Extreme-Orient, vol. LXXVIII), Paris, 1971.

Arthaviniscaya, ed. N. H. SAMTANI (Tibetan Sanskrit Works Series, XIII), Patna, 1971.

Aṣṭādaśa I = The Gilgit Manuscript of the Aṣṭādaśasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitā, ch. 55 to 70, ed. and transl. by E. CONZE (Serie Orientale Roma, vol. XXVI), Roma, 1962.

Astadasa II = The Gilgit Manuscript of the Aṣṭādaśasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitā, ch. 70 to 82, ed. and transl. by E. CONZE (Serie Orientale Roma, vol. XLVI), Roma, 1974.

BAREAV A., La Jeunesse du Buddha dans les Sūtrapīṭaka et les Vinayapīṭaka anciens, in BEFEO, LXI, 1974, p. 199-274.

BEAUTRIX P., Bibliographie de la Littérature Prajñāpāramitā, Bruxelles, 1971.

BECHERT H., Eine alte Gottheit in Ceylon und Sudindien, WZKSO, XII-XIII (1968-69), p. 33-42.

BECHERT H., Einige Fragen der Religionssoziologie und Struktur des sudasiatischen Buddhismus, in Beitrage zur religionssoziologischen Forschung, IV (1968), p. 251-295.

BECHERT H., Sangha, State, Society, "Nation"; Persistence of Traditions in "Post-Traditional" Buddhist Societies, in Daedalus, Winter 1973, p. 85-95.

BECHERT H., Theravāda Buddhist Sangha : Some General Observations on Historical and Political Factors in its Development, in Journal of Asian Studies, XXIX, 1969-70, p. 761-778.

BERNHARD F., Zur Entstehung einer Dhāraṇī, ZDMG, 117 (1967), p. 148-168.

BHATTACHARYA K., L'Ātman-Brahman dans le bouddhisme ancien (Publications de l'Ecole Francaise d'Extreme-Orient, vol. XC), Paris, 1973.

Bhikṣuṇī-Vinaya, ed. G. ROTH (Tibetan Sanskrit Works Series, XII), Patna, 1970.

Buddhist Studies in honour of I. B. Horner, ed. by L. COUSINS, A. KUNST, and K. NORMAN, Dordrecht, 1974.

CONZE E., Further Buddhist Studies, London, 1975.

CONZE E., The Buddha's lakṣaṇas in the Prajñāpāramitā, in Journal of the Oriental Institute (Baroda), XIV, 1965, p. 225-229.

CONZE E., The Large Sūtra on Perfect Wisdom, with the divisions of the Abhisamayālaṅkāra, Berkeley, 1975.

CONZE E., The Perfection of Wisdom in eight thousand Lines and its Verse Summary (Wheel Series, I), Berkeley, 1973.

CONZE E., The Short Prajñāpāramitā Texts, London, 1973.

CONZE E., Thirty Years of Buddhist Studies, London, 1967.

FBAUWALLNER E., Abhidharma-Studien, in WZKSO, VII (1963), p. 20-36; VIII (1964), p. 59-99; XV (1971), p. 69-102; 103-121; XVI (1972), p. 95-152; XVII (1973), p. 97-121.

GAUD R. A., Buddhist Text Information (BTI), six Numbers, New York, 1974-76.

GUENTHER H. V., The Dawn of Tantra, Berkeley and London, 1975.

GUENTHER H. V., The Tantric View of Life, Berkeley and London, 1972.

Kāraṇḍavyūha, ed. P. VAIDYA, dans Mahāyānasūtrasamgraha, I, Darbhanga, 1961.

Kośa = Abhidharmakośa by Vasubandhu, tr. L. DE LA VALLEE POUSSIN, 6 vol., Paris, 1923-31.

Kośa Index = Index to the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya by A. HIRAKAWA and others, Tokyo, 1973.

Kośabhāṣya = Abhidharmakośabhāṣya of Vasubandhu, ed. P. PRADHAN (Tibetan Sanskrit Works Series, VIII), Patna, 1967.

Kośakārikā = Abhidharmakośakārikā, ed. V. V. GOKHALE, in Journ. Bombay Branch, R.A.S., N.S. XXII, 1946, p. 73-102.

Kośavyākhyā = Sphutartha Abhidharmakośavyākhyā, ed. U. WOBHARA, Tokyo, 1932-36.

LALOU M., La version tibétaine du Ratnakūṭa, in JA, 1927, p. 233-259.

LALOU M., Les textes bouddhiques au temps du roi Khri-sron-lde-bcan, in JA, 1953, p. 313-337.

LAMASSE H., Sin kouo wen, or Nouveau Manuel de la langue chinoise, Hong-kong, 1922.

Madhyānta-Vibhāga-Śāstra, ed. B. C. PANDEYA, Delhi, Varanasi, Patna, 1971.

Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvānasūtra, trad. K. YAMAMOTO, 3 vol. (The Karin Buddhological Series, N° 5), Tokyo, 1973-75.

Mahāyānasūtrasamgraha, 2 vol., ed. P. L. VAIDYA (Buddhist Sanskrit Texts, N°8 17, 18), Darbhanga, 1961-64.

MALLMANN M.-T. DE, Introduction a l'Iconographie du Tantrisme bouddhique (Bibl. du Centre de Recherches sur l'Asie Centrale et la Haute Asie, vol. I), Paris, 1975.

MAY J., Kant et le Madhyamaka, in Indo-Iranian Journal, III, 1959, p. 102-111.

MAY J., La philosophie bouddhique de la vacuité, in Studia Philosophica, XVIII, 1958, p. 123-137.

MAY J., La philosophie bouddhique idéaliste, in Études Asiatiques, XXV, 1971, p. 265-323.

MIMAKI K., La réfutation bouddhique de la permanence des choses et la preuve de la momentanéité des choses (Publications de l'Institut de Civilisation indienne, fasc. 41), Paris, 1976.

MUKHERJEE B., Die Überlieferung van Devadatta, dem Widersacher des Buddha, in den kanonischen Schriften, München, 1966.

Prasannapadā Index = Index to the Prasannapadā Madhyamakavṛtti by S. YAMAGUCHI.

— Part One : Sanskrit-Tibetan; Part Two : Tibetan-Sanskrit, Kyoto, 1974.

Pratimokṣa-Sūtra of the Mahasanghikas, ed. W. PACHOW, Allahabad, 1956.

Śārdulakarmāvadāna, ed. S. MUKHOPADHYAYA, Santiniketan, 1954.

Satyasiddhiśāstra, rec. N. A. SASTBI (Gaekwad's Oriental Series, N° 159), Baroda, 1975.

SCHMITHAUSEN L., Zur Literaturgeschichte der Alteren Yogacara-Schule, ZDMG (Supplementa I), 1969, p. 811-823.

Srimaladevi, tr. WAYMAN = The Lion's Soar of Queen Srimala transl. by A. and H.

WAYMAN (Translations from Oriental Classics), New York and London, 1974.

STBENG F. J., Emptiness, A Study in Religious Meaning, New York, 1967.

TUCCI G., Le Beligioni del Tibet (Orizzonti dello spirito, 20), Boma, 1976.

Upāliparipṛcchā = Vinaya-viniścaya-upāli-paripṛcchā, ed. et tr. P. PYTHON (Collection Jean Przyluski, t. V), Paris, 1973.

WALDSCHMIDT E., Das Paritta, Eine magische Zeremonie der buddhistischen Priester auf Ceylon, in Baessler-Archiv, XVII, 1934, p. 139-150.

WALDSCHMIDT E., Das Upasenāsūtra, ein Zauber gegen Schlangenbiss aus dem Saṃyuktāgama, NGAW, 1967, p. 27-44.

WALDSCHMIDT E., Kleine Brahmi-Schriftrolle, NAWG, 1959, p. 1-25.

WALDSCHMIDT E., Sanskrithandschriften aus den Turfanfunden, 3 Teile (Verzeichnis der Orientalischen Handschriften in Deutschland, B. X, 1, 2 und 3), Wiesbaden, 1965-68-71.

WALDSCHMIDT E., Sanskrit- Wörterbuch der buddhistischen Texte aus den Turfan-Funden, I (Redaktor : G. VON SIMSON), Göttingen, 1973.

WAYMAN A., The Buddhist Tantras, New York, 1973.

WELBON G. R., The Buddhist Nirvāṇa and its Western Interpreters, The University of Chicago Press, 1968.

WILLER P., Tausend Buddhanamen des Bhadrakalpa nach einer fünfsprachigen Polyglotte, Leipzig, 1928.

WELLER F., Zum Kāśyapaparivarta, Verdeutschung des Sanskrit-tibetischen Textes,

Leipzig, 1965. — Kāśyapaparivarta nach der Han-Fassung verdeutscht, in Buddhist Yearly 1968-70, Halle, 1970, p. 57-221. — Kāśyapaparivarta nach der Djin-Fassung verdeutscht, in Mitteilungen des Instituts für Orientforschung, XII, 1966, p. 379-

462. — Die Sung-Fassung des Kāśyapaparivarta, in Monumenta Serica, XXV, 1966, p. 207-362.

CHAPTER XLII (continued) THE GREAT LOVING-KINDNESS AND THE GREAT COMPASSION OF THE BUDDHAS

First Section ACQUIRING THE KNOWLEDGES OF THE PATHS AND THE ASPECTS OF THE PATHS

At the end of the Sermon at Benares, the Buddha taught the fourth noble truth to his disciples: the way of the destruction of suffering (duḥkhanirodhagāminī pratipad) or the noble eightfold path (āryāṣṭāṅgikamārga) that leads to nirvāṇa. Later, on many occasions (Dīgha, II, p. 81, 84; Itivuttaka, p. 51) he defined its three elements, namely, morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā). This supraworldly (lokottara) path is the only one able to assure the total liberation of the śrāvakas who aspire for their own benefit. They have the direct understanding of it at the end of the stage of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga), a vision which destroys any error they may have of the nature of things, especially of the existence of the ātman, and brings them the fruit of entry into the stream of nirvāṇa (śrotaāpattiphala). From then on, the śrāvakas know the Path in its fourfold aspect of path (mārga), reasoning (nyāya), acquisition (prāpti) and exit from the world (nairyāṇika): cf. Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 1552, k. 6, p. 918a-b; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 79, p. 408c; Kośa, VI, p. 163; VII, p. 30-34; Mahāvvyut., no. 1190-1205).

A much vaster understanding is required of the bodhisattvas who want to assure the benefit and happiness of all beings. It is not enough for them to know the single path that leads to deliverance, but all the paths, good or bad, that beings are liable to take. But they cannot be taken in by this multiplicity of paths: they must understand that “all these paths end up in a single path”, that of the true nature which is none other than the absence of nature (alakṣaṇa).

Thus, at the stage of seeing the truths, the bodhisattva must hold a twofold knowledge which is absent in the śrāvaka, the knowledge of the paths and the knowledge of the aspect of the paths (mārgākmarajñatā), which is empty of any nature.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 6-7; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 67, l. 4-5). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to obtain the knowledge of the paths must exert himself in the perfection of wisdom; the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who, by means of the knowledge of the paths, wishes to fulfill completely the knowledge of the aspect of the paths must exert himself in the perfection of wisdom (Mārgajñatām anuprāptukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ yogaḥ karaṇīyaḥ. Mārgajñatayā mārgākmarajñatām <1736> paripūrayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ yogaḥ karaṇīyaḥ.)

Śāstra. –

I. KNOWLEDGE OF THE PATHS

[1. Simple Path]. – There is a simple path (ekayāna) to go directly to nirvāṇa: this is mindfulness (smṛti) and heedfulness (apramāda) applied to the good dharmas, the path conforming to mindfulness of body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna).¹

[2. Twofold paths] – There are also twofold paths: 1) bad path (akuśalamārga) and good path (kuśalamārga); 2) worldly path (laukikamārga) and supraworldly path (lokottaramārga); 3) path of concentration (samādhimārga) and path of wisdom (prajñāmārga); 4) impure path (sāsravamārga) and pure path (anāsravamārga); 5) path of those who practice (śaikṣamārga) and path of those who no longer practice (āśaikṣamārga); 6) path of seeing (darśanamārga) and path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga); 7) path of those who seek the truth as a result of faith (śraddhānusārin) and path of those who seek the truth as a result of scripture (dharmānusārin); 8) path of those who are candidates for the fruit of the religious life (phalapatipannakamārga) and path of those who are in possession of these fruits (phalaprāptamārga); 9) path of expulsion of the conflictbing emotions (ānantaryamārga) and path of deliverance from the conflicting emotions (vimuktimārga); 10) path of those who are convinced by means of faith (śraddhādhimuktamārga) and path of those who have the speculative view (dṣṛṭiprāptamārga); 11) path of those who are delivered by means of wisdom (prajñāvimuktamārga) and path of those who are doubly delivered (ubhayatobhāgavimuktamārga).² There are innumerable twofold paths of this kind.

[3. Threefold paths]. – There are also threefold paths:

1) path of the damned (nārakamārga), path of the animals (tiryāṇimārga) and path of the pretas.

The three kinds of hells are the hot hells, the cold hells and the <1737> dark hells.³ The three kinds of animals are those that live on the earth, those that live in the water and those that live in the air. The three kinds of pretas are the [258a] emaciated pretas, the pretas that eat filth and the divine pretas.⁴

2) Three kinds of good paths (kuśalamārga): the path of humans (manuṣyamārga), the path of the gods (devamārga) and the path of nirvāṇa.

There are three kinds of humans: those who commit wrong-doings (āpatti), those who earn merit (puṇya) and those who seek nirvāṇa, There are three other kinds of humans: those who taste the objects of desire

¹ Cf. Dīgha, II, p. 290; Majjhima, I, p. 55, 63; Saṃyutta, V, p. 141, 167-168; Kathāvatthu, p. 158: Ekāyano ayaṃ bhikkhave maggo sattānaṃ visuddhiyā sokapariddavānaṃ samatikkamāya dukkhadomanassānaṃ atthagamāya nāyassa adhighamāya nibbānassa sacchikiriyāya, yadidaṃ cattāro satipaṭṭhānā.

² For these various categories of saints, see above, p. 1389-1391F, n.

³ The hells have been described above, p. 955-968F.

⁴ For the pretas, see p. 954-955F.

(kāma) and do wrong; those who taste the objects of desire and do not do any wrong; those who do not taste the objects of desire and do not do any wrong.

There are three kinds of gods: gods of the desire realm (kāmadeva), gods of the realm of subtle form (rūpadeva) and gods of the formless realm (ārūpyadeva).

There are three kinds of paths of nirvāṇa: the path of the śrāvakas, the path of the pratyekabuddhas, and the path of the Buddhas. The path of the śrāvakas is of three kinds: the path of those who practice (śaikṣamārga), the path of those who no longer practice (aśaikṣamārga) and the path of those who are neither the one nor the other (naivāśaikṣanāśaikṣamārga). It is the same for the path of the pratyekabuddhas. The path of the Buddhas is of three kinds: the path of the perfections (pāramitāmārga), the path of skillful means (upāyamārga) and the path of the pure lands (visuddhakṣetramārga). The Buddhas have three other paths: the path of the first production of the mind of awakening (prathamacittotpādamārga), the path of the practice of benefit (kuśalacaryāmārga) and the path of converting beings (sattvapariṇāmanamārga).

There are three other threefold paths: the path of morality (śīlamārga), the path of meditative stabilization (samādhimārga) and the path of wisdom (prajñāmārga). There are innumerable threefold paths of this kind.

[4. Fourfold paths]. – There are also fourfold paths: 1) the path of worldly people (prthagjanamārga), the path of the śrāvakas, the path of the pratyekabuddhas and the path of the Buddhas; 2) the path of the śrāvakas, the path of the pratyekabuddhas, the path of the bodhisattvas and the path of the Buddhas; 3) the path of the śrāvakas is of four kinds: the path of suffering (duḥkhamārga), the path of the origin (samudayasamārga), the path of the cessation (nirodhamārga) and the path of the way (pratipannamārga); <1738> 4) the paths of the four fruits of the religious life (catuḥśramāṇyaphalamārga); 5) the path contemplating the true nature of the body (kāyadharmatānupaśyanamārga) and the paths contemplating the true nature of feeling, the mind and things (vedanācittadharmadharmatānupaśyanamārga);⁵ 6) the four paths by means of which evil bad dharmas that have not yet arisen may not arise (anupannānām pāpakānām akuśalānām dharmāṇām anutpādāya), so that the bad wicked dharmas already arisen may be destroyed (utpannānām pāpakānām akuśalānām dharmāṇām prahāṇāya), so that good dharmas that have not yet arisen may take birth (anupannānām kuśalānām dharmāṇām utpādāya) and so that the good dharmas that have already arisen may increase (utpannānām kuśalānām dharmāṇām vātipulāya);⁶ 7) the four paths predominating respectively in zealotry (chanda), exertion (vīrya), mind (citta) and examination (mīmāṃsā);⁷ 8) the paths of the four lineages of saints (āryavaṃśa) consisting of losing interest in clothing (cīvara), food (piṇḍapāta), beds (śayanāsana) and medicines (bhaiṣajya) and taking enjoyment (rāmatā) in the cessation of suffering (duḥkhaprahāṇa) and the practice of the Path (mārgabhāvanā);⁸ 9) the paths of the four ways (pratipad): the difficult way of slow understanding (duḥkhā pratipad dhandhābhijñā), the difficult way of quick understanding (duḥkhā pratipad kṣiprābhijñā), the easy way of slow understanding (sukhā pratipad dhandhābhijñā), the easy way of quick understanding (sukhā pratipad kṣiprābhijñā);⁹ 10) the four paths of meditation (bhāvanāmārga) aimed at happiness in the present lifetimes (ihasukha), knowledge of births and deaths (cyutyupapādajñāna), destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣaya) and analytical knowledge (vibhaṅgañāna) respectively; 11) the four divine paths (devamārga), namely, the four trances (dhyāna); 12) the four kinds of paths: paths of the devas, the Brahmās, the āryas and the Buddhas. There are innumerable four paths of this type.

[5. Fivefold paths]. – There are also fivefold paths: 1) path of the damned (nārakamārga), path of the animals (tiryānimārga), path of the pretas, path of humans (manuṣyamārga) and <1739> path of the gods (devamārga); 2) paths of the five elements belonging to those who no longer practice (aśaikṣaskandhamārga), from the aśaikṣaskandha of morality (śīla) up to the aśaikṣaskandha of the cognition and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana);¹⁰ 3) paths of the five kinds of Śuddhāvāsikadeva;¹¹ 4) paths of the five objects of desire (kāmaguṇa);¹² 5) five paths of words in harmony with the Dharma and five paths of words of adharma; 6) five paths: those of the prthagjanas, the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas, the bodhisattvas and the Buddhas; 7) paths of the five [258b] destinies (gati) 8) paths analyzing material things (rūpa), the mind (citta), mental events (caitasika), dharmas disassociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) and the unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛta) respectively; 9) five paths concerning things to be destroyed (praheya) by the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya), the truth of the origin (samudayasatya), the truth of cessation (nirodhasatya), the truth of the path (pratipatsatya) and meditation (bhāvanā) respectively. There are innumerable fivefold paths of this kind.

[6. Sixfold paths]. – There are also sixfold paths: 1) path of the damned (nārakamārga), path of the animals (tiryānimārga), path of the pretas, path of humans (manuṣyamārga), path of the gods (devamārga) and path of the arhats; 2) paths of abandonment of the six objects (ṣaḍviṣayaparityāga); 3) paths of the six comities (sārāṇyāya);¹³ 4) paths of the six superknowledges (abhiññā);¹⁴ 5) paths of the six kinds of arhats;¹⁵ 6) paths of development of the six stages (bhūmi); 7) paths of the six meditative stabilizations (samādhi); 8) paths of the six perfections (pāramitā), each of them including six paths in turn. There are innumerable sixfold paths of this kind.

[7. Sevenfold paths]. – There are also sevenfold paths: 1) paths of the seven factors of bodhi (sambodhyaṅga); 2) pure paths (anāsravamārga) of the seven stages (bhūmi); 3) meditation paths <1740>

⁵ The four smṛtyupasthāsa: cf. p. 1150-1176F, 1187-1194F.

⁶ The four samyakpradhāna: cf. p. 1176-1177F.

⁷ The four ṛddhipāda: cf. p. 1177-1179F.

⁸ The four āryavaṃśa; cf. Dīgha, III, p. 224; Anguttara, II, p. 27-28; Kośabhāṣya, p. 336.

⁹ The four pratipad: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 106, 228; Anguttara, II, p. 149, 154; V, p. 63; Kośabhāṣya, p. 382.

¹⁰ The five aśaikṣaskandha also called anāsrava-, dharma- or lokottara-skandha: cf. p. 1233F, n. 3, 1349-1361F.

¹¹ Deities dwelling on the five upper stages of the fourth dhyāna.

¹² Adopting the variant wou yu tao.

¹³ These are the cha sārāṇyā dhammā of the Pāli sources: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 245; Majjhima, I, p. 322; II, p. 250; Anguttara, III, p. 288. See the dictionaries of Rhys Davids (s.v. sārāṇyā) and Edgerton (s.v. sārāṇyāya).

¹⁴ For the five and six abhiññā, cf. p. 328-333F.

¹⁵ The six kinds of arhats, parihāṇadharman, etc.; cf. Kośa, VI, p. 251, 253, 266.

of the seven notions (saṃjñā);¹⁶ 4) paths of the seven purities (viśuddhi);¹⁷ 5) paths of the seven virtuous people (satpuruṣa);¹⁸ 6) paths of the seven riches (dhana);¹⁹ 7) paths of the seven riches of the Dharma (dharmadhana);²⁰ 8) paths of the seven auxiliary meditative absorptions. There are innumerable sevenfold paths of this type.

[8. Eightfold paths]. – There are also eightfold paths: 1) noble eightfold path (āryāṣṭāṅgamārga);²¹ 2) paths of the eight liberations (vimokṣa).²² There are innumerable eightfold paths of this kind.

[9. Ninefold paths]. – There are also ninefold paths: 1) path of the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvasamāpatti);²³ 2) pure paths (anāsravamārga) of the nine stages (bhūmi); 3) paths of cessation (prahāṇamārga) of the nine views (dṛṣṭi); 4) paths of the nine classes of arhat;²⁴ 5) nine paths of the bodhisattvas, namely, the six perfections (pāramitā), skillful means (upāya), conversion of beings (sattvapariṇāmanā) and the purification of the buddhafi elds (buddhakṣetrapariśodhaṇa). There are innumerable ninefold paths of this kind.

[10. Tenfold paths]. – There are also tenfold paths: 1) paths of the ten aśaikṣas;²⁵ 2) paths of the ten notions (saṃjñā);²⁶ 3) paths of the ten bases of the spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana);²⁷ 4) the ten bad paths of action (akuśalakarmapatha), the ten good paths of action (kuśalakarmapatha);²⁸ and so on <1741> up to 162 paths.²⁹ These are the innumerable headings concerning the paths.

II. KNOWLEDGE OF THE ASPECT OF THE PATHS

¹⁶ On the group of the seven saṃjñā, see references above, p. 1311F.

¹⁷ The seven viśuddhi, śīla, etc.: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 148; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 2, p. 430b-c.

¹⁸ The sapta satpuruṣagaṭayaḥ: cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 70 seq; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 2, p. 427a; Kośavyākhyā, p. 270.

¹⁹ The sapta dhanāni, śraddhā, etc.: f. Dīgha, III, p. 163, 251; Anguttara, IV, p. 4.; Mahāvvyut., no. 1566-1572; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 35, p. 649c22-23.

²⁰ Probably the sapta aupadhikāni puṇyakriyāvastāni, meritorious material works: cf. Tchong a han, T 26, k. 2, p. 428a-b; T 125, k. 35, p. 741b-c; Kośavyākhyā, p. 352-354.

²¹ Cf. p. 1181-1185F, 1203-1207F.

²² Cf. p. 1291-1299F.

²³ Cf. p. 1308-1309F.

²⁴ Cf. Kośa, VI, p. 273.

²⁵ Cf. Kośa, VI, p. 295.

²⁶ Cf. p. 1431-1463F.

²⁷ Cf. p. 1474-1483F.

²⁸ Cf. p. 501F.

²⁹ The 162 mārga (81 prahāṇa or ānantarīyamārga and 81 vimuktīmārga) practiced in the course of the bhāvanāmārga to break the conflicting emotions: cf. p. 1104F

The exhaustive knowledge, the complete knowledge of these various paths is the knowledge of the aspect of the paths (mārgakārajñatā).

1. The aspect of the paths is absence of nature

Question. – The Prajñāpāramitā is the single path of the bodhisattva: its sole nature is the absence of nature (ekalakṣaṇam yadutālakṣaṇam).³⁰ Why then speak of the various paths?

Answer. – These paths all end up in a single path (ekayāna), namely, the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. At the beginning of the practice, they show many particularities, but at the end, they are all equal and alike and no longer show any differences (viśeṣa). In the same way, at the time of the final conflagration (kalpoddāha), all existing things are gathered into empty space (ākāśa).

However, in order to convert beings (sattvapariṇāmanā), the bodhisattva makes distinctions (vikalpa) and speaks of many paths, mainly the worldly path (laukikamārga) and the supraworldly path (lokottaramārga), etc.

2. Worldly path and supraworldly path are mingled into one single non-existence

Question. – Why does the bodhisattva established in the single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), i.e., in the absence of nature (alakṣaṇa), distinguish a worldly path and a supraworldly path?

Answer. – That which is called world (loka) comes from an erroneous thought (viparyastamanasikāra) and a deceptive duality; it is like a magic show (māyā), a dream (svapna), the circle of fire drawn by a fire-brand. Worldly people arbitrarily <1742> take it to be the world, but this world is false; false today, it [258c] has been false from the beginning. In reality, it does not arise, it does not act; it comes only from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) consisting of the coming together (saṃnipāta) between the six inner organs (adhyātmendriya) and the six outer objects (bahirdhāviśaya). But in order to conform to the prejudices (abhiniveśa) of worldly folk, we speak of the world. The many wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) about the world are like tangled threads (jāla): whoever clings to them wanders in saṃsāra eternally. That is how to know the world.

What is the supraworldly path (lokottaramārga)? Knowing the world in conformity with reality is the supraworldly path. Why? The wise person has looked very hard for the world and the supraworld: these two things do not exist (nopalabhyante). Since they do not exist, we should know that the world and the supraworld are only denominations (prajñapti).

³⁰ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 164, l. 8-9 (T 223, k. 4, p. 242c2-4; k. 8, p. 278c1-2). A pithy phrase often cited by the Traité (p. 676F, 938F, 1376F, 1621F, 1694F, 1703F, etc.).

We speak of the supraworld merely to destroy the world. The self-nature (lakṣaṇa) of the world is precisely the supraworld, and the latter is even more non-existent. Why is that? The nature of the world being non-existent, the supraworld is eternally empty (śūnya) of worldly nature, for any fixed nature (niyatalakṣaṇa) in things of this world is non-existent.

Thus the yogin does not find the world (lokaṃ nopalabhate) and does not cling to the supraworld either (lokottaraṃ nābhiniśīate). If he does not find the world, he is not attached to the supraworld. Having destroyed affection (anunaya) and aversion (pratigha), he does not debate with the world (na lokena sārdhaṃ vivadati).³¹ Why? Because, knowing for a long time that the world is empty (śūnya), non-existent (asat) and deceptive (mṛṣā), the yogin no longer has memory (anusmaraṇa) or thought construction (vikalpa).

By world (loka) we mean the five aggregates (skandha). But even if the Buddhas of the ten directions looked for the nature (lakṣaṇa), they would not find it, for the aggregates are without a starting point (āgamasthāna), without a resting point (stītiṣṭhāna) and without a point of departure (nirgamasthāna). The impossibility of finding the natures of coming, staying and departing in the five aggregates constitutes the supraworld (lokottara). <1743>

From then on, the yogin considers the world and the supraworld as being really invisible. He does not see any connection (saṃyoga) between the world and the supraworld nor any connection between the supraworld and the world. Beyond the world, he sees no supraworld, and beyond the supraworld, he sees no world. Thus he does not produce the twofold idea of world and supraworld. Rejecting the world without adopting the supraworld, this is the supraworld.

But the bodhisattva who knows this can, in the interest of beings, make distinctions between worldly path and supraworldly path. Nevertheless, whether they are impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), the paths of all dharmas come together in a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), [namely, the absence of nature]: this is what is called the knowledge of the aspect of the paths (mārgakārajñatā).

Second Section WINNING OMNISCIENCE AND THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ASPECTS

The bodhisattva aspires to omniscience (sarvajñatā), the knowledge of all dharmas, conditioned and unconditioned, isolated or grouped, existent or non-existent, true or false.

There are two kinds of omniscience, perfect or imperfect:

1. Perfect omniscience cognizes all dharmas under their general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and their specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa). The general characteristics of dharmas are three or four in number: all dharmas are impermanent (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and selfless (anātman). The specific characteristics are infinite in number: these are, for example, the solidity (khakkhatva) of the earth element, the moistness (dravatva) of the water element, etc., etc.

Perfect omniscience belongs only to the Buddhas: it is called omniscience (sarvajñatā) in the full sense of the word or also knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) to show that it extends to the specific characteristics of the dharmas.

2. As well, there are imperfect or incomplete omnisciences that bear upon only the general characteristics of the dharmas and a restricted number of the specific characteristics. They are the exploits of the first two Vehicles, the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas. It is wrong that they are sometimes called ‘omniscient’ (sarvajñā): the proof of this is that the wisest of them are unable to answer all the difficult questions they were asked.

Buddha, arhat and pratyekabuddha have access to their respective omnisciences or bodhis by using the paths or Vehicles of their choice. Each having attained their final goal, they no longer use the knowledge of the paths (mārgajñatā) or the knowledge of the aspect of the paths (mārgakārajñatā). Indeed, they say: “The path already practiced by me is no longer to be practiced” (mārgo me bhāvito na pounar bhaviatyah): cf. above, p. 1359F.

This is not the case for the bodhisattvas who, from their first cittotpāda until their arrival at buddhahood, are in the course of their career. <1744> The path or the paths that they have to travel, particularly the *bodhipāṅkṣikadharma*s, the pāramitās, the balas, the vaiśāradyas, etc., include all the good dharmas. They know them by practicing them, and this experimental science finally ends up in the perfect enlightenment which is that of the Buddhas.

Śāstrā. –

I. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN OMNISCIENCE AND THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ASPECTS

Question. – What are the differences between sarvajñatā ‘knowledge of everything’ and *sarvākārajñatā*³² ‘knowledge of all the aspects’?

Answer. – Some say there is no difference and that [either] sarvajñatā or sarvākārajñatā is said. [259a]

Others say that sarvajñatā is the knowledge of the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and sarvākārajñatā is the knowledge of the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa).

Sarvajñatā is cause (hetu); sarvākārajñatā is effect (phala).

Sarvajñatā is a concise expression (saṃkṣepenokti); sarvākārajñatā is a verbose expression (vistareṇokti).

Sarvajñatā generally destroys the ignorances (avidyā) about all the dharmas; in regard to multiple statements of the Dharma (dharmaparyāya), sarvākārajñatā destroys the ignorances. Thus for example, there is sarvajñatā when one preaches the four truths (catuḥsatya); there is sarvākārajñatā when one preaches the implications (artha) of the four truths. <1745>

³¹ Canonical reference: Saṃyutta, III, p. 138; Madh. vṛtti, p. 370. See above, p. 42F, note.

³² Sarvākārajñatā has already been defined above, p. 640-642F.

There is sarvajñatā when one preaches the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya); there is sarvākārajñatā when one preaches the eight characteristics of suffering (duḥkhalakṣaṇa).

There is sarvajñatā when one preaches the suffering of birth (jātiduḥkha); there is sarvākārajñatā when one preaches the various places of the birth (jātisthāna) of beings.

Furthermore, by ‘all dharmas’, [the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana)] from eye (cakṣus) and colors (rūpa) up to mind (manas) and things (dharma) is understood.

The arhats and pratyekabuddhas know the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa):³³ impermanence (anityatā), suffering (duḥkha), emptiness (śūnya) and selflessness (anātman), and, since they know these twelve bases (āyatana), they are said to be ‘omniscient’.

The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not know the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) in an exhaustive manner; they do not know the place of birth (jātisthāna) of a given being, his beauties and his uglinesses, the exact number of his actions, [not only in the past] but also in the future (anāgata) and the present (pratyutpanna). How then would they not be ignorant of those of all beings?

They do not know the names used to designate gold (suvārṇa) in a single Jambudvīpa. How then would they know the many sounds used to designate a single thing in the trīsāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu, and in the languages of the gods, in the language of the nāgas, etc.? Not knowing the many sounds used to designate gold, how then would they know the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) of the various aspects] of gold, the various deposits of gold, their qualities or their respective values? How would they know the causes required to gain merit (punya), commit sin (āpatti) or find the Path? Not being able to cognize things that are so obvious, how then would they cognize the minds (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharma), such as the trances (dhyāna), absorptions (samāpatti), wisdom (prajñā) and the other [invisible] dharmas?

The Buddha, on the other hand, cognizes the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) of all <1746> the dharmas in an exhaustive manner. This is why he is called ‘knower of all the aspects’ (sarvākārajñatā).

Finally, in a later chapter [of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra], the Buddha himself says: “Omniscience (sarvajñatā) is the concern of śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas; knowledge of the paths (mārgajñatā) is the concern of bodhisattvas; knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) is the concern of the Buddhas.”³⁴

The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have general omniscience (sāmānyasarvajñatā) only and do not have the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā).

Moreover, although they have a partial knowledge of specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa), śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not know them fully. It is because of their knowledge of the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) that they are called omniscient (sarvajña). In the Buddhas, sarvajñatā and sarvākārajñatā are real knowledges, whereas in the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas they are just the name. Their omniscience is like a lamp drawn³⁵ [on the wall]: it has the name only of a lamp but does not fulfill the function of a lamp. So it is for the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

³³ The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas know all the general characteristics plus some specific characteristics; only the Buddha knows all the specific characteristics.

³⁴ Pañcaviṃśati, San-houei-p’in, T 223, p. 375b25-27.

When objections are put to them, often they are unable to reply and cannot cut through doubts. Thus, when the Buddha questioned Śāriputra three times, the latter was unable to answer.³⁶ If he had had real omniscience, why did [259b] he not reply? It is because he had only the name of omniscient, as he did not surpass ordinary people (prthagjana),³⁷ but he did not have true omniscience. Thus the Buddha [alone] has true omniscience and knowledge of all the aspects. He has innumerable epithets of this kind: sometimes he is called sarvajña and sometimes sarvākārajña,

In summary (saṃkṣepeṇa), this sets forth sarvajñatā, sarvākārajñatā and their many differences.

II. KNOWLEDGE OF THE PATHS LEADING TO OMNISCIENCE

Question. – The [Prajñāpāramitā]-sūtra has said that by practicing certain dharmas such as the six perfections (pāramitā), the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipāṅśika), the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), etc., omniscience (sarvajñatā) is obtained.³⁸ Why does it say here that it is only by using the knowledge of the aspect of the paths (mārgākārajñatā) that [the bodhisattva] obtains omniscience?

Answer. – The six perfections, etc., of which you speak are precisely the Path. By knowing these paths, by practicing these paths, the bodhisattva obtains omniscience. Why do you doubt that?

Furthermore, all the good dharmas (kuśaladharma) included between the first production of the mind of awakening (prathamacittotpāda) and sitting on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍaṇiśadana) together comprise the Path. Practicing these Paths by distinguishing them and meditating on them constitutes the knowledge of the paths. The [Prajñāpāramitā]-sūtra will say later that this is the concern of the bodhisattva.

Question. – I understand that there is no question of knowledge of the paths in the Buddha where the business of the Path has already ended. But all the qualities are not yet complete among the arhats and pratyekabuddhas. Then why not recognize the knowledge of the paths in them?

³⁵ Adopting the variant houa teng.

³⁶ Śāriputra was unable to reply to the Buddha’s question about the past and future existences of a pigeon found at the edge of a road: see above, p. 647-649F, the Avadāna of the pigeon.

³⁷ Actually, in knowledge Śāriputra surpassed not only ordinary people but also all the arhats; only the Buddha was superior to him. Cf. Comm. on the Dhammapāda, III, p. 228 seq., and Comm. on the Suttanipāta, II, p. 570 seq.

³⁸ Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 5, p. 247c12-15.

Answer. – The arhats and pratyekabuddhas have also completed the practice of their own paths.³⁹ This is why for them there is no question of knowledge of the paths, for the nature of the Path (mārga) is practice (caryā).

Furthermore, the sūtra in question speaks of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, and [the path] of the śrāvakas does not consist of three Vehicles.⁴⁰ This is why [knowledge of the paths] is not their concern. Being great, <1748> the path of the Buddhas [and that of the bodhisattvas] includes the knowledge of the paths; those of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, being small, does not include it.

Finally, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva himself practices the paths and also teaches beings the paths for each of them to practice. This is why the [Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] says here that by practicing the knowledge of the paths the bodhisattva obtains omniscience.

III. DHARMAS KNOWN BY OMNISCIENCE

Question. – What are all these dharmas cognized by omniscience?

Answer. –

1. The two bases of consciousness

[Sabbasutta]. – The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: “I will teach you ‘all dharmas’ (sarvam = sarve dharmāḥ). What are all these dharmas? The eye (caṅṣus) and colors (rūpa); the ear (śrotra) and sounds (śabda); the nose (ghrāṇa) and smells (gandha); the tongue (jihvā) and tastes (rasa); the body (kāya) and tangibles (spraṣṭavya); the mind (manas) and things (dharma). These twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) are all dharmas.”⁴¹

³⁹ By at least virtual possession of nirvāṇa, the arhat has nothing more to follow or to know.

⁴⁰ The śrāvaka knows and practices only the path of his own Vehicle; the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas know the three Vehicles experientially and use them to convert beings based on the needs and the dispositions of the latter.

⁴¹ Sabbasutta of the Saṃyutta, IV, p. 15, corresponds to the sūtra no. 319 of the Tsa a han, T 99, k.13, p. 91a24-91b3. The latter may be restored by the citations of the Kośabhāṣya (p. 4, l. 2-3) and the Abhidharmadīpa (p. 271, l. 17-272, l. 2), but the individuals are different and the sūtra in entitled Hastatāḍipama.

Pāli: Sabbaṃ vo bhikkhave dessissāmi, taṃ suṇātha. Kiṃca bhikkhave sabbaṃ. Cakkhuṃ ceva rūpa ca, sotañca saddā ... kissa hetu. Yathā taṃ bhikkhave aviṣayasmin ti.

Sanskrit: Sarvam astīti brāhmaṇa yāvad eva dvāṣaḍāyatanaṇi. Etāvat sarvaṃ yaduta caṅṣū rūpaṃ ... uttare vā saṃmoham āpadyeta. Yathāpi tad aviṣayatvāt.

Transl. of the Pāli. – Monks, I will teach you ‘everything’. Listen then. What is everything? The eye and colors, the ear and sounds, the nose and odors, the tongue and tastes, the body and tangibles, the mind and dharmas. That, O monks, is called everything. Monks, the person who says: “Dismissing all that, I propose another

2. Names and forms (or five aggregates)

Furthermore, ‘all dharmas’ are names and forms (nāmarūpa).⁴²

[Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi] – Thus in the Li-tchong king

(Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi)⁴³ the Buddha spoke these stanzas:

For the person who seeks right seeing

There are only names and forms.

The person who wants to consider and know truly

He too will know only names and forms.⁴⁴ everything”, that, on his part, would be a pointless statement; if he were to be questioned, he would be unable to stick to it and, furthermore, he would fall into confusion. Why? Because, O monks, it would not be objective.

⁴² In the expression nāmarūpa, nāman represents the four formless skandhas (vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra, vijñāna), and rūpa represents the rūpaskandha: cf. Kośa, III, p. 94-95.

The expression ‘all dharmas’ designates that which has its own nature (svabhāva) and its own characteristics (svalakṣaṇa), whether these dharmas are classified into five skandhas, twelve āyatanas or eighteen dhātus. The Commentary on the Anguttara, II, p. 259, l. 4-5 says: Sabbadhammā vuccanti pañcakkhandhā dvādasāyatanaṇi aṭṭhārasa dhātuyo.

⁴³ The Sanskrit sources place the Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi in the Kṣudrakāgama or Kṣudrapīṭaka “Minor Texts” (cf. Lamotte, Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 174-176); the Pāli sources incorporate the Aṭṭhakavagga in the Suttanipāta, the fifth book of the Khuddakanikāya.

In his translation of the Traité, Kumārajīva designates the Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi under various names: Tchong-yi king (see above, p. 39F), A t’a p’o k’i king (p. 65F), Yi-p’in (p. 1089F) and also here, Li-tchong king, a translation which will be adopted later (k. 31, p. 295c; k. 45, p. 389a, where Li-chong-chen king should be read as Li-tchong king).

⁴⁴ Cf. Aṭṭhakavagga of the Suttanipāta, v. 909, p. 177 and Yi-tsou king, T 198, k. 2, p. 183b3-4:

Passaṃ naro daakkhiti nāmarūpaṃ, disvāna vāññassati tāni,-eva kāmaṃ bahum passatu appakaṃ vā, ma hi tena suddhiṃ kusalā vadanti.

“The clear-sighted man sees names and forms and, having seen them, just recognizes them. Supposing he sees a very great number of them and a small number of them, no valid proof of them will happen: this is what the experts say.”

But this translation departs notably from the explanations given by the Mahānidesa, II, p. 325 and the Commentary on the Suttanipāta, II, p. 560. E. M. Hare, Woven Cadences of Early Buddhists, London, 1944, p. 133 translates it as:

When a foolish mind multiplies notions
 And is attached to distinguishing many dharmas,
 He will never have anything
 But names and forms. <1750>

3. Groups of two dharmas⁴⁵

‘All dharmas’ is also dharmas with form (rūpin) and without form (arūpin); visible (sanidarśana) and invisible (anidarśana); resistant (sapratigha) and [259c] non-resistant (apratigha); impure (sāsrava) and pure (anāsrava); conditioned (saṃskṛta) and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta); mind (citta) and non-mind (na citta); associated with mind (cittasaṃprayukta) and non-associated with mind (na cittasaṃprayukta); coexisting with mind (cittasahabhū) and non-coexisting with mind (na cittasahabhū); resulting from mind (cittānuparivartin) and not resulting from mind (na cittānuparivartin); taking its origin from mind (cittasamutthāna) and not taking its origin from mind (na cittasamutthāna). Numberless similar groupings of two dharmas contain all the dharmas. See the Abhidharma, in the Chō-fa p’in (Dharmasaṃgrahaparivarta).⁴⁶

4. Groups of three dharmas

‘All dharmas’ is also the good (kuśala), the bad (akuśala) and indeterminate (avyākṛta) dharmas; the dharmas to be destroyed by seeing <1751> the truths (satyadarśanaheya), to be destroyed by meditation (bhāvanāheya) and not to be destroyed (aheya); the dharmas with retribution (savipāka), without retribution (avipāka), neither with nor without retribution. Innumerable similar groups of three dharmas comprise all the dharmas.

The man with eyes will see both ‘name’ and ‘form’,
 And having seen, will know them just as such:
 Let him see much or little as he lists,
 No cleansing comes by that the experts say.

⁴⁵ These groups of two dharmas have been mentioned above, p. 644F, 1101F.

⁴⁶ The Traité refers here to the Abhidharmaprakaraṇapāda, in the beginning of chapter VI, entitled Fen-pie-chō p’in in Guṇabhadra’s version (T 1541, k. 4, p. 644b5-644c23) and Pien-chō-teng p’in in Hsuan-tsang’s version (T 1542, k. 5, p. 711b6-711c26). A note added to Guṇabhadra’s translation (T 1541, k. 4, p. 644c23) mentions 216 groups of two dharmas (see above, p. 1101F). For the author of the Traité, chapters V to VIII of the Prakaraṇapāda were not the work of Vasumitra but that of the arhats of Kaśmir (cf. 0. 111-112F).

5. Groups of four dharmas

‘All dharmas’ is also dharmas past (atīta), future (anāgata), present (pratyutpanna), neither past, future nor present; dharmas belonging to the world of desire (kāmadhātuvavacara), belonging to the world of form (rūpadhātuvavacara), belonging to the formless world (ārūpyadhātuvavacara), not having any membership (anavacara); dharmas coming from a good cause (kuśalahetusamutthāna), coming from a bad (akuśala) cause, coming from an indeterminate (avyākṛta) cause, and coming from a cause that is neither good, bad nor indeterminate; dharmas that are object condition (ālambanapratyaya), that are non-object condition, that are both object and non-object condition, that are neither object nor non-object condition. Innumerable similar groups of four dharmas comprise all the dharmas.

6. Groups of five dharmas

‘All dharmas’ is also the dharmas that are material (rūpa), mind (citta), mental (caitasika), a formation dissociated from mind (cittaprayuktasaṃskāra) or unconditioned (asaṃskṛta); the four truths (satya) and the indeterminate-unconditioned (avyākṛtasaṃskṛta). Innumerable similar groups of five dharmas comprise all the dharmas.

7. Groups of six dharmas

‘All dharmas’ is also the five aggregates (skandha) and the unconditioned (asaṃskṛta); the dharmas to be destroyed by the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya), by the truth of the origin (samudayasatya), by the truth of cessation (nirodhasatya), by the truth of the path (mārgasatya), by meditation (bhāvanā), or not to be destroyed (aheya). Innumerable similar groups of six dharmas comprise all the dharmas. <1752>

8. Other groups of dharmas

Groups of seven, eight, nine, ten dharmas, etc., are analyzed in the Abhidharma in the chapter of the [Dharma]-vibhaṅga.⁴⁷

‘All dharmas’ is thus all existing (sat) or non-existing (asat), empty (śūnya) or real (satya), objects (ālambana) or subjects (ālambaka), united or scattered, etc., dharmas.

⁴⁷ Prakaraṇapāda, T 1541, k. 4, p. 645b28 seq.; T 1542, k. 5, p. 712c17 seq.

‘All dharmas’ is thus existent, non-existent, existent and non-existent; false, not false, false and not false; false, true, neither false nor true; arising, perishing, arising and perishing; neither arising nor perishing; and so on, dharmas.

‘All dharmas’ is also existent, non-existent, existent and non-existent, [260a] neither existent nor non-existent dharmas.

Apart from these tetralemmas (catuṣkoṭi), such as ‘empty (śūnya), non-empty (aśūnya), arising and perishing, neither arising nor perishing’ dharmas, there are also pentalemmas of the same kind.⁴⁸

All the dharmas are included in these innumerable and incalculable groupings. Knowing the said dharmas in an exhaustive and complete way with unhindered wisdom (apratihātaprajñā) is called omniscience and knowledge of all aspects (sarvākārjñatā).

IV. TRUE OMNISCIENCE BELONGS TO THE BUDDHA⁴⁹

Question. – All beings seek wisdom (prajñā). Why is the Buddha the only one to attain sarvajñatā?

Answer. – Since the Buddha is foremost (agra) of all beings, he is the only one to obtain sarvajñatā.

[Pasādasutta.] – Thus the Buddha said: “Of all beings without legs, with two legs, with four legs, with many legs, with a body or without a body, conscious, unconscious, neither conscious nor unconscious, etc., the Buddha is the foremost of all.”⁵⁰

Just as Mount Sumeru is foremost among the mountains, just as fire (tejas), of all the four great elements (mahābhūta) has the power to illuminate and to burn, so, of all beings, the Buddha is foremost. This is why he obtains sarvajñatā.

Question. – Why is the Buddha alone the foremost of beings?

Answer. – As I have just said, because he possesses sarvajñatā. But I must repeat myself here.

⁴⁸ For the Madhyamaka method, which uses and abuses reduction to absurdity (prasaṅga), the tetralemma (catuṣkoṭi) and fivefold argumentation, see J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 16, 51 (n. 7), 66 (n. 68), 183 (n. 597), 221 (n. 761).

⁴⁹ This subject has already been discussed above, p. 146-161F.

⁵⁰ Beginning of the Pasādasutta of the Anguttara, II, p. 34 (Tseng-yi-a-han, T 125, k. 12, p. 602a1-3) often reproduced in other suttas (Anguttara, III, p. 35; V, p. 21; Itivuttaka, p. 87):

Yāvataṁ bhikkhave sattā apadā dipadā vā catuppadā vā bahuppadā vā rūpino vā arūpino vā saññino vā asaññino vā nevasaññināsaññino vā Tathāgato tesam aggam akkhāyati araham sammāsambuddho.

The corresponding Sanskrit formula is in Divyāvadāba, p. 154, and Avadānaśataka, I, p. 49, 329:

Ye kecit sattvā vā dvipadā vā [catuṣpadā vā] bahupadā vā rūpino vā arūpino vāsaṃjñino vā asaṃjñiṇo vā naivasamjñino nāsaṃjñiṇas Tathāgato ’rhan samyaksambuddhas teṣāṃ sattvānāṃ agra ākhyāyate.

The Buddha, who assures both his own good (svahita) and the good of others (parahita), is the foremost of beings.

Thus, the sun (āditya) is the foremost of all lights (prabhā); the noble cakravartin king is the foremost of all humans; the blue lotus (nīlotpala) is the foremost of the lotuses; the jasmine (sumanā) is the foremost of all flowers growing on land; the ox-head sandalwood (gośīrṣa candana) is the foremost of all perfumed wood; the wish-fulfilling pearl (cintāmaṇi) is the foremost of jewels (maṇi); the morality of the saints (āryaśīla) is the foremost of moralities; the indestructible deliverance (abhedyavimukti) is the foremost of the deliverances (vimukti); the liberations (vimokṣa) are the foremost of the purities (viśuddhi); the consideration of emptiness (śūnyatāmupaśyana) is the foremost of all considerations (anupaśyanā);⁵¹ <1754> nirvāṇa is foremost of all dharmas.⁵²

Thus there are numberless primacies of all kinds, and as the Buddha also is the foremost of all beings, he is the only one to obtain sarvajñatā.

Furthermore, from his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittoṭpāda), the Buddha is adorned with great vows (mahāprañidhāna) and, in order to save all beings in decline, he has practiced all the good paths (kuśalamārga) in a complete and exhaustive way. There are no merits that he has not accumulated or sufferings that he has not undergone. He has gathered into himself all the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddhas. For these many and numberless reasons, the Buddha alone is the foremost of all beings.

Question. – But all the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions have the same qualities. Why do you say that the Buddha alone is foremost?

Answer. – I said that, among beings other than the Buddhas, the Buddha [260b] alone is supreme. The Buddhas have equal and identical qualities.⁵³

V. ETYMOLOGY OF SARVAJÑATĀ

In the expression ‘sarva-jñā-tā’, sarva in the language of the Ts’in means ‘all’, jñā in the language of the Ts’in means ‘to know’, and tā in the language of the Ts’in means ‘the fact of’.⁵⁴ As I have said above, sarva designates all dharmas, with form (rūpin), etc. The Buddha knows all these dharmas in their characteristics, single or diverse, impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), conditioned (saṃskṛta) or unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), etc.

Each of these dharmas has their characteristics (lakṣaṇa), their power (bala), their causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), their fruit of retribution (vipākaphala), their nature (prakṛti), their acquiring (prāpti) and ⁵¹ Adopting the variant kouan.

⁵² Similar lists of ‘statements of primacy’ (agraprajñapti) in Majjhima, III, p. 6-7; Saṃyutta, III, p. 156; Anguttara, III, p. 364-365; V, p. 21-22.

⁵³ Adopting the variant teng-yi.

⁵⁴ A Chinese gloss incorporated into the translation.

their loss (vināśa). It is by the power of sarvajñātā that one cognizes them in a full and exhaustive way, at all times and in all their aspects (ākāra). That is why [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] says here: “The bodhisattva who wants to fulfill omniscience completely by means of the knowledge of the aspect of the paths (mārgākārajñatā) should exert himself in the Prajñāpāramitā. If he wants to fulfill completely the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñata), he should exert himself in the Prajñāpāramitā.”

VI. THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ASPECTS IS PRACTICED AFTER OMNISCIENCE

Question. – But as soon as he acquires complete enlightenment (sambodhi), the Buddha completely fulfills both omniscience (sarvajñatā) and the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) by means of his knowledge of the paths (mārgajñatā). Why does [the sūtra] say here that he uses omniscience to perfect the knowledge of all the aspects?

Answer. – It is true that, as soon as he attains enlightenment, the Buddha completely fulfills omniscience and completely fulfills the knowledge of all the aspects by means of his knowledge of the paths. He could be compared to the king of a great country: at the time when he ascends his throne, he enters into possession of his territories (viśaya) and his treasures (kośa), but he has not yet opened them and used them.

Third Section DESTROYING THE TRACES OF THE CONFLICTING EMOTIONS

Canonical Buddhism makes the destruction of the conflicting emotions (kleśaprahāna), the elimination of love, hate and ignorance (rāga-dveṣa-moha-kṣaya), the final goal of the religious life. It constitutes arhattva, sainthood (S. IV, p. 252), amṛta, immortality (S. V, p. 8), Nirvāṇa (S. IV, p. 251, 261). The destruction of the conflicting emotions is the result of a certain supramundane prajñā which is not the same in all the saints, but it involves the disappearance of the conflicting emotions for all. The Buddha said: “In those who possess it, there is no difference between deliverance and deliverance” (Majjhima, II, p. 129; Saṃyutta, V, p.410; Anguttara, III, p. 34: Ettha kho nesahaṃ na kiñci nānākaraṇaṃ vadāmi, yadidaṃ vimuttiyā vimuttiṃ).

The enlightenment of the Buddha has been the object of many accounts (cf. E. Waldschmidt, Die Erleuchtung des Buddha, in Festschrift Krause, 1960, p. 214-229). They say that Śākyamuni attained anuttarā samyak-sambodhi and broke through his last kleśa at the end of the third watch of the night. For the Sarvāstivādins who have carefully worked out the timing of the night of the enlightenment (Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 153, p. 780b29-c6; Kośa, II, p. 205-206; VI, p. 177; Traité, p. 1036), it was at the thirty-fourth <1756> mind-moment that the Sage acceded to sambodhi and detached himself from the ninth category of conflicting emotions of the summit of existence (bhavāgra). For these early sources, one line was enough to define the succession to sainthood of a disciple of the Buddha: “While this religious instruction was being given, the Venerable One’s mind was liberated from impurities by means of detachment.”

At the beginnings of Buddhist speculation it is only a question of passions and destruction of the passions: this is the same in all the saints, arhat, pratyekabuddha and Buddha, and results immediately in enlightenment.

However, on simply reading the canonical and paracanonical texts, we notice that most of the disciples of the Buddha, even after having destroyed the conflicting emotions and attaining sainthood, often still acted as impassioned men subject to love, hate and ignorance. In this regard, the Traité has gathered together some rather significant anecdotes (cf. p. 117-123F, 1659-1661F) and will return to them later (k. 84, p. 649c). It must be noted that the saints who no longer have conflicting emotions still carry out apparently impassioned actions. These lapses of behavior do not constitute faults and do not involve their responsibility; they are the unfortunate consequence of inveterate habits. The saints retain the traces, the impregnations (vāsanā) of their emotions like sesame seeds retain the perfume of the flowers that perfumed them (vāsita or bhāvita) long ago, long after the flowers have disappeared.

Anantavarman, a commentator on the Mahāvibhāṣā, defined the kleśavāsanā in these words: “In every śrāvaka who previously was subject to an emotion, a special potentiality is created by this emotion in his mind which is the cause of a distortion in his physical and vocal conduct: this potentiality is called ‘trace’ (vāsanā). The trace is a mind of a special kind, morally undefined (avyākṛta): (Kośavyākhyā, p. 647: Śrāvakāñāṃ yo hi yatkleśacaritaḥ pūrvam tasya tatkrtaḥ kāyavākceṣṭāvīkārāhetusāmarthyaviśeṣaś citte vāsanety. avyākṛtaś cittaviśeṣo vāsaneti).

Innocent though they are, these actions are out of place in the saints and make them appear ridiculous. But there is something more serious. Some exegetists think they have found in the biographies of Śākyamuni a whole series of not very edifying episodes: an exaggerated kindness, insulting words, or even ignorance unworthy of the Great Sage. The authors of the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 16, p. 77b4-c9) and the Traité (above, 1661F seq.) have not attempted to evade these “embarrassing” episodes, but have washed away any suspicion of the Teacher by justifying his somewhat bold initiatives by excellent reasons. Moreover, they have not failed to reveal irrefutable proof in the life of the Buddha of his unshakeable calmness in no matter what circumstance, pleasant or unpleasant (T 1509, k. 27, p. 260c27-261a22). The conviction spread that the śrāvakas do not eliminate the traces of the emotions whereas the Buddhas are easily freed of them. A stock phrase reproduced in some lives of the Buddha (T 156, k. 6, p. 155c13-17) or commentaries on the Vinaya (T 1440, k. 1, p. 504c3-7) says: “In the Buddhas, the vāsanās are destroyed; in the [adepts] of the two Vehicles, [śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha], they are not. Thus the bhikṣu Gavāmpati was always chewing the cud because from existence to existence he had been a cow; although he had destroyed his impurities (kṣīṇāśrava) the bhikṣu (Nanda?) was always admiring himself in the mirror because from lifetime to lifetime he had been a courtesan; yet another bhikṣu (Madhuvāsiṣṭha?) leapt over walls and climbed up <1757> towers because he had been a monkey from lifetime to lifetime. Those are not called ‘Bhagavat’.”

On the other hand, the absence of vāsanās of emotions in the Buddhas, which the early biographies mention in passing, take on the weight of dogma in some Hīnayānist sects strongly marked by supernaturalistic and docetic tendencies. Here the evidence of Mahāvibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 173, p. 871c2-7; k. 44, p.229a17-20; k. 76, p. 391c27-392a3) may be called upon: “For the Vibhajyavādins and the Mahāsāṃghikas, the body of birth (janmakāya) of the Buddha is without impurities (anāsrava). Why do they say that? Because they depend on the sūtra (Samyutta, III, p. 140; Anguttara, II, p. 39) where it is said: ‘The Tathāgata, born into the world, having grown up in the world, transcends the world and is not defiled by the world’ (Tathāgato loke jāto saṃvaḍḍho lokam abhibhuyya viharati anupalitto lokena). In dependence on this text, they say that the body of birth of the Buddha is without impurity. These teachers also say: ‘The Buddha has completely and definitively destroyed all the kleśas and their traces (vāsanā); how then could his body of birth have impurities?’ ”

The Mahāyānists have resolutely adopted the lokottaravāda of the Vibhajyavādins and the Mahāsāṃghikas and try to define more precisely the relationship between the kleśas and the kleśavāsanās and the conditions of their respective eliminations.

The kleśas are bad dharmas that pollute the mind; the vāsanās are the natural results of emotional actions. Unpleasant or ridiculous though they may be, the vāsanās are morally undefined (avyākṛta) and do not involve any responsibility.

Affecting the mind, kleśa and vāsanā can be destroyed only by a wisdom (prajñā), a certain form of omniscience (sarvajñatā).

A wisdom of a lower class that is essentially concerned with the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) of things and that belongs to the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas suffices to destroy the kleśas. A higher wisdom concerned with the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) as well and, for this reason, called ‘knowledge of all the aspects’, destroys the kleśas and the vāsanās. This wisdom is an attribute exclusive to the Buddha.

Finally, in contrast to what the early sources would have one believe, the destruction of the kleśas and the destruction of the vāsanās are not simultaneous but are separated in time by a rather long interval.

This system which the Traité will describe in detail in the following pages is directly inspired by concepts developed in the Mahāyānasūtras and especially in the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra of which some extracts are given here.

Vol. VI, no. 220, k. 363, p. 872a7-19; vol. VII, no. 220, k. 525, p. 695b27-c11: There is no difference between the different destructions of the conflicting emotions (kleśaprahāṇa). However, the Tathāgatas, arhats and samyaksambuddhas have entirely and definitively cut all the conflicting emotions (kleśa) and the traces that result from them (vāsanānusaṃdhi). The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas themselves have not yet definitively cut the vāsanānusaṃdhi... These vāsanās are not really kleśas. After having cut the kleśas, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas still retain a small part of them: semblances of love (rāga), hate (dveṣa) and ignorance (moha) still function in their body (kāya), speech (vāc) and mind (manas): this is what is called vāsanānusaṃdhi. In foolish worldly people (bālapṛthagjana), the vāsanās call forth disadvantages

(anartha), whereas among <1758F> the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas they do not. The Buddhas do not have all these vāsanānusaṃdhi.”

But where in the career of the bodhisattva is the destruction of the kleśas and the destruction of the vāsanās located? Are they simultaneous or consecutive? The question lends itself to controversy, but the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, as it appeared in the Chinese version by Kumārajīva (T 223, k. 6) gives a precise answer:

T 223, k. 6, p. 257b16-17 and 259a25: Twenty dharmas must be perfectly accomplished by the bodhisattva who is on the seventh level: ... notably the 15th, the overcoming of the passions (kleśavivarta). – What is the overcoming of the passions by the bodhisattva? It is the destruction of all the passions (sarvakleśaprahāṇa).

T 223, k. 6, p. 259c8-10: The bodhisattva who completely fulfills the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) and has destroyed all the traces (sarvakleśavāsanā) is a bodhisattva-mahāsattva who is on the tenth bhūmi and should be considered simply as a Buddha (tathāgata eva vedītyaḥ).

Sūtra (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 9-11; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 67, l. 8-10). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wants to destroy the traces of all the conflicting emotions by means of knowledge should exert himself in the perfection of wisdom. It is thus, O Śāriputra, that the bodhisattva-mahāsattva should practice the perfection of wisdom (Sarvākārajñatayā kleśavāsanāḥ prahātukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ yogaḥ karaṇīyaḥ. Evam eva Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE ASPECTS LEADS IMMEDIATELY TO THE DESTRUCTION OF THE TRACES OF CONFLICTING EMOTIONS

Question. - The bodhisattva obtains omniscience (sarvajñatā), the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) and destroys all the traces of conflicting emotion (sarvakleśavāsanā) in one and the same moment of mind. Why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] say here that he uses omniscience to completely fulfill the knowledge of all the aspects and that he uses the knowledge of all the aspects to destroy the traces of the passions?

Answer. – It is true that all these knowledges⁵⁵ are acquired simultaneously, but here [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] expresses itself in this way in order to bring people to believe in the Prajñāpāramitā.

⁵⁵ Adopting the variant yi ts'ie tche.

Besides, in a <1759> following chapter, the *Tch'a-pie p'in*⁵⁶ (Viśeṣaparivarta), he wants beings to acquire pure mind (viśuddhacitta) and this is why he expresses himself in this way.

Moreover, although that is all acquired in a single mind-moment, there is, nevertheless, a succession with a beginning, a middle and an end, for every mind involves three characteristics: production (utpāda) which conditions duration (sthiti) and duration which conditions disappearance (vyaya).⁵⁷ And this is so for the mind (citta), mental events (caitasikadharma), formations dissociated from the mind (viprayktaśaṃskāradharma), physical actions (kāyakarman) and vocal actions (vākkarman).

By means of the knowledge of the paths (mārgajñatā), the bodhisattva completely fulfills (paripūrayati) omniscience (sarvajñatā); by means of omniscience, he completely fulfills the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā); by means of the knowledge of all the aspects, he destroys the traces of the passions (kleśavāsanāḥ prajahāti).

I said above (p. 1744F) that the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) is the same as omniscience (sarvajñatā). The knowledge of the paths (mārgajñatā) is synonymous with the diamond concentration (vajrasamādhi).⁵⁸ [In possession of the latter,] the Buddha first⁵⁹ produces a mind which is none other than omniscience or the knowledge of all the aspects and immediately his traces of the passions (kleśavāsanā) are destroyed. <1760>

II. CONFLICTING EMPTIONS AND THE TRACES OF CONFLICTING EMOTIONS

The characteristics of omniscience and the knowledge of all the aspects have been described above (p. 1744F). What is destroying the traces of all the conflicting emotions (sarvakleśaprahāṇa)? [260c]

⁵⁶ Adopting the variant Tch'a-pie p'in. This is the LXXXIVth chapter of the Chinese Pañcaviṃśati (T 223, k. 26, p. 411b15), the chapter entitled Tch'a-pie p'in (Viśeṣaparivarta) in the Korean edition adopted by the Taisho, Sseu-ti p'in (Catuṣṣatyaparivarta) in the editions of the Yuan and the Ming. On pg. 411b19-25, the Buddha actually says to Subhūti: “The attributes of the bodhisattva are also the attributes of the Buddha. To know all the aspects is to acquire the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) and to destroy all the traces of the passions (kleśavāsanā). The bodhisattva will attain this attribute whereas the Buddha, by means of a wisdom associated with a single moment of mind (ekakṣaṇasamprayuktaprajñā), already knows all the dharmas and has acquired anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi. This is the difference (viśeṣa) between the bodhisattva and the Buddha. It can be compared to the difference between the candidate for the [first] fruit of the Path (phalapratiṭpannaka) and the holder of this same fruit (phalapṛāpta): both are āryas, but there is a difference between the holder and the candidate.”

⁵⁷ These are the characteristics of every conditioned dharma: cf. p. 1163F, n. 1.

⁵⁸ Concentration also called vajropamasamādhi: cf. p. 242F, n. 1, 1068F, 1325F, 1341F, 1503F.

⁵⁹ Adopting the variant tch'ou fa.

In brief, the passions (kleśa) are the three poisons (triviṣa) – [desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), ignorance (moha)]; at length, these are the ninety-eight perverse tendencies (anuśaya) of the three worlds. The traces of the passions (kleśavāsanā) are the residual emanations of passion.

If certain physical or vocal actions are not in accordance with wisdom (na jñānānuparivartin), they seem to come from the passions (kleśa), and those who do not know the minds of others (paracitta) see them as such and experience a feeling of horror (aśuci). In reality, it is not truly a matter of passion, but those who have given themselves up to the passions for a long time carry out actions of this kind.

Thus a prisoner who has been laden with chains for a long time, once he is liberated, moves with a hesitant walk even though he no longer is in chains. A nurse's clothes that have been stained for a long time, even though they are washed and scrubbed with pure ash, still remain impregnated with the smell of the stains. In the same way, the stains of the mind (cittamala) in the saint are like the passions and, even though he has washed his passions with the water of wisdom, the traces (vāsanā) remain in him.

III. THE TRACES OF PASSION PERSIST IN THE SAINTS

The saints (bhadrārya) other [than the Buddha] destroy the passions but do not destroy the traces.

Thus, although he had attained the bodhi of the arhats, Nan-t'o (Nanda),⁶⁰ as a result of the traces of lust (rāgavāsanā), in the presence of a large assembly of men and women, first stared at the women and then, raising his voice, preached the Dharma.

Out of traces of anger (krodhavāsanā), when the Buddha accused him of eating impure food, Chō-li-fou (Śāriputra) spat out his food <1761> and never again accepted an invitation.⁶¹ Śāriputra then added this stanza:

It is a habitual offender, a false mind,

An ignorant and lazy person.

Never again will I allow him

To come in and stay near me.⁶²

Out of traces of hatred (dveṣavāsanā), after the Buddha's nirvāṇa when the Dharma was being compiled, Mo-ho-kia-chō (Mahākāśyapa) ordered Ānanda to confess six duṣkṛta misdeeds, then, taking him by the ⁶⁰ Saundarananda: see p. 117-118F, 286-287F, 1545F.

⁶¹ This incident has been told in full above (p. 118-122F, 1632F) supported by a jāṭaka. See also Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 16, p. 77b1-2.

⁶² This stanza concerns the vaiśya who had inconsiderately reserved some fancy tidbits for Śāriputra.

hand, he expelled him from the assembly, saying: “We cannot compile the Dharma with you, unclean man, whose impurities have not been destroyed.”⁶³

Pi-ling-kia-p'o-ts'o (Pilindavatsa) was always insulting the deity of the Ganges treating her like a slave (vr̥ṣala).⁶⁴

Out of traces of monkey antics, Mo-t'eou-p'o-ho-tcha (Madhuvāsiṣṭha) sometimes leapt from coat-rack to beam, from beam to shed and from shed to the tower.⁶⁵

Out of bovine traces (govāsanā), Kiao-fan-po-t'i (Gavāmpati) was always spitting up his food and then swallowing it back again.⁶⁶

While having destroyed their impurities (kṣīṇāsrava), saints such as these still have the traces of passion. Thus when [ordinary] fire has burned the fuel, there remain the ashes and charcoal, for the strength of the fire is so weak that it cannot consume them.

IV. THE TRACES OF PASSION ARE DESTROYED IN THE BUDDHA

At the end of the kalpa, the [cosmic] fire consumes the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu of which nothing remains, for the strength of this fire is very great. The fire of the Buddha’s omniscience is also very great: it consumes the passions without leaving any trace (vāsanā). <1762>

Thus, when a brāhman addressed five hundred harmful words (pāruṣyavāda) to the Buddha in the full assembly, the Buddha neither changed color nor feeling. And when the same brāhman, his mind having been tamed, retracted and praised the Buddha with five hundred eulogies, the Buddha [261a] manifested neither pleasure (prīti) nor satisfaction (āttamanas).⁶⁷ <1764> In blame (nindā) as in praise (praśaṃsā), his feelings and his color remain unchanged.

⁶³ On the wrangles between Mahākāśyapa and Ānanda during the First Council, see above, p. 93-97F.

⁶⁴ Pilindavatsa: cf. p. 121-122F, 1439F, 1661F, and later, k. 84, p. 649c14-17.

⁶⁵ Madhuvāsiṣṭha: cf. p. 1659-1660F and later k. 84, p. 649c10-13.

⁶⁶ Gavāmpati: cf. p. 1659F. See also Tch’ou tch’ou king, T 730, p. 527a2-4.

⁶⁷ This concerns a young brāhman of the Bhāradvāja clan whose name was Piṅgi or Paṅgi in Sanskrit, Piṅgiyānin in Pāli and whose surname was Ākrośaka, the insulter. The Traité, which will speak of him again at k. 84, p. 649c18-21, tells that he spoke five hundred insults and five hundred praises to the Buddha in succession. It repeats the version of the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 76, p. 392a28-b2) where it is said: “The Buddha was insulted directly in five hundred strophes by a Bhāradvāja brāhman: example of blame (nindā); and this same brāhman, at the same time, returned these five hundred strophes and directly praised the Buddha: example of praise (praśaṃsā).” But for the canonical sources, blame and praise were pronounced at two different occasions and were the object of two distinct sūtras, the Akkosasutta of the Saṃyutta and the Piṅgiyānisutta of the Anguttara.

I. Akkosasutta of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 161-163:

The Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha at the Veluvana in the Kalandakanivāpa. Akkosaka-Bhāradvāja came to find him and, furious to learn that his brother Samaṇa had just entered the bhikṣu community, he insulted and outraged the Blessed One with coarse and harmful words (bhagavantam asabbhāhi pharusāhi vācāhi akkosati paribhāsati). The Buddha’s only response was to ask him if sometimes he welcomed friends and relatives at his home and if, in the affirmative, he offered them food. Akkosaka acknowledged that sometimes that happened. And if the guests refuse the food that you offer them, said the Buddha, to whom does this food belong? – It returns to me, answered the brāhman. In the same way, continued the Buddha, by not responding to your insults by means of insults, we let you take them into account: it is to you that they return, O brāhman (tav-ev-etam brāhmaṇa hoti).

Akkosaka thought that the Buddha would be angry with him, but the latter set him straight by addressing four stanzas to him (also mentioned in the Theragāthā, v. 441-444) which say in substance: From where would anger come to the man without anger? Not answering anger with counter-anger is to win a difficult victory.

At these words, Akkosaka expressed his admiration for the Buddha, took refuge in the Three Jewels and asked to leave the world (pabbajjā) and for ordination (upasampadā). In a short while he reached the summit of religious life and attained arhathood.

For the Commentary to the Saṃyutta, I, p.229, Akkosaka-Bhāradvāja had come to insult the Buddha in five hundred strophes (pañcagāthāsatehi Tathāgataṃ akkosanto āgato), which means that he insulted the Buddha ‘by means of the ten bases of insults’ (dasahi akkosavatthūh akkosati) the details of which are in Vin. IV, p. 7 and the Commentary to the Dhammapada, I, p. 211-212: “You are a thief (cora), a fool (bāla), a silly thing (mūḷha), a camel (oṭṭha), an ox (goṇa), an ass (gadhabba), a hell being (nerayika); you have only a bad destiny in view (duggati yeva tuyhaṃ pātikaṅkhā).” According to the Anguttara, III, p. 252, a bhikṣu who pronounces such insults would be guilty of the five heinous crimes.

The Pāli Akkosasutta has its Sanskrit correspondents in the Āgamas: Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 1152, k. 42, p. 307a10-b9, and T 100, no. 75, k. 4, p. 400b10-c10. Both Sanskrit sūtras differ considerably from the Pāli suttanta. They place the event not at Rājagṛha, but at Śrāvastī in the Jetavana in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada; they designate the brāhman not by the name Ākrośaka but under his personal name: the mānava Pin-k’i-kia (Piṅgi) or Pei-yi (Piṅgiya); finally and in particular, they are silent about the conversion of the brāhman, his entry into religion and his reaching arhathood. In T 99, i.e., the brāhman is pardoned only for his coarseness by the use of the commonplace phrase: atyayo Gotama yathā bālo yathā mūḍho, yatjāyako yathākuśalo...

II. Piṅgiyānisutta of Snguttara, III, p. 239-240:

One day the Blessed One was dwelling at Vesālī at Mahāvana in the Kūṭāgārasālā and five hundred Licchavis came to pay their respects to him. Among them, the brāhman Piṅgiyānin (var. Piṅgiyāni) had a sudden illumination (paṭibhā) and the Buddha asked him to explain it. The brāhman then addressed a stanza of homage appropriate to the occasion to the Lord:

Padumaṃ yathā kokaṇaḍaṃ sugandhaṃ pāto siyā phullaṃ avitagaṇḍhaṃ / aṅgīrasaṃ passa virocamaṇaṃ tapantaṃ ādiccam iv’ antalikkhe //

When the brāhmaṇa Tchan-tchō (Ciñcā) attached a wooden disk to her belly (udare dārumaṇḍalikāṃ baddvā), [pretending to be pregnant], and slandered the Buddha, the latter did not redden with shame (hrī) and, once the trick was revealed, did not redden with joy (prīti).⁶⁸

“As the red lotus flower with sweet perfume expands in the morning without having lost its perfume, see how the Āṅgīrasa shines and how he glows like the sun in the firmament.” [Stanza also cited in Samyutta, I, p. 81; Jātaka, I, p. 116; Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 326.]

Then the Licchavis covered the brāhmaṇa Piṅgiyānin with their five hundred lower cloaks (uttarāsāṅgha) and the latter in turn covered the Buddha with them.

Finally, the Buddha revealed to the Licchavis the five jewels (ratana) rarely appearing in the world.

The episode told here by the Piṅgiyānisutta is reproduced with a some variants in many Sanskrit-Chinese sources:

a. Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, ed. E. Waldschmidt, p. 182.

b. Dīrghāgama, T 1, k. 2, p. 14a11-25.

c. Fo pan ni yuan king, T 5, k. 1, p. 164a13-20.

d. Pan ni yuan king, T 6, k. 1, p. 179b15-c2.

e. Mahīśāsaka Vin., T 1421, k. 20, p. 135c18-136a2.

f. Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, k. 40, p. 856b3-18.

g. Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1448, k. 7, p. 28c14-29a2.

h. Ibid., T 1451, k. 36, p. 386b10-22.

In all these texts, the brāhmaṇa is called Paiṅgika or Piṅgika. Source a reproduces it literally; sources b to f designate it by transliteration by means of the Chinese characters Ping-ki, Pin-tseu, Ping-ki, Pin-k'i-ye, Pin-k'i-yang-t'ou; sources g and h translate it as Kouang-che ‘Vast ornament’ and Houang-fa ‘Yellow hair’ respectively.

In the same texts, Piṅgika addresses several stanzas to the Buddha whereas the Piṅgiyānisutta mentions only one.

III. Pañcarājānosutta of the Samyutta, I, p. 79-81:

This sutta takes place in Sāvattthi. Five kings, led by Pasenadi, entered into a discussion in regard to the five objects of sense enjoyment (kāmaguṇa), viz., color, sound, smell, taste and touch, and they wondered which was the best. They went to consult the Buddha who told them that it was necessary to take into account the tastes and preferences of each one: the sense-object that called forth the most pleasure is the best.

The upāsaka Candanaṅgalika present in the assembly reproduces exactly the same words and gestures of Piṅgiyānin described in the preceding sutta: he pronounces the same stanza and covers the Buddha with five cloaks that had been offered to him by the five kings.

Two Sanskrit sūtras incorporated in the Samyuktāgama correspond to this Pāli sutta: i) T 99, no. 1149, k. 42, p. 306a21-c1; ii) T 100, no. 72, k. 4, p. 399b28-c29. But whereas the first sūtra also has the upāsaka Tchen-t'an (Candana), the second substitutes the brāhmaṇa Pei-yi, i.e., Piṅgiya.

In addition, the Ekottara (T 125, k. 25, p. 681c13-683a5) contains a developed version of the same sūtra of the five kings, but it has neither Candana nor Piṅgiya.

⁶⁸ On the trick and punishment of Ciñcā, see p. 123F, 509F.

When the Buddha turned the Wheel of Dharma (dharmacakra) and a cry of admiration arose from the ten directions, the mind of the Buddha was not thrilled.⁶⁹

At the death of Souen-t'o-li (Sundarī), when evil rumors were spread in regard to the Buddha, his mind knew no despondency.⁷⁰

In the land of A-lo-p'i (Āḷavi), a cold wind (śīlavāta) was blowing and there were many thorny broom plants, but the Buddha sat and lay down there without feeling any discomfort.⁷¹

During the summer retreat (varṣa) when he was staying in the [Trāyastriṃśa] heaven in the Houan-hi-yuan (Nandanavana), he was seated on the Kien-p'o-che (Kambalaśilā), soft and pure like the gods’ silk ribbons, but he felt no pleasant sensation (sukhavedanā).⁷² <1766> And when the great devarājas, on their knees, offered him celestial foods (divyāni bhakṣyabhojyāni), he did not consider them to be exquisite.

⁶⁹ After the sermon at Benares, the terrestrial yakṣas uttered a cry of joy that was taken up by all the deities of the desire realm and the form realm, from the Caturmahārājikas up to the Brahmakāyikas: cf. Pāli Vin., p. 11-12; Mahīśāsaka Vin., T 1421, k. 15, p. 104c; Dharmagupta Vin., T 1428, k. 32, p. 788b-c; Mūlasarv. Vim., T 1450, k. 6, p. 128a; Catuspariśatsūtra, p. 154-156; Lalitavistara, p. 401; Mahāvastu, III, p. 334-335.

The Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 76, p. 392a23-26, also comments: At the moment of the Buddha’s birth, his name went up to the Paranimittavaśavartins; at the moment of his enlightenment, up to the Akaniṣṭha gods; at the time of turning the Wheel, up to the palaces of the Mahābrahmas.

⁷⁰ On the murder of Sundarī falsely imputed to the Buddha, cf. p. 507F, 1572-73F; later, k. 84, p. 649c23-25.

⁷¹ Ālavaka sutta of Anguttara, I, p. 136-138 (Tseng-yi-a-han, T 125, k. 20, p. 650a20-c11): Evam me sutam. Ekam samayaṃ Bhagavā Ālaviyaṃ viharati Gomagge Śiṃsapāvane paññisanthāre. Atha kho Hāthako Ālavako jaṅghāvihāraṃ ... sukhaṃ senti ahaṃ tesam aññataro ti.

Transl. – Thus have I heard. Once the Blessed One was staying in Āḷavi at the Ox Path in the Śiṃśapa (Dalbergia sisu) forest, on the ground strewn with leaves.

Then Hastaka of Āḷavi who was walking about saw the Blessed One at the Ox Path in the Śiṃśapa forest seated on the ground strewn with leaves. Having seen him, he came near the Blessed One and, having approached, he bowed to the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Sitting down at one side, Hastaka of Āḷavi said to the Blessed One:

“Tell me, sir, is the Blessed One sitting comfortably?”

“Yes, my prince, I am sitting comfortably. I am one of those who are comfortable in this world.”

“Nevertheless, sir, the winter nights are cold; the fifteenth of the month is the time of snowfall; the ground trodden by the cows’ hoofs is hard; the layer of leaves is thin; the leaves of the trees are scattered; the saffron robes are cold and the Vairambhaka wind is blowing.”

Then the Blessed One answered: “Nevertheless, my prince, I am comfortable. I am one of those who, in this world, is comfortable.”

- At k. 84, p. 649c27-28, the Traité will come back to this episode. For Hastaka Āṭavika, see above, p. 562-565F and notes.

⁷² In the seventh year of his public ministry, the Buddha, who has just carried out the great miracle at Śrāvastī, following the example of his predecessors, went to preach the Dharma (some texts specify the Abhidharma) in the Trāyastriṃśa heaven where his mother Māyā had taken rebirth. In the shadow of a Pārikāta kovidāra tree (Erythrina indica), seated on Śakra's throne, the Pāṇḍukambalaśilā (Stone of white wool), he prolonged his teaching for the three months of the summer season (varṣa). Seven days afterwards, escorted by Brahmā on his right and Śakra on his left, he descended from the heavens of the Trāyastriṃśas by way of a wondrous triple staircase and set foot on earth at Sāṃkāśya, in the Āpajjura forest, at the foot of the Udumbara tree (Ficus glomerata).

All these details are summarized in the Avadānaśataka, II, p. 89, l. 4-6; 94, l. 15-16.

The second part of this miracle designated in the texts by the name Devāvatara "Descent from the gods" or Samkassanagare orohaṇaṃ "Descent into the city of Sāṃkāśya" has already been studied above (p. 634-636F and n.), but we must return to the first part, the Sermon to the Trāyastriṃśa gods.

All these details are summarized in the Avadānaśataka, II, p. 89, l. 4-6; 94, l. 15-16: Buddho bhagavān... deveṣu trayastrimṣeṣu varṣā upagataḥ pāṇḍukambalaśilāyāṃ ...nagare Āpajjura dāve Udumbaramaññe.

The second part of this miracle designated in the texts under the name of Devāvatāra "Descent from the gods" has already been studied above (p. 634-636F and n.), but we should return to the first part, the Sermon to the Trāyastriṃśa gods.

The suttas of the Pāli Vinaya do not mention it. The Saṃyutta, V, p. 367, mentions an appearance of the Buddha in the Trāyastriṃśa heaven but without giving the circumstances. On the other hand, the Ekottarāgama (T125, k. 29, p. 346a14-347b26) dedicates lengthy pages to this miracle of which the Saṃyuktāgama also was aware. The Arthapadaśūtra (T 198, k. 2, p. 184c24-186c26), which is part of the Basket of the Kṣudrakas, has the nun Utpalavarṇa welcoming the Buddha on his descent from the heaven, and cites a few stanzas which have their correspondents in verses 955 to 964 of the Pāli Suttanipāta.

The postcanonical literature gives a prominent place to the occasion with which we are concerned. Among the Sanskrit-Chinese sources may be mentioned the Légendes d'Asoka (Divyāvadāna, p. 394, l. 3-5; T 99, k. 23, p. 169c22-24; T 2042, k. 2, p. 104a23-24; T 2043, k. 2, p. 138a9-10) and especially the Avadānaśataka, II, p. 89-97 and its abridged Chinese translation in T 200, k. 9, p. 247a-b. Among the Pāli sources may be mentioned the Mahāniddeśa, II, p. 447-448; the commentaries of the Suttanipāta, p. 570, the Jātakas, IV, p. 265 and especially the Dhammapada, III, p. 216-223 (tr. Burlingame, III, p. 47-52).

Most of these sources insist on the enormous dimensions of the Pāṇḍukambakaśilā, Śakra's throne, on which the Buddha was sitting. The Commentary of the Dhammapada (III, p. 217) attributes sixty leagues in length and fifty leagues in width, but when the Buddha occupied it, it was reduced to the size of a drum (nīcapīṭhaka). The unusual shape of this throne has permitted A. Foucher (Art gréco-bouddhique du Gandhāra, I, p. 483-486) to recognize, on a bas-relief of the Sikri stūpa, a representation of the Sermon to the Trāyastriṃśa gods: the Buddha, seated in padmāsana, his right hand raised in abhayamudrā, is sitting in the shade of the Pārijāta on the Kambalaśilā. He is surrounded by six individuals who may be recognized, from bottom to top, as two orants, Vajrapāṇi and Māyā, Brahmā and Śakra. Much more numerous are the representations of the Descent into Sāṃkāśya. A few have been noted above (p. 634F, n.): a sculpture at Butkara may be added (D. Facenna, II, 2, pl. CCXXXIII) reproducing the three staircases, the gods Brahmā and Śakra, the nun Utpalavarṇā and three leafy trees on three superimposed levels: the Pārijata and the Kovidāda adorning the Trāyastriṃśa heaven, and the Udumbara growing at Sāṃkāśya.

When he ate oats (yava) at P'i-lan-jo (Vairambhya, Verañja), he did not find that to be painful.⁷³ And when the great kings presented him with superior food, he did not consider that to be a godsend.

Coming into the village of the brāhmins (brāhmaṇagrāma), he had to return with an empty bowl (dhautena pātrena), but he did not consider that to be a loss.⁷⁴

When T'i-p'o-to (Devadatta) pushed a rock down from the height of Gṛdhrakūṭapārvata to crush the Buddha, he did not feel any hatred (pratigha).⁷⁵ At that time, Lo-heou-lo (Rāhula) praised the Buddha with a mind of respect, but the Buddha felt no gratitude for it.

A-chō-che (Ajātaśatru) unleashed drunken elephants intending to kill the Buddha, but the latter was not afraid and tamed the mad elephants.⁷⁶ Their respect doubled (gurukāra), the inhabitants came out with perfumed flowers and ornaments (ābharaṇa) to offer to the Buddha, but the latter experienced no joy.

- During the t'ai-che period (265-274), Dharmarakṣa translated a long sūtra of clearly Mahāyānist tendency entitled in Chinese Fo cheng t'ao li t'ien wei mou chou ha king 'The Buddha went up to the Trāyastriṃśa gods and preached the Dharma to his mother' (T 815). Later (k. 32, p. 3012b16-c5), the Traité refers to it under the name of San-che-san-t'ien-p'in king 'Sūtra on the section of the gods of the Thirty-three', and will cite a long extract.

⁷³ To the references given above (P. 124F, n. 1), add the Mūlasarv. Vin. in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part I, p. 24, l. 8-48, l. 4 and its Chinese version in T 1448, k. 10-11, p. 45a-48c9.

⁷⁴ See above (p. 457-463) the detailed story of the Buddha's alms-round at Śāla.

⁷⁵ Cf. p. 874, n. 3.

⁷⁶ A brief allusion to the miracle of the subjugation of the elephant Nālāgiri or Dhanapāla. The stories of this miracle can be arranged into three groups: 1) the sources that present it as a miracle of loving-kindness; 2) those that make it into a miracle of magic; 3) the late versions, somewhat aberrant, where the meaning of the miracle does not appear clearly.

I. The subjugation as a miracle of loving-kindness

The earliest sources have it that the Buddha converted the animal by means of the radiation of his loving-kindness (maitrī). There is an old belief that fierce animals, especially snakes, are sensitive to the good feelings expressed towards them.

I. Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 194-196:

In Rājagṛhā at that time there was the elephant Nālāgiri, fierce (caṇḍa) and a killer of men (manussaghātaka). Devadatta went to find its mahouts and, taking advantage of his influence over king Ajātaśatru, ordered them to loose the animal against the Buddha when the latter entered Rājagṛha. This was done. The next day, surrounded by many monks, the Buddha came to the city to beg his food. The elephant was unleashed and, with its trunk erect (saṇḍaṃ ussāpetvā), ears and tail rigid (pahaṭṭhakaṇṇavāla), rushed against the Teacher. The monks begged the Buddha to go back, but the latter reassured them that no aggression coming from the exterior could deprive him of his life.

Frightened, the population of Rājagṛha took refuge on the roof-tops and made wagers as to who would win, the man-elephant (the Buddha) or the animal-elephant (Nālāgiri).

Then the Blessed One penetrated Nālāgiri with a mind of loving-kindness (Nālāgiriṃ mettena cittena phari) and, lowering its trunk (soṇḍam oropetvā), the animal stopped in front of the Buddha who caressed its forehead with his right hand (dakkhīṇena hatthena hatthissa kumbhaṃ parāmasanto), saying:

O elephant, do not attack the Elephant; this attack would be shameful.

There can be no good destiny in the beyond for the one who kills the Elephant.

Flee from drunkenness (mada) and laziness (pamāda); the lazy miss the good destinies.

Act in such a way as to attain a good destiny.

At these words, Nālāgiri gathered the sand-grains covering the feet of the Blessed One in his trunk and spread them on top of its head; then, still kneeling, it backed away, always keeping the Buddha in sight.

It was on this occasion that the people chanted the following stanza (see also Majjhima, II, p. 105; Theragāthā, v. 878):

Some tame them with blows of the stick, with pitchforks or with whips;

With neither stick nor weapon was the elephant tamed by the Great Sage.

2. Jātaka, V, p. 333-337:

The Cullahaṃsajātaka (no. 533) reproduces the preceding source, not without adding numerous details. When the Buddha made his entry into Rājagṛhā, he was accompanied by many monks coming from the eighteen monasteries situated in the neighborhood of the city. Seeing the rush of the elephant, the eighteen great abbots, Śāriputra, etc., suggested that they would tame the animal, but the Buddha refused their offer and asked them to remain in their place. The good Ānanda insisted on staying beside the Blessed One in order to be killed before him, and the Blessed One had to use his magical powers to put him back beside his colleagues.

The sources that follow have it that, at the approach of the elephant, all the arhat monks except for Ānanda fled shamefully, and they will contrast their cowardice with the complete devotion of the preferred disciple. It is possible that this not very edifying incident was part of the original story but that the Pāli texts passed over it in silence so as not to cause any trouble in the Saṃgha. However, the Ceylonese Theravādins were aware of it by way of an indiscretion (?) of the Milindapañha, the Pāli version of an original Prakrit seemingly coming from the north-west of India. In this version (p. 207-208), king Milinda (Menander) asked Nāgasena how it was possible that arhats supposed to be free of all fear took flight before the elephant.

3. Mahīśāsaka Vinaya, T 1431, k. 3, p. 19b24-c26:

This source is very close to the Pāli Vinaya, but here it is King Ajātaśatru himself who urged the mahouts to loose the mad elephant after having made it drunk. All the disciples abandoned the Buddha with the exception of Ānanda.

4 and 5. Kāśmīrian Vinaya, T 1464, k. 5, p. 871c20-872b17; Sarvāstivādin Vinaya, T 1435, k. 36, p. 262a11-263a6: A longer version than the preceding ones. Warned by Devadatta seven days in advance, the mahout watched for the Buddha's coming and was warned of his approach by a series of wonders which are usual when the Blessed One enters the gates (indrakālā) of a city: the elephants trumpet (hastinaḥ kroñcanti), the horses neigh (aśvā heṣante), the bulls bellow (ṛṣabhā garjanti), etc., etc. This is a stock phrase occurring frequently in the texts (Divyāvadāna, p. 250-251; 364-365; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 109; Mahāvastu, I, p. 308). To convert the elephant Dhanapāla, the Buddha entered into the concentration on loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi), caressed its forehead and taught it the Dharma. Finally, for the edification of the crowd who were cheering him, he entered into the concentration of the brilliance of fire (tejodhātusamādhi) and, emitting all kinds of rays, he accomplished the twin miracle (yamakaprātihārya) of water and fire. This miracle, accomplished by the Buddha in other circumstances, is described here in stereotyped terms: see, e.g., Catuspariśatsūtra, p. 318; Divyāvadāna, p. 161; Mahāvastu, III, p. 115-116; Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, I, p. 57.

For the Theravādins, only the Buddhas are able to perform the yamakaprātihārya: it is a privilege they do not share with the śrāvakas: asādhāraṇaṃ sāvakehi (Comm. of the Dhammapada, III, p. 213, l. 18; Jātaka, IV, p. 265, l. 12-13; Visuddhimagga, p. 331, l. 14) and actually, in the Pāli sources, we never see a disciple accomplish this miracle. For the Sarvāstivādins, on the other hand, the yamakaprātihāra is common to the Tathāgata as well as all the śrāvakas: Tathāgatasya sarvaśrāvakasādharaṇā rddhiḥ (Divyāvadāna, p. 161, l. 13; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1451, k. 26, p. 332a27, and in the Sanskrit sources, many disciples accomplish it: Yaśas or Yaśodha (Mahāvastu, III, p. 410, l. 5-10), Kālodāyin (P'ou yao king, T 186, k. 8, p. 534c6-15), Urubilvākāśyapa (Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 38, p. 279b29-c5; Catuspariśatsūtra, p. 348), Panthaka (Divyāvadāna, p. 494, l. 18-23), the five hundred co-sisters of Mahāprajāpati (Ekottara, T 125, k. 50, p. 822a3-9).

- Returning to Dhanapāla, the Kāśmīr Vinaya, l.c., has it that once it was converted, it abstained from eating grass for seven days and, after its death, it was reborn among the Cāturmahārājikas.

6 and 7. Buddhacarita by Aśvaghoṣa (T 192, k. 4, p. 40a2-41b3; E. H. Johnson, The Buddha's Mission and Last Journey, Acta Orientalia, XV, 1937, p. 57-60) and Buddhacarita compiled by Saṃgharakṣa (T 194, k. 2, p. 136a21-c5).

In their poetic tales of the deeds of the Buddha, these two authors, supposedly contemporaries of Kaniṣka, again insist on the miraculous power (prabhāva) of the Buddha's loving-kindness.

II. The subjugation as a miracle of magic.

In his Vie du Buddha, 1949, p. 289, A. Foucher makes the following comment: "Count on the devotees to spoil all the charm (of this episode) while claiming to embellish it. According to the informants of Hiuan-tsang, as also according to the Nepali miniatures and the Chinese drawings, it was the five lions that sprang from the outstretched fingers of Śākyamuni that were charged with keeping the elephant at bay. Neither can the deeds and the mind of the Great Being be basely betrayed nor be exalted."

I [Lamotte] share the indignation of my illustrious teacher, but I am somewhat less severe in respect to the humble cicerones of Rājagṛha who, by informing Hiuan-tsang in this way were only repeating a lesson based on a long literary tradition.

Indeed, there are numerous texts that have it that Śākyamuni tamed Dhanapāla, not so much by his spiritual power, but by the brute force of his magic. To support this new version of the facts, it sufficed for them to use a banal cliché in the words of which the Blessed One tamed wild animals "by making five hairy maned lions appear, with two masses of fire on the right and on the left and above a huge iron rock" or else a fiery ditch. The cliché often appears in the Sanskrit collections of tales such as the Avadānaśataka, I, p. 331, l. 12-13: Tato bhagavatā purastāt pañca keśariṇaḥ saṭadhārīṇaḥ siṃhā nirmitā vāme dakṣiṇe ca pārśve dvāv agniskandhāv supariṣṭān mahaty ayomayī śīlā.

The sources that exploit this cliché - mostly Sarvāstivādin in origin - do not fail to insist on the flight of the arhats and on Ānanda's devotion; they are also interested in the fate of the elephant after its conversion.

1) Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya. – The episode of Dhanapālaka in its original text appears in the manuscript of the Saṅghabhedavastu (fol. 491b-493b) found by G. Tucci in Pakistan in 1957. He was kind enough to send me [Lamotte] a copy prepared by the care of Prof. Raniero Gnoli, to both of whom I am indebted for their kindness. The essence of the story has been translated into Italian by G. Tucci, Il trono di diamante, 1967, p. 265-266. See also the Chinese translation by Yi-tsing in T 1450, k. 19, p. 197b28-198c6.

At the invitation of a wealthy householder, the Buddha accompanied by five hundred monks went to Rājagṛha. He was challenged from the heights of the ramparts by Ajātaśatru and Devadatta who had plotted his death. The Teacher announced to them that he was going to manifest his marvelous power. When the elephant Dhanapālaka rushed against him, the Blessed One on the palm of his right hand created by magic five maned lions with ribbons on their heads; having smelled their scent, the elephant began to flee, releasing urine and excrement. By virtue of the Blessed One, all the directions in space began to flare up into one great mass of fire with the exception of the spot where the Blessed One was standing where there was perfect calm. After a moment of panic, Dhanapālaka approached the Blessed One slowly and the latter caressed his head with his hand marked with the marks of the wheel and the svastika, a hand resulting from many hundreds of merits and capable of reassuring the frightened. Speaking to the elephant in stanzas, the Buddha reproached him for his past behavior and taught him the three seals of Dharma, sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, etc.

The Buddha then entered into the house of the householder who had invited him. The elephant who was following him tried to enter as well but only succeeded in demolishing the house. The Blessed One changed the house into rock crystal so that the elephant could see him without difficulty.

When the meal was over, the Blessed One left the walls of Rājagṛha to go back to his monastery. Dhanapālaka tried to follow him but was seized by the mahouts (hastidāmaka) and put into iron chains. Thus deprived of the sight of the Buddha, the animal crushed its trunk with its foreleg and died asphyxiated (sa bhagavantam upaśyam pādena śuṇḍām avaṣṭabhya kālagataḥ).

Dhanapālaka was reborn among the Cātummahārājika gods and, in this paradise, went to the Veṇuvana to meet the Buddha again and covered him with flowers. The Blessed One preached the Dharma to him and this 'son of the gods who had been an elephant' (nāgaṇḍurvi devaputrah) saw the noble Truths and obtained the srotaāpattiṭṭhala.

2) Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 83, p. 429a12-b2:

On the invitation of a vaiśya, accompanied by a crowd of monks, the Blessed One came down from Gr̥dhraṇṇaparvata and went to Rājagṛha. King Ajātaśatru, instigated by Devadatta, loosed the mad drunken elephant Dhanapāla against him. The Tathāgata extended his right hand and, from the ends of his five fingers, there sprang forth five lions. At the sight of them, the elephant looked about, took fright and fled. At once the Buddha created magically a deep ditch five hundred cubits in width. Seeing this, the astonished elephant looked from right to left, but from right to left the Buddha magically created high walls ready to collapse. The panic-stricken elephant then looked upward, but the Buddha created magically in the air a huge flaming rock threatening to fall down. Seeing this, the terrified elephant looked everywhere, but the Buddha everywhere magically created burning fires. Only near the Buddha was there any coolness and calm. (tato bhagavatā dakṣiṇe karatale pañca siṃhāḥ kesariṇaḥ paṭṭadhāriṇo ... pādamaṇḍalāṃ śantaṃ śāntibhūtaṃ adhiṣṭhitaṃ). . The elephant awoke from its drunkenness, approached slowly and the Buddha made the five lions disappear. The elephant rubbed the Buddhas feet with its trunk, the Buddha caressed its forehead and, borrowing the language of elephants, preached the Dharma to it: sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, etc.

Dhanapāla became disgusted with its animal destiny and abstained from eating and drinking. He died and was reborn among the Trāyastriṃśa gods. Remembering the benefits of the Buddha, he went to him: the Blessed One preached him the Dharma and the new god saw the four noble Truths.

[For the punishment of the flaming wheel of fire (jvalitānalaṃ cakram āyasam) armed with double-edged swords (asidharam) turning above the head of the guilty, see the legend of Maitrakanyaka (Maitrāyājña) in Divyāvadāna, p. 605; Mahākarmavibhaṅga, ed. S. Lévi, p. 54; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 202, etc.]

3) Ekottarāgama, T 125, k. 9, p. 590a8-591a7:

The Buddha was at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Veṇuvana and was expecting to go the next day into the city on his begging-round. Devadatta proposed to king Ajātaśatru to loose the fierce elephant Nālāgiri against him. The king agreed and proclaimed that the animal would be loosed the next day and that consequently traffic in the city would be forbidden. Devadatta commented to the king that if the Buddha were truly omniscient he would be careful not to leave his monastery.

Buddhist sympathizers went in a crowd to the Veṇuvana; they warned the Buddha of the plot and begged him not to enter the city. The Teacher reassured them: "Let the upāsakas not be worried. The body of the Tathāgata is not an ordinary body. Nothing can harm him." And the Buddha went into a long explanation of cosmography where he described the entire cosmic system from the Caturdvīpaka up to the Trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu. He concluded: "If the Airavaṇa elephants, equal in number to that of all the plants and trees, filled all these universes and came to attack the Tathāgata, they would be unable to shake a single hair on his body. The magic power (ṛddhibala) of the Tathāgata is inconceivable.

The next day, accompanied by five hundred monks, the Buddha went on his alms-round to Rājagṛha. Thousands of myriads of deities came to join him: the four Cātummahārājikadevas (Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Virūdhaka, Virūpakṣa, Vaiśravaṇa), Śakra and Brahmā Devarāja, accompanied by their respective entourages. The fourfold community of Rājagṛha went to welcome him and the sound of their shouts reached the king's ears. When the Buddha entered the city gate, the heaven and the earth trembled and from the skies the deities threw flowers.

However, the elephant Nālāgiri, drunk on arak and holding a sword in its trunk, rushed against the Buddha. The five hundred monks fled headlong and the good Ānanda, not keeping to his place, took refuge behind the Buddha. To the left and right of Nālāgiri, the Buddha made lions appear by metamorphosis, (the number is not given) and behind him, a fiery pit. The animal urinated and dropped excrement, but not finding any way to escape, approached the Buddha who addressed a stanza to it. At once, Nālāgiri dropped the sword, bent its knees, prostrated on the ground and with its trunk, licked the Buddha's feet.

Myriads of men and women were converted by this prodigy. As for the drunken elephant, it contracted the sickness of 'cutting winds' (in Pāli, satthakā vātā), died and was reborn in the palaces of the Cātummahārājakāyikas.

[In the present sūtra, the Ekottarāgama once again betrays its Mahāyāna attachments or interpolations by means of the dizzying perspectives of its cosmogony and the luxuriance of its theophanies.]

III. Late versions

It is not to the texts examined hitherto that the Traité seems to be referring in its brief allusion to the miracle of Rājagṛha, but to shorter and later sources where the original meaning of the miracle of maitrī seems to have become blurred and where the rôle of the individuals is modified noticeably. Henceforth the responsibility for the plot against the Buddha's life rests mainly, no longer on Devadatta, but on king Ajātaśatru. He unleashes not just one elephant (Nālāgiri or Dhanapāla) but a number of elephants, the number of which is usually given as five hundred. In order to tame them, the Buddha magically creates five hundred lions. At the approach of the elephants, the five hundred arhats accompanying the Buddha again take flight, but the good Ānanda, instead of exposing his master, remains nailed in place by fear. Finally king Ajātaśatru, impressed by the magic miracle, excuses himself to the Buddha by placing the blame onto Devadatta.

1) Ta feng pien fo pao ngen king (Chinese translation made under the Heou (Han), T 156, k. 4, p. 147b23-c7:

At that time, a messenger from king Ajātasatru came to invite the Tathāgata. The Buddha and five hundred arhats accepted the king's invitation and entered the city of Rājagṛha. Then the king loosed five hundred drunken elephants. They attacked savagely, breaking trees, upsetting walls and, with loud bellows, they rushed towards the Tathāgata. Seized by great fear, the five hundred arhats flew up into the air and whirled about the Buddha. Ānanda, who was accompanying the Buddha, was so frightened that he could not move. Then by the power of his loving-kindness and compassion, the Buddha raised his right hand from the fingers of which sprang five lions that opened their throats and roared. The five hundred elephants, panic-stricken, fell face down to the ground. Then surrounded by the great assembly, the Tathāgata entered into the king's palace. King Ajātasatru came out respectfully to meet him and begged the Buddha to be seated. When the Buddha sat down, the king asked for pardon and confessed his wrong-doing, saying: Bhagavat, it is not my fault but that of Devadatta. The Buddha said to the king: I too know that well. Devadatta has always wanted to harm me and not just today. Even before this he wanted to hurt me and I saved him by the [power of my loving-kindness and compassion].

2) Fa kiu p'i yu king (Chinese translation mad between 290 and 306), T 211, k. 3, p. 596a5-27 (passage reproduced by Pao-tch'eng of the Ming in the Che kia jou lai ying houa lou: cf. L. Wiegner, Les vies chinoises du Buddha, Cathasia, 1913, p. 139):

This source reproduces the preceding one in substance, but here it is five hundred lions that the Buddha makes appear from his finger-tips. Instigated by Devadatta, Ajātasatru had prevented the inhabitants of Rājagṛha from offering anything at all to the Buddha and the Saṃgha. Not receiving anything, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Subhūti, Prajāpati and their disciples had gone to foreign lands. But the Buddha and his five hundred arhats remained on Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata.

3) Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, k. 8, p. 488c25-489a2: Speaks about the elephant Dhanapāla, but five hundred lions were needed to tame it.

4-5) Fa hien tchouan, T 2085, p. 862c16, and Si-yu ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 920c13-16. During their voyage to Rājagṛha, at the beginning of the 5th and the first part of the 7th century respectively, the two Chinese masters, Fa-hien and Hiuan-tsang, were able to visit the place where the miracle had taken place.

Figurative representations

At Gandhāra: A. Foucher, AgbG, I, p. 189, fig. 74; p. 543, fig. 267-269.

At Swat: G. Tucci, Il trono di diamante, p. 267.

At Amarāvati and at Andhradeśa: A. Foucher, AgbG, II, p. 571, fig. 510, or Revue des arts Asiatiques, V, no. 1, pl. X, 2. – D. Barret, Sculpture of Amarāvati in the British Museum, London, 1954, pl. XIVa. – A. H. Longhurst, The Ninety-six heretics (īrthya) once came together, all claiming to be omniscient (sarvajñamānin). They came to Śrāvastī to debate with the Buddha. Then the Buddha, using the bases of his miraculous powers (ṛddhipāda), sent forth many rays (raśmi) from his navel (nābhi) on each of which there appeared an emanated buddha (nirmitabuddha). The king of the land, Po sseu-ni (Prasenajit), also ordered the heretics to go to the top [of a building] but they were unable to move and still less debate with the Buddha. Seeing the heretics coming as enemies, the Buddha made no movement to turn back and destroyed the heretics. The gods and men redoubled their respect (gurukāra) and veneration (satkāra), but the Buddha felt no attraction.⁷⁷

From all these stories (nidāna), it is evident that when someone wanted to harm him, the Buddha remained impassive. Just as the gold of the Jāmbhū river (jāmbhūnadasuvārṇa) does not change when it is beaten, melted or broken,⁷⁸ so the Buddha undergoes criticism, derision, denigration, slander and debates without moving or changing. This is how we know that the traces of the emotions (kleśavāsānā) have been destroyed in him without residue.

V. WHY THE BUDDHA ELIMINATES THE TRACES

Question. – But the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas likewise, having at their disposal pure wisdom (anāśravajñāna), eliminate the traces of the passions. Is this completely or incompletely?

Answer. – Previously (p. 1761F) I said that the power of their knowledge (jñānabala) is weak and only like ordinary fire, whereas the power of the Buddhas is great and like the [cosmic] fire at the end of the kalpa (kalpoddāha). Here I must repeat myself:

The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have accumulated the qualities (guṇa) [261b] and the knowledges (jñāna) for a short time, one, two or three lifetimes. The Buddha, on the other hand, has cultivated the knowledges and practiced the qualities during innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa); long ago he vaporized the perfume of the good dharma (kuśaladharmā): this is why he no longer has even a trace of kleśavāsānā.

Buddhist Antiquities of Nāgārjunakoṇḍa, MASI, no. 54, 1938, pl. XXXIIb. – T. N. Ramachandran, Nāgārjunakoṇḍa, MASI, no. 71, 1938, pl. VIIA5 (identification doubtful). – Idem, Buddhist Sculptures from a Stūpa near Goli village, Bull. Madras Gov. Museum, I, 1929, pl. IIH.

Stela from Benares, Gupta style, representing the eight Great Miracles: A. Foucher, AgbG, p. 539, fig. 498; Beginnings of Buddhist Art, 1917, pl. XIX. – B. Majumdar, A Guide to Sārnāth, 1937, pl. XIII d.

Stela from Magadha, Pāla style, showing the eight great amiracles: A. Foucher, AgbG, II, p. 545, fig. 500.

Nepali miniatures from the 11th century: A. Foucher, Étude sur l'iconographie bouddhique de l'Inde, I, 1900, pl. X 5.

⁷⁷ For the Great Miracle at Śrāvastī, see references above, p. 531-532F, n.

⁷⁸ Canonical image: compare nekkham jambonadassa of the Anguttara, I, p. 181; II, p. 8, 29.

Moreover, the Buddha has accumulated and exhausted all the qualities to the extent that the traces of passion have been eliminated definitively without residue. <1775> Why? Because the good dharma and qualities make the passions melt. The arhats who have not fully obtained these qualities eliminate only their desire for the world (lokatṛṣṇā) and enter directly into nirvāṇa.

Finally, the Buddha has cut the fetters (saṃyojana) and the power of his knowledge (jñānabala) is very sharp (tīkṣṇa). He utilizes the ten powers (daśabala) like a great knife and his unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid) are superior. This is why he cuts the fetters completely and without residue.

When a man has committed a serious wrong-doing, the king, who is very angry, massacres his descendants down to the seventh generation so that there is nobody left. In the same way, the Buddha tears up and eradicates these powerful enemies that are the conflicting emotions so that there is nothing left.

This is why [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] says here that [the bodhisattva] who wants to destroy the traces of passion by means of the knowledge of all the aspects should exert himself in the perfection of wisdom.

VI. WHERE THE DESTRUCTION OF THE TRACES IS LOCATED

Question. – Is destroying the traces (vāsanāprahaṇa) also eliminating the passions (kleśacchedana)?

1. Report on and criticism of four wrong theories

[First theory: Destruction of the passions and destruction of the traces are simultaneous.] – Some say: When the passions (kleśa) are cut, the traces (vāsanā) disappear at the same time and, as has been said above, the traces disappear without residue. But the arhats and pratyekabuddhas cut just the passions and do not cut the traces whereas the Bodhisattva cuts all the passions and their traces which are eliminated without residue.

[Second theory: The passions are cut at the time of the Bodhisattva's meeting with the buddha Dīpaṃkara, at the end of the second asaṃkhyeyakalpa.] – Others say: already, The Buddha has long ago withdrawn from the desires (rāga). Thus the Buddha said: “When I saw the buddha Ting-kouang (Dīpaṃkara), I had already eliminated the desires.”⁷⁹ Therefore it was by the power of his salvific skillful means (upāya) <1776> that he pretended [later] to take births and deaths, a wife, children and slaves.

[Third theory: Passions and traces are destroyed when anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi is obtained.] - Others say: Starting from the time when the Bodhisattva obtained the certainty that things do not arise (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi)⁸⁰ and he found the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of things, all his passions and all the traces were destroyed.

[Fourth theory: Passions and traces are destroyed the night of the enlightenment.] – Other say: When the [future] Buddha produced the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) for the first time, he had passions, but when he sat down on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimāṇḍa) and during the last watch of the night (paścime yāme), he destroyed all his passions and all the traces.

Question. - Which is the correct theory?

Answer. – All having come from the mouth of the Buddha (kaṇṭhoka), none of them is incorrect. [But they must be interpreted.]

[Criticism of the first theory.] – In the śrāvaka system, the Buddha, by the power of his skillful means (upāya), pretends to assume human qualities: he undergoes birth (jāti), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsā), etc.⁸¹ As no human is born without passions, the Buddha must likewise conform to human qualities and [seem] to have passions. Under the king of trees, first outwardly, he crushed Māra's armies (mārasenā); then inwardly, he destroyed his enemies that are the fetters (saṃyojana). Having destroyed his external and internal enemies, he realized supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi). Everyone, seized by faith, [said to themselves]: “Here is a man who has accomplished great things; therefore we also should realize such things.”

[Criticism of the second and third theories.] – Some tell us: “For a long time already the Buddha is without passion. When he <1777> met the buddha Jan-teng (Dīpaṃkara) or acquired the conviction that things do not arise (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi), he destroyed his passions completely.”⁸² But this is again skillful [261c] means (upāya) to lead bodhisattvas to rejoice. If the bodhisattva [Śākyamuni] had long ago destroyed all his passions, what more did he need to do at the time of his enlightenment (saṃbodhi)?

Question. – But the Buddha has all kinds of things to do. Cutting the fetters (saṃyojanaprahāṇa) is only one. He still has to purify the buddhafields (buddhakṣetrapariśodhana), ripen beings (sattvapariṇāmana), etc., all things that he has not yet done. When he has completely fulfilled all these things, he will be called Buddha.

Answer. – If that is so, why did the Buddha say [at the moment of his enlightenment]: “I have destroyed the fetters: this is my last existence”⁸³? How can a man who no longer has any fetters be reborn?

Question. – When he acquired the conviction that dharma do not arise (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi), he always acquires a body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya)⁸⁴ and becomes transformed.

⁷⁹ In the course of an earlier lifetime, when he was the young brahmācārī Sumedha, Megha or Sumati, the future buddha Śākyamuni met the Buddha Dīpaṃkara and received from him the prediction that he would become buddha. This meeting took place at the end of the second asaṃkhyeyakalpa of his career: cf. p. 248F and n. 2.

⁸⁰ This conviction is definitively acquired in the eighth bodhisattva bhūmi, the Acalā.

⁸¹ Docteric theory advocated by some Hīnayāna schools, especially the Mahāsāṃghikas and their subjects. See Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 690-692.

⁸² See above, p. 983F, the statements put into the mouth of the future Buddha Śākyamuni.

⁸³ Ayaṃ antīmā jāti, n'atthi dāni punabhavo: Vinaya, I, p. 11, etc.

⁸⁴ On the dharmadhātujakāya as opposed to the māṃsakāya, see above, p. 392-393F, 711-712F and notes.

Answer. – As to transformation, it is the rule that first there is a master of emanation (nirmāṭr) and only then an emanation. If [the future Buddha] cut all the fetters (saṃyojana) at the time when he acquires anupattikadharmakṣānti, he would be abandoning his fleshly body (māṃsakāya) at the moment of death and would no longer have a real body. Who then would be transforming? This is how we know that after having acquired anupattikadharmakṣānti, he has not eliminated the fetters.

[Criticism of the fourth theory]. – Furthermore, the śrāvakas say: “The Bodhisattva does not cut the fetters until after he has seated himself on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimanda). This is a serious error. Why? In your system, it is said that the Bodhisattva, after having traveled through the three asaṃkhyeyakalpas [of his career], must travel through a further [additional] hundred <1778> kalpas.⁸⁵ However, even in possession of the knowledge of his former abodes (pūrvanivāsajñāna), he remembers that at the time of the buddha Kiā-chō (Kāśyapa), he was the bhikṣu Yu-to-lo (Uttara) and was already practicing the attributes of the buddhas.⁸⁶ <1779>

⁸⁵ According to the Sarvāstivādins, the career of the bodhisattva involves three asaṃkhyeyakalpas plus a hundred supplementary kalpas during which the bodhisattva accomplishes the acts that produce the thirty-two marks. This theory has been presented on pages 246-255F and refuted on pages 283-397F.

⁸⁶ This Uttara is none other than Śākyamuni himself in one of his earlier lifetimes where the Buddha Kāśyapa had made his prediction. Cf. Mūlasarv. Vin., in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part 4, p. 47, l. 16-18 T 444, k. 2, p. 1030a5-7; Divyāvadāna, p. 347, l. 10-12, (the text of which is corrupt): Bhagavatā Kāśyapena samyakṣambuddhenottaro nāma māṇavo vyākṛto bhaviṣyasi tvam mānava varṣaśatāyūṣi prajāyām Śākyamunir nāma tāthagato ‘rhan samyakṣambuddha iti. – “The blessed perfectly and fully enlightened Kāśyapa made the prediction to a young Brāhman named Uttara: ‘Young man, when the life-span of creatures will be one hundred years, you, under the name of Śākyamuni, will be a tathāgata, saint, fully and completely enlightened’ “.

Here is his story as the Traité will tell it (k. 38, p. 340c23-341a26):

Why did the buddha Śākyamuni, while he was still a Bodhisattva, have criticism and abuse in regard to the buddha Kāśyapa? I have already spoken about this affair above. The dharmakāya bodhisattvas transform themselves in many ways to save beings and sometimes adopt human shapes. They undergo hunger and thirst, cold and heat, old age and death; they have likes and dislikes, anger and joy; they praise and they blame: except for the grave wrong-doings, they commit all the others.

At that time, the bodhisattva Śākyamuni was the younger brother of the buddha Kāśyapa and was called Uttara. The older brother, whose wisdom was ripened, hated chatter; the younger, whose wisdom was incomplete, loved to debate. The people at that time considered the younger brother to be superior.

Later, the older brother left home and attained complete enlightenment; he was called Kāśyapa. The younger brother was the teacher of Kṛkin, king of Jambudvīpa. He had five hundred disciples. He taught the brāhmanical books to these brāhmins for the latter did not like the Buddhist doctrine.

There was at that time a master potter (kumbhakāra) named Nandapāla; he was a disciple of the buddha Kāśyapa; he was devoted to the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla) and held the threefold path. He was the kalyānamitra of the chaplain Uttara for his mind was honest, pure and full of faith.

One day Uttara mounted a golden chariot drawn by four white horses and went out of the city with his disciples. Nandapāla met Uttara on the way, and asked him: “Where are you coming from?” Nandapāla replied

Now, during his practices of austerities (duṣkaracārya), why would he have followed the wrong path [of asceticism] for the duration of six years by eating only one sesame grain (tila) one single grain of rice

“Your older brother has attained anuttarā samyakṣambodhi and I have just come from paying homage to him. You ought to go to see him with me. Let’s go to meet him.”

Uttara said to himself: “If I go to the Buddha, my disciples will mistrust me and will say: ‘From the beginning, you have always been outstanding in your dialectic and your wisdom, and now you are going to pay homage out of family spirit. We certainly won’t follow you.’ ”

However, fearing to miss the chance to see the Buddha, Uttara settled himself in the wisdom bearing on the true nature of things (dharmāṇām dharmatā) and entered into the wisdom using supreme skillful means (anuttarapāya) in order to save his disciples. That is why, out of his mouth, he spoke an insult saying: “How could this man with the shaved head (muṇḍaka) be able to attain sambodhi?”

Immediately, Nandapāla, his kalyānamitra, pretending to be angry, seized him by the head and wrestled him down, saying: “It’s of no use for you to resist.” Then Uttara addressed his disciples, saying: “Things being as they are, I cannot resist.”

Upon this, teacher and disciples together went to the Buddha and, seeing his radiance (prabhālakṣaṇa), their minds were purified. Prostrating to the feet of the Buddha, they sat down to one side. The Buddha preached the Dharma to them as appropriate. Uttara attained innumerable dhāraṇīmukha, and all the samādhimukha opened up for him; the five hundred disciples produced the mind of anuttarā samyakṣambodhi. Uttara arose from his seat and said to the Buddha: “I would like the Buddha to permit me to leave home and become a bhikṣu.” The Buddha said to him: “That’s good. Come!”, and he became a śramaṇa,

Therefore it was out of skillful means (upāya) that Uttara hurled an insult, but it was not really true.

Space may be broken, water may be changed into fire and fire into water, but an ekajātīpratibaddha bodhisattva cannot be angry with a worldly person, still less with a Buddha.

- Elsewhere Uttara mānavaka is designated by the name Jyotipāla or Jyotiṣpāla, while Nandapāla, the potter, is also called Ghaṭikāra. In any case, it is the same jātaka, well known to the canonical and postcanonical sources.

Sanskrit-Chinese sources: Madyamāgama, T 26, k. 12, p. 499a-503a; Mahāvastu, I, p. 317-335; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, k. 11, p. 157a-b; Hing-k’i-hing king, T 197, k. 2, p. 172c-174b.

Pāli sources: Majjhima, II, p. 45-54; Buddhavaṃsa, XXV, v. 10 seq.; Jātaka, I, p. 43; Milindapañha, p. 221-224.

The village where the buddha Kāśyapa gave the prediction to Uttara, alias Jyotipāla, was called Veruḍḍiṅga in Sanskrit, Vebhaṅga in Pāli, but was designated elsewhere as Mārakaraṇḍa. It was on the site of the present Sārṇāth near Benares, and in the 7th century, Hiuan-tsang was still able to visit it. He was shown the exact spot on which the prediction had occurred (cf. Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 7, p. 905c14-18).

A bas-relief at Gandhāra shows Nandapāla (alias Ghāṭikāra) pulling his childhood friend Uttara (alias Jyoyipāla) by the hair to lead him to the buddha Kāśyapa (cf. A. Foucher, AgbG, II, p. 327, fig. 458 above).

(taṇḍula) every day?⁸⁷ The Bodhisattva in his last lifetime (caramabhāvika) cannot be deceived even for a single day; then how would he be so for six years?

It is the same for his reactions of hatred (dveṣa). In times gone by, the Bodhisattva was a venomous snake (āśviṣa); hunters (vyādha, lubdhaka) flayed him without him feeling the least hatred.⁸⁸ How then would he have hated the group of five (pañcavargīya) in his last lifetime?

Thus we know that the śrāvakas interpret the mind of the Buddha wrongly. It is out of skillful means (upāya) that he wanted to destroy the heretics and that he gave himself up to austerities for six years. You claim that he was angry with the group of five: that too is skillful means; these were the traces of passions (kleśavāsanā) and not the passions (kleśa).

2. Report on the correct theory

Now we must speak truthfully. When the Bodhisattva attained the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti),⁸⁹ his passions (kleśa) have already been exhausted, but his traces (vāsanā) have not yet been eliminated. It is as a result of these traces that he assumes [a birth]. Obtaining a body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya), he can transform himself at will. Out of loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) for beings and also in order to fulfill his earlier vows (pūrvapraṇidhāna), he returns to this world to <1781> perfect or acquire yet other Buddha attributes. Once the tenth bhūmi has been completed (paripūrṇa), he sits on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍa) and, by the power of his unhindered liberation (asaṅgavimokṣa), he attains omniscience (sarvajñatā), the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) and destroys the traces of the passions (kleśavāsanā).

3. Criticism of two Mahāyāna theories

⁸⁷ As the Traité has explained above (p. 1512F), if for six years at Uruvilvā, Śākyamuni, in the course of his last existence, gave himself over to the practices of austerity, he did not, however, approve of the pernicious austerity practiced by the heretics. By giving himself over to the insane tortures of mortification, he was in a position to condemn with even more authority the excesses of asceticism as he did in the sermon at Benares.

At Uruvilvā, he began by stopping the inhalation and exhalation and fell into a state close to catalepsy. Then he gave himself over to the most severe fasting, going so far as to finally abstain from all food.

The detail of the grain of sesame seed and the grain of rice given here by the Traité appears in all the sources: see, e.g., Makkhima, I, p.245; Mahāvastu, II, p. 125-129; Lalitavistara, p. 254-255; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, k. 5, p. 121a, etc.

⁸⁸ See the Jātaka of the flayed naga above, p. 853-855F.

The text says simply: ‘the five men’. This concerns evidently the five mendicants, Ājñāta-Kaunḍinya, etc., who had been present at the mortifications of Śākyamuni and who later became the listeners privileged to hear his first sermon. Nevertheless, the Buddha was never irritated with them, even though it were for skillful means.

⁸⁹ The definitive attainment of this kṣānti is realized in the eighth bodhisattva bhūmi.

[First theory: Passions and traces are destroyed simultaneously on the obtaining of anutpattikakṣānti.] – Some Mahāyānists say: “At the moment when the Bodhisattva obtains the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti), all his passions (kleśa) and traces of passion (kleśavāsanā) are destroyed.” This also is wrong. In fact, if were all destroyed, the Bodhisattva would not be different from the Buddha and, furthermore, would not assume a body born from the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya). [262a] Why? Because it is at the moment when the Bodhisattva obtains the anutpattikadharmakṣānti that he abandons his body of birth (janmakāya) and obtains the body born of the fundamental element.

[Second theory: Passions and traces are destroyed simultaneously the night of enlightenment.] – If someone tells us: “The Bodhisattva should be seated on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍa) for all his passions (kleśa) and traces of passion (kleśavāsanā) to be destroyed”, this statement would be wrong as well. Why? If, [at the moment of his enlightenment], the Bodhisattva still retained the three poisons (viṣatraya) [desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha)], how could he have [previously] gathered innumerable Buddha attributes (buddhadharma)? He would be like a poisonous pot from which nobody eats even if it is filled with nectar (amṛta). In fact, the Bodhisattva accumulates the very pure qualities (pariśuddhagūṇa) at the moment when he becomes Buddha. If, [at that moment], he were still mixed with the three poisons, how would he be able to perfect the pure attributes of the Buddhas?

Question. – By contemplating the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of <1782> dharmas and by cultivating the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta), he ‘weakened’ the three poisons and then was able to accumulate the pure qualities.

Answer. – By weakening (tanutva) the three poisons, he could only obtain an existence (ātmabhāva) as a noble chakravartin king or king of the gods (devarāja), but that would be insufficient to acquire the mass of Buddha qualities. It is necessary to destroy the three poisons but not to have eliminated the traces, in order to be able to accumulate the qualities.

Moreover, there is a weakening [of the three poisons] in the person detached from desire (vītarāga) who has destroyed the fetters related to the lower level (avarabhāgīya saṃyojana) but who still keeps the fetters relative to the higher levels (ūrdhvbhāgīya saṃyojana).⁹⁰ There is also weakening [of the three poisons] in the srotaāpanna who has suppressed the fetters to be destroyed by the seeing of the truths (satyadarśanaheya saṃyojana), but has not suppressed the fetters to be destroyed by meditation ⁹⁰ There are ten saṃyojana. Five are avarabhāgīya “favorable to the lower part”, i.e., to Kāmadhātu; these are: i) the belief in the individual (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi), ii) the unjustified belief in the efficacy of observances and rituals (śīlavrataparāmarśa), iii) doubt (vicikitsā), iv) love of pleasure (kāmacchanda), v) maliciousness (vyāpāda). Five are ūrdhvbhāgīya ‘favorable to the higher part’, i.e., to rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu; these are: i) desire for the form realm (rūparāga), ii) desire for the formless realm (arūparāga), iii) pride (māna), iv) excitement (auddhatya), v) ignorance (avidyā). See Saṃyutta, V, p. 61, 69; Anguttara, V, p. 17; Kośa, V, p. 84-87.

The saint who has destroyed the five avarabhāgīya has simply ‘weakened’ and not ‘destroyed’ the three poisons (viśa) or the three bonds (bandhana), namely, rāga, dveṣa and moha.

(bhāvanāheya saṃyojana).⁹¹ Finally, as the Buddha said: “One is sakrdāgāmin by means of the destruction of three fetters, desire, hatred and delusion (rāgadveṣamohānāṃ ca tanutvā).”⁹² But <1783> [in order to accumulate the Buddha attributes, it is not enough] to weaken [the three poisons] as you have said; they must be destroyed.

Thus, at the moment when the Bodhisattva obtains the conviction that dharma do not arise (anupattikadharmakṣānti), he destroys the passions (kleśān prajahāti), and at the moment when he becomes buddha, he destroys the traces of passion (kleśavāsanāḥ prajahāti): this is the correct theory.

Fourth Section ENTERING INTO THE ASSURANCE OF BODHISATTV

As the Traité is going to explain, here the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is trying to draw a parallel between the path of the bodhisattva and that of the śrāvaka of which the Sarvastivādin-Vaibhāṣika school had carefully laid out the stages. Once again we notice the considerable influence exerted by this school on the earliest Mahāyāna writers.

1. In the course of the preparatory path (prayogamārga), the śrāvaka, trained in the practice of the smṛtyupasthāna, cultivates the four wholesome roots favorable to penetration into the four noble Truths (nirvedhabhāgīya kuśalamūla): these are the heats (ūṣmagata), the summits (mūrdhan), the acquiescences (kṣānti) and the supreme worldly dharma (laukikāgradharma). The old canonical texts make no mention of them, but the Sarvastivādin Abhidharma attaches great importance to them (Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 34, p. 175b7; k. 65, p. 338c3; k. 127, p. 662c13; k. 176, p. 884a16-17; Abhidharmaśāra, T 1550, k. 2, p. 818b; Samyuktābhidharmaśāra, T 1552, k. 5, p. 910a; Abhidharmāmṛtarasa, T 1553, k. 1, p. 972c-973a; k. 2, p. 976b; Kośa, p. 163-177.). These four roots of good, each of which includes a weak, medium and strong degree, have as object the four noble truths and take their sixteen aspects (cf. p. 641F, 1179F). These are right views (samyakdrṣṭi), wisdoms (prajñā), in constant progression, but impure (sāsrava) wisdoms, of mundane order, which still involve traces of errors, e.g., the concept of self. The śrāvaka who practices them is still a worldly person (prthagjana).

⁹¹ In possession of the first fruit of the Path, the srotaāpanna has destroyed the first three avarabhāgīya (satkāyadrṣṭi, śīlavrataparāmārśa and vicikitsā), in the sense that during the Darśanamārga that he has just traversed, he has abandoned a certain type of kleśa – the kleśa of ‘wrong view’, called avastuka – plus certain rāga immediately related to wrong view. But he still has to traverse the Bhāvanāmārga and eliminate the fetters to be destroyed by meditation (bhāvanāheya). Therefore he has ‘weakened’ the three poisons but not eliminated them completely.

⁹² In possession of the second fruit of the Path, the sakrdāgāmin has made some progress over the preceding. By means of the Darśanamārga, he has destroyed the first three avarabhāgīya; by means of the beginning of the Bhāvanāmārga, he has abandoned six categories of kleśa of kāmadhātu. He must still abandon three categories of kleśa of kāmadhātu plus all the kleśa that hold him tied to rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu. He too is far from having destroyed the three poisons completely.

This is the meaning of the canonical formula cited here by the Traité: Tiṇṇaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayā rāgadosamohānaṃ tanuttā sakadāgāmi hoti, sakid eva imaṃ lokam āgantvā dukass’ antaṃ karoti. It occurs in Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92, 93, 200, 201, 252; III, p. 107, 132; Majjhima, I, p. 34, 226, 465; III, p. 80; Samyutta, V, p. 357, 378; Anguttara, I, p. 232; II, p. 89, 238; IV, p. 380. – Sanskrit formula in Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 166; Divyāvadāna, p. 533-534 (with a lacuna).

The first two roots, heats and summits, are not fixed (cala) because the ascetic may fall back from them: there is falling from the summits (mūrdhabhyaḥ pāta) when the śrāvaka becomes distracted from the contemplation of the truths by wrong judgments (Jñānaprasthāna, T 1544, k. 1, p. 918c25-919a1; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 6, p. 27a29-c4: passages translated in Hobogirin, IV, p.346, s.v. Chōda). <1784>

The śrāvaka goes through the supreme worldly dharma in the Path of seeing (darśanamārga) of the four noble Truths: suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha) and the path (mārga) of its cessation. The full light rises up in him and he has the clear understanding of it (abhisamaya). It is now a matter of a pure (anāsrava) prajñā, supramundane (lokottara), free of any error (viparyāsa). Suddenly the ascetic sees purely the truth of suffering relative to dharma of the desire realm (kāmadhātu). This first moment is followed by fifteen others which complete the pure seeing of the truths relative to the three realms of desire, subtle matter (rūpadhātu) and the formless (ārūpadhātu). The Traité has already alluded to these sixteen mind-moments (cf. p. 130F, n. 1; 214F; 1067F, n. 1; 1411F, n. 2; 1478-1480F). In the first one the śrāvaka ceases to be a worldly person (prthagjana) and becomes an ārya, a candidate for the first fruit of the religious life (prathamaphalapratipannaka). This first moment also constitutes entry into samyaktvaniyāma (in Pāli, sammattaniyāma), entry into the positions of salvation or, as L. de La Vallée Poussin translates it (Kośa, III, p. 137; VI, p. 181), entry into this ‘absolute determination of the acquisition of salvation’. In his introduction to the edition of the Bodhisattvabhūmi, Leipzig, 1930, p. 28-31), U. Wogihara has dedicated a learned note to this expression to which de La Vallée Poussin has also added.

In the words of a canonical sūtra cited by the Kośabhāṣya, p. 157, samyaktva is the cessation of all the passions (sarvakleśaprahāna), i.e., nirvāṇa; for the Commentary to the Samyutta, II, p. 346, it is ariyamagga, the path of the āryas, in this case the path of the pure seeing of the Buddhist Truths. Samyaktva, salvation, is opposed to mithyātva, perdition, the falling into the bad destinies. In principle, the āryas are destined to samyaktva, whereas those guilty of misdeeds of immediate retribution (ānantaryakārin) are destined to mithyātva (Kośa, III, p. 137).

The term niyāma is difficult because the Sanskrit and Pāli texts spell it in three different ways: niyāma, niyama and nyāma, for which the Tibetan and Chinese versions propose distinct translations (cf. Mahāvvyut., no. 6500-6502).

1. Niyāma, position, determination, is a noun derived from the root ni-yam, and appears alone or in composition in many sources:

niyāma in Suttanipāta, p. 9. I. 14; Anguttara, I, p. 121, I. 27; Kathāvatthu, p. 317, I. 2; 480, I. 2; Daśabhūmika, p. 63, I. 14.

niyāmagata in Saṃyutta, I, p. 196, l. 17; Niyāmagama, Kathāvatthu, p. 307, l. 24.

niyāmadassī in Suttanipāta, p. 65, l. 5.

niyāmāvakrānti, in Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 75, l. 3; avakrāntaniyāma, in Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 270, l. 4.

bodhisattvaniyāma, in Pañcaviṃśati, p. 107, l. 8; Daśabhūmika, p. 11, p. 27.

samyaktvaniyāma, in Kośabhāṣya, p. 350, l. 6; Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 131, l. 10; sammāttaniyāma, in Saṃyutta, III, p. 225, l. 18.

Niyāma is given as ñes par hgyur ba in Tibetan, as kiue-ting ‘determination, fixation’ in Chinese. Kumārajīva always gives samyaktvaniyāma – and undoubtedly also samyaktvanyāma – as tcheng-wei, ‘correct position’ (cf. T 223, p. 381a26; 405c24; T 1509, p. 192c12; 262c3), whereas Hsuan-tsang, who <1785> carefully distinguishes it from samyaktvanyāma, gives it as tcheng-kiue-ting ‘position in uprightness’ (cf. T 1558, p. 121b5; T 1562, p. 683a17).

2. Niyama, less frequent than niyāma, has exactly the same meaning and is also derived from the root ni-yam. It is usually rendered in Tibetan by ñes pa, ‘determination’ and not by mi hgyur ba, ‘non-transformation’ as proposed by Mahāvīrya, no. 6500. Niyama is just a grammatical variant of niyāma as Kośavyākhyā, p. 541 explains it: Tatra niyamo niyāma iti. tatra samyaktve niyama ekāntibhāvaḥ. niyāmaiti ghaṇī rūpam. api tu niyama iti yamaḥ samupaniviṣu cety apratyayaṣya vibhāṣitatvāt. – “Here, niyama is niyāma. The niyama of salvation is the absolute (ekāntibhāva) determination to salvation. To say niyāma is to apply [the suffix] ghaṇī, but we also say niyama when we opt for the rule [of Pāṇini, III, 3, 63]: Yamaḥ samupaniviṣu ca: [the suffix ap is in conjunction with ghaṇī] after the root yam preceded by the prefixes sa-, upa-, ni-, vi-.”

3. Nyāma (sometimes wrongly corrected to nyāya in the editions at our disposal) seems itself to be an erroneous spelling for niyāma or niyama. It occurs often in the Sanskrit texts: cf. Lalita, p. 31, l. 20; 34, l. 10; Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 679, l. 6; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 11; 66, l. 15; 119, l. 6; 182, l. 20; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 67, l. 11; 272, l. 8; 486, l. 4; 489, l. 3; Gaṇḍhavyūha, p. 320, l. 22; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 358, l. 2; Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 171, l. 22.

An imaginary etymology proposed by the Indian writers themselves has modified the meaning profoundly. According to them, nyāma would come from ni-āma and would mean ‘absence of coarseness’ in the proper sense and ‘absence of error’ in the figurative sense. Hence the Tibetan translation skyon med pa ‘absence of error’ and the Chinese translation li cheng ‘absence of coarseness’. In the texts of the Greater and of the Lesser Vehicle as well, Hsuan-tsang often comes upon the expression samyaktvanyāma and translates it faithfully and invariably by tcheng song li cheng, ‘correctness abandonment of coarseness’ (cf. T 1545, p. 7a3, 8c27, 13a2; T 220, vol. VII, p. 7c26, 19a21, 44b3).

For the Sarvāstivādin, āma, ‘coarsenesses, defects’, are the passions to be abandoned by seeing (darśanaheyakleśa), the belief in the individual (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi), the quality of the worldly person (pr̥thagjana), etc.; ny-āma, ‘rejection of coarsenesses’, is the path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga) that makes one go beyond these coarsenesses, which transforms the pr̥thagjana śrāvaka into an ārya and destines him for nirvāṇa: see Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 3, p. 13; Kośa, VI, p. 181, note.

For the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, the samyaktvaniyāmāvakrānti leading to nirvāṇa is exclusively the work of a prajñā - made possible by śīla and maintained by samādhi – bearing upon the four noble Truths. For the Mahāyānists, the bodhisattvaniyāmāvakrānti, as we will see, opens up perspectives far more vast.

The śrāvaka aspires to arhathood, to nirvāṇa, in order to realize his own benefit (svahita); the bodhisattva aspires to supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi), to buddhahood, in order to assure his own benefit and that of others (parahita). The bodhisattva differs from the śrāvaka on two points: he tends toward a higher goal and is inspired by altruistic concerns..

To attain his ideal, he must practice the six perfections of his state (pāramitā) <1786> and convert beings (sattvaparipācana) over the course of a long career. The latter consists of ten stages or levels (bhūmi) to which the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra later will dedicate a lengthy section (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 214, l. 6 – 225, l. 19; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1454, l. 1 – 1473, l. 18). It is content to enumerate them; only later did other Mahāyānasūtras, notably the Daśabhūmika, give each a name.

The Mahāyānist thinkers tried very early to establish a parallel between the path of the śrāvakas and that of the bodhisattvas. After many attempts, they came to a coherent account where they distinguished five phases in the respective careers of the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and bodhisattvas: 1) a path of accumulating of merit (saṃbhāramārga), 2) a preparatory path (prayogamārga), 3) a path of seeing (darśanamārga), 4) a path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga), 5) a final path excluding any practice (śaikṣamārga). A succinct account of this comparative study may be found in the remarkable paper of E. Obermiller, The Doctrine of Prajñāpāramitā as exposed in the Abhisamayālaṃkāra of Maitreya, Acta Orientalia, XI, 1932, p. 1-133.

Here the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra envisages only the preparatory path and the path of seeing, the major importance of which has not escaped it.

1. The four wholesome roots favorable to penetration (nirvedhabhāgīya kuśalamūla), the heats, etc., constituting the preparatory path of the śrāvakas find their place in the preparatory path of the bodhisattvas as will clearly be shown in the subtitles introduced into the version of the Pañcaviṃśati intentionally revised to serve as commentary to the Abhisamayālaṃkāra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, ed. N. Dutt, p. 119, l. 11-145, l. 19). But whereas the śrāvaka concentrates on the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) of the aggregates – impermanence (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), emptiness (śūnya) and non-self (anātman) – the bodhisattva disregards these distinctions and focuses on the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇāṃ dharmatā) free of arising and cessation.

Every candidate who has attained the second of the four wholesome roots, namely, the summits (mūrdhan), can still retrogress from it. As we will see, the śrāvaka falls back from the summits when he ceases to contemplate the general characteristics of things and allows himself to be drawn into mental ranting (ayoniśo manaskāra). The bodhisattva falls from the summits when, hypnotized by the general characteristics of things, he loses the view of their true nature, non-arising and non-cessation. In this case, he is not reduced to the level of the śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas but he cannot accede to the definitive position (niyāma) of the bodhisattva.

In the following pages, the Traité will compare with the four nirvedhabhāgiya kuśalamūla of the śrāvakas a fourfold practice (caryā): 1) the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), 2) carrying out practices (caryābhāvanā or caryāpratipatti), i.e., the practice of the six perfections (pāramitā), 3) great compassion (mahākaruṇā), 4) skillful means (upāyakaūśalya) to convert beings. Only the second of these four points constitutes a ‘practice’ in the proper sense of the word.

From other sources, we know that the bodhisattva who has produced the mind of awakening begins his career only on entering the preparatory path extending over the first seven bhumis.

During the first six, the bodhisattva simultaneously cultivates the six pāramitās <1787> but especially generosity (dāna) in the first, morality (śīla) in the second, patience (kṣānti) in the third, exertion (vīrya) in the fourth, meditation (dhyāna) in the fifth and wisdom (prajñā) in the sixth. But this wisdom is not that of the śrāvakas bearing upon the aspects of the noble Truths; it is a Mahāyānist wisdom for which the true nature of things is emptiness (śūnyatā), the non-arising (anutpāda) of dharmas. The bodhisattva who limits his efforts ceases to think, speak and act and is of no use to beings.

Thus, in the seventh bhūmi, animated by great compassion for beings, the bodhisattva resorts to skillful means to convert beings: this upāyakaūśalya is the dominant quality of the seventh bhūmi (cf. Daśabhūmika, p. 69, l. 6-7; Saṃgraha, p. 207; Siddhi, p. 623).

In conclusion, the prajñā of the bodhisattva is necessarily increased by upāyakaūśalya which is sorely lacking in the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha.

2. From the preparatory path, the śrāvaka penetrates into the path of pure seeing of the truths and at once is placed in the position of salvation (samyaktvaniyāma): he ceases to be an ordinary person (prthagjana) and becomes an ārya, with the certainty of some day reaching nirvāṇa. In a parallel manner, when the bodhisattva passes from the seventh to the eighth bhūmi, he enters into the ‘position of the bodhisattva’ (bodhisatvaniyāma) also called ‘rightful or legal position’ (dharmaniyāma). In his case and without exception, it is no longer a matter of position of salvation (samyaktva), for it is not nirvāṇa that is assured for him, but rather the state of Buddha, this supreme complete enlightenment that excludes the seeing of beings (sattva) and things (dharma) but at the same time being allied with great loving-kindness and great compassion.

In the pages that follow, the Traité sets forth up to seven definitions of the bodhisatvaniyāma, but it is far from exhausting the subject.

a. Primarily, this niyāma is characterized by the definitive attainment (pratilābha, pratilambha, pratilambatā) of the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) or, as the Vajracchedikā explains, p. 58, l. 9, the conviction regarding dharmas without self and without birth (nirātmakeṣu anutpattikeṣu dharmeṣu kṣāntiḥ). Most texts place this final conviction in the eighth bhūmi, which later will be called Acalā (cf. Daśabhūmika, p. 64, l. 5; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 122, l. 2; 131, l. 17; Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 105, l. 11; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 350, l. 27; 351, l. 13-14).

b. The acquisition of this kṣānti is accompanied by the great prediction (mahāvyaākaraṇa) about the final triumph of the bodhisattva: cf. Lalitavistara, p. 35, l. 21; Daśabhūmika, p. 71, l. 24; Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 266, l. 1-2; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 20, l. 15; 141, l. 27; 166, l. 12; Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 190, l. 18; 192, l. 1.

c. From now on, the bodhisattva is assured of his future buddhahood: niyatipatito bhavati buddhatve (Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 190, l. 20); niyato bhavaty anuttarāyāṃ samyaksaṃbodhau (Sūtrālamkāra, p. 83, l. 24); ṭṭīyanīyatipātāpatito bhavati (Bodh. bhūmi, p. 367, l. 12). – As a result, he is without regression (avaivartika), in possession of an irreversible conviction (avaivartikakṣāntipratilabdha: Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 259, l. 13). Thus the eighth bhūmi, the Acalā, is also called Niyatabhūmi, ‘determined level’ (Bodh. bhūmi, p. 367, l. 11), Avivartyabhūmi, Avivartanīyabhūmi, Avaivartikabhūmi, ‘Irreversible level’ (Daśabhūmika, p. 71, l. 12; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 176, l. 22; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 235, l. 18). It marks the beginning of the irreversible career (avaivartacaryā, avivartanacaryā), of the <1788> infallible career (abandhyacaryā) which will be pursued in the last three bhumis (cf. Mahāvastu, I, p. 1, l. 3; 63, l. 13-14; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 290, l. 21).

d. Starting from this eighth bhūmi, the bodhisattva’s activity is practiced spontaneously, effortlessly, for it is no longer disturbed by objects and notions: this is why it is called anabhisamskāranābhogavihāra or anābhoganīrmitavihāra (Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 105, l. 18-21; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 178, l. 3; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 367, l. 11; Saṃgraha, p. 202).

e. The bodhisattva strips off his fleshly body of birth-death (cyutyupapadamamsakāya) and takes on a body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya): under various transformations, he is established in the universes, travels in and adorns the buddhafiels and converts beings (cf. p. 392-393F, 711-712F and notes).

f. As we have seen in the preceding section, it is at the moment when the bodhisattva, having entered into niyāma, when he makes the turn-about (vivarta) definitively acquires anutpattikadharmakṣānti, that he is already saṃbodhiprāpta “in possession of perfect enlightenment”. However, this enlightenment does not bring about the complete destruction of the traces of conflicting emotions (kleśavāsana): this results from the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākāraṇajñatā) to which the bodhisattva accedes on the tenth level and which makes him like a Tathāgata (cf. p. 1780-1781F).

This brief summary far from exhausts all the virtues of the bodhisatvaniyāma coinciding with the bodhisattva’s entry into the eighth bhūmi. This, even more than the tenth level, constitutes the great victory of the bodhisattva where prajñā and upāya are perfectly balanced.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 11-12; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 67, l. 11-13).

- Moreover, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to enter into the position of bodhisattva must exert himself in the perfection of wisdom (punar aparaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena bodhisatvaniyāṃ avakramitukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

I. POSITION OF BODHISATTVA

1. The bodhisattvaniyāma ‘position of bodhisattva’ is the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti).⁹³ <1789> Having obtained this conviction in regard to dharmas, the bodhisattva considers the whole world as empty (śūnya) and his mind has no longer any further attachment (abhiniveśa). Settled on the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, the bodhisattva no longer loves the world.

2. Furthermore, the bodhisattvaniyāma is the concentration [visualizing the Buddhas] of the present (pratyutpannasamādhi).⁹⁴ In possession of this concentration of the present, the bodhisattva sees all the ⁹³ From this equation it results that the bodhisattvaniyāma occurs in the eighth bhūmi. In fact, the anutpattikadharmakṣānti (cf. Vjracchedikā, p. 58, l. 9: nirātmakeṣu anutpattikadharmeṣu kṣāntiḥ) or the conviction that dharmas are without self and do not arise, occurs in three stages during the bodhisattva’s career: it may be a purely verbal conviction (ghoṣānuga), preparatory (anulomikī) and finally be definitively acquired (pratilabdā): cf. Samādhirāja, ed. N. Dutt, I, p. 76-82; Avataṃsaka, T 279, k. 44, p. 232b9; Sukhāvatīvyūha, p. 112, l. 12-13; Dhyānasamādhisūtra, T 614, k. 2, p. 285a-b; Maṇuṣyendraprajñāpāramitā, T 245, k. 1, p. 826b23-24.

1. At the beginning in the first five bhūmis, the bodhisattva accepts the idea of the non-arising of dharmas, but it is only adhimukti, belief, agreement, verbal professing (ghoṣānuga): he is not in definitive possession of the conviction. Cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 856, l. 25: bodhisattvāḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ carantaḥ sarvadharmā anutpattikā ity adhimuñcanti na ca tāvad anutpattikadharmakṣāntipratilabdā bhavanti.

2. In the sixth bhūmi (Abhimukhī), examining emptiness of dharmas in every way, he possesses an intense preparatory conviction (anulomikī kṣānti), but has not yet made his entry into the real anutpattikadharmakṣānti. Cf. Daśabhūmika, p. 47, l. 17: sa evaṃsvabhāvān sarvadharmān pratyavekṣamāno ‘nusrjann anulomayann avilomayan śraddadhann abhiyan pratiyann avikalpayann anusaran vyavalokayan pratipadyamānaḥ, ṣaṣṭhīm abhimukhīm bodhisattvabhūmim anuprāpnoti tīkṣṣyānulomikyā kṣāntiā. na ca tāvad anutpattikakṣāntimukham anuprāpnoti.

Finally, the bodhisattva ‘obtains’ (pratilabhate: cf. Sad. puṇḍ., p. 266, l. 1; 437, l. 1; Lalitavistara, p. 36, l. 9; 440, l. 21) the anutpattikadharmakṣānti. This is what is called the definitive obtaining (pratilābha, pratilambha, pratilambhā) of kṣānti.

According to most sources, this attainment is realized in the eighth bhūmi, the Acāla: cf. Daśabhūmika, p. 64, l. 5; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 122, l. 2; 131, l. 17; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 350, l. 27; Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 105, l. 11.

At this third stage of the kṣānti, the bodhisattva enters into ‘the position of bodhisattva’ (bodhisattvaniyāma).

⁹⁴ Pratyutpannabuddhasaṃmukhāvasthasamādhi, ‘concentration where the Buddhas of the present appear face to face’. It is the object of a sūtra of the same name (T 418), first translated in 179 by Tche Tch’an and Tchou Fo-cho. It has already been noted above, p. 245F, 425F, 430F, 526F, 1023F, and the Tratité will return to it below, p. 276a. Although the great bodhisattva samādhis are located in the tenth bhūmi, the Tratité here places the Pratyutpannasamādhi in the eighth; the Śūrangamasamādhi, transl. p. 163, does the same. On the other hand, the Daśabhūmika, p. 82, l. 14-15, assigns it to the tenth.

Buddhas of the ten directions of the present, hears the Dharma preached by these Buddhas and cuts the net of his doubts (saṃśayaajāla): henceforth the mind of the bodhisattva comes to a standstill. This is called bodhisattvaniyāma.

3. Furthermore, there is bodhisattvaniyāma when the bodhisattva, fully endowed with the six perfections (ṣaṭpāramitāsaṃpanna),⁹⁵ produces the <1790> knowledge of skillful means (upāyajāñāna),⁹⁶ but without becoming fixated on the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas.⁹⁷ He knows it (jānīte) personally and attests it (sākṣātkaroti) personally without depending on the words of another. If Māra in the form of a buddha comes to him, his mind is not disturbed (kāñkṣā) at all.

4. Furthermore, when he enters into the rightful position (dharmaniyāma)⁹⁸ of bodhisattva, he takes the name of non-regressing bodhisattva (avaivartika or avinivartanīya).⁹⁹

5. Furthermore, the bodhisattva who has entered into this rightful position does not regress to the rank of ordinary person (prthagjana) and is said to be ‘in possession of complete enlightenment’ (saṃbodhiprāpta).¹⁰⁰ All the mundane things that could destroy his mind [of bodhi] cannot disturb him. [262b] He has closed the gates to the three unfortunate destinies (durgati); he is ranked among the bodhisattvas. For the first time he takes birth in the family of the bodhisattvas (bodhisattvakula).¹⁰¹ His wisdom (prajñā) is pure (viśuddha) and ripe (vipaka).

⁹⁵ The bodhisattva cultivates the six pāramitās in the course of the first six bhūmis, generosity predominating in the first, morality in the second, and so on. Cf. Madh. avatāra, p. 23 (transl. Le Muséon, 1907, p. 272); Saṃgraha, p. 207.

⁹⁶ Upāyakaśaṭya is the dominant virtue of the seventh bhūmi: cf. Daśabhūmika, p. 60, l. 6-7; Saṃgraha, p. 207; Siddhi, p. 623.

⁹⁷ Dwelling on the true nature which is the non-arising of everything would be to interrupt the bodhisattva career and to enter nirvāṇa prematurely.

⁹⁸ Here dharmaniyāma is synonymous with bodhisattvaniyāma. The expression has nothing in common, it would seem, with the dhammaniyāmatā, ‘the regularity of phenomena’ of which the canonical sources speak (Saṃyutta, II, p. 25; Anguttara, I, p. 286).

⁹⁹ This is the avaivartika of the eighth bhūmi and not the first: see below, p. 1804F.

¹⁰⁰ In the Vehicle of the śrāvakas, the ascetic who penetrates into the darśanamārga by eliminating all doubt regarding the suffering of kāmādhātu (duḥkhe dharmajāñānakṣānti) was qualified as ārya. Here, the bodhisattva who has entered the darśanamārga by being persuaded of the non-arising of dharmas is called saṃbodhiprāpta ‘in possession of complete enlightenment’. At this stage, śrāvaka and bodhisattva cease being ordinary persons (prthagjana).

¹⁰¹ See below, p. 1919F.

6. Furthermore, the fact of being established on the summits (mūrdhāvasthāna) and not falling from them¹⁰² is called bodhisattvadharmaniyāma. <1791> This is what is said in the Hiue p'in (Śikṣāparivarta):¹⁰³

“The bodhisattva who has entered niyāma does not fall into the evil destinies, is not reborn into lowly families, does not regress to the level of śrāvaka or pratyekabuddha and does not fall back from the summits either.”¹⁰⁴

Question. – What is falling back from the summits (mūrdhabhyaḥ pāta)?

Answer. – As Subhūti said to Śāriputra: “When the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who is without skillful means (anupāyakuśala) but is practicing the six perfections has entered [the concentrations] of emptiness, signlessness and wishlessness, he cannot accede to bodhisattvaniyāma, but neither does he regress to the rank of śrāvaka or pratyekabuddha.”¹⁰⁵ <1792>

¹⁰² In the śrāvaka system, the preparatory path (prayogamārga) consists of the practice of the four wholesome roots favorable to penetration of the four noble Truths (nirvedhabhāgīyakūśalamūla): heats (ūśmagata), summits or heads (mūrdhan), convictions (kṣānti) and supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma).

The ascetic is able to strip away the first two. The summits (mūrdhan) are the highest of the unfixed (cala) roots of good, i.e., from which one may still regress. <1991> Or else, one regresses from the summits (mūrdhabhyaḥ pāta) or one is established on the summits (mūrdhāvasthāna) in order to pass over them by penetrating into the convictions (kṣānti). The Kośabhāṣya, p. 343-344, explains it thus: Ūśmabhyo mūrdhāna utpadyate... yādṛśā ūśmāṇāś cauḥsatyālambanāḥ ṣoḍaśākārāś ca. utkṣṣṭataratvāt nāmāntaram calakuśalamūrdhatvāt mūrdhānaḥ. ebhyo hi pāto 'tikramo vā. – Transl.: From the heats arise the summits. Like the heats, they have as object the four Truths of which they take the sixteen aspects. As a result of their superiority they receive another name and, as they are the summit of the unfixed roots of good, they are called summits. One can fall from these summits or one can also pass over them.

The Prajñāpāramitāsūtra takes inspiration from this system to elaborate a bodhisattva Path. In his progress towards entering into possession (prāpti) of anupattikadharmakṣānti, the bodhisattva can attain certain summits close to this kṣānti, but he may regress from them if he speculates about the nature and characteristics of dharmas: these are non-existent, without arising or ceasing, are not to be wished for. Only the niyāta “determined, predestined” bodhisattva is sheltered from regressing from the summits.

¹⁰³ Chapter VIII of the Pañcaviṃśati, entitled K'iu-an-hiue p'in (Śikṣāparivarta) in Kumārajīva's translation (T223, k. 3, p. 232c), Jou-li-cheng p'in (Nyāmāvakrānti) in that of Hiuan-tsang (T 220, vol. VII, p. 43a).

¹⁰⁴ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 118, l. 14-119, l. 2, amended by the Chinese versions (T 223, k. 3, p. 233a24-26; T 220, vol. VII, k. 408, p. 43c21-24): Niyāmāvakrānto bodhisattvo mahāsattvo nāpayeṣūpapadyate na hīnakuleṣūpapadyate na ca śrāvakabhūmiṃ vā na ca pratyekabuddhabhūmiṃ vā patati na ca mūrdhabhyaḥ patati.

¹⁰⁵ Here the Traité is faithfully reproducing the Chinese translation of the Pañcaviṃśati (T 223m k. 3, p. 233a29-b3).

However, as I [Lamotte] have noted (p. 1785F), several Sanskrit versions, followed by the Chinese translators have here adopted the reading nyāma ‘absence of coarseness’ (in Chinese, li-cheng) in preference to

He becomes attached (abhinivīṣate) to the qualities (guṇa) and the attributes; in the five aggregates (skandha) he grasps the characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇāti) of impermanence (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), emptiness (śūnya), non-self (anātman) and attaches his mind to them; he says: “This is the Path, that is not the Path; this should be practiced, that should not be practiced.” When he grasps such characteristics in this way <1793> and makes such distinctions (vikalpa), the bodhisattva has “fallen from the summits” (mūrdhabhyaḥ patitah).

What is it to become established on the summits (mūrdhāvasthāna)? As is said in the passage mentioned above, it is to destroy the thirst for dharmas (dharmatrṣṇāprahāṇa),¹⁰⁶ and to no longer grasp these dharmas for which thirst has been destroyed.

Thus it is said in the explanation of mūrdhāvasthāna: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva cultivating the perfection of wisdom does not see the emptiness of the external bases in the emptiness of the internal bases; he does not see the emptiness of the internal bases in the emptiness of the external bases; he does not see the emptiness of the internal and external bases in the emptiness of the external bases; he does not see the niyāma ‘position, determination’ (in Chinese, wei), and by āma, ‘coarseness’ (in Chinese, cheng), they mean dharmatrṣṇā, thirst, attraction to things.

Pañcaviṃśati, ed. N.Dutt, p. 119, l. 4-9: Yadāyusman Śāriputra bodhisattvo mahāsattvo 'nupāyakuśalāḥ ṣaṭsu pāramitāsu carann ... ucyate bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya dharmatrṣṇā.

Śatasāh., ed. P. Ghosa, p. 485, l. 18-486, l. 7: Yadāyusman Śāradvatiputra bodhisattvo mahāsattvo 'nupāyakuśalena ṣaṭsu pāramitāsu carati ... ucyate bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya dharmatrṣṇā.

Transl. – Venerable Śāriputra, when the bodhisattva-mahāsattva unskilled in skillful means practices the six perfections, and when, without skill in skillful means, he penetrates the concentrations of emptiness, signlessness and wishlessness, then he does not fall to the level of śrāvaka or that of pratyekabuddha, but neither does he accede to the absence of coarseness (ny-āma) of the bodhisattva. This is called the coarseness of the summits in the bodhisattva... By coarseness (āma), O Śāriputra, is meant thirst for things.

– In brief, the bodhisattva who practices the six pāramitās and the three vimokṣamukhas, but forgets skillful means (upāyakuśalya), does not fall to the level of śrāvaka or pratyekabuddha, but neither does he accede to the bodhisattvaniyāma. The summits (mūrdhan) to which he has climbed are not free of coarseness (āma) because he retains the dharmatrṣṇā. This coarseness of the summits (mūrdhāma) which the bodhisattva does not succeed in passing over constitutes, in fact, a regression from the summits (mūrdhabhyaḥ pāta).

This appears clearly in the translation made by Hiuan-tsang (T 220, vol. V, k. 36, p. 200c14-18; vol. VII, k. 408, p. 43c26-44a1): If the bodhisattva without possessing skill in skillful means (upāyakuśalya) practices the six pāramitās, if without skill in skillful means he becomes established in the three gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha), then he steps backward and falls [note here the absence of negation!] to the level of śrāvaka or pratyekabuddha and does not accede to bodhisattvasamyaktvanyāma. In the bodhisattva this is called falling from the summits (mūrdhabhyaḥ pāta)... By āma (in Chinese, cheng) we mean dharmatrṣṇā.

For another interpretation of these passages, see H8bḡgirin, IV, p. 346, s.v. Chōda.

¹⁰⁶ See preceding note.

emptiness of the external bases in the emptiness of the internal and external bases. And so on up to the emptiness (no. 18) of non-being and being itself (abhāvasvabhāvasūnyatā).¹⁰⁷

7. Finally, the bodhisattva who accedes to niyāma attains the mind “equal to that which has no equal” (asamasamacitta) but does not take pride in it (nātmāmam utkarṣati). When we know [as he does] that the nature of the mind is integral emptiness, all the futile proliferation (prapañca) about existence (astitā) and non-existence (nāstitā), etc. disappears.

II. ‘POSITION’ AND ‘POSITION OF SALVATION’

Question. – In the system of the śrāvakas, why do they speak of samyaktvaniyāma ‘position of salvation’, whereas in the system of the bodhisattvas they speak only of niyāma ‘position’?¹⁰⁸

Answer. – If the latter system spoke of samyaktvaniyāma, it would not be wrong (doṣa) either. Why? If it was a matter of a bodhisattva attribute, the latter would lead to salvation (samyaktva). But in the śrāvaka system, they speak only of ‘niyāma’ and not of ‘niyāma of the śrāvaka’. This is why [we specify] by saying samyaktvaniyāma, ‘position of salvation’.

Furthermore, the śrāvakas do not possess the mind of great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā). Their wisdom (prajñā) not being sharp (tīkṣṇa), they have no feeling of disgust (nirvedacitta) [for the world]; they especially seek out dharmas and multiply wrong views (mityādrṣṭi), doubts (vicikitsā) and regrets (vipratīṣāra). The bodhisattva-mahāsattva, however, full of loving-kindness and compassion for all, seeks especially to free beings from the sufferings of old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa); he does not try to imagine or increase futile proliferation (prapañca). Like the wealthy man (śreṣṭhin) who dearly loves his only son: when this son gets sick, his father looks for only the best remedies (bhaiṣajya) capable of curing the sickness; he does not seek to distinguish the names of the remedies and, as soon as he has found them, he mixes them and administers them.

¹⁰⁷ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 120, l. 17-121, l. 3 (T 223, k. 3, p. 233b23-c15); Śatasāhasrikā, p. 489, l. 8-490, l. 12 (T 220, vol. V, k. 36, p. 201a22-b25):

Itāyusman Śāriputra bodhisattvo mahāsattvaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caran nādhyaṭmasūnyatāyāṃ bahirdhāsūnyatāṃ ... bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya prajñāpāramitāyāṃ carato bodhisattvanāyamaḥ.

¹⁰⁸ The objection is valid if one considers the text of the Pañcaviṃśati translated by Kumārajīva, but in the translation made by Hiuan-tsang, often there is the expression bodhisattvasamyaktvaniyāma (T 220, vol. VII, k. 402, p. 7c26; k. 404, p. 19a20-21; k. 408, p. 43c28).

The answer is simple: When the śrāvaka enters the darśanamārga, he is destined for samyaktva, viz., destruction of rāga, dveṣa and moha, or nirvāṇa. When the bodhisattva enters into his darśanamārga, he is assured of some day attaining the complete omniscience of the Buddhas consisting of the knowledge of all aspects (savākārajātātā). The niyāma of the śrāvakas is a ‘position of salvation’; that of the bodhisattvas is a ‘position of future Buddha’; therefore it is simply said ‘bodhisattvaniyāma’ or else ‘dharmaniyāma’.

Thus in order to consider the twelve-membered (dvādaśanidāna) [pratītyasamutpāda] the bodhisattvas start from the effects (phala); they do not start from the causes (hetu) in order to consider it. [The śrāvakas] assess according to the cause, whereas the bodhisattvas who are romantics (trṣṇābahula) assess according to the effect.¹⁰⁹ In the śrāvakas, the cause is

[262c] niyāma: this is why they are in the position of salvation (samyaktvaniyāma); in the bodhisattvas where the position of perdition (mithyātvaniyāma)¹¹⁰ is minimal (tanu), we speak only of bodhisattvaniyāma. <1795>

III. PREPARATORY PRACTICES FOR THE BODHISATTVANIYĀMA

Question. – In the system of the śrāvakas, there is samyaktvaniyāma ‘position of salvation’ starting from the conviction producing a dharmajñāna concerning suffering (duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti) up to the conviction producing a subsequent dharma concerning the path (mārga ‘nṛvayadharmajñānakṣānti).¹¹¹ As it is said in a sūtra: “In the three evil destinies (durgati) three things cannot be found: 1) the position of salvation (samyaktvaniyāma), 2) the fruits of the saints (āryaphala), 3) the destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣaya), just as they cannot be found in immoral beings (duḥśīla), blinded by wrong views (mithyādrṣṭika) or guilty of the five wrongdoings of immediate retribution (ānantaryakārin).¹¹² Then, [in the bodhisattva system], starting from which dharmas is it a question of the bodhisattvaniyāma?

¹⁰⁹ The śrāvakas preoccupied with their personal salvation are rationalists by the stopping of pratītyasamutpāda; the bodhisattvas who aim above all for the benefit of others are the romantics.

¹¹⁰ The sources distinguish three categories of beings: 1) samyaktvaniyatarāśi, those who have entered into the path and will quickly reach nirvāṇa; 2) mithyātvaniyatarāśi, those who, having committed grave wrongdoings, will certainly go to the evil <1795> destinies and, having come out of them, will pass over I into the third rāśi; 3) aniyatarāśi, those who do not belong to either the first or the second rāśi and can enter into either of them. Cf. Dīgha, III, p. 217; Tseng-yi a-han, T 125, k. 13, p. 614b23-24; k. 27, p. 698c; kathāvatthu, p. 611; nettippakaraṇa, p. 96; Lalitavistara, p. 400, l. 2-3; Mahāvastu, III, p. 318, l. 5; Mahāvvyut., no. 1737-39.

¹¹¹ The sixteen moments of mind of the darśanamārga: see above, p. 130F, n. 1; 214F; 1067F, n. 1; 1411F, n. 2; 1478-80F. In the first moment, the ascetic becomes an ārya, destined for sainthood (samyaktvaniyata) and candidate for the first fruit of the Path (prathamapannaka). In the sixteenth moment, which coincides with the first moment of the bhāvanāmārga, the ascetic takes possession of the first fruit, the fruit of srotaṅganna.

¹¹² Unidentified sūtra, the essential ideas of which are expressed in the Samyutta, III, p. 225 foll. The Buddha declares that all the elements of existence, eye, colors, visual consciousness, etc., are transitory (anicca), changing (vipariṇāmin) and destined to be altered (aññathābhāvin). After which, he continues:

Yo bhikkhave ime evaṃ saddahati adhimuccati, ayaṃ vuccati, saddhānusārī, okkanto sammattaniyāmaṃ, sappurisabhūmiṃ okkanto, vīṭvato puthujjanabhūmiṃ, abhabbo taṃ kammaṃ kātuṃ yaṃ kammaṃ katvā nirayaṃ vā tiracchānayoṇiṃ vā pettivisayaṃ vā uppajjeyya, abhabbo ca tāva kālaṃ kātuṃ yāva na sotāpattiphalam sacchikaroti. – “He who believes in these teachings and adheres to them, O monks, is said to pursue [the truth] by

Answer. – In order to enter into the bodhisattvanīyāma, it is necessary to cultivate completely four dharmas: 1) the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda); 2) the practice of <1796> meditation (caryābhāvanā); 3) great compassion (mahākaruṇā); 4) skillful means (upāya).¹¹³ Likewise, in the śrāvaka system, first the four roots of good (kuśalamūla)¹¹⁴ must be completely fulfilled, viz., i) heats (ūśmagata), ii) summits (mūrdhan), iii) patiences (kṣānti), iv) supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma), in order then to accede to duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣālī [constituting] the samyaktvanīyāma.

faith. He has acceded to the determination of salvation; he has acceded to the level of a virtuous man; he has escaped from the level of the ordinary man. It is impossible for him to do an action by virtue of which he would take rebirth in hell, in an animal destiny or in the world of the pretas; it is impossible for him to die without having realized the fruit of entering into the stream.”

¹¹³ These four dharmas preliminary to the bodhisattvanīyāma are to be cultivated in the level of the practice of adhesion (adhimuktīcaryābhūmi) and in the first seven levels, the nīyāma taking place only in the eighth. The four great Prajñās, which are also the earliest, distinguish four degrees and ten levels in the bodhisattva’s career:

1) The prathamayānasamprasthita having just embarked in the Greater Vehicle by means of the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda). He is also called prathamacittotpādika and is in the preparatory stage, the adhimuktīcaryābhūmi.

2) The caryāpratipanna, endowed with practices, who for a long time has cultivated the six perfections and, in a mind of great loving-kindness, skill in skillful means (upāyakaśaṭya). He is in grounds one to seven.

3) The avivartanīya or irreversible bodhisattva established ‘in the position of bodhisattva’ (bodhisattvanīyāma). He is in the eighth and ninth grounds.

4) The ekajātipratibaddha, separated from Buddhahood by one lifetime only. He is on the tenth ground. These four degrees in the bodhisattva career, prathamayānasamprasthita, etc., are mentioned in the Prajñāpāramitās:

a. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 831, l. 10-15; T 227 (vol. VIII), k. 8, p. 575a19-21; T 220 (vol. VII), k. 553, p. 849a26-29; k. 564, p. 914c1-4.

b. Aṣṭādaśasāh., T 220 (vol. VII), k. 521, p. 666b9-12; k. 553, p. 849a26-29.

c. Pañcaviṃśatisāh., T 223 (vol. VIII), k. 19, p. 358c10-13; T 220 (vol. VII), k. 456, p. 302a6-10.

d. Śatasāh., T 220 (vol. VI), k. 341, p. 752c28-753a2.

The four degrees are also cited and commented on in the Wen chou che li wen p’ou t’i king, T 464, p. 482b12-15; the Gyaśīrṣa, T 465, p. 485a5-7; T 466, p. 487c26-28; T 467, p. 490c1-4; and the Mahāsaṃnipātra, T 397, k. 10, p. 67a4-6.

Compare the four caryā of the Mahāvastu, I, p. 46, l. 6-7.

For the correspondence between the four degrees and the six grounds, see the Āloka, p. 831., l. 22-24:

Adhimuktīcaryābhūmau prathamayānasamprasthītāḥ. Pramuditādisaptabhūmiṣu caryāpratipannāḥ.

Acalādībhūmidvīṭaye ‘vinivartanīyāḥ. Daśamyām bhūmāv ejajātipratibaddhāḥ.

¹¹⁴ These are the four roots of good favorable to the penetration of the four noble Truths (nirvedhabhāgīya kuśalamūla); cf. p. 395F, n. 1; 1067F, 1077F, 1411F, 1462F, 1485F.

Question. – But carrying out the practices (caryābhāvanā) includes (samgrhṇāti) the four dharmas [you have just mentioned]. Why do you distinguish four of them?

Answer. – <1797>

1. Production of the mind of bodhi

The first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) indeed involves carrying out a practice (caryābhāvanā), but as it is not practiced for a long time, I do not call it ‘carrying out a practice’. Thus, when a householder does not stay at home all day, he is not said, however, to be away on a journey (carati).

2. Carrying out practices

Furthermore, while at the moment when he produces the mind of bodhi (cittotpāda), the bodhisattva is only formulating a vow (prañidhāna) in his mind, whereas at the time of the practices (caryā), he is really acting: he makes material gifts (āmiṣa) to people, he engages in rituals (śīlāni samādādāti), etc. Thus practice of the six perfections (pāramitā) is called ‘carrying out the practices’ (caryābhāvanā).

3. Great compassion

Having carried out the practices, the bodhisattva, by means of the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā), knows the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, and with a feeling of great compassion (mahākaruṇā), he has pity for beings who do not know this true nature of dharmas and who become attached to the deceiving systems of the world and thereby undergo all sorts of physical suffering (kāyika duḥkha) and mental suffering (caitasika duḥkha). This is called ‘experiencing great compassion’, but not ‘carrying out the practices’.

4. Skillful means

As for skillful means (upāya), here is the following. Completely fulfilling the perfection of wisdom, the bodhisattva knows the emptiness (śūnya) of dharmas, and with great compassion, he pities beings.

Here are two things to be considered: 1) By the power of his perfection of wisdom,¹¹⁵ the bodhisattva feels no attachment (abhiniveśa) for things; 2) although he knows the true nature of dharmas, <1798> the power of his skillful means (upāya) is such that he does not abandon beings. Without abandoning beings, he knows the true emptiness of dharmas. If the two things in him – prajñā and upāya – are balanced, then the bodhisattva can accede to bodhisattvanīyāma.

Similarly, the śrāvaka, in whom the two things – concentration (saṃādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) – are balanced, accedes at this moment to the position of salvation (samyaktvanīyāma).

¹¹⁵ The text has: “by the power of means”, which is evidently a lapse.

Although they involve a [certain] ‘practice’ (caryā), these dharmaś of the bodhisattva, [viz., production of the mind of bodhi, the carrying out of the practices, great compassion and skillful means] take on other names as well and, [except for the second], are not called ‘carrying out the practices’ (caryābhāvanā). All the practices carried out by the bodhisattva from his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) up to his sitting on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍaṇiśadana) are the carrying out of practice [under different names], but as there are a few slight differences, they are given different names to distinguish them more easily.

IV. SKILLFUL MEANS AND WISDOM

When someone produces the mind of supreme complete enlightenment for the first time, he wants to free all beings from physical and mental sufferings (kāyikacaitasikaduḥkha): old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī), death, (maraṇa), etc. He formulates great vows (mahāpraṇidhāna) and is adorned with two things, qualities (guṇa) and wisdom (prajñā), as a result of which his wishes will all be fulfilled.

These two things involve a sixfold ‘carrying out of practices’ (caryābhāvanā): these are the six perfections (pāramitā). Generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and patience (kṣānti) make up the guṇa part; exertion (vīrya), meditation [263a] (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā) make up the prajñā part. The bodhisattva practices these six perfections.

Knowing that the characteristics of these dharmaś are very profound (gambhīra), subtle (sūkṣma), difficult to probe (durvigāhya) and difficult to understand (duranubodha), he has the following thought:

“Beings are attached (abhiniviṣṭa) to the dharmaś of the threefold world. By what means can I lead them to find the natureś of these dharmaś? For that I must fulfil completely the qualities (guṇa) and be endowed with pure wisdom (viśuddhaprajñā). <1799>

“The Buddha’s body has thirty-two primary marks (lakṣaṇa) and eighty secondary marks (anuvyañjana); his radiance (prabhā) is perfect and his superknowledges (abhijñā) are immense. By means of his ten powers (bala), four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharma) and four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid), he considers those who should be saved, preaches the Dharma to them and converts them.

“Thus [the garuḍa], the golden-winged king of the birds, when he finds some nāgas to be destroyed, strikes the sea with his wings and separates the waters; then he seizes them and devours them.¹¹⁶ In the same way, the Buddha with his buddha-eye (buddhacakṣus) considers beings distributed in the universes of the ten directions and inhabiting the five destinies (gati), and he asks himself who should be saved. First he manifests the bases of his magical power (ṛddhipāda); then he uncovers the trains of thought of their minds (cittavispandita). Having removed the three obstacles (āvaraṇa) by these two things, he preaches the ¹¹⁶ This mythical bird called garuḍa or suparṇa has a wing-span of five hundred leagues and the beating of its wings brings on the tempests. It is the sworn enemy of the nāgas.

Dharma and saves beings of the threefold world. A being who thus holds the powers of the Buddha (buddhabala) and immense superknowledges (abhijñā) would merit belief even if he were lying, all the more so when he is speaking the truth. That is what is called skillful means (upāya).”

Furthermore, the bodhisattva, knowing the [True] nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) and remembering his previous vows (pūrvapraṇidhāna) wants to save beings. He has the following reflection: In the True nature of dharmaś, there are no beings to be found (nopalabhyante). Then how to save them?

He has the following thought: There are no beings to be found in the True nature of dharmaś but, nevertheless, they are ignorant of this nature of dharmaś. Therefore I wish that they should know this True nature.

Finally, this True nature of dharmaś does not harm beings for it is defined as being without harm and without activity.

That is what is meant by skillful means (upāya). <1800>

The bodhisattva who completely fulfills (paripūrayanti) these four dharmaś,¹¹⁷ accedes to the bodhisattvaniyāma.

Fifth Section SURPASSING THE LOWER VEHICLES AND ACCEDING TO THE IRREVERSIBLE GROUND

This section does not add anything to the preceding section, but insists on the close relationship between the bodhisattvaniyāma and the quality of irreversible (avaivartika) bodhisattva: the latter is not really acquired until the ninth bhūmi.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 12; Śatasāhastikā, p. 67, l. 13-16). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to surpass the stages of śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha and who wishes to take his place on the irreversible ground should exert himself in the perfection of wisdom (Śrāvaka-pratyekabuddhabhūmim atikramitukāmena, avaivartikabhūmau sthātukāmena prajñāpāramitāyām śikṣatavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. SURPASSING THE STAGE OF ŚRĀVAKA AND PRATYEKABUDDHA

¹¹⁷ The four preparatory practices, prathamacittopāda, etc., that are the subject of the present section.

Question. – At the moment when the bodhisattva acceded to dharmaniyāma, he had already surpassed the stage of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas and was settled in the irreversible ground. Why return to that here?

Answer. – Although these three events are simultaneous and linked one to the other, they must be praised in order (krameṇa). Similarly, when in a single moment of mind, the ascetic simultaneously acquires the five pure faculties (anāsravendriya),¹¹⁸ it is necessary to distinguish them and describe their characteristics each in turn.

When the bodhisattva accedes to dharmaniyāma, he destroys such and such fetters (saṃyojana), acquires such and such qualities (guṇa), surpasses such and such stages and becomes established on such and such a ground, but only the Buddha knows it. It is in order to guide (upanayana) the bodhisattvas that the Buddha celebrates all of that in many ways. Similarly, at the beginning of the present sūtra¹¹⁹ it was said: “The Buddha was on the Gr̥dhra-kūṭapārvata with <1801> an assembly of five thousand bhikṣus: all were ārhat, had destroyed their impurities (kṣiṇāsrava), were accomplished and perfect (kṛtakṛtya),¹²⁰ etc. It was in [263b] order to guide other men and purify their minds that the Buddha multiplied these praises and there was no fault (doṣa) there. It is the same here: if the bodhisattva has acceded to dharmaniyāma, by that very fact he has “surpassed the stage of śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha” and has “become established on the irreversible ground”. Furthermore, it is because he has acceded to the dharmaniyāma that the bodhisattva has surpassed the stage of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha and is established on the irreversible ground.

Question. – But in acceding to the dharmaniyāma, the bodhisattva also bypasses old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa), he cuts through the fetters (saṃyojana) and suppresses the three evil destinies (durgati) as has been said above (p. 1790F). Why then does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] limit itself to saying that “he surpasses the stage of śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha”? [By acceding to the dharmaniyāma] the bodhisattva is also established in many qualities (guṇa). Why does [the sūtra] say only that he ‘is established on the irreversible ground’?

Answer. – The bodhisattva abandons bad things and acquires the qualities. Later, the sūtra will describe successively the qualities in which he is established. When the Dharma is explained, it is necessary to proceed in an orderly fashion (krama); it is impossible to speak of everything at the same time.

Furthermore, when the bodhisattva produces the mind of bodhi (cittotpāda) for the first time, he is afraid above all of not bypassing the stage of śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha. For him, to fall directly into hell (niraya) would be less formidable, for [such a fall] would not definitively cut the path of the Mahāyāna. On the other hand, [to remain at the stage] of śrāvaka or pratyekabuddha constitutes a definitive loss for the Mahāyāna.¹²¹ <1802>

[The caution of the cotton-tree.] – Thus there once was a cotton-tree (śalmālī) in a desert land. Its fruits and its branches were great and broad and birds in large numbers would gather there to pass the night. There came a day when one single pigeon (kapota) sat on a branch; the branch and the fruits broke off instantaneously.

The deity of the marsh (kacchadevatā) asked the deity of the tree (vr̥kṣadevatā): When there are large numbers of birds, eagles (garuṣmat) or vultures (gr̥dhra), you were able to sustain them; why could you not resist a little bird?

The deity of the tree answered: This bird was lately sitting on an enemy of mine, the banyan tree (nyagrodha) and, having eaten a seed of that tree, it came to perch on me. It will certainly let fall droppings and, from the seed that has fallen to the ground, there will grow another evil tree that will certainly do me a great wrong. Thus, with anger and fearful of this pigeon, I preferred to sacrifice one branch: that was better.

- The bodhisattva-mahāsattva does the same. He feels less afraid of the heretics (tīrthika), Māra’s troops, the fetters (saṃyojana) and evil actions (pāpakarman) than of the arhats and pratyekabuddhas. Why? For the bodhisattva, the arhats and pratyekabuddhas are like the pigeon of the story for they destroy the spirit of the Mahāyāna and definitively ruin the work of the Buddha (buddhakārya). This is why [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] mentions, as the most important here, only the fact of “bypassing the stage of śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha and becoming established on the irreversible ground”. <1803>

II. BECOMING ESTABLISHED ON THE IRREVERSIBLE GROUND

Question. – What is the irreversible ground (avaivartikabhūmi)?

Answer. – 1. The bodhisattva considers unborn (anutopanna), non-destroyed (aniruddha) neither unborn nor non-destroyed (naivānutopannanāniruddha), neither shared (sādhāraṇa) nor unshared (asādhāraṇa) dharmas. Considering things thus, he is freed from the threefold world. Utilizing neither the empty (śūnya) nor the non-empty (aśūnya), he believes whole-heartedly in the wisdom of the True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) held by the Buddhas of the ten directions. Nothing can shake it or destroy it. It is called ‘conviction that dharmas do not arise’ (anutpattikadharmakṣānti), and this conviction constitutes the irreversible ground.

¹¹⁸ Śraddhā, vīrya, smṛti and prajñā: see p. 1125-1127F.

¹¹⁹ Cf. p. 198F.

¹²⁰ Since Burnouf, kṛtakṛtya has been translated as ‘having accomplished what they had to do’, but see above, p. 213-215F.

¹²¹ The Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, transl. p. 292, puts the following thought into the mouth of the arhat Mahākāśyapa: “It would be better to become guilty of the five sins of immediate retribution (ānantarya) than to be completely liberated as arhat as we are. Why? Because those who are guilty of the five ānantaryas still have the power to destroy these ānantaryas, to produce the mind of supreme complete enlightenment and to gradually realize all the dharmas of the Buddha. Whereas we, the arhats, who have destroyed our impurities, we will never be capable of that.”

2. Furthermore, access to the bodhisattvaniyāma is the irreversible ground and the surpassing of the stage of śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha is also called irreversible ground.

3. Furthermore, the bodhisattva established on the irreversible ground obtains indestructible (asaṃhārya) and immutable (acṛyuta) superknowledges (abhiññā) from lifetime to lifetime as fruit of retribution (vipālapphala). Endowed with these two things and while grasping the True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, he uses his great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and does not abandon beings.

4. Furthermore, the bodhisattva possess two attributes: i) pure wisdom (viśuddhaprajñā); ii) the wisdom of skillful means (upāyaññāna). He possesses two other attributes: iii) high resolve (adhyāśaya) directed toward nirvāṇa; iv) activity (kriyā) that does not neglect the world (loka).

He is like a great nāga whose tail is deep in the great sea but whose head is in the sky,¹²² he makes the lightning and the thunder but also makes the [beneficial] great rain to fall.

5. Finally, the irreversible bodhisattva who has acquired the wisdom of the True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas retains it from one existence to <1804> the next without ever abandoning it, even temporarily. About the profound sūtras of the Buddha¹²³ he never has any doubt or difficulty. Why? He says: “I myself do not have omniscience (sarvajñatā); that is why I do not know by what skillful means and for what reason the sūtras are expressed in this way.”

By virtue of his deep aspiration (abhyāśaya), the irreversible (avaivartika) bodhisattva never does any harm (pāpa). In his deep aspiration, he accumulates good things (kuśala); superficially, he may do bad (akuśala) things.

III. THE TWO KINDS OF IRREVERSIBLE BODHISATTVAS

Question. – In his avaivartika quality, the bodhisattva has the conviction that dharmas do not rise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti). Why does he still do bad things by means of a superficial mind?

Answer. – There are two kinds of avaivartika: 1) the one who has obtained anutpattiladharmakṣānti; 2) the one who has not obtained anutpattikadharmakṣānti [but who has received the prediction].¹²⁴ The Buddha knows that <1805> because of his past (atīta) and future (anāgata) karmic causes and conditions, this bodhisattva will necessarily become a buddha for the benefit and happiness of other beings (parasattvānāṃ hitāya sukhāya) and gives him the prediction (vyākaraṇa).¹²⁵ With his body of birth-death (cyutyupapadamāṃsakāya or saṃsāramāṃsakāya), this bodhisattva has not yet cut the fetters (saṃyojana),

¹²² The huge dimensions of the nāgas is well known. It is such that ‘the tail is still in Takṣaśilā while the head is already in Benares’: cf. Abiniṣkramaṇasūtra, T 190, k. 37, p. 828b17.

¹²³ By ‘profound sūtras’, the canonical sources already mean the sūtras associated with the teaching of emptiness. Cf. Anguttara, I, p. 72; III, p. 107; Samyutta, II, p. 267: Suttantā Tathāgatabhāsītā gambhīrā gambhūratthā lokuttarā suññatāpaṭisaṃyutā: ‘Sūtras preached by the Tathāgata, profound, of profound meaning, supramundane, associated with emptiness’. They are also called sūtras of precise meaning (nūṭārtha): cf. Akṣayamatīrīrdeśa in Madh. vṛtti, p. 43, l. 4-9.

¹²⁴ Interpreting the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras faithfully, the Traité distinguishes the two kinds of avaivartikas, i.e., with regression, or without regression in their progress toward supreme bodhi.

1. There is an avaivartika in deed and rightfully, showing all the characteristics of the avaivartika described by the Prajñāpāramitā (see above, p. 243-245F) and having notably the conviction that dharmas do not arise. This conviction, definitively realized in the eighth bhūmi, the Acalā, determines or predestines the bodhisattva to supreme bodhi: he cannot fall back, and this is called the niyāma.

2. There is an avaivartika in deed only. He does not show the characteristics of an avaivartika and would be able, in principle, to fall back. In fact, he will go directly to supreme enlightenment of the Buddhas, but only the Buddha knows this. This bodhisattva is avaivartika in the prescience of the Buddha and it happens that the Buddha gives him the prediction of it (vyākaraṇa). This is what is said in the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 66, l. 15-16 and the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 272, l. 7-9: Santi bodhisattvā mahāsattvā ye prathamacittotpādenaiva bodhisattvaniyāmam avarānty avinivartanīyabhūmau vāvatiṣhante. – “There are bodhisattvas who, just through the first production of the mind of bodhi, enter into the determination of bodhisattva or become established in the irreversible ground.”

Here another passage of the Traité must be cited (k. 74, p. 579c21-580a11) already mentioned and translated by L. de La Vallée Poussin in Siddhi, p. 738-739:

“What must the bodhisattva obtain to receive the name of avaivartika?

“According to the Abhidharmavibhāṣā, when the bodhisattva, having crossed through three incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa), plants the causes that will produce the thirty-two marks, starting from this moment, he is called avaivartika (see above, p. 246-249F; Kośa, IV, p. 222-223).

“According to the Vinaya-Avadāna, since he saw the buddha Dīpaṃkara, threw the five flowers, spread out his hair on the ground, received from the Buddha the ‘prediction of avaivartika’, rose up into the air and praised the Buddha: starting from that moment, he is called avaivartika.

“But in the Prajñāpāramitā, when the bodhisattva possesses the practice of the six pāramitās, obtains jñāna and upāya, is no longer attached to the pāramitās which are absolutely empty, sees that all dharmas are without birth-cessation-increase-decrease, defilement, purity, coming-going-unity-multiplicity-permanence-impermanence-existence-non-existence, without any dualities whatsoever; then, as a result of this jñāna, he sees and crushes any note of impermanence after having crushed any note of permanence; abandons the view of nonarising-cessation, the view of impermanence; is not attached to nonarising-cessation... he is called ‘bodhisattva who has obtained the anutpattikadharmakṣānti’, he enters into the determination of bodhisattva, he is called avaivartika.

“Undoubtedly, since the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva is called avaivartika; but he is not endowed with the avaivartika characteristics.”

¹²⁵ The Sūramgamasamādhi (transl. p. 20-213) distinguishes four kinds of predictions (vyākaraṇa): i) prediction concerning the one who has not yet produced the bodhi mind (anutpāditabodhicittavyākaraṇa), ii) prediction conferred on the one who has just produced bodhi mind (utpāditabodhicittavyākaraṇa), iii) prediction made secretly (rahoṃvyākaraṇa), iv) prediction made in the presence of the one who has obtained the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣāntilabdhasaṃmukhavyākaraṇa). – Here it is a matter of a bodhisattva who has not yet obtained the kṣānti but whose progress toward bodhi will be irreversible. The Buddha knows it and predicts it.

but of all ordinary people (prthagjana), he is by far the foremost, and he too is described as avaivartika. When he obtains anutpattikadharmakṣānti and cuts all the fetters (saṃyojana), he will be purified (parisuddha). His last fleshly body (paścima māṃsakāya) having disappeared, he will obtain a body born of the fundamental element <1806> (dharmadhātujakāya); rid of the fetters, he will no longer need a teacher. He will be like a ship (nau) on the great Ganges river that does not need a pilot and by itself ends up in the great ocean.

Furthermore, since his first production of the bodhi mind (prathamacittotpāda), he has made the great resolution of cutting all the conflicting [264a] emotiona (kleśa) and knowing the True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas: then he will become [truly] avaivartika.

By practicing the perfection of generosity (dānapāramitā) alone, the bodhisattva perfects (paripūrayati) the six perfections; the same [by practicing the other perfections] up to and including the perfection of wisdom.¹²⁶ But by practicing the six virtues, the bodhisattva does not yet become avaivartika: it is at the moment when he produces a feeling of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta) toward beings that he becomes avaivartika.

Endowed with this feeling of compassion, he has the following thought: “Dharmas all being empty (śūnya), there are no beings (sattva); who then is there to be saved?” At that moment, his feeling of compassion weakens. But it happens that, in the face of the great misery of beings, the vision he has of the emptiness of dharmas (dharmāśūnyatāsamanuṣāyanā) weakens in turn. If he has the power of skillful means (upāyabala), the two things [viz., the feeling of compassion and the seeing of emptiness] are in balance, without struggling against each other. The feeling of great compassion does not hinder [the seeing] of the True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and [the seeing] of the True nature of dharmas does not prevent the arising of great compassion (mahākaruṇā).¹²⁷ That is skillful means (upāya), Then the bodhisattva ‘accedes to the dharmaniyāma of the bodhisattva and is established on the irreversible ground’. <1807>

See what is said in the Wang-cheng p’in (Upapadaparivarta)¹²⁸, and in regard to the characteristics of the avaivartika, see later the two A-pi-po-tche p’in (Avaivartikaparivarta).¹²⁹

¹²⁶ The bodhisattva cultivates the six pāramitās during the first six bhumis: generosity (dāna) in the first, morality (śīla) in the second, patience (kṣānti) in the third, exertion (vīrya) in the fourth, meditation (dhyāna) in the fifth and wisdom (prajñā) in the sixth. Nevertheless, the fact of specially cultivating one pāramitā brings about the perfecting of the other five since the pāramitās are inseparable. Generosity, cultivated preferentially in the first ground, brings about morality, patience, exertion, meditation and wisdom: see above, p. 750-769F. For the mutual inclusion of the six pāramitās, cf. Sūtrālamkāra, p. 115-116; Samgraha, p. 195; Siddhi, p. 630.

¹²⁷ The Vimalakīrtinirdeśa (transl., p. 233-234) makes the entire edifice of the bodhisattva rest on two pillars: the wisdom assumed by skillful means (upāyapāttaprajñā) and the skillful means assumed by wisdom (prajñopāttopāya).

¹²⁸ Chapter IV of the Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 2, p. 225a-229c.

¹²⁹ Chapter LV of the Pañcaviṃśati, also called Pou-t’ouei p’in, T 223, k. 16, p. 239a-341b.

CHAPTER XLIII (p. 1809F) THE PURSUIT OF THE SIX SUPERKNOWLEDGES

First Section BECOMING ESTABLISHED IN THE SIX SUPERKNOWLEDGES

NOTE ON THE ABHIJÑĀS

The superknowledges (Sanskrit, abhiññā; Pāli, abhiññā; Chinese, t’ong or chen-t’ong; Tibetan, mñon par śes pa) are six in number and are usually presented in the following order:

1. Ṛddhividhiñjāna (Pāli, iddhividha) or ṛddhiviṣayañjāna, the knowledge of magical processes.
2. Divyaśrotra (dibbasota), divine hearing.
3. Cetaḥparyāyajñāna, also called paracittajñāna, the knowledge of another’s mind.
4. Pūrvanivāsānussmṛtijñāna, (pubbe nivāsānussatiñāṇa), the memory of [one’s] former abodes (or existences).
5. Cyutupapādajñāna (sattānaṃ cutūpapātañāṇa), the knowledge of the death and rebirth of beings, also called divyacakṣus (dibbacakkhu), the divine eye.
6. Āsravaḥkṣayañjāna (āsavakkhayañāṇa), the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities.

1. Canonical definition of the abhiññās

Pāli recension. – Dīgha, I, p. 78-84; III, 281; Majjhima, I, p. 4-36, 494-496; II, p. 18-22; III, p. 11-12, 98-99; Saṃyutta, II, p. 212-214; V, p. 264-266; Anguttara, I, p. 255-256; III, p. 17-19, 28-29, 280-281, 425-426; V, p. 199-200.

Sanskrit recension. – Catuspariṣatsūtra, p. 432-434; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 83-87; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 301-308; Daśabhūmika, p. 34-36; Kośavyākhyā, p. 654. Among these various recensions there are numerous variations in detail, and here two of them will be reproduced.

Dīgha, I, p. 78-84:

I. so anekaviḥitaṃ iddhividhaṃ paccanubhoti.

- 1) eko pi hutvā bahudhā hoti ...
- 2) ... parimajjati yāva brahmalokā pi kāyena vasaṃ vatteti.

VI. ... brahmacariyaṃ kataṃ karaṇīyaṃ nāparaṃ itthattāyā ti pajānāti /

Daśabhūmika, p. 34-36:

I. so 'nekavidhāṃ ṛddhividhiṃ (var. ṛddhiviśayaṃ) pratyanubhavati /

1. prthivīm api kampayati. ...

8.... brahmalokam api kāyena vaśaṃ vartayati.

VI. (Košavyākhyā, p. 654) ...kṛtaṃ karaṇīyaṃ nāparaṃ asmād bhavam iti prajñānāti /

Translation of the Sanskrit:

I. – He practices various magical processes: 1. he shakes the earth; 2. being one, he becomes many; 3. being many, he becomes one; 4. he manifests appearances and disappearances; 5. he passes through walls, ramparts and mountains unimpededly as though it were through space; 6. he moves through space with crossed legs like a bird with wings; 7. he dives into the earth and emerges from it as though it were water; 8. he walks on the water without sinking as though it were on the earth; 9. he smokes and flames like a great mass of fire; 10. he emits currents of water from his body, like a great cloud; 11. he strokes the sun and the moon, so prodigious and so powerful, touches them with his hand and exerts his will physically as far as the world of Brahmā.

II. By the faculty of the pure and superhuman divine hearing, he hears the two kinds of sounds, divine and human, subtle and coarse, distant or near, including those of horseflies, mosquitoes, insects and flies.

III. With his mind, he recognizes precisely the minds of other beings, of other people; he recognizes precisely a loving mind as a loving mind, a mind free of love as a mind free of love, a hateful mind as a hateful mind, a mind without hate as a mind without hate, a disturbed mind as a disturbed mind, a mind free of disturbance as a mind free of disturbance, an impassioned mind as an impassioned mind, a mind without passion as a mind without passion, a small mind as a small mind, a vast mind as a vast mind, an elevated mind as an elevated mind, an immense mind as an immense mind, a condensed mind as a condensed mind, a concentrated mind as a concentrated mind, an unconcentrated mind as an unconcentrated mind, a liberated mind as a liberated mind, a non-liberated mind as a non-liberated mind, a stained mind as a stained mind, a stainless mind as a stainless mind, a coarse mind as a coarse mind, a mind without coarseness as a mind without coarseness. This is how, by means of his mind, he recognizes precisely the mind of other beings, of other people.

IV. He remembers his many earlier abodes: one lifetime, two, three, four five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty lifetimes, several hundred lifetimes, several hundreds of thousand lifetimes, a period of disappearance (of the world), a period of creation, several periods of disappearance, a hundred periods, a thousand periods, a hundred thousand periods, a million periods, a hundred million periods, a thousand million periods, a hundred thousand million periods, up to many hundreds of thousands of millions of koṭinīyuta of periods. He thinks: “At that time, I had such and such a name, such and such a clan, such and such a family, such and such food, such and such a lifespan; I experienced such and such happiness and such and such suffering. When I left this place, I was reborn over there and from that place I was reborn here.” This is how he remembers his many earlier bodes with their aspects, their location and their details.

V. With his divine eye, purified, superhuman, he sees beings dying and being reborn and recognizes them according to reality, handsome or ugly, of good or bad destiny, excellent or vile, according to the consequences of their actions. He thinks: “These beings full of bodily misdeeds, full of vocal misdeeds, full of mental misdeeds, slandering the saints, having wrong views, acting badly as a result of their wrong views, for this cause and this reason, at the dissolution of the body after death, are born in a miserable state, in a bad destiny, in an abyss, in the hells. On the other hand, these beings endowed with good bodily actions, endowed with good vocal actions, endowed with good mental actions, not slandering the saints, having right views, acting well as a result of their right views, for this cause and this reason, at the dissolution of the body after death, are born in the good destinies, in the heavens, in the god realms. Thus with his divine eye, pure, superhuman, he sees, with their aspects, their location and their details, beings dying or being born, and he recognizes them in conformity with reality.

VI. He recognizes properly the noble truths: this is suffering, this is the origin of suffering, this is the destruction of suffering, this is the way leading to the destruction of suffering. While he knows this and sees this, his mind is liberated from the impurities [of the realm] of desire (kāmadhātū) is freed from the impurities of the two higher realms (bhavāśrava) and the impurities of ignorance (avidyāśrava). When he is liberated, the knowledge and the vision of being liberated arise in him. He recognizes: “Birth is exhausted for me; there is no further existence for me.”

- Whereas the Pāli Nikāyas remain faithful to the order followed in the wording of the abhijñās, the Sanskrit Āgamas depart from it frequently: as we will see later, they may place divyacakṣus or divyāśrota at the head of the list.

The first five abhijñās which occur among worldly people (prthagjana) as well as among the saints (arhat) are within the range of human powers and consequently are of mundane order (laukika). In contrast to the āśravakṣayajñāna strictly reserved for the saints, they form a separate group: that of the five abhijñās often mentioned in the texts: cf. Samyutta, II, p. 121-122; mahāvastu, I, p. 284, I. 3; II, p. 33, I. 11; 96, I. 1; Divyāvadāna, p. 321, I. 3; Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 134, I. 11; 141, I. 9; 254, I. 14; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 243, I. 13.

Abhijñā is rendered in French sometimes as ‘pouvoir naturel’ (supernatural power), sometimes as ‘supersavoir’ (superknowledge): the second translation seems preferable for abhijñā; as its name indicates, it is indeed an awareness of superior order which does not necessarily means an intuitive awareness. The earliest sources already insist on the fact that they are the fruit of samādhi: they appear only “in a concentrated mind, very pure, very clean, without fault, free of stains, supple, ready to act, stable, having reached impassivity.” (Dīgha, I, p. 77 seq.).

2. The Abhijñās in the Abhidharma

Pāli scholasticism (Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 111-118; Visuddhimagga, ed. H. C. Warren, p. 328-368) reproduces fully the canonical definition of the abhijñās cited at the beginning of the present note, comments on it word by word and illustrates it with numerous examples.

Scholars have taken into account that the canonical definition of ṛddyaabhijñā refers above all to miraculous movement and does not embrace the entire group of magical processes. They have, therefore, completed the list by distinguishing ten kinds of iddhi (Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 207-214; Visuddhimagga, p. 318-323; Atthasālini, p. 91; see also S. Z. Aung, Compendium of Philosophy, p. 61):

1. Adhiṭṭhānā iddhi, magic by virtue of an act of will, to which the canonical formula exclusively refers: “Being one, he becomes many”, etc.
2. Vikubbanā iddhi, magic of bodily transformation.
3. Manomayā iddhi, creation of a physical body, the double of oneself.
4. Ñānavipphārā iddhi, magic resulting from an intervention of knowledge.
5. Samādhivipphārā iddhi, magic resulting from an intervention of the mind in concentration.
6. Ariyā iddhi, noble magic, permitting the seeing of pleasant things as unpleasant and vice versa. This was already discussed by the canonical sūtras (Dīgha, III, p. 112-113, etc.).
7. Kammavipākajā iddhi, magic resulting from the retribution of actions.
8. Puññavato iddhi, magic belonging to the deserving person.
9. Vijjāmayā iddhi, magic of the scientific order, resulting from progress in the sciences.
10. Tattha tattha sammāpayogapaccayā ijḥanaṭṭhena iddhi, magic the success of which is assured by a correct undertaking in such and such a realm. Thus the destruction of the impurities has, as cause, the efforts employed in the course of the career of the arhats.

The abhijñās are placed neither among the dharmas of the Path studied in chapters XXXI to XXXVIII nor among the attributes of the Buddhas mentioned in chapters XXXIX to XLII, but they present many traits in common with them. They form a special category which fits into the Buddhist system poorly and whose job seems to have been done already. As the Traité has already commented (p. 1557F), there is only a difference of intensity of knowledge between abhijñā, vidyā and bala. All of this poses some difficult problems over which the Abhidharmas and the śāstras of the Sarvāstivādins have struggled for a long time: cf. Saṃgūtiparyāyā, T 1536, k.15, p.432b17-c8; Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 102, p. 530; k. 141, p. 727b22-728c1; T 1546, K. 53, p. 383b-c; Abhidharmasāra, T 1550 k. 3, p. 824a27-28; Abhidharmāmṛtarasa, T 1553, k. 2, p. 975c22-976a17.

Kośa, VII, p. 98-112, comes to the following conclusions:

In their nature (svabhāva), the abhijñās are wisdoms of the path of deliverance (vimuktimārgaprajñā).

Abhijñās 1, 2, 4 and 6 are saṃvṛtījñāna; abhijñā 3 involves jñānas 1, 2, 3, 4 and 8 (see above, p. 1472F); abhijñā 6 is similar to bala 10 and like it, involves six or ten jñānas (cf. p. 1508F).

Abhijñās 1 to 5 have as their support (āśraya) the four dhyānas but not the four ārūpyasamāpattis. As domain or object (viṣaya), they have their level (bhūmi) or a lower level. Already cultivated in an earlier existence, they are acquired by detachment (vairāgya); if not, by effort (prayoga).

Abhijñā 3 includes the smṛtyupasthānas 2, 3 and 4 (cf. p. 1121-1122F); abhijñās 1, 2 and 5 are the kāyasamṛtyupasthāna; abhijñās 4 and 6 have as nature the four smṛtyupasthānas.

Abhijñās 2 and 5 and indeterminate (avyākṛta); the others are good (śubha).

Abhijñās 4 to 6 are knowledges (vidyā) because they cause the non-knowledge relating to the past, future and present to cease. Abhijñā 6 belongs to the arhat alone.

Abhijñā 1 corresponds to the magical miracle (ṛddhiprātihārya) that converts beings; abhijñā 3 corresponds to the miracle of the statement (ādeśanāprātihārya) that reads minds; abhijñā 6 corresponds to the miracle of the correct teaching (amuśāsanāprātihārya) that confers the fruits of salvation and happiness. We may remember that these pratihāryas are listed in the canonical texts: Dīgha, I, p. 212; III, p. 220, Anguttara, I, p. 170.

3. The Abhijñās in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras

In the present passage, the sūtra envisages the case of a bodhisattva who, already possessing the first five abhijñās, “wishes to be established in the six abhijñās”. But if he obtains the sixth abhijñā, he destroys his impurities (kṣīṇāsrava) and enters into nirvāṇa. In this case, it is hard to see how he could pursue his ideal of bodhisattva and still dedicate himself to the welfare and happiness of beings.

This leads the Traité to distinguish two kinds of destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣaya):

1. Complete āsravakṣaya involving both the elimination of the afflictive emotions (kleśa) and the elimination of their traces (kleśavāsanā). It belongs to the fully and completely enlightened Buddhas alone, and the bodhisattva attains it only at the end of his career in the tenth bhūmi.
2. Incomplete āsravakṣaya, eliminating the afflictive emotions without eliminating their traces. As we have seen above (p. 1761F), it is characteristic of the śrāvakas who have reached the state of arhat as well as the bodhisattvas of the eighth bhūmi. But the results are quite different according to whether it is a matter of an arhat or a bodhisattva.

The kṣīṇāsrava arhat, aspiring only to his personal deliverance, puts an end to suffering and escapes from saṃsāra.

The kṣīṇāsrava bodhisattva, animated by great loving-kindness and great compassion, uses his traces of afflictive emotions to pursue his work of salvation and, without taking rebirth in the threefold world, assumes a body of the dharmadhātu for the service of beings.

Thus the bodhisattva “who wishes to become established in the six abhijñās” aspires above all to this incomplete āsravaḥ where he retains the traces of emotions in a purely altruistic end.

If the sūtra submits to these subtleties, it is in order to maintain in its system the role of the abhijñās to which the canonical scriptures grant such an important place. Nonetheless, the practice of the abhijñās comes within conventional truth and loses any significance from the point of view of universal emptiness.

Coming back to the subject later, the sūtra (Pañcaviṃśati, p.83-33; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 301-306) will comment that by using the six abhijñās, the bodhisattva is under no illusion: he does not grasp them (nopalabhate), has no thought of either possessing them or knowing their object, because he is based on the emptiness (śūnyatā) and non-existence (anupalabdhitā) of their self-nature; he does not seek to produce them or to realize them if this is not in the spirit of omniscience.

[264b] Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 13; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 67, l. 16). – The bodhisattva-mahāṭṭva who wishes to become established in the six superknowledges should practice the perfection of wisdom (Ṣaḍabhijñātāyāṃ sthātukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. QUALITIES OF THE SIXTH SUPERKNOWLEDGE

In the Tsan-p'ou-sa p'in (Bodhisattvastutiparivarta) [above, p. 328-333F], the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra spoke of the ‘bodhisattva possessing five abhijñās’ (bodhisattvāḥ pañcābhijñāḥ). Why does it speak here of the ‘bodhisattva wishing to become established in the six abhijñās’ (bodhisattvaḥ ṣaḍabhijñātāyāṃ sthātukāmaḥ)?

Answer. – The [first] five Abhijñās are possessed by the bodhisattva, but here the six abhijñās in which the bodhisattva wants to be established are possessed by the Buddha. If the bodhisattva possessed the six abhijñās, he would be a Tathāgata.

Question. – However, in the Wang-cheng p'in (Upapadaparivarta),¹³⁰ the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra will say: “There are bodhisattvas established in the six abhijñās who go [from buddhafiield] to buddhafiield” (santi bodhisattvā mahāsattvaāḥ ṣaṇṇām abhijñānām lābhino ye buddhakṣetreṇa buddhakṣetram saṃkrāmantī).¹³¹ Why then do you say that the bodhisattvas possess only five abhijñās?

¹³⁰ Chap. IV of the Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 2, p.225a21-229c4.

¹³¹ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 63, l. 7-9; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 271, l. 4-6.

Answer. – The sixth abhijñā, or knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (āsravaḥ), is of two kinds: i) simultaneous elimination of the impurities (āsrava) and their traces (vāsanā); ii) elimination of the impurities but not of the traces. The traces not being eliminated, we say that the bodhisattvas ‘possess’ five abhijñās; the traces being eliminated, we say that they ‘are [264b] established’ in the six abhijñās.¹³²

Question. – How can the bodhisattva whose impurities are eliminated (kṣīṇāsrava) be reborn and assume a birth (upapatti)? Any taking of birth (upapattiparigraha) results from the flow of desires (trṣṇāpravāha). Just as rice (dhyāna), even though it is planted in good soil, does not germinate when moisture is lacking, so the saints (āryapudgala), once liberated from the husk of desire (trṣṇātuṣa), although still in possession of defiled actions (sāsravakarman), causes and conditions of birth (upapattihetupratyaya), cannot return to existence.

Answer. – As I have said earlier (p. 1801F), the bodhisattva reaches dharmaniyāma and becomes established in the avaivartikabhūmi. When his last fleshly body (paścīma māṃsakāya) has disappeared, he obtains a body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya). Although he has cut the passions (kleśa), he still retains their residues (vāsanā) and because of them, he takes on a body born of the fundamental element, not a birth in the threefold world (traiḍhātuka).

Question. – Among the arhats as well the passions are cut while the traces are not. Why are they not reborn?

Answer. – [Contrary to the bodhisattva], the arhats have neither great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) nor great compassion (mahākaruṇā), and they have not made the earlier vow (pūrvapraṇidhāna) to save all beings. Having realized the culminating point of reality (bhūtaakoṭim sāḥṣātkṛtvā), they abandon saṃsāra [definitively].

Furthermore, I said previously (p. 1817F) that there are two kinds of destructions of the impurities (āsravaḥ). Here it is not a question of a bodhisattva possessing the abhijñā of the destruction of the impurities but of a bodhisattva ‘wishing to become established in the six abhijñās’ and, to this end, to practice the perfection of wisdom.

On the meaning (artha) of the six abhijñās, see what the Buddha will say in the following chapters.¹³³ Above (p. 328-333F), in the Tsan-p'ou p'in chapter (Bodhisattvastutiparivarta), I have also explained the meaning of the five abhijñās of the bodhisattva.

II. ORDER OF THE SUPERKNOWLEDGES

¹³² For a bodhisattva to be truly established in the six abhijñās in the example of the Buddha, it is necessary that all his impurities (āsrava) be destroyed, not just the afflictive emotions (kleśa) that make up the āsrava proper, but also the traces (vāsanā) that are the result of them.

¹³³ See especially Pañcaviṃśati, p. 83, l. 7 - 88, l. 16; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 301, l. 11 - 306, l. 9.

Question. – What is the order (krama) of the abhijñās?

Answer. –

1. Order generally accepted by the canonical sūtras¹³⁴

A. Abhijñā of magical power¹³⁵

[a. Gamanārddhi]. – The bodhisattva detached from the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaḡa), possessing the trances (dhyāna), endowed with loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā), takes the abhijñā in the interest of beings and manifests wondrous (adbhuta) and marvelous (āścarya) things so ¹³⁴ Namely, 1) rddhividhi, 2) divyaśrotra, 3) cetahparyāya or paracitta, 4) pūrvanivāsa, 5) cyutupapāda or divyacakṣus, 6) āsravakṣaya. This order is followed scrupulously by the Nikāyas and the Pāli Abhidhammas and a significant portion of the Sanskrit Āgamas: cf. Dīrgha, T 1, k. 9, p. 54b9-11; 58a24-26; Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 29, p. 209c27-28; k. 41, p. 302a25-26.

¹³⁵ As has already been noted, the canonical definition of rddhividhijñāna is concerned with a part only of magical operations. Later sources tried to complete it. Pāli scholasticism distinguishes ten magical operations (cf. p. 1815F) whereas the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma speaks of several kinds of magic:

Vibhāṣā. T 1545, k. 141, p. 725b23-c4: There are three types of rddhi: 1) that which moves the body (śarīravāhinī), 2) that which comes from a volition (ādhimokṣikī), 3) that which is fast like the mind (manojavā).

The śarīravāhinī raises the body up and moves it in the air like a bird flying or a flying ṛṣi painted on the wall.

The ādhimokṣikī makes what is far becomes near (dūraśyāśannādgimokṣeṇa). By the power of this volition, one can touch the sun and the moon while staying on this very continent. Or, as well, one can reach the Akaniṣṭha heaven in the time it takes to bend or stretch one's arm.

The manojavā is the visual consciousness (cakṣurvijñāna) reaching the summit of rūpadhātu; or else it is reaching the Akaniṣṭha heaven or also traveling through infinite universes.

How many people realize these three rddhis? The śrāvakas realize the first one; the pratyekabuddhas realize two with the exception of manojavā; only the Buddha Bhagavats realize all three.

The Abhidharmamūrtarasa, T 1553, k. 2, p. 975c24-25 speaks of three rddhipāda (taken in the sense here of rddhividhi or rddhiviśaya): 1) displacement by flying (utpatanaganmana), 2) creation (nirmāṇa), 3) the abhijñā of the saints (ārya).

This classification is retained by the Traité which, here and in other places, (cf, p. 329-330) also mentions three kinds of rddhi: gamana-, nirmāṇa-, āryaḍḍhi.

For the Kośa, VII, p. 113-114, and the Abhidharmadīpa, p. 400, rddhi is displacement (gati) and creation (nirmāṇa). Displacement itself is of three kinds: śarīravāhinī, ādhimokṣikī and manojavā. Creation is of two types: of the realm of kāma and of the realm of rūpa.

For the abhijñās in the Vijñānavāda system, see especially Bodh. bhūmi, p. 58-71; Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 185; Saṃgraha, p. 294-295; Abhidharmasamuccaya, ed. Pradhan, p. 97.

that the minds of beings may be purified. Why? If he did not perform miraculous things, he would not be able to lead many beings to find salvation.

Having thought thus, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva fixes his mind on [the element] of space (ākāśadhātu) inherent in his own body and eliminates the idea of coarse-heavy (audārikarūpa) matter. Constantly noting [within himself] the nature of emptiness-lightness (laghutvanimitta), he produces great minds of vigorousness (chanda), energy (vīrya), wisdom (prajñā) and examination (mīmāṃsa)¹³⁶ which have the power to raise the body. Before any examination, he knows himself that the power of his mind is so great that it can raise up his body as one does when walking. Destroying any idea of the heaviness of matter and always cultivating the notion of lightness, he then can fly.

[b. Nirmāṇārddhi]. - Secondly, the bodhisattva can also transform things. He makes the earth (prthivī) become water (ap) and water become earth, wind (vāyu) become fire (tejas) and fire become wind: he is able to transform all the great elements (mahābhūta). He makes gold (suvarṇa) change into gravel (kāṭhalla) and gravel change into gold: he can transform all these things. To change earth (prthivī) into water (ap), he thinks of water unceasingly and increases it until he no longer thinks of earth. At that moment, the earth becomes water in accordance with his mind, The bodhisattva can transform all these kinds of things.

Question. – If that is so, how are the superknowledges different from the spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana)?

Answer. – The kṛtsnāyatanas are the first path of the abhijñās. Preliminary [264c] to the kṛtsnāyatanas, the vimokṣas and the abhibhvāyatanas make the mind flexible; then it is easy to enter the abhijñās. Moreover, in the kṛtsnāyatanas, there is only a single person to notice that the earth has been changed into water; other people do not see it at all.¹³⁷ This is not so in the abhijñās: the ascetic himself really sees water and other people really see the water as well.

Question. – However, the kṛtsnāyatanas are great concentrations (samādhi) also. Why are they unable to give real water, seen by both the ascetic and other people as well?

Answer. – The kṛtsnāyatanas have a very vast field of vision. What happens is that everything takes on just the characteristics of water but does not truly become water. The abhijñās, on the other hand, do not include everything, but what happens is that the earth changes into water and that is real water. The result is that these two concentrations (samādhi) each have their own special power.

Question. – [One of two things]: the things transformed (nirmita) by these two samādhis are either true or false. If they are true, how does stone (śilā) become gold (suvarṇa) and how does earth become water? If they are false, how can the āryas become free of these fallacious practices?

Answer. – All these practices are true and the āryas are not in error for they have eliminated the threefold poison (viśatraya). No dharma has a fixed nature (niyatalakṣaṇa): each of them can be changed into earth or become water.

¹³⁶ These are the four rddhipāda, bases of magical power (cf. p. 1124F).

¹³⁷ The Traité has commented above (p. 1305F) that the kṛtsnāyatanas are subjective seeing.

Thus, [as as result of their solidity (khakkhaṭṭva)], cheese (dadhi), glue [bird-lime] (gavyadṛḍha) and leather (lākṣā) belong to the type earth (prthivī), but if they are brought near fire, they melt, become water (ap) and take on a moist nature (dravatva). Water, exposed to the cold, solidifies, becomes ice and takes on a solid nature (khakkhaṭṭva). Stone when compressed becomes gold, gold when decompressed changes into copper (tāmra) or returns to stone. For beings (satva), it is the same: the bad (pāpa) can become good (kuśala) and the good can become bad. This is why we know that no dharma has a fixed nature. The transformations (nirmāṇa) brought about by the power of the abhijñās are real and not false. If each thing had a fixed nature originally, it could never be transformed.

[c. Āryarddhi]. – Thirdly, the noble magical power (āryarddhi) is to have domination dependent on good pleasure (yathākāmaṇasīva) over the six sense objects (viśaya):

“1) Faced with a pleasant object, to produce a notion of unpleasantness; 2) faced with an unpleasant object, to produce a notion of pleasantness; 3) eliminating both the notions of pleasantness and unpleasantness, to become established in a mind of indifference: this is the threefold abhijñā [of noble magical power].”¹³⁸

The Buddha alone possesses this abhijñā of domination (vaśitvābhijñā).

B. Abhijñā of divine hearing

The bodhisattva in possession of this abhijñā [of magical power] moves through the buddhafiels (buddhaḥṣetra) but, in these various fiels, the languages are not the same, and the bodhisattva, not understanding the small beings located afar, seeks the abhijñā of divine hearing (divyaśrotra). Remembering always the great sounds (śabda) pronounced in many audiences, he grasps their characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇāti) and cultivates the practice of them. As a result of this continuous practice, his ear (śrotra) contacts a subtle matter (rūpaprasāda) derived from the four great elements of the world of form (rūpadhātucaturmahābhūtabautika) and, possessing this matter, he succeeds in hearing at a distance.¹³⁹ Without any difficulty, the bodhisattva penetrates articulated sounds (śabda), divine (divya) and human (mānuṣa), whether coarse (audārika) or subtle (sūkṣma) distant or close (ye vā dūre ye vāntika).

2. Order proposed by the Dhyānasūtra

¹³⁸ Noble magic, belonging to the saint whose spiritual faculties have been developed (bhāvitendriya): it is holy (āryā), free of āsrava and upadhi, in contrast to the ṛddhi of miracles (eko 'pi bhūtva bahudhā bhavati, etc.) which, having āsrava and upadhi, is not holy (anārya),.

Here the Traité reproduces the canonical definition: Digha, III, p. 112-113; Majjhima, III, p. 301;

Samyutta, V, p. 119, 295, 317-318; Anguttara, III, p. 169-170; Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 212:

So sace ākaṅkhati: Paṭikkūle appaṭikkūlasaññī vihareyyan ti, appaṭikkūlasaññī tattha viharati ... upekkhako tattha viharati sato sampajāno.

¹³⁹ Kośa, VII, p. 123, explains the rūpa derived from the four great elements entering into the formation of the divine eye and the divine ear in the same way.

Question. – See what is said in the Tch'an king (Dhyānasūtra):¹⁴⁰

“1) First the ascetic obtains the divine eye (divyacakṣus). – 2) Having seen beings but not hearing their sounds, he seeks the abhijñā of divine hearing (divyaśrotra). – 3) Possessing the divine sight and divine hearing, he perceives the bodily shape (saṁsthāna) of beings as well as their articulated sounds (ghoṣa), but he does not understand their language (vāc, adhivacana) or their various expressions (nirukti) of sadness (daurmanasya) or joy (muditā), of suffering (duḥkha) or happiness (sukha). This is why he seeks the unhindered knowledge of expression (niruktiṭṭhisamvid). But then he only knows the expressions (nirukti) of beings and does not know their minds (citta); this is why he seeks the knowledge of another's mind (paracittajñāna). – 4) Knowing the minds of other [265a] beings, he still does not know where they originally came from. This is why he seeks the abhijñā of remembering former abodes (pūrvanivāsānussmṛti). – 5) Knowing their origin now, he wants to cure their mental illness (cittavyādhī). This is why he seeks the abhijñā of the destruction of the impurities (āsravaḥṣaya). – 6) Thus furnished with the five abhijñās, he cannot yet perform transformations (nirmāṇa); consequently, the beings saved by him are not numerous, for he is unable to subdue people of great merit contaminated by wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi). This is why he seeks the abhijñā of magical power (ṛddhyabhijñā).

Since this is the order to be followed, why would the bodhisattva first seek the abhijñā of magical power?¹⁴¹

Answer. –Among beings, the coarse (audārika) ones are numerous, the subtle ones (sūkṣma) are rare. This is why the yogin first uses the abhijñā of magical power. Actually, the abhijñā of miraculous power saves many people, coarse as well as subtle; this is why [the sūtra] mentions it first.

Moreover, the abhijñās differ as to the mode of their acquisition and as to their number (saṁkhyā). As for their mode of acquisition, many yogins first seek the divine eye (divyacakṣus) because it is easy to obtain. He uses the sun (sūrya), the moon (candra), stars (nakṣatra), pearls (maṇi) and fire (tejas), by grasping the common characteristic (nimitta) which is the light (āloka). He cultivates it so well, with so much diligence and exertion that day and night no longer make any difference. Above, below, in front, behind, this unique single light rises up before him without obstacle.¹⁴² This is how he acquires the abhijñā of the divine eye first. As for the other abhijñās, he acquires them in the order described above.

¹⁴⁰ This sūtra, which is often referred to by the Traité (cf. P. 1025F, 1422F, 1547F and later, k. 91, p. 705b6) places the divyacakṣus at the head of the abhijñās and ṛddhi at the end. This rather unusual order, is that of the Dharmasamgraha, § 20 and the Mahāvīyutpatti, no. 202-208.

¹⁴¹ According to the most commonly accepted order, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras place the ṛddhi at the head of the abhijñās.

¹⁴² This way of acquiring the divine eye, known in Pāli as ālokaḥṣiṇa, is fully described in Visuddhimagga, ed. H. C. Warren, p. 361-362.

3. Order followed by the Buddha on the night of bodhi.¹⁴³

Finally, the Buddha taught the order of the abhijñās in accord with the way he had acquired them:

1. During the first watch (prathamē yāme) the Buddha obtained one ‘superknowledge’ abhijñā and one ‘knowledge’ (F: science) vidyā, viz., the abhijñā of magical power (ṛddhi) and the vidyā of former abodes (pūrvanivāsa).
2. During the middle watch (madhyame yāme), he obtained the abhijñā of divine hearing (divyaśrotra) and the vidyā of the divine eye (divyacakṣus).
3. During the last watch (paścime yāme), he obtained the abhijñā of the awareness of others’ minds (paracittajñāna) and the vidyā of the destruction of the impurities (āsravaṣaya).

Here, since the search for the vidyās consists of the harder effort (vyāpāna), they are placed second. Abhijñā and vidyā are acquired in an order comparable to that of the four fruits of the religious life (catuḥśrāmanyaphala) where the greatest are placed second.¹⁴⁴

Question. – If the divine eye (divyacakṣus), being easy to obtain (sulabha), is placed first, why does the bodhisattva not obtain the divine eye first?

¹⁴³ Here the Traité takes its inspiration from relatively late sources in the words of which, during the night at Bodhi-Gayā, the Buddha conquered the six abhijñās.

1. During the first watch of the night, ṛddhivijāyajāñāna and pūrvanivāsānānumṛtijñāna; during the middle watch, divyaśrotrañāna and divyacakṣurjñāna; during the last watch, cetahparyāyajāñāna and āsravaṣayajāñāna, either in the order: no. 1, 4, 2, 5, 3, 6. Cf. Catuspariśatsūtra, p. 432, l. 4 – 434, l. 13; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, K. 4, p. 123c14-124b8 (cf. G. Tucci, Il trono di diamante, p. 207-210, where the order is slightly different).

2. During the first watch, kāyābhijñā (= ṛddhyabhijñā?) and pūrvanivāsānūmṛtyabhijñā; during the middle watch, divyaśrotra and divyacakṣus; during the last watch, paracittajñāna and āsravaṣayajāñāna, either in the order abhijñā no. 1, 4, 2, 5, 3, 6. Cf. Abhinīṣkramaṇasūtra, T 190, k. 30, p. 793a-794c3.

But according to the old canonical sources, the Buddha attained only three jñānas in the course of the three watches of the night: pūrvanivāsānūmṛtijñāna, cyutupapāḍajāñāna and āsravāṇāṃ kṣayajāñāna, i.e., abhijñās 4, 5 and 6, forming altogether the threefold knowledge (vidyatrāya). Cf. Vinaya, III, p. 4, l. 17 – 5, l. 38; Majjhima, I, p. 22, l. 9-23, l. 28-117; 247, l. 36 – 249, l. 22; Anguttara, IV, p. 177, l. 9 – 179, l. 13; Madhyama, T 26, k. 40, p. 680a1-b7; Ekottara, T 125, k. 23, p. 666b24-c20; Dharmagupt. Vin., T 1428, k. 31, p. 781b5-c10; Mahīśāsaka Vin. T 1421, k. 15, p. 102c19-20 (contrary to usage, the latter has the second vidyā as paracittajñāna but claims to follow the T’ai tseu jouei ying pen k’i king, T 185, k. 2, p. 478a5-9 in doing so).

¹⁴⁴ To enter into the fruits of the religious life, the ascetic must pass through two stages each time: that of candidate for the fruit (phalapratiṣṭhā) and that of abiding in the fruit (phalastha). This is why the texts distinguish eight kinds of āryapudgala (cf. Kośa, VI, p. 232; Traité, p. 1390F).

Answer. – All dharmas are easy for the bodhisattva to obtain and do not present any difficulty; for other people who are of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), some are hard to obtain, others are easy.

Moreover, during the first watch of the night (prathamē yāme), when king Māra came to fight against the Buddha, the Bodhisattva, by the power of his abhijñā [of magical power], performed various transformations (nirmāṇa) that changed the weapons of Māra’s warriors into necklaces (keyūra, niṣka). Having vanquished Māra’s army, the Bodhisattva began to think about [this] abhijñā and wanted to fulfill it completely (paripūrana). He formulated the thought of it and immediately found the position of attack (avatāralābha). Completely fulfilling the abhijñā, he conquered Māra.¹⁴⁵ - Then he wondered why he alone could possess such a great power, and by investigating the vidyā of former abodes (pūrvanivāsa), he understood that it was by accumulating the power of merit (punyaśala) lifetime after lifetime.

During the middle watch (madhyame yāme), Māra having retreated, calm and tranquility reigned and there was no more noise (ghoṣa). Out of loving-kindness and pity for all beings, the Bodhisattva thought about the cries uttered by Māra’s troops and gave rise to the abhijñā of divine hearing (divyaśrotra) and the vidyā of the divine eye (divyacakṣus). Using this divine hearing, he heard the cries of suffering and happiness uttered by beings of the ten directions and the five destinies (pañcagati). Hearing their cries, he wanted to see their shapes (saṃsthāna) as well and, since the veils (antarāyika) prevented his seeing them, he sought the divine eye (divyacakṣus).

During the last watch (paścime yāme), when he saw the shapes of beings, he wanted to understand their minds (citta) and thus, by seeking the knowledge of [265b] others’ minds (paracittajñāna), he knew the thoughts of beings. – Everybody wants to avoid suffering and to look for happiness. This is why the Bodhisattva sought the abhijñā of the destruction of impurities (āsravaṣaya). And since, of all happiness, that of the destruction of impurities is the highest, the Bodhisattva causes others attain it.

Question. – The bodhisattva who has acquired the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) has, from one lifetime to the next, always obtained the abhijñās as fruit of retribution (vipākaphala). At the time [of his enlightenment] why does he have doubts about himself and does not know the minds of beings when he sees them?

Answer. – There are two kinds of bodhisattvas: i) the bodhisattva with body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya); ii) the bodhisattva who, in order to save beings, assumes human qualities (manuṣyadharmā) out of skillful means in order to save beings: he is born into the family of king Tsing-fan (Śuddhodana); he makes a trip to the four gates of the city and asks questions about an old man, a sick man and death.¹⁴⁶ This bodhisattva is in possession of the six abhijñās when he is seated under the king of the trees. Moreover, the abhijñās previously held by this bodhisattva were not yet perfected (paripūrṇa) and it is now, during the three watches of the night that they are [really] acquired.¹⁴⁷ That this Buddha who exercises human qualities still has doubts of himself does not constitute a fault (doṣa).

¹⁴⁵ See p. 339-346F.

¹⁴⁶ See p. 22F, n. 2.

¹⁴⁷ See p. 1556-57F

Question. – Concerning the order of the six abhijñās, the divine eye (divyacakṣus) always comes first, whereas the abhijñā of the destruction of the impurities comes last. But is it always so?

Answer. – Most often, the divine eye comes first and the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities comes last. However, sometimes, in consideration of the easiest method, either the divine hearing (divyaśrotra) or the bases of magical power (ṛddhipāda) is placed first.¹⁴⁸

Some say: The divine hearing (divyaśrotra) is easy to obtain in the first dhyāna because this dhyāna involves enquiry (vitarka), analysis (vicāra) and four (? , sic) minds (citta).

The divine eye (divyacakṣus) is easy to obtain in the second dhyāna because the visual consciousness being absent there, the mind is concentrated (samāhita) and free of distraction (avikṣipta).

The abhijñā of magical power (ṛddhi) is easy to obtain in the third dhyāna because in this dhyāna “one experiences bliss physically” (sukham kāyena pratisamvedayati).

All the abhijñās are easy to obtain in the fourth dhyāna because this dhyāna is the place of all security (sarvayogaḥkṣemasthāna).

On the meaning of the three abhijñās:¹⁴⁹ memory of former abodes (pūrvanivāsa), etc., see [above, p. 1555-1563F] what was said about the ten powers (bala).

Second Section DISTINGUISHING THE MOVEMENTS OF MIND OF ALL BEINGS

Like all the abhijñās, the third abhijñā or knowledge of others’ minds (cetahparyāyājñāna = paracittajñāna) concerns the thoughts of beings occupying the same ‘level’ as that in which the abhijñā has been obtained or a lower level. Thus, if he so wishes, an ascetic in the fourth dhyāna can examine the minds of beings in kāmādhātu and the four dhyānas, but not of formless beings. He knows only the minds of present beings but not those of future or past beings. Furthermore, an ascetic of dull faculties (mṛdvindriya) cannot take hold of the minds of a being of sharp faculties (tīkṣnendriya) abiding on the same level as himself. Finally, a worldly person (prthagana) cannot know the minds of a śrāvaka, a śrāvaka is ignorant of those of a pratyekabuddha, and a pratyekabuddha knows nothing of those of a Buddha. Thus, effective though it may be, an abhijñā is restricted to one realm and does not attain the totality of beings.

However, in order to fulfill his ideal and assure the benefit and happiness of all creatures, the bodhisattva must know beforehand the minds of all the beings of the threefold world, past, future and present. This is why he aspires to a ¹⁴⁸ The divine eye (divyacakṣus) or cyutupapādajñāna is placed at the head of the abhijñās in Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 34, p. 247b23; Saddharmapund., p. 134, l. 11; Mahāvvyut., np, 202; Dharmasamgraha, § 20; Dhyānasūtra, cited above. – The divine hearing (divyaśrotra) occupies first place in Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 29, p. 209b10; k. 41, p. 302a25; 303c12.

– According to the most commonly used (cf. p. 1809F), ṛddhiviśaya appears first and āsravakṣaya last.

¹⁴⁹ More correctly, the three vidyās.

paracittajñāna higher than that of the third abhijñā. He understands, so the Prajñāpāramitā tells us, how to distinguish the “movements of mind of all beings” (sarvasattvacittacaritavispandita).

Although the text does not say it explicitly, this universal awareness, in space as well as in time, is the prerogative of the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas of the tenth bhūmi and is only an aspect of omniscience par excellence, i.e., sarvākārajñatā.

But, someone will say, “the world of beings is infinite” (anantaḥ satvalokaḥ) and, infinity being without beginning or end, will never be known to the very end, from A to Z. But that is just a specious objection which the Traité, once again, will refute victoriously.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 13-14; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 67, l. 17–68, l. 1). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to know the movements of mind of all beings must practice the perfection of wisdom (Sarvasattvacittacaritavispanditāni vijñātukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyām śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE KNOWLEDGE OF ANOTHER’S MIND AND THE AWARENESS OF THE MOVEMENTS OF MIND OF ALL BEINGS

Question - In regard to the six abhijñās, we have just spoken about the abhijñā of knowing another’s mind (paracittajñāna).¹⁵⁰ Why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra repeat it here?

Answer. – The abhijñā of knowing the mind of another (paracittajñā) has a restricted range (viśaya, gocara); it knows only the minds (citta) and mental events (caitasika dharma) of presently existing (pratyuṭpanna) beings belonging to the desire realm (kāmadhātu) and the form realm (rūpadhātu), but it does not know the minds and mental events of past (atīta) and future (anāgata) beings or beings belonging to the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).¹⁵¹

¹⁵⁰ The third abhijñā of the sūtras, also called cetahparyāyājñāna, in Pāli cetopariyāñāna.

¹⁵¹ The awareness of the mind of others works by deduction: it considers the rūpa of beings, their color-shape, and from that deduces that such and such a being having such and such rūpa must have such and such a mind: Ēdṛṣe rūpa idṛṣaṃ cittaṃ bhavati. It reveals only the minds of beings belonging to the two form realms (kāma- and rūpadhātu) and who are presently existing. The minds of formless beings escapes it, for these beings, by definition, have no rūpa. Neither do they do know the minds of past beings who no longer have rūpa, nor of future beings, who do not yet have it. See Kośa, VIII, p. 102.

Among ordinary people (prthagjana), the abhijñās that depend on the four higher dhyānas (mauladhyāna)¹⁵² have as their realm (viśaya) the level on which the abhijñā has been acquired or a lower level (adhobhūmi).¹⁵³

They are fully cognizant of the minds and mental events of the beings situated in the four continents (caturdvīpaka).

Among the śrāvakas, the abhijñās that depend on the four higher dhyānas have as their domain the level on which the abhijñā has been acquired or a lower level. They are fully aware of the minds and mental events of beings occupying a thousand universes (lokadhātu).

Among the pratyekabuddhas, the abhijñās that depend on the four higher dhyānas have as their domain the level on which the abhijñā has been acquired or a lower level. They are fully cognizant of the minds and mental events of beings occupying a hundred thousand universes (lokadhātu).

Ascetics of dull faculties (mṛdvindriya) of a higher level cannot cognize the minds and mental events of ascetics of sharp faculties (tīkṣhendriya) of a lower level.

Worldly people (prthagjana) cannot cognize the minds and mental events of śrāvakas. Śrāvakas cannot cognize the minds and mental events of pratyekabuddhas. Pratyekabuddhas cannot cognize the minds and mental events of the Buddhas.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says that the ‘bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wants to know the movements of the mind of all beings [265c] should practice the perfection of wisdom.’

II. THE MOVEMENTS OF MIND ARE COGNIZED BY AN INFALLIBLE LIBERATION

Question. – By what knowledge (jñāna) can one cognize the minds and mental events of all beings?

Answer. – The Buddhas possess an unhindered liberation (asaṅgavimokṣa)¹⁵⁴ and, having entered into this liberation, they cognize the minds and mental events of all beings. The great bodhisattvas, having a ‘semblance’ of unhindered liberation,¹⁵⁵ can also cognize the minds and mental events of all beings.

¹⁵² The first five abhijñā, of which the awareness of the minds of others, are obtained by an ascetic in dhyāna (cf. Kośa, VII, p. 101) and have as their realm (viśaya) the level of the dhyāna on which they have been acquired or a lower level (cf. Kośa, VII, p. 104). Therefore the abhijñā of paracittajñāna does not know the mind of another when the latter is of a level higher than that of the abhijñā.

¹⁵³ By ‘higher dhyānas’ the Traité means the four basic dhyānas (mauladhyāna) that have been discussed above, p. 1027-1032F; 1233-1238F.

¹⁵⁴ Wou-ngai-kiai-t’ouo, ‘unhindered liberation or deliverance’ probably renders an original Sanskrit asaṅgavimokṣa or apratihatavimokṣa. It belongs to the Buddhas and great bodhisattvas who, thanks to it, cognize

Thus the beginning (ādikarmika) bodhisattvas would like to obtain this unhindered liberation of the great bodhisattvas and this unhindered liberation of the Buddhas and, by means of this unhindered liberation, cognize the minds and mental events of all beings. The great bodhisattvas would like to obtain the unhindered liberation of the Buddhas.

This is why [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra], although it has already (p. 1824F) spoken of the abhijñā of knowing the minds of others (paracittajñā) speaks again of the bodhisattva who, “wanting to cognize the movements of mind of all beings, should practice the perfection of wisdom”.

Question. – When ‘movements of mind’ (cittacaritavispandita) are spoken of here, either the mind¹⁵⁶ has gone (gata) or the mind has not yet gone (agata).

If it has gone, “one is without mind (acetana), like a dead man.”¹⁵⁷

If the mind has not gone, how would one cognize it? Actually, the Buddha said: “It is in dependence on the mind (manas) [as antecedent organ] and on the dharma as object (ālambana) that the mental consciousness (manovijñāna)¹⁵⁸ arises.” If the mind (manas) has not gone, there is no meeting (saṃgati) between the manas-organ and the dharma-object].¹⁵⁹ the past and the future. See above, p. 328F, 1355F, 1357F, 1595F, 1652F, 1663F. Compare acintyavimokṣa (Tib. nam par thar pa bsaṃ gyis mi khyab pa) of the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, transl., p. 250=158.

¹⁵⁵ A ‘semblance’ of an unhindered liberation, i.e., a liberation similar to that of the Buddhas assuring a complete dominance over objects.

¹⁵⁶ By mind, here we should understand the manas (in Chinese, yí) also called mana-indriya, mana-āyatana, mano-dhātu, organ and support of the mental consciousness (manovijñāna).

¹⁵⁷ Conforming to a canonical topic (Tchong a han, T 26, k. 58, p. 789a4-5; Saṃyutta, III, p. 143, l. 4-5; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 21, p. 150b9-10) cited in Sanskrit in Kośabhāṣya, p. 73, 243:

Āyur ūṣmātha vijñānaṃ yadā kāyaṃ jahaty amī / apaviddhas tadā śete yathā kāṣṭham acetanaḥ //

“When life, heat and consciousness leave the body, it lies there abandoned, like a piece of wood, without intellection.

¹⁵⁸ Majjhima, I, p. 112; III, p. 281; Saṃyutta, II, p. 72, 73, 74, 75; Mahāniddeśa, II, p. 276: Manañ ca paṭicca dhamme ca uppajjati manovijñānaṃ.

The punctuation in Taisho should be corrected: the period should be placed after yí che cheng.

¹⁵⁹ According to the Sarvāstivādin interpretation: the mental consciousness (manovijñāna) is the result of two conditions (pratyaya): 1) an immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaya) that serves a point of support (āśraya), namely, the manas, and by manas is meant that one of the six consciousnesses that has just passed (saṃnām ananantarātītaṃ vijñānaṃ yad dhi tan manaḥ);

2) an object condition (ālambanapratyaya), namely, the six things (dharma).

The result is that if the manas has gone (nirgata), i.e., has left the body, the body is without intellection like a piece of wood. If, on the other hand, the manas has not yet gone, the manovijñāna that should immediately

Answer. – You should know that the mind does not leave (na gacchatī) and does not stay (na tiṣṭhatī). Actually, it is said in the Prajñāpāramitā: “All dharmas are without the nature of coming (āgati) and going (gati).”¹⁶⁰ Then why do you speak here of a mind having an arrival and a departure?

[Paramārthaśūnyatāsūtra]. – It is said that “all dharmas, when they arise, do not come from anywhere, and when they perish, do not go anywhere.”¹⁶¹ To claim that they have an arrival and a departure is to fall into the belief in permanence (śāśvatadr̥ṣṭi). Dharmas have no fixed nature (niyatalakṣaṇa).

Consequently, it is only from the meeting (saṃgati) between the six internal organs (adhyātmendriya) and the six external objects (bāhyaviṣaya) that the six consciousnesses (vijñāna) arise together with the six sensations (vedanā), the six concepts (saṃjñā) and the six volitions (saṃskāra).¹⁶² Therefore, the mind being like a magic show (māyā), one can “cognize the minds and mental events of all beings”, but there is no subject that cognizes (jānaka) nor any subject that sees (paśyaka).¹⁶³

It is said in the T’an-mo-ho-yen p’in (Mahāyānastutiparivarta): “If the minds and mental events of all beings existed essentially and in reality (tattvatas) and were not false, the Buddha could not know the minds and mental events of all beings. But because the minds and mental events of all beings are follow it cannot arise. Thus there is no meeting (saṃgati) between organ, object of consciousness and vijñāna, and the process of consciousness is blocked. See Kośa, I, p. 31-32, 95; III, p. 85.

¹⁶⁰ Cf. Pañcaviṃśati, ed. Dutt, p. 239, l. 12-15 (T 223, k. 6, p. 264b22-26; T 220, vol. VII, k. 419, p. 102c25-103a1); Śatasāhasrikā, ed. Ghosa, p. 1586, l. 4-8 (T220, vol. V, k. 58 p. 39b16-20): Yad api Subhūtiṃ evam āha. nāpi tasya mahāyānasya āgatir dr̥śyate nāpi gatir na sthānaṃ dr̥śyata iti. evam etat Subhūte tasya mahāyānasyāgatir na dr̥śyate nāpi gatir na sthānaṃ dr̥śyate. tat kasya hetoḥ. acalā hi Subhūte darvadharmās te na kvacid gacchanti na kutaścid āgacchanti na kvacit tiṣṭhanti. – Subhūti said: “In this Mahāyāna, neither coming nor going nor staying is noticed.” That is good, O Subhūti: in this Mahāyāna, no coming nor going nor staying are noticed. Why? Immobile, O Subhūti, are all dharmas; they do not go anywhere, they do not come from anywhere, and they do not stay anywhere.

¹⁶¹ This Paramārthaśūnyatāsūtra, the original Sanskrit text of which will be found below (p. 2135F), states that the five skandhas – and consequently all conditioned dharmas – do not come from anywhere and do not go anywhere: Cakṣur bhikṣava upadāyamānaṃ na kutaścid āgacchati, nirudhyamānaṃ ca na kvacit saṃnicayaṃ gacchati.

¹⁶² Cf. Majjhima, I, p. 293: Yā ca vedanā yā ca saññā yañ ca viññāṇaṃ ime dhammā saṃsaṭṭhā no visamsaṭṭhā, na ca labbhā ime saṃ dhammānaṃ vinibbhujitvā vinibbhujitvā nānākaraṇaṃ paññāpetuṃ. Yaṃ hi vedeti taṃ sañjānāti, yaṃ sañjānāti taṃ vijjānāti. – All sensations, notions and consciousnesses are things associated and non-dissociated; it is impossible to separate them one from another and to show their differences, for whatever one feels, that one conceives, and whatever one conceives, that one cognizes.

¹⁶³ In other words, knowing the movements of mind of all beings does not consist of detailing them one by one, but of penetrating their true nature (dharmaṭā), characterless like a magic show. Only the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas possess such an overall view.

essentially and really false, without coming (āgati) or going (gati), the Buddha knows the minds and mental events of all beings.”¹⁶⁴

To take an example: if the bhikṣu is greedy (adhyavasita), he does not receive offerings (pūjā), but if he has no ulterior motive, he lacks for nothing. It is the same for the mind (citta). If it imagines (vikalpayati) and grasps at characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇāti), it does not find the truth and, not finding the truth, it cannot penetrate or know the minds and mental events of all beings. On the other hand, if it does not grasp at characteristics and does not imagine anything, it finds the truth and, finding the truth, it penetrates and knows the minds and mental events of all beings without encountering any obstacles.

III. ARE THE BEINGS TO BE KNOWN INFINITE IN NUMBER?¹⁶⁵

¹⁶⁴ The Mahāyānastutiparivarta, abbreviated to Stutiparivarta, is the XLIVth chapter of the Pañcaviṃśati (T 223, k. 12, p. 311c5-313a25). There it says (p. 311c28-29) that the Prajñāpāramitā is a perfection without going because all dharmas are without coming (agamanapāramiteyaṃ Bhagavan sarvadharmāgamanatām upādāya).

This total immobility is also applied to citta and the caitasika dharmas. In the Pañcaviṃśati, ed. Dutt, p. 116, l. 5-7, Subhūti asks the Buddha: Kena kāraṇena, Bhagavan, bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya cittaṃ nāvalīyate na saṃlīyate. The Lord replies: Tathāhi, subhūte, bodhisattvo mahāsattvaś cittacaitasikān dharmān nopalabhate na samanupaśyati.

¹⁶⁵ This problem has already been studied (p. 146-161F, 529-530F, 1682F): how to reconcile the omniscience of the Buddha with the existence of an infinite number of beings? Infinity is unknowable for, by definition, one never finishes traveling through it (p. 153F). Therefore the Buddha cannot know all the minds of an infinite number of beings and he is not omniscient.

Encountering this objection, the Traité first shows its faithfulness to the canonical texts and states: “Beings are infinite in number and the wisdom (knowledge) of the Buddha is infinite: that is the truth.”

On the one hand, the Buddha is proclaimed to be omniscient, and the Buddha cannot lie; on the other hand, the canonical texts seem to accept the existence of infinite realities, in space as well as in time:

1. In the Anamataggasutta (Samyutta, II, p. 178-193), the Buddha himself spoke of beings the beginning of which is unknown and that are led into a saṃsāra without beginning or end.
2. Atthasālinī, p. 160, l. 26-28, posits four infinities (cattāri anantāni): i) space (ākāśa), ii) the circles around the world (cakkavāla), iii) the world of beings (sattakāya), iv) the knowledge of the Buddha (buddhañāna).
3. Kośabhāṣya (p. 113, l. 21-22) will in turn recognize: “There is no production of new beings. Although [innumerable] Buddhas appear and incalculable beings reach parinirvāṇa, there is no final exhaustion of beings” (nāsty apūrvasattvapradurbhāvah. pratibuddhītpādē cāsaṃkhyeyasattvaparinirvāṇe ’pi nāsti sattvānāṃ parikṣayaḥ).

But this does not answer the objection in the words of which, infinite realities not being knowable to the very end, there is no omniscience to cognize them, and the Buddha himself does not know them.

Thus, examining the problem more deeply, the Traité finally adopts a more radical position. While the sūtras and the śāstras tell us about infinite beings and universes, those are statements of a practical order (upāyokti) and not true doctrine (cf. p. 529F). If the Buddha teaches us about the infinity of suffering, the eternity of saṃsāra, it

Question. – But can all the minds of beings (satva) be known completely? If they can all be known completely, then beings are limited in number (antavat). If they [266a] cannot be known completely, why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speak here about “the bodhisattva wishing to know the movements of the mind of all beings” and how would the Buddha really have the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā)?

Answer. – All the minds (citta) and mental events (caitasika dharma) of beings can be known completely. Why is that?

1. Because [the Buddha claims to know them completely] and it is said in the sūtras that, among all those who speak truthfully (satyavādin), the Buddha is foremost.¹⁶⁶ If it were impossible to know completely all the minds of beings and if one came up against the limits, how could the Buddha say that he knows them completely and how could he call himself omniscient (sarvajña)? But since the words of the Buddha are truthful, there must necessarily be an omniscient one.

2. Furthermore, although beings may be infinite in number (ananta), omniscience (sarvajñatā) itself is infinite. When a letter (lekha) is big, the envelope containing it is also big.¹⁶⁷ If the wisdom of the Buddha were limited (antavat) and if the number of beings were limitless (ananta), the objection [that you have raised against the omniscience of the Buddha] would be pertinent. But in the present case, the wisdom of the Buddha and the number of beings are both limitless: therefore your objection does not hold.

3. Finally, when it is a question of finite (antavat) and infinite (ananta), it is customary in the Buddhadharmā to reply by not responding (sthāpanīya vyākaraṇam). The fourteen difficult questions is in order to detach us from the world and to save us. He forbids speculation on the finite and the infinite, the eternal and the transitory, the grasping of characteristics and freeing oneself from vain proliferation. These metaphysical problems are absurd and dangerous. Why debate on the infinite number of beings when the being (satva) does not exist? Why discuss the eternity of saṃsāra when the latter is, from the beginning, confused with nirvāṇa?

Thus the Buddha declined to pronounce on the question of whether the world and the self are eternal or non-eternal, finite or infinite, etc. (cf. p. 155F); those are unanswerable questions (avyākṛtavastu), because any answer, affirmative or negative, would be a wrong view (p. 423F). Far from being a confession of ignorance, the Buddha’s silence on this subject indicates his complete wisdom (p. 1682F).

¹⁶⁶ Cf. Dīgha, I, p. 4; III, p. 170; Anguttara, II, p. 209; IV, p. 249. 389: Musāvādaṃ pahāya musāvādā paṭivirato samano Gotamo saccavādī saccasandho theto paccayiko avisamvādakpo lokassa. – He avoids falsehood, he abstains from lying, the monk Gotama; he speaks the truth, he has set off bound for the truth; worthy of faith, he is certain of not betraying his word towards people.

We have seen above (p. 146-152F) how the Buddha’s contemporaries down to the most humble cowherds recognized his omniscience.

¹⁶⁷ The comparison of the letter and the envelope has already been used above (p. 153F, 530F, 646F).

[among which are the finite and the infinite] being unreal (abhūta), false (asat) and useless (vyartha),¹⁶⁸ you cannot make any objection [to the omniscience of the Buddha].

Question. – If the finite and the infinite are both false, why did the Buddha speak of ‘infinities’ in several places? Thus he said: “Beings who, full of error (moha) and desire (trṣṇā), have come [into saṃsāra] have neither beginning nor end”,¹⁶⁹ and also: “The ten directions (daśadiś) also are limitless.”¹⁷⁰

Answer. – Beings are infinite in number (ananta) and the wisdom of the Buddha is infinite: that is the truth. But if a person is attached to infinity (anantam abhinivīṣate), grasps at the characteristic (nimittam udgrhṇāti) and gives himself over to idle discursiveness (prapañca), the Buddha says that infinity is wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi).¹⁷¹

It is the same [with infinity] as for the eternity (śāśvata) and non-eternity (aśāśvata) of the world (loka): both are deceptions and come within the fourteen difficult questions. However, the Buddha has often spoken of non-eternity in order to save beings, whereas he did not speak much of eternity. If someone is attached to non-eternity (aśāśvatam abhinivīṣate), grasps at the characteristic (nimittam udgrhṇāti) and gives himself up to futile discursiveness, the Buddha says that he acts from wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi) and error. But if someone, without being attached to non-eternity, simply recognizes: “That which is non-eternal is suffering; that which is suffering is non-self; that which is non-self is empty,”¹⁷² this person, thus being based on the vision of non-eternity (aśāśvatavipasyanāśrita), enters into the emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā) and is in the truth. This is why we know that non-eternity introduces one into the real truth, but also makes up part of the fourteen difficult questions for, by [hypostatizing it], by becoming attached to its causes and conditions (hetupratyayābhinviśāt), that is a wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi).

¹⁶⁸ Once again the Traité returns to the fourteen difficult questions on which the Buddha declined to comment (cf. P. 154-158F, 421F, 423F, 529-530F, 1589F, 1682F). In the questions about the infinity and eternity of the world and of beings, the four envisaged alternatives are incorrect and no categorical response is acceptable. Cf. Kośa, IX, p. 267.

¹⁶⁹ A free citation of a well-known stock phrase which has given its name to a section of the Saṃyutta, the Anamataggasaṃyutta. At first sight, it concerns the eternity of saṃsāra rather than the infinity of the world of beings, but the two notions are connected.

The Pāli wording appears in Saṃyutta, II, p. 178-193; III, p. 149-151; V, p. 226, 441; Cullaniḍḍesa, p. 273; Kathāvatthu, I, p. 29: Anamatagg ‘āyaṃ bhikkhave saṃsāro pubbakoṭi na paññāyati avijjānīvaraṇānaṃ sattānaṃ taṇhāsaṃyojanānaṃ sandhāvataṃ saṃsāratam. – Of unknown beginning, O monks, is this saṃsāra: one does not know the beginning of beings who, obstructed by ignorance and fettered by desire, run about and wander [from birth to birth].

For this ‘logion’ which shows many variations, see below, p. 2096F.

¹⁷⁰ The Mahāyānasūtras endlessly speak of universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and of innumerable and incalculable buddhafiels.

¹⁷¹ Brahmajālasutta of Dīgha, I, p. 23-24: Ye pi te samaṇabrāhmaṇā evaṃ āhaṃsu anato ayaṃ loko aparīyanto ti, tesam pi musā. – “The monks and brāhmaṇas who say that this world is infinite, that it is without limit, they too are in error.”

¹⁷² Saṃyutta, III, p. 22, 82, 84; IV, p. 1: yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ, yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā...

Here I have spoken about non-eternity (aśāsvata) in order to clarify [the question] of infinity (ananta): it is as a result of the infinity [of suffering] that beings conceive distaste (nirveda) for the length of saṃsāra, [but the infinity of suffering is not a thing in itself: suffering is simply very long].

[Lohita or Tiṃsamattā sutta]¹⁷³. – Thus forty bhikṣus from the land of *Po-li*¹⁷⁴ who observed fully the twelve pure practices (dhūtaguṇa) came to the Buddha who taught them the practice of disgust (nirveda, saṃvega).

¹⁷³ Sūtra entitled Tiṃsamattā ‘The thirty’ in the Pāli Saṃyutta, II, p. 187-189, and Lohita ‘The blood’ in the Chinese Sanskrit sources: Tsa a han, T 99, no. 937, k. 33, p. 240b-c; Pie-yi tsa a han, T 100, no. 330, k. 16, p. 485c-486a; Tseng-yi a han, T 125, k. 49, p. 814b11-21. The Pāli locates this sūtra at Rājagṛha in the Veṇuvana; the Sanskrit, sometimes at Vaiśālī on the Maṇḍakāśāla, sometimes at Śrāvastī in the Jetavana. Here are a few translations of extracts from the Pāli text (Saṃyutta, II, p. 187-198):

One day the Blessed One was staying at Rājagṛha in the Bamboo Forest.

Then some monks from Pāvā, thirty in number, all dwelling in the forest, living on alms, clothed in rags, wearing the three robes only but still victims of the fetters, came to where the Blessed One was. Having come near him and having saluted the Blessed One, they sat down at one side.

The Blessed One had this thought: These monks from Pāvā, thirty in number, all dwelling in the forest... are still victims of the fetters. What if I preached the Dharma to them in such a way that even here on their very seats, their minds could be liberated from the impurities by means of detachment?

The Blessed One said: Of unknown beginning, O monks, is this saṃsāra: the very beginning is unknown of beings who, obstructed by ignorance and fettered by desire, run around and wander (from birth to birth).

What do you think, O monks? Which is greater: the blood that has been spilled and spread about by you when your heads have been cut off while you were running around and wandering (in saṃsāra) for so long, or the water in the four great oceans?

– Lord, as we understand the Dharma preached by the Blessed One, it is the blood spilled out and spread around when our heads have been cut off while we were running around and wandering (in saṃsāra) for so long and not the water in the four great oceans.

– Good, good, O monks! You understand well, O monks, the Dharma preached by me...

Thus spoke the Blessed One. With joyful minds, the monks were pleased with what the Buddha had said. When this statement had been made, the minds of the thirty monks from Pāvā were freed from the impurities by means of detachment.

¹⁷⁴ The Chinese translations mentioned at the beginning of the previous note speak of forty bhikṣus from the village of Po-li-ye or forty Po-li-chō-kia bhikṣus; the Pāli version speaks of thirty Pāveyyakā bhikṣus (variant Pāṭhyaka). The commentary to Saṃyutta (II, p. 159) explains Pāveyyakā as Pāveyyadesavāsino “inhabitant of the region of Pāvā”. Pāvā (in Sanskrit, Pāpā) is the actual Kasia, situated 56 kilometers east of Gorakhpur. At the time of the Buddha, this city was the Malla capital. The early sources (Dīgha, II, p. 165; Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 252, 432, etc.) distinguish the Mallas of Pāpā (in Sanskrit, Pāpīyaka or Pāpeya, in Pāli, Pāpeyyeka) from the Mallas of Kuśinagara (in Sanskrit, Kuśināgara, in Pāli, Kosināraka). The Pāṭheyyakas played an important part at the time of the Buddhas funeral rituals and in the council of Vaiśālī (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 253).

The Buddha asked them: The five rivers, Heng-k’ie (Gaṅgā), Lan-meou-na (Yamunā), Sa-lo-yeou (Sarayū), A-tche-lo-p’o-t’i (Aciravati) and Mo-hi (Mahī) arise and empty into the great ocean (mahāsamudra).¹⁷⁵ Is the mass of water contained in this ocean great or small?

The bhikṣus answered: It is very great.

The Buddha continued: In the course of a single kalpa, during his animal existences, a single man has been cut up and flayed. In yet other circumstances when he committed a wrong-doing, his hands and feet have been cut off and his head has been cut off. Well then! His blood (lohita) that has been spilled surpasses the amount of water in the ocean. [266b]

Likewise, the blood that he has spilled during his lifetimes (ātmalābha) in the course of great kalpas infinite in number (anantamahākālpa) is incalculable, and it is the same for the tears (aśru) that he has wept and the mothers’ milk (mātṛstana) that he has sucked.¹⁷⁶

The bones (asthi) that a single man leaves during a single kalpa surpasses in height the great mountain Pi-feou-lo (Vaipulya). – [A note in the K’i-tan says: This is an Indian mountain and as the natives see it constantly, it is easy to believe it.]¹⁷⁷ Thus, the man undergoes the sufferings of saṃsāra during innumerable kalpas.

¹⁷⁵ The other versions of the sūtra do not mention these five rivers.

¹⁷⁶ Here and in the following paragraph, the Traité inserts into its Lohitasūtra three comparisons borrowed from other sūtras of the Saṃyutta.

1) The comparison of the tears is taken from the Assu-suttanta of Saṃyutta, II, p. 179-180 (T 99, no. 938, k. 33, p. 240c250241a17; T 100, no. 331, k. 16, p. 486a18-b23): Etad eva bhikkhave bahutarāṃ yaṃ vo iminā dīghena addhunā ... paggharitaṃ na tveva catūsu mahāsamuddesu udakam. – Transl.: More abundant than the water of the four great seas are the tears that you have wept, during the very long time that you have wandered in saṃsāra, moaning and crying at being united with what you do not like and being separated from what you like.

2. The comparison of the mothers’ milk is taken from the Kṣīra-suttanta in Saṃyutta, II, p. 180-181 (T 99, no. 939, k. 33, p. 241a18-b8; T 100, no. 332, k. 16, p. 486b24-c6): Etad eva bhikkhave kappam bahutarāṃ yaṃ vo iminā dīghena addhunāna tveva catūsu mahāsamuddesu udakam. – Transl.: More plentiful than the water of the four great seas is the maternal milk that you have sucked during the very long time that you were wandering in saṃsāra.

3) The compassion of the bone piles is taken from the Puggala-suttanta of Saṃyutta, II, p. 185-186 (T 99, no. 947, k. 34, p. 242a28-b15; T 100, no. 340, k. 16, p. 487b17-c3): Ekapuggalassa bhikkhave kappam sandhāvato saṃsarato siyā ... sace saṃhārako assa sambhataṃ ca na vīnesseyya. – Transl.: From a single man wandering in saṃsāra for a kalpa there would come bone skeletons, a pile of bones, a mass of bones as high as mount Vaipulya, supposing there were someone to gather up these bones and the pile would not be destroyed.

As we have seen above (p. 457F), the author of the Traité likes to construct composite sūtras.

¹⁷⁷ Edition of the Chinese Canon printed under the K’i-tan (Tartars), beginning in 1059 and included, in 1068, 579 volumes. See P. Demiéville, Sur les éditions imprimées du Canon chinois, BEFEO, XXIV, 1924, p. 207-212.

Having heard this discourse, the bhikṣus were disgusted with the world and obtained bodhi. Furthermore, learning that the beings of the ten directions are infinite in number, they felt joy, busied themselves in not destroying life (prāṇātīpāta) and won infinite merit (anantaṭṭya).

For these reasons, the beings of all the universes should pay homage (pūja) to the bodhisattva who produces the mind of bodhi for the first time (prathamacittotpādika). Why? Because, in order to save the beings of universes infinite in number, he himself uses infinite qualities (anantaḡuṇa). As they present such benefits, they are called ‘infinite’.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that the bodhisattva ‘knows the movements of mind of all beings completely’. Thus, when the sun illumines a continent (dvīpaka), it goes everywhere simultaneously and there is no place that is not illumined.

Third Section OUTSHINING THE KNOWLEDGE OF ALL THE ŚRĀVAKAS AND PRATYKABUDDHAS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃṣati, p. 21, l. 14-15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 68, l. 1-2). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to outshine the knowledge of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas must practice the perfection of wisdom (Sarvaśrāvakaṇṇapratyekabuddhānāṃ jñānaṃ abhivṛtitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. – Question. – What is the knowledge of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas?

I. KNOWLEDGE OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS¹⁷⁸

Answer. – 1. Considering the true nature of dharmas under its general characteristic (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and its specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) is the knowledge of the śrāvakas.¹⁷⁹

[Suśīmasutta.] – Thus it is said in a sūtra: “First one must use the analytical knowledge of the dharmas (dharmapracicayaḡjñāna?) and then apply the knowledge concerning nirvāṇa (nirvāṇe jñānaṃ).”¹⁸⁰ The ¹⁷⁸ This subject has been discussed already, p. 1067-1068F.

¹⁷⁹ To be more precise and as has been said above (p. 1745F), the śrāvakas know the general characteristics of conditioned dharmas, impermanence, suffering, emptiness and non-self, but they know only a restricted number of specific characteristics, solidity of earth, etc.

¹⁸⁰ Suśīmasutta of Saṃyutta, II, p. 124 (Tsa a han, T 99, k. 14, p. 97b6, already cited omn p. 1383F: Pubbe kho Susīma dhammaṭṭhitiṇāṇaṃ pacchā nibbāṇe ṇanan ti.

analytical knowledge of dharmas concerns the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa); the knowledge of nirvāṇa concerns the general characteristic (sāmānyalakṣaṇa).

2. Furthermore, the śrāvakas know the dharmas that are, respectively, deliverance (mokṣa) or bondage (bandhana); progression (pravṛtti) or regression (nivṛtti); production (utpāda) or cessation (nirodha); benefit (āsvāda) or defect (ādinava); in the opposite sense (pratiloma) or in the natural sense (anuloma); the near shore (apāra) or the opposite shore (pāra);¹⁸¹ of mundane order (laukika) or supramundane order (lokottara), and other knowledges of the same type analyzing dharmas grouped into twos. They are called knowledges of the śrāvaka.

3. There are also threefold knowledges: the knowledges bearing upon the the five aggregates of attachment (upādānaskandha) concerning their origin (samudaya), their breaking up (vikṣepa) and their disappearance (astamgama) or concerning their benefits (āsvāda), their faults (ādinava) and their deliverance (niḡsaraṇa);¹⁸² the knowledges associated with the three gates of deliverance (vimokṣaṃukhasaṃpraykta) and other knowledges analyzing the dharmas grouped into threes.

4. There are also fourfold knowledges: the knowledges consisting of the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna); - the knowledges of phenomena (dharmajñāna), the subsequent knowledge (anvayaḡjñāna), the knowledge of another’s mind (paracittajñāna) and conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtijñāna); - the knowledges of suffering (duḡkha), its origin (samudaya) its cessation (nirodha) and the path to its cessation (mārga);¹⁸³ - the knowledges of impurity (aśuci), impermanence (anitya), suffering (duḡkha) and non-self (anātman);¹⁸⁴ - the knowledges of impermanence (anitya), suffering (duḡkha), emptiness (śūnya) and non-self (anātman);¹⁸⁵ the knowledge of phenomena (dharmajñāna), the subsequent knowledge (anvayaḡjñāna), the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣayaḡjñāna) and the knowledge of their non-reoccurrence (anutpādaḡjñāna) and other knowledges of the same type analyzing dharmas grouped by fours.¹⁸⁶

But the ‘analytical knowledge’ spoken of here in the Traité does not quite give the dhammaṭṭhitiṇāṇa of the Pāli, which W. Geiger, in his translation of Saṃyutta, II, p. 172, translates as “das Wissen von der Gegesetzmaßsigkeit”. In his Pāli Dhamma, p. 12 he explains: Das Wissen von der Kausalität wird hier bestimmt als eine Vorstufe des Wissens vom Nirvāṇa.

¹⁸¹ Time-honored expressions designating saṃsāra and nirvāṇa respectively.

¹⁸² Compare the Arahasutta of Saṃyutta, III, p. 161: Yato ca kho bhikkhave bhikkhu imesaṃ pañcannaṃ upādānakkhandhānaṃ samudayaṇca atthagamaṇca assāsaṇca ādinavaṇca nissaraṇaṇca yathābhūtaṃ viditvā anupādā vimutto hoti. See also Saṃyutta, III, p. 28, l. 26-29.

¹⁸³ Four knowledges concerned with the four āryasatyas respectively.

¹⁸⁴ Knowledges counteracting the four viparyāsas.

¹⁸⁵ Knowledges bearing upon the four ākāras of the truth of suffering.

¹⁸⁶ All these other knowledges have been defined in chap. XXXVIII, p. 1465-1486F.

5. Finally, from the knowledge of *duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti*¹⁸⁷ up to the knowledges of śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi, ānimittānimittasamādhi and apraṇihitāpraṇihitasamādhi,¹⁸⁸ all the knowledges included in that interval are all śrāvaka knowledges. In summary, this is disgust for the world.

[266c] Thinking of nirvāṇa, rejecting the threefold world (traiḍhātuka), cutting the conflicting emotions (kleśaprahāṇa), obtaining the supreme dharma (agradharma), i.e., nirvāṇa: all of that is called the knowledge of the śrāvaka.

Furthermore, it is said in the Pan-jo-po-lo-mi-yi p'in (Prajñāpāramitāparivarta):¹⁸⁹ “The knowledge of the bodhisattva and the knowledge of the śrāvaka are one and the same knowledge, the difference being that the śrāvakas do not have skillful means (upāya), are not [clothed] in the great armor (na mahāsaṃnāhasaṃnaddha),¹⁹⁰ have neither great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) nor great compassion (mahākaruṇā), do not seek all the attributes of the Buddha, do not seek the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) or omniscience (sarvadharmajñatā). They are disgusted only with old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa), cut the bonds of thirst (trṣṇābandhana) and go straightway to nirvāṇa: this is the difference.

¹⁸⁷ First moment of the darśanamārga.

¹⁸⁸ Concentrations by means of which one wards off the dangers of the absorptions having as their objects emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita): cf. p. 1094F; Kośa, VIII, p. 187-190.

¹⁸⁹ Unidentified chapter and citation.

¹⁹⁰ The texts of the Greater Vehicle often speak of bodhisattva mahāsaṃnāhasaṃnaddha (in Tibetan, go cha chen po bsgos pa), i.e., ‘clothed in the great armour’. This is mentioned in Pañcaviṃśatī, ed. Ditt, p. 175, l. 6; Kumārajīva renders the expression by ta-che-ichouang-yen or ta-ichouang-yen, ‘adorned by great vows’ or ‘greatly adorned’, whereas Hiuan-tsang (T 220, vol. VII, p. 62a12) translates it as pei-ta-kong-tō-k'ai, ‘clothed in the great armour of the qualities’.

The Prajñāpāramitā (Pañcaviṃśatī, p. 175, l. 3 – 179, l. 21; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1298, l. 12 – 1313, l. 18) dedicates an entire section to the Great Armor. The bodhisattva, it explains, puts on the great armor when he decides to fulfill the six pāramitās, not for a limited number of beings but for all beings without exception (sarvasattvānām kṛtena), and this for the purpose of introducing them into the perfections and leading them to supreme complete enlightenment. He practices the six perfections without objectifying them or seizing them (śaṭ pāramitā na nimittīkaroti nopalabhate).

The Abhisamayālaṃkāra, I, v. 43, condenses this section into the following stanza:

Dānāsau śaḍvidhe teṣāṃ pratyekaṃ saṃgrahena yā / saṃnāhapratipattiḥ sā śaḍbhiḥ śaṭkair yathoditā //

“The action [consisting of] putting on the armor is represented by six sextads, the six [pāramitās], generosity, etc., combined one with the others respectively.”

The saṃnāhapratipatti thus consists of six sextads [combinations of generosity with the other five pāramitās, of morality with the other five pāramitās, etc.]: which makes a total of thirty-six aspects.

For the ‘great armor’ see also Āloka, p. 84-85.

II. KNOWLEDGE OF THE PRATYEKABUDDHAS¹⁹¹

Question. – This, then, is the knowledge of the śrāvakas. Now what is the knowledge of the pratyekabuddhas?

Answer. – The knowledge of the pratyekabuddhas is the same as the knowledge of the śrāvakas with the exception of time (kāla), sharp faculties (tīkṣhendriya) and merits (puṇya).

1. Time (kāla). – When there is no Buddha in the world or, as well, when the Buddhadharma does not exist, the ascetic who, after a minor occurrence (nidaṇa),¹⁹² leaves home and obtains bodhi, is called pratyekabuddha.

2. Sharp faculties (tīkṣhendriya). – Pratyekabuddhas differ [from śrāvakas] by their keen faculties, but their manner of being (dharmatā) is similar (tulya). It is thanks to the depth of their knowledge (jñānagambhīratā) alone that the ascetic obtains the bodhi of the pratyekabuddha.

3. Merits (puṇya). – This is a matter of merits bringing the physical marks (lakṣaṇa): one mark, two marks, or up to thirty-one marks.¹⁹³

If, when the Buddhadharma is still in existence, an ascetic has first of all obtained the quality of an ārya and then becomes arhat after the disappearance of the holy Dharma (saddharmavipralopa), he is also called pratyekabuddha but his body does not possess the physical marks.¹⁹⁴

If the pratyekabuddha is very quick (kṣipra), his career (caryā) is four lifetimes; if he is slow (manda), it is prolonged even for as long as one hundred kalpas. Like the śrāvaka: if he is fast, three lifetimes; if he is slow, sixty kalpas.¹⁹⁵

¹⁹¹ This subject has already been treated above, p. 1068-1069F.

¹⁹² Such as the king who, seeing the wreckage of his garden, understood the futility of things and attained the state of pratyekabuddha: see p. 1068F.

¹⁹³ Sharp faculties and physical marks are characteristic of the pratyekabuddhas living alone, like rhinoceroses (kaḍgaviṣṇākālpa): see p. 1069F and n.

¹⁹⁴ This is a question of the pratyekabuddha living in a group (vargacārīn). These are former śrāvakas who entered the Path during the reign of a Buddha, but only accede to bodhi during a time when the Buddha and his Dharma have disappeared: cf. Kośa, III, p. 195.

Conversely, there are bodhisattvas who withdraw and become either śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas: cf. Śūraṃgamasamādhi, transl., p. 240-241.

¹⁹⁵ For the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 83, p. 428b27-28), usually sixty kalpas are necessary in order to acquire the bodhi of the śrāvakas, one hundred kalpas to acquire that of the pratyekabuddhas, three incalculable periods to acquire that of the Buddhas. But there are exceptions.

On the lineage (gotra), the realizations (samudāgama), the abodes (vihāra) and the conduct (caritra) of pratyekabuddhas, see Asaṅga’s Yogācārabhūmi, Pratyekabuddhabhūmi, ed. A. Wayman, Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies, VIII, 1960, p. 376-377 (T 1579, k. 34, 477c-478a).

This has been fully described earlier (p. 1068-1069F).

III. EMINENT KNOWLEDGE OF THE BODHISATTVA

Question. – According to the Buddha’s words, there are four kinds of fruit of the religious life (śrāmaṇyaphala), four kinds of ārya from the srotaāpanna to the arhat, five kinds of sons of the Buddha (buddhaputra) from the srotaāpanna up to the pratyekabuddha, and three kinds of bodhi: the bodhi of the arhats, the bodhi of the pratyekabuddhas and the bodhi of the Buddhas. The bodhisattva does not appear anywhere among these arhats, these sons of the Buddha and these bodhis. Why then does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speak here of the bodhisattva “outshining the knowledge of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas”?

Answer. – The Dharma of the Buddha is of two kinds: i) the Dharma of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and ii) the Dharma of the Mahāyāna. The Dharma of the śrāvakas is small (hīna) and praises the things concerning the śrāvakas alone; it does not speak of things that concern the bodhisattva. The Dharma of the Mahāyāna is vast (mahat) and deals with things relative to the bodhisattva-mahāsattva: the production of the mind of awakening (cittotpāda), the development of the ten levels (daśabhūmibhāvanā), the access to certainty (niyāmāvakrānti), the purification of the Buddha fields (buddhaṣṭetrapariśodhana), the maturation of beings (sattvapariṣkāna) and the attainment of supreme enlightenment (abhisambodhi). In this Dharma, it is said that the bodhisattva follows on from the Buddha and should be honored as he is: he contemplates the [true] nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa) in a similar way, he is a field of merit (puṇyakṣetra) and he dominates the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

In many places, the Mahāyānasūtras praise the knowledge of the bodhisattva-mahāsattva which prevails over that of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

[Ratnakūṭasūtra].¹⁹⁶ – In the Pao-ting-king, (Ratnakūṭasūtra) it is said:¹⁹⁷ The noble cakravartin king who ¹⁹⁶ The Traité, under the title of Ratnakūṭasūtra, rendered in Chinese by Kumārajīva as Pao-ting king, is referring here to the Kāśyapaparivarta which has come down to us in a somewhat mutilated Indian version (ed. A. von Staël-Holstein, Chang-hai, 1926), one Tibetan translation (Tib. Trip., vol. 24, no. 760, 43) and four Chinese translations made under the Han between 178 and 184, under the Tsin between 265 and 420 (T 351), under the Ts’ing between 350 and 431 (T 310, k. 112, p. 631-638) and by Che-hou under the Song, about 982 (T 352). All these sources are reproduced in von Staël-Holstein which I [Lamotte] will designate as KP (Kāśyapaparivarta). F. Weller has dedicated an important series of works to them and has proposed a number of amendments to the Sanskrit text. I will cite here only the following: Zum Kāśyapaparivarta, Verdeutschung des sanskrit-tibetischen Textes, Leipzig, 1965; Kāśyapaparivarta nach des Han-Fassung verdeutscht, Buddhist Yearly, 1986-70, Halle, 1970, p. 57-221; Kāśyapaparivarta nach der Djin-Fassung verdeutscht, Mitteilungen des Instituts für Orientforschung, XII, 1966, p. 379-462; Die Sung-Fassung des Kāśyapaparivarta, Monumenta Serica, XXV, 1966, p. 207-362.

At some undetermined date, the Kāśyapaparivarta was incorporated into a vast collection of about fifty Mahāyāna sūtras, a collection known under the name of Ratnakūṭa in Sanskrit, Pao tsi king (less often, Pao ting king) in Chinese, dkon-brtegs in Tibetan. The Chinese Ta pao tsi king (T 310) in 120 kuan, was compiled at Lo-yang, under the T’ang, between 706 and 713, by Bodhiruci, a brahmin from southern India converted to Buddhism. To this purpose, Bodhiruci resorted to some earlier Chinese translations: “He used as many as 23 sūtras; 15 other sūtras of which translations also existed, were re-translated by him, either because the translations of his predecessors were not satisfactory or because the Sanskrit version that he was using differed from those previously translated; finally, he gave a new translation of 11 sūtras.” (P. Demiéville, Inde Classique, II, p. 434). In this Ta pao tsi king, the version of the Kāśyapaparivarta is in the 43rd place: this is the version entitled P’ou ming p’ou sa, done at the time of the Ts’ing by a translator whose name has been lost. – The Tibetan dkon-brtegs (Tib. Trip., vol. 22-24, no. 760) which includes 49 sūtras was translated at the beginning of the 9th century by Jinamitra, Surendrabodhi and Ye-śes sde (cf. Lalou, La version tibétaine du Ratnakūṭa, JA, Oct.-Dec., 1927, p. 233-259).

The history of the Sanskrit Ratnakūṭa as a collection of sūtras still remains obscure. The Chinese, followed later by the Tibetans, are almost the only ones to affirm its existence. In the K’ai yuan (T 2154, k. 9, p. 570b4-12) we read: “In the past, during the Tcheng-kouan period (627-649), the Dharma teacher Hiuan-tsang traveled to India and returned with Sanskrit texts. In the Hong fou sseu, he translated the Mahābodhisattvapitakasūtra, the twelfth ‘assemblage’ of the Ratnakūṭa. Later, when at Yu houa kong sseu he had finished translating the Mahāprajñā (T 220), the monks invited him to translate the Ratnakūṭa immediately. The Dharma teacher Hiuan-tsang said: “The merit in translating the Ratnakūṭa is not inferior to that of translating the Prajñā. The time remaining in my life is brief; I am afraid that I cannot finish the work.” As the requests addressed to him did not stop, he began to translate the text hastily. He was able to make only a few lines, and he said, sighing: “This sūtra does not show favorable signs for the people of this country. My strength is exhausted; I cannot finish it.” This is why he stopped translating. The day that Bodhiruci arrived (about 706?), he again presented a Sanskrit text of this [Ratnakūṭa]. The emperor Hō-ti ordered Bodhiruci to continue the remainder of the work begun by Hiuan-tsang.”

Late though it is, the Chinese evidence is no less categorical. On the other hand, when the Indian authors and commentators refer to the sūtras contained in the Chinese and Tibetan Ratnakūṭas, they cite them under their specific names as independent works and if they do mention a Ratnakūṭa, it is almost always to refer to it as Kāśyapaparivarta.

To complete the work of my [Lamotte's] predecessors, here is a list of citations of the texts in question with references, wherever possible, to the corresponding paragraphs of the edition of the Kāśyapaparivarta (KP) by Staël-Holstein.

1. Traité, T 1509 (translated by Kumārajīva): - k. 26, p. 253c17: Kāśyapapariprcchā (Kia chō wen) = KP, § 57 or Madh. vṛtti, p. 358.

This is not a reference to the Kātyāyanavāda as I [Lamotte] proposed above, p. 1684F, n. 4. - k. 28, p. 266c28: Ratnakūṭa (Pao ting king) = KP, § 83 (same comparison but applied otherwise), and 84.

2. Daśabhūmikavibhāṣā, T 1521 (translated by Kumārajīva): - k. 16, p. 109c12: Ratnakūṭasūtra (Pao ting king), in the chapter on the combined Buddhas (Houo ho a pa p'in). The quotation that follows portrays the bodhisattva Akṣayamati. - k. 17, p. 118c3: Ratnakūṭasūtra (Pao ting king), in the Kāśyapaparivarta (Kia chō p'in) = KP, § 134. This reference is interesting. It proves that the author of this Vibhāṣā, presumably Nāgārjuna, held the Kāśyapaparivarta to be a section of the Ratnakūṭa.

3. Che mo ho yen louen, T 1668 (author Nāgārjuna; translator Fa-t'i-mo-to in 401). - k. 4, p. 625a16: Ratnakūṭasūtra = ?

4. Ratnagotravibhāṣā, T 1611 (author Stīramati, about 250): - k. 3, p. 828c26 (cf. ed. Jofmston, p. 29, lo. 11): In the Ratnakūṭasūtra, the Buddha says to Kāśyapa = KP, § 64.

5. Mahāyānāvataṛā, T 1634 (author Sāramati): - k. 2, p. 48a6: Ratnakūṭasūtra = KP, § 88.

6. Mahāyānasūtrālamkāra by Asaṅga, ed. S. Lévi: - p. 165: Ratnakūṭa = KP, 6 24.

7. Mahāyansamgraha by Asaṅga, tr. É. Lamotte: - II, p. 143-145F = KP, § 23-25.

8. Fo sing louen, T 1610 (authir Vasubandhu, translator Paramārtha): - k. 4, p. 809a24: Ratnakūṭasūtra (Pao tong king) = KP, § 66.

9. Prasannapādā by Candrakīrti, ed. L. de La Vallée Poussin: - p. 45: Āryaratnakūṭasūtra = KP, § 102. - p. 47-50: Āryaratnakūṭasūtra = KP, § 138-141. - p. 156-157: Āryaratnakūṭasūtra = KP, § 71. - p. 248-249: Āryaratnakūṭasūtra = KP, § 63-65. - p. 336-339: Āryaratnakūṭasūtra = § 139-141. - p. 358: Āryaratnakūṭa = KP, § 57.

10. Śikṣāsamuccaya by Śāntideva, ed. C. Bendall: - p. 52: Ratnakūṭa = KP, § 3. - p. 53: Ratnakūṭa = KP, § 24. - p. 54: Ratnakūṭa = KP, § 11. - p. 54: Ratnakūṭa = KP, § 11. - p. 55: Ratnakūṭa = KP, § 6. - p. 146: Ratnakūṭasūtra = KP, § 15. - p. 148: Ratnakūṭa = KP, § 5. - p. 196: Āryaratnakūṭa = KP, § 128. - p. 233: Āryaratnakūṭa = KP, § 97-102.

11. Bodhicaryāvatārapañjikā by Prajñākaramati, ed. L. de La Vallée Poussin: - p. 147: Ratnakūṭa = KP, § 11. - p. 526-527: Āryaratnakūṭa = KP, § 97-102.

12. Ta tch'eng pao yao yi louen, T 1635, Chinese translation of the Sūtrasamuccaya, made in the first half of the 11th century by Dharmarakṣa of the Song, assisted by Wei-tsing. According to the Tibetan version (Tib. Trip., vol. 102, no. 5330), this would be the work of Nāgārjuna, and Śāntideva, in his Bodhicaryāvatāra, V, stanza 105-106, attributes it to Nāgārjuna (cf. J. Filliozat, Śikṣāsamuccaya et Sūtrasamuccaya, JA, 1964, p. 473-478).

The work cites five passages from a Ratnakūṭasūtra (K. 2, p. 52b19; 53a18; k. 5, p. 61b19; 62b6; k. 6, p. 63a22) but these do not seem to be in the Kāśyapaparivarta.

lacks one son, [viz., the thousandth and last], does not have in full the thousand sons [necessary to constitute his lineage]. Even [267a] though he possesses great power already, his [first 999 sons] are not honored either by the gods or by humans; but the true offshoot of the noble cakravartin king, [viz., his thousandth

13. Tsi tchou fa pao tsouei yi louen, T 1638 (author: an Indian whose name is given in Chinese as Chant-si; translator: Che-hou, under the Song, about 982). - k. 1, p. 150b24 = KP, § 60.

- In summary, it is likely that at the time of the Traité, at the beginning of the 4th century (cf. vol. III, p. ixF), already there existed a Sanskrit collection of Mahāyāna texts of varying dates and provenances. Until then, these texts had had a separate existence. We know little about the Sanskrit collection except that it included at least two questionnaires: one from the disciple Kāśyapa (Kāśyapapariprcchā) and on from the bodhisattva Akṣayamati (Akṣayamatipariprcchā). The first, judging from the botanical information that it furnishes, came from eastern India (cf. H. Nakamura, A critical survey of Mahāyāna and Esoteric Buddhism, Acta Asiatica, 7, 1964, p. 48). It enjoyed exceptional prestige and was named Ratnakūṭa 'Summit of Jewels' translated correctly by Pao-ting in Kumārajīva's versions. This explains why the Traité designates it equally as Kāśyapapariprcchā and Ratnakūṭasūtra. Incorporated into the Sankrit collection, it also takes the name of 'Chapter of Kāśyapa' (Kāśyapaparivarta).

The Sankrit collection grew in the course of time and, towards the end of the 5th century it included about fifty sūtras, some of which had already been translated into Chinese. This collection also took the name of Ratnakūṭa, not as 'Summit of Jewels' (Pao ting) but as 'Heap of Jewels' (Pao tsi). Brought to China by Hiuan-tsang in 649, it was completely translated between 706 and 713 by Bodhiruci who, for a good part of it, used the earlier Chinese translations. The Tibetan version occurred only after Tibet's conversion to Buddhism. A first version is already mentioned in the Index of the translations of the Āgamas and Śāstras existing in the palace of Ldan-kar, in the Stod-thaṅ, an index prepared by Dpal-brtsegs and Nam-mkaḥi-sñin-po: it appears under the category no. III of this index, and this category is entitled "Sūtra of the Greater Vehicle arranged in chapters (leḥu) of the eleven hundred *dharma*prayerāyas of the Mahāratnakūṭa, up to forty-nine chapters" (cf. M. Lalou, Les textes bouddhiques au temps du roi Khri-sron-bde-btsan, JA, 1953, p. 320-321). The second version was made by Jinamitra, as has been said above: it is preserved in the Tib. Trip., vol. 22-24, no. 760.

Apart from the author of the Daśabhūmikavibhāṣā, the Indian scholars and commentators make no mention of a Sanskrit Ratnakūṭa as a collection of texts and everything leads one to think that they were unaware of its existence. In any case, when Sāramati, Asaṅga, Vasubandhu, Candrakīrti, Śāntideva and Prajñākaramati cite the Ratnakūṭasūtra, it is always to refer to it only as Kāśyapaparivarta.

¹⁹⁷ Citation to be compared with the Kāśyapaparivarta, ed. von Staël-Holstein, and last son], although he is still in his mother's womb (kukṣi) and starting from the first seven days after his conception (saptarātropapanna), is honored by the gods. Why? The first 999 sons do not guarantee the lineage (vaṃśa) of the noble cakravartin king permitting people to enjoy happiness for only two generations; on the other hand the last son, even though he is still in the womb, definitively completes the descent of the noble cakravartin king. This is why he is honored.

§ 83, where the theme is presented in a different way: If he is endowed with the marks of a cakravartin (cakravartīlakṣaṇasamanvāgata), the prince, even though he exists only in the embryonic state in his mother's womb, is more greatly honored by the gods than his already grown-up brothers who are without the marks of a cakravartin. Here, it is a matter for the Traité of the thousandth and last son of a cakravartin king preferentially honored over all his brothers because he has the full number necessary to form the lineage (vaṃśa) of a universal king. The latter, in order to fulfill his role, must not only possess the seven jewels (saptaratna) of a cakravartin, but must also have "a full thousand heroic sons, virile, with excellent bodies, destroyers of the enemies' armies". This is expressed in a frequently repeated stock phrase (Dīgha, I, p. 88-89; Catuspariśatsūtra, p. 235; Vivyāvādāna, p. 548-549): Pūrṇaṃ cāśya bhaviṣyati ahaṃ putrāṇāṃ śūrāṇāṃ virāṇāṃ varāṅgarūpīṇāṃ parasainyapramardakāṇāṃ.

Similarly,¹⁹⁸ even though the arhats and pratyekabuddhas have spiritual faculties (indriya), the powers (bala), the factors of enlightenment (saṃbodhyaṅga), the members of the Path (mārgaṅga),¹⁹⁹ the six superknowledges (ṣaḍabhijñā), the power of the trances (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā), even though they realize the highest point of the truth (bhūtaḥ) and are a field of merit (puṇyakṣetra) for beings, they are not honored by the Buddhas of the ten directions. On the other hand, in the womb of the fetters (saṃyojana), the passions (kleśa), the bonds of desire (kāma-bandhana) and the threefold poison (viṣatraya), the bodhisattva who has just produced the mind of peerless bodhi (prathamānuttarabodhicittotpāda) is honored by the Buddhas before having done what had to be done (akṛtakṛtya). It is only gradually that he will cultivate the six perfections (pāramitā), acquire the power of skillful means (upāyabala), enter into the position of Bodhisattva (bodhisattvaniyāma) and succeed in obtaining the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā) and save innumerable beings. But [from his first production of the bodhi mind] he prevents the rupture (anupacchedāya sthāsyati) of the Buddha lineage (buddhavaṃśa), of the lineage of the Dharma (dharmavaṃśa) and the lineage of the Community (saṃghavaṃśa); he prevents the rupture of the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) assuring pure happiness (viśuddhasukha) in the heavens (svarga) and in this world (īhaloka). [This is why he is honored by the Buddhas as soon as he is conceived].

Thus the Kia-lo-p'in-k'ie (kalaviṅka) bird, when it is still within the egg (aṇḍakośa), surpasses all other birds (sarvapakṣigaṇam abhibhavati) by the melody of its songs (rutaravitena). Similarly the bodhisattva-mahāsattva, even before leaving the shell of ignorance (avidyāṇḍakośa), surpasses the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and heretics by the sound of his preaching (dharmadeśana) and his teachings (upadeśa).²⁰⁰

¹⁹⁸ Cf. Kāśyapaparivarta, § 83 which is expressed more consisely: Evam eva kāśyapa prathamacittotpādiko bodhisattvaḥ aparipakvendriya kalamahābhūtagata eva samānodatha ca punar balavantarā tatra pūrvadarśano devā sprhām utpādayanti, na tv evāṣṭavimokṣadhyāyīṣv arhatsu, tat kasmād hetoh. sa hi buddhavaṃśasyānupacchedāya sthāsyati.

¹⁹⁹ Adopting the variant kio tao.

²⁰⁰ Kāśyapaparivarta, § 84: Tad yathāpi nāma kāśyapa karaviṅkapotaka āṇḍakośapraṅkṣitah anirbhinne nayane sarvapakṣigaṇam abhib. yad uta gaṃbhīramadhranirgṣarutaravite[na] evam eva kāśyapaḥ prathamacittotpādiko bodhisattvo avidyāṇḍakośapraṅkṣita karmkleśatamastimirapaṭalaparyavanaddhaḥ nayano pi sarvaśrāvakapratyekabuddhān abhibhavati yad uta kuśalamūlapariṇāmanāprayoga-nirhārutaravieta.

The kalaviṅka, sparrow or cuckoo, has already been mentioned, p. 279F, 1587F.

[Viśeṣacintibrahmapariprcchā]²⁰¹ – It is said in the Ming-wang king (Jālinīprabhasūtra): The sthāvira²⁰² Śāriputra said to the Buddha: O Bhagavat, those who are able to understand the words of these bodhisattvas gain great merit (bahum puṇyaskandham prasuvante). Why? If those who succeed merely in hearing the name (nāman) of these bodhisattvas already derive great benefit, what can be said of those who also understand their words?

O Bhagavat, if a man were to plant a tree (vrkṣa) without stamping down the ground around it and this tree produced roots (mūla), a trunk (skandha), branches (śākhā), leaves (parṇa), and even gave fruit (phala), that would be a rare thing (durlabha). Well, the activity (caryālakṣaṇa) of these bodhisattvas is just as extraordinary. Indeed, without relying on any dharma whatsoever, they manifest births (jāti) and deaths (maraṇa) in the buddhafiels (buddhakṣetra) and there, as if at play, they display at will the talents of their eloquence (pratibhāna) and their wisdom (prajñā). Then, hearing these great sages displaying this talent of eloquence playfully and at will, who would not produce the mind of supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksambodhicitta)?

At that time there was in the assembly the bodhisattva P'ou-houa (Samanta puṣpa).²⁰³ He said to Śāriputra: The Buddha has said that the sthāvira [Śāriputra] is the foremost of the sages (prajñāvatām agryaḥ) among all the disciples (śrāvaka). Today, O sthāvira, have you not discovered (upagata) the dharmadhātu,²⁰⁴ the fundamental element of the dharma? Then why not use your great wisdom to discourse on this dharma as you will?

Śāriputra. – The disciples of the Buddha (buddhaśrāvaka) only speak of its domain (yathāviśayaṃ).

Samantapuṣpa. – Does the dharmadhātu have a domain?

Śāriputra. – No. [267b]

Samantapuṣpa. – If the dharmadhātu has no domain, how can you claim, O sthāvira, to speak according to this domain?

Śāriputra. – I speak of it according to the degree it has been understood (adhigata) by me.

Samantapuṣpa. – O sthāvira, have you understood that the dharmadhātu is without measure (apramāṇa)?

²⁰¹ In Tibetan, gnas brian corresponding to the Sanskrit sthāvira which Kumārajīva renders equally as houei-ming or k'i-nien. In the Sanskrit texts, the names of the disciples are usually preceded by the adjective āyusmat (in Chinese ich 'ang-tche, kiu-cheou; in Tibetan, tshé dan ldan pa) the translation of which Kumārajīva and even Hiuan-tsang most frequently omit. All these epithets of respect have the sense almost of the Greek 'presbyter', elder, worthy of consideration. Another honorific appellation of Buddhist and Jain monks is bhadanta (in Chinese, tsuan-tche; in Tibetan, bstun pa).

²⁰² On this sūtra frequently cited under different names by the Traité, see above, p. 1268-1269F, note. The passage cited here occurs in T 585, k. 2, p. 10c23 – 11b25; T 586, k. 2, p. 42c9 – 43b2; T 587, k. 3, p. 74a2-c7; Tib. Trip., no. 827, vol. 33, p. 198-199, fol. 50b7 – 52b3.

²⁰³ In Tibetan, Kun-tu me-tog.

²⁰⁴ In Tibetan, chos kyi dbyinis.

Śāriputra. – Yes.

Samantapuṣpa. – Then why did you just say: “I speak to the measure that it has been understood by me”? If the dharmadhātu such as it is understood by you is immeasurable, the words [spoken about it] are also immeasurable. The dharmadhātu is immeasurable and is not measurable.

Śāriputra. – The dharmadhātu is ungraspable (anadhigamyalakṣaṇa).

Samantapuṣpa. – If the dharmadhātu is ungraspable, do you find deliverance (vimukti) outside the dharmadhātu?

Śāriputra. – No.

Samantapuṣpa. – Why?

Śāriputra. – Because the dharmadhātu is inseparable (avyatirikta) from it.

Samantapuṣpa. – Is the knowledge of the saints (āryajñāna) that you understand like the dharmadhātu?

Śāriputra. – As for me, I want to hear the Dharma; this is not the time to preach.

Samantapuṣpa. – All dharmas being fixed (niyata) in the dharmadhātu, is there something to hear (śrotavya) or something to say (vaktavya)?

Śāriputra. – No.

Samantapuṣpa. – Then why did you just say: “I want to hear the Dharma; this is not the time to preach”?

Śāriputra. – Nevertheless, the Buddha said: “Two people gain immeasurable merit: i) the one who preaches carefully; ii) the one who listens attentively.”

Samantapuṣpa. – When you enter into the absorption of cessation (nirodhasamāpatti),²⁰⁵ can you hear the Dharma?

Śāriputra. – O son of noble family (kulaputra), in the absorption of cessation one does not hear the Dharma.

Samantapuṣpa. – Do you think that all the dharmas are eternally ceased (nityaniruddha)?

Śāriputra. – Yes, I think so.

Samantapuṣpa. – The dharmadhātu being eternally ceased, it is impossible to hear the Dharma. Why? Because all the dharmas are eternally ceased.

Śāriputra. – Without coming out of concentration (samādhi), can you preach the Dharma?

Samantapuṣpa. – There is no dharma that is not concentrated (samāhita).

Śāriputra. – If that is so, all worldly people (prthagjana) are also concentrated.

²⁰⁵ The saṃjñāveditanirodhasamāpatti, the concentration of the cessation of concept and feeling, which by definition has no object: cf. p. 1299F, 1307F.

Samantapuṣpa. – Of course, all worldly people are concentrated.

Śāriputra. – In what concentration are all worldly people concentrated?

Samantapuṣpa. – It is in the unshakeable concentration of the dharmadhātu (akṣobhyadharmadhātusamādhi)²⁰⁶ that all worldly people are concentrated.

Śāriputra. – If that is so, there is no difference (viśeṣa) between worldly people (prthagjana) and saints (ārya).²⁰⁷

Samantapuṣpa. – I do not accept that there is a difference between worldly people and saints. Why? Because among saints, there is no dharma that is ceased (niruddha) and, among worldly people, there is no dharma that is produced (utpanna). Neither of them escape the sameness (samatā) of the dharmadhātu.

Śāriputra. – O son of noble family (kulaputra), what is the sameness of the dharmadhātu?

Samantapuṣpa. – It is what was cognized (jñatā) and seen (dṛṣṭa) by you, O sthāvira, when you attained bodhi. Did you then produce the attributes of the saint (āryadharmā)?

Śāriputra. – No.

Samantapuṣpa. – Did you destroy the attributes of the worldly person (prthagjanadharmā)?

Śāriputra. – No.

Samantapuṣpa. – Did you acquire the attributes of the saint?

Śāriputra. – No.

Samantapuṣpa. – Did you see and cognize the attributes of the worldly person?

Śāriputra. – No.

Samantapuṣpa. – O sthāvira, what then did you cognize and see in order to acquire the bodhi of the saints?

Śāriputra. – The way of existence (tathatā) of the worldly person, the way of existence of the bhikṣu who has just attained deliverance (vimukti), the way of existence of the bhikṣu entered into nirvāṇa without residue (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa). This way of existence is a single way of existence; it does not involve any differentiation.

Samantapuṣpa. – O Śāriputra, it is the way of existence characteristic of the dharmadhātu, the unshakeable way of existence (akṣobhyatathatā and, by this way of existence, one will know the way of existence of all dharmas.²⁰⁸

²⁰⁶ In Tibetan, chos kyi dbyiṅs hkhruṅgs paḥi tñiṅ ne ḥdzin.

²⁰⁷ The identity of worldly people and the saints is one of the favorite themes of the Mahāyānasūtras: cf. Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, transl., p. 143, note 5; 156-157; 235; Śūraṅgamasamādhi, transl. p. 184.

²⁰⁸ In the Tibetan version, Samantapuṣpa says to Śāriputra: de bCin ṅid de ni ma log pa de bśin ṅid dan / gCen ma yin pa de bCin ṅid dan / mi ḥgyur ba de bCin ṅid dan / mi hkhruṅgs pa de bCin ṅid de / bisun pa Śariḥi bu de bśin ṅid chos thams cad kyi de bśin ṅid rjes su rig par byaḥo /

Then Śāriputra said to the Buddha: Bhagavat, there is no object (vastu) that the great mass of fire (agniskandha) does not consume. It is the same for the words spoken by those individuals who affirm that all dharmas enter into the dharmadhātu.

[Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra.] – Finally, as is said in the Wei-mo-kie king (Vimalakīrtisūtra), Śāriputra and other śrāvakas said that they themselves were incapable of going to visit Vimalakīrti in order to ask him about his sickness and each of them told how, at another time, they had been greeted with derision by Vimalakīrti.²⁰⁹

Thus, in many sūtras, it is said that “the knowledge of the bodhisattva outshines that of the śrāvakas and pratykebuddhas.”

IV. OUTSTANDING QUALITIES OF THE BODHISATTVA

Question. – For what reasons does the knowledge of the bodhisattva outshine that of the śrāvaka and pratykebuddha?

Answer. – As is said in the Pen-cheng king (Jātakasūtra), the bodhisattva has accumulated the knowledges for innumerable incalculable kalpas (aprameyāsamaṅkhyeyakalpa). For innumerable kalpas, there is no suffering that he has not undergone, no deed that he has not accomplished.

In search of the Dharma, he has gone into the fire;²¹⁰ he has thrown himself down [from the top of a mountain];²¹¹ his skin was flayed;²¹² with one of his bones as pen, his blood as ink and his skin as paper, he transcribed a sūtra.²¹³ It was out of love for the Dharma that he suffered these enormous torments.

In order to acquire knowledge, from lifetime to lifetime he venerated his teachers, looking upon them as Buddhas. He recited, studied and penetrated all the existing sūtras.²¹⁴ For innumerable incalculable kalpas

This way of being (tathatā) is the way of being without mistake (aviparyāsatathatā), the infallible way of being (ananyatathatā), the immutable way of being (avipariṇamatathatā), the unshakeable way of being (akṣobhyatathatā). O bhadanta Śāriputra, the way of being of all dharmas should be known by this way of being.

²⁰⁹ See chap. III of the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, transl. p. 141-218.

²¹⁰ Avadāna of Dharmagaveśin or Subhāṣitagaveśin: cf. p. 690F, note.

²¹¹ Jātaka of the ṛṣi who threw himself down at the feet of the Buddha Kauṇḍinya from the summit of a high mountain (cf. p. 751F); story to be compared with the story of the young brāhmin in search of a stanza (p. 689F, note).

²¹² Jātaka of the flayed nāga (cf. p. 853-855F).

²¹³ Jātaka of Dharmarakta or Dharmarata (cf. p. 975-976F; below, k. 49, p. 412a).

²¹⁴ Adopting the variant kiai-t'o.

he ceaselessly reflected and thought. He investigated everything, beautiful and ugly, profound and superficial, good and bad, pure and impure, eternal and transitory, existent and non-existent, etc. He meditated, analyzed and questioned. In view of knowledge, he venerated the Buddhas, bodhisattvas and śrāvakas. He heard the Dharma, questioned, trusted, reflected properly and acted in conformity with the Dharma.

Completely fulfilling such causes and conditions of knowledge, how could he not outshine the śrāvakas and pratykebuddhas?

Finally, the wisdom (prajñā) of the bodhisattva is assisted and adorned by the first five perfections (pāramitā). He possesses the power of skillful means (upāyabala); he has thoughts of loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) for all beings; he is not obstructed by wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi); he dwells in the ten levels (bhūmi); his knowledge (jñāna) is profound (gambhīra) and his strength (prabhāva) is great. For these great reasons, he outshines the śrāvakas and pratykebuddhas; for these great reasons, the lesser ones disappear by themselves. The arhats and pratykebuddhas do not have these prerogatives. This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here: “The bodhisattva who wants to outshine the śrāvakas and pratykebuddhas should practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Fourth Section OBTAINING THE GATES OF RECOLLECTION AND CONCENTRATION

NOTE ON DHĀRAṆĪ

Here the Traité returns to the dhāraṇī studied above (p. 317-321F, 328F). It is not correctly called a mantra, a magical formula as is usually translated; it is first and foremost the memorizing of the teachings of all the Buddhas. This is indeed how the Tibetans and Chinese understood the term; the former render it as gzun ‘holder’, related to the perfect of the root hḍzin pa ‘to lay hold of, to seize’; the latter transcribe it by the characters t'o-lo-ni or t'o-lien-ni, or translate it as tsong-tch'e, ‘completely retaining’.

Already in the canonical sūtras (Majjhima, I, p. 480; II, p. 173), Śākyamuni applied it to the operations required of the bhikṣu who seeks the truth:

1. He lends ear and listens to the teaching (ohitasoto dhammaṃ suṇāti).
2. Having listened to the teaching, he keeps it in his memory (satvā dhammaṃ dhāreti).
3. He examines the meaning of the teachings that he keeps in his memory (dhāritānaṃ dhammānaṃ upaparikkhati).
4. While he is examining the meaning, the teachings become imprinted in him (atthaṃ upaparikkhato dhammā nijjhānaṃ khamanti).

Hearing (śravaṇa), memorizing (dhāraṇā), examining (upaparīkṣaṇa) and strong adherence to the teachings (dharmaṇidhyānakṣānti) summarize the spiritual program of the Buddha's disciples, learned (bahuśruta), endowed with memory (smṛta) and clear (saṃprajānat).

According to the Anguttara, II, p. 178, the disciple who memorizes the entirety of the Buddhist scriptures, nine-membered according to the Pāli tradition, twelve-membered according to the Sanskrit tradition, is described as learned (bahussuta) and a holder of the Dharma (dhammadhara). The enterprise, arduous though it may be, was not beyond the capacities of the prodigious memory of the Indians. However, so as not to impose an unsupportable burden, the Anguttara adds that it is enough to understand the meaning and the letter of a single stanza of four feet and to live according to the Dharma in order to merit the title of bahussuta and dhammadhara (Catuppādāya ce pi bhikkhu gāthāya atthaṃ aññāya dhammaṃ aññāya dhammānudhammapaṭipanno hoti bahussuto dhammadhara ti alaṃ vacanāya ti). This was to open the door a crack to compromises which later Buddhists took part in broadly .

Memorization of the Dharma gained even more importance in the Mahāyāna from the point of view of requiring the use of a new vocabulary. To the 'learned' śrāvaka (bahuśruta, mahābahuśrutya) there succeeded the bodhisattva 'in possession of recollections' (dhāraṇīpratilabdha, dhāraṇīprāpta) who, not content with memorizing the nine-membered or twelve-membered scriptures, is going to keep in memory the teachings of the innumerable Buddhas of the three times and ten directions, and to preach them to beings.

Pañcaviṃśati, p. 219, l. 12-14; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1461, l. 19-20. — Yat kiṃcid buddhair bhagavdbhir bhāṣitam iha lokadhātu samantād daśasu lokadhātuṣu tat sarvaṃ ādhārayiṣyami. "All that has been said by the blessed buddhas in the present universe and in the universes of the ten directions, I will retain all that."

Daśabhūmika, p. 79. — Sa evaṃ apramāṇair dhāraṇīmukhāsaṃkhyeyaśatasahasrair daśasu diṅṣu aprameyānāṃ buddhānāṃ bhagavantāṃ sakāśād dharmaṃ śṛṇoti śrutvā vismārayati, yathāśrutam cāpramāṇavibhaktiṃ evaṃ nirdiśati: "[The Bodhisattva], by means of innumerable hundreds of thousands of incalculable dhāraṇīmukhas, heard the Dharma of the innumerable blessed Buddhas of the ten directions and, having heard, he taught what he had heard with innumerable details."

Lalitavistara, p. 35, l. 18. — Dhāraṇīpratilambhaḥ sarvabuddhabhāṣitāṣītādhāraṇatāyāi pravartate. "The acquisition of the dhāraṇis leads to the memorization of the words of all the Buddhas."

Āloka, p. 98, l. 3-4. — Smṛtir hi granthāsthadhāraṇena dhārayatīti kṛtvā dhāraṇisaṃbhāra iti. "Insofar as memory 'retains' by retaining books and their meanings, we speak of 'accumulation of dhāraṇī'."

Just as the three higher samādhis — śūnyatā, ānimitta and apraṇihita — are called vimokṣamukha 'gateways to deliverance' because they lead to liberation (cf. p. 1221F), so the dhāraṇīs are often called dhāraṇīmukhas because they all open the door to memorization of the Dharma of the Buddhas and because, by engendering one another, they are in 'communication'.

The Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, p. 147, distinguishes three kinds of dhāraṇīs according to whether they result from retribution of earlier actions (pūrvakarmavipāka), from the effort of listening (śrutābhyāsa) in order to grasp (grahaṇa) and retain (dhāraṇa) the teachings, or whether they are dependent on mental concentration (samādhisaṃpāya).

The first two are within the range of humans: cakravartin kings, ṛṣis and śrāvakas have a certain number of them (cf. 328F). These are the lesser (parīta) dhāraṇīs.

The dhāraṇī that depends on mental concentration is the greater dhāraṇī and is the prerogative of the bodhisattvas. It can be weak (mṛdu), middling (madhya) or superior (adhimātra).

1. Weak dhāraṇī

This belongs to the bodhisattvas who have not yet entered into the bhūmis (abhūmipraviṣṭa) and are still at the stage of practicing conviction (adhimuktīcaryābhūmi).

Still affected by a fleshly body, the bodhisattva searches for, writes, recites, studies and meditates on all the teachings of the Buddha of his period.

According to the Traité (k. 49, p. 412a7-10), this is a matter of the 84,000 articles of the Dharma (dharmaśāstra), or else the twelve-membered teaching (dvādaśāṅgapravacana), or else the Four Baskets (catuspiṭaka), namely the four Āgamas (Ekottara, Madhyama, Dīrgha and Saṃyukta), the Abhidharmapiṭaka, the Vinayapiṭaka, the Kṣudrapiṭaka (minor texts) and also all the Mahāyānasūtras such as the Mahāprajñāpāramitā, etc.

According to the Bodhisattvabhūmi, p. 96, the bodhisattva must know: 1) that which is 'developed' in the twelve-membered scripture (dvādaśāṅgād vacogatād yad vaipulyam), namely, the Bodhisattvapiṭaka, in other words, the Mahāyānasūtras; 2) all the rest of the other members, namely, the Śrāvakaṭiṭaka; 3) the three outer treatises (bāhyakāni śāstrāṇi), namely, logic (hetu), grammar (śabda) and medicine (vyādhivikitsā); 4) the profane sciences of the arts and crafts (laukikāni śilpakarmasthānāni).

The bodhisattva retains these teachings (śrutadhāraṇī), considers their meaning (arthopaparīkṣā), penetrates the correct value of the articulated sounds and phonemes that expresses them (ghoṣākṣarapraveśa), grants well-considered acquiescence to the teachings (nidhyānakṣānti) and, out of compassion, preaches them to all beings (nirdeśa).

From the viewpoint of the Prajñāpāramitā and the Madhyamaka, the meaning or the object of the Buddha's speech and primarily of the Mahāyānasūtras, is the true nature of things (dharmaatā), namely, the absence of nature. Without production or destruction, things are merged in primordial non-existence. The only way of conceiving them is not to think of them; the only way of speaking of them is to be silent. Avoiding the two fundamental approaches of the mind, affirmation and negation, they are inconceivable and inexpressible. The true nature of things being the absence of nature, all that one can say about them is insignificant (nirarthaka), whether it is a voluminous sūtra of a hundred thousand ślokas, a simple stanza of four feet (catuspādika gāthā) or a single phoneme (akṣara).

For this purpose and even before his entry into the bhūmis, the bodhisattva must accumulate the dhāraṇīs.

Above (p. 317-321F) and in the pages that follow, the Traité furnishes precious information on these dhāraṇīs, but the interpretation is not always easy. The bodhisattva strengthens his memory by means of mental exercises or even magical formulas (mantra) in order to succeed in retaining what he has heard just once and to keep the memory throughout all his lifetimes: this is śrutadharadhāraṇī.

He grasps the discontinuous nature of spoken language which removes from it any expressive value. Such a discovery makes the bodhisattva equally indifferent to blame and to praise: this is ghoṣapraveśadhāraṇī.

He has recourse to mnemonic techniques (dhāraṇīmukha) in order to grasp the true nature of dharmas. Thus, starting with the forty-two phonemes comprising the arapacana syllabary, he constructs phrases showing that things are not. Thus he throws light on both the inexpressibility of the dharmatā and the identity of the phonemes (akṣarasamatā): “The forty-two phonemes are all included in each of them and each of them is included in the forty-two phonemes. This is how the Tathāgata, skilled in Dharma and in phonemes, preaches in phonemes a Dharma which is not included in them.” (Aṣṭādaśa, II, p. 54-55; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 24, p. 396b): this is the akṣarapraveśadhāraṇī.

There is also a vibhajyajñānadhāraṇī by means of which the bodhisattva distinguishes the respective qualities of the beings to be converted and regulates his sermons accordingly. This dhāraṇī undoubtedly is to be compared with the indriyaparāparajñānabala, the power by which the Buddhas know the degrees of the moral faculties of beings.

Always according to the Traité (p. 317F), the dhāraṇī, as its name indicates, ‘retains’ (dhārayati) the good dharmas and ‘avoids’ (vidhārayati) the bad ones. By good dharmas we should understand primarily the good teachings of the Buddha and, by bad dharmas, the harmful teachings polluted by the unwholesome roots (akuśala) that are passion, aggression and ignorance. By keeping the former and turning away from the latter, the dhāraṇī builds a defence against the pernicious consequences of the passions and repulses the onslaughts of Māra and his cohorts. It is mindfulness (smṛti) and, at the same time, protection (rakṣā, paritrā).

In the same place, the Traité presents a learned definition taken from an Abhidharma which, however, cannot be either that of the Theravādins or the Sarvāstivādins where there is no question of the dhāraṇīs.

“Dhāraṇī is associated with the mind (cittasamprayukta) or dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayukta); impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava); invisible (anidarśana) and without resistance (apratigha); it is included in one element (dhātu), one base of consciousness (āyatana) and one aggregate (skandha), namely, the dharmadhātu, the dharmāyatana and the saṃskāraskandha; it is cognized by all the knowledges (jñāna) except the āsravakṣayajñāna; it is understood only by the mental consciousness (manovijñāna).”

Hence the differences between samādhi and dhāraṇī:

1. Samādhi as concentrated mind is always associated with the mind, whereas dhāraṇī may either be associated with or dissociated from mind.
2. Samādhi disappears when a distraction arises and at the changing of existence; dhāraṇī, once acquired, persists throughout successive states and successive rebirths: it follows its holder like the shadow follows the body or like strong fever follows the sick man. It may be compared to the religious discipline (saṃvara) resulting from the taking of vows: it continues to exist in the monastic whose mind is bad or indeterminate or who is unconscious.

3. The prolonged exercise of samādhi is necessary to create dhāraṇī.

Very clear information on the elementary dhāraṇīs to be cultivated by the bodhisattva on the stage of conviction will be found in the Yogācāra treatises, especially in the Bodhisattvabhūmi, p. 272-274 which I [Lamotte] translate with the help of the Chinese versions (T 1579, k. 45, p. 542c16 – 543a24; T 1581, k. 8, p. 934a3-29; T 1582, k. 7, p. 996b20-c18:

Tatra katamā bodhisattvānāṃ dhāraṇī / samsataś caturvidhā draṣṭavyā / dharmadhāraṇī, arthadhāraṇī, mantradhāraṇī, bodhisattvākṣāntilābhāya ca dhāraṇī // 1. tatra dharmadhāraṇī katamā / iha ... adhimukticyābhūmīkṣāntau vartate / iyaṃ bodhisattvasya bodhisattvākṣāntilābhāya dhāraṇī veditavyā /

Translation. – What is the dhāraṇī of the bodhisattva? In brief, it should be considered as being fourfold: i) dhāraṇī of the teachings, ii) dhāraṇī of meaning, iii) dhāraṇī of mantra and iv) dhāraṇī leading to the conviction of the bodhisattva.

1. What is the dhāraṇī of the teachings? The bodhisattva concentrates such power of memory and wisdom that, thanks to it and merely by hearing, he retains for an immense length of time immense works not yet formulated verbally, not yet practiced, formed by collections of names, phrases and phonemes, symmetrically composed and symmetrically arranged.

2. What is the dhāraṇī of meaning? Like the preceding one but with the following difference: The bodhisattva, for an immense length of time, retains the immense meaning of these same teachings, a meaning not yet formulated nor practiced mentally.

3. What is the dhāraṇī of mantra? The bodhisattva gains such mastery of concentration that by means of it he consecrates magical syllables destined to pacify the scourges of all beings, and thus these syllables become effective, supremely effective and infallible in pacifying many scourges. In the bodhisattva, this is the dhāraṇī of mantra.

4. In the bodhisattva, what is the dhāraṇī leading to the conviction of the bodhisattva? A bodhisattva who is personally devoted to solid [?, sic] causes, who holds wisdom, lives in solitude, eats moderately, eats nothing impure, does not enter into anyone’s field of vision, eats only one kind of food, devotes himself completely to ecstasy, sleeps little and is awake most of the night: this bodhisattva considers, weighs and examines the meaning of the magical syllables offered by the Tathāgatas allowing the acquisition of the conviction of the bodhisattva. For example, the formula iti miṭi kiṭi bhikṣānti padāni svāhā. Thus familiarized with these magical syllables, he discovers the meaning in the following way by himself without learning it from anyone else: “In these magical syllables, there is no significant value; they are purely and simply without significance; their meaning is insignificance.” And he does not look for any other meaning than that. In this way, the meaning of these magical syllables is well penetrated by this bodhisattva. Having properly penetrated the meaning of these magical syllables, he also accordingly penetrates the meaning of all dharmas and he does that by himself without learning it from anyone else.

Furthermore, he penetrates the meaning in the following way: “The meaning of intrinsic nature of dharmas, enunciated in all kinds of expressions, is without real value, and moreover it is their inexpressible intrinsic nature that constitutes the [true] meaning of their intrinsic natures.” Having thus correctly penetrated the meaning of the intrinsic natures of dharmas, the bodhisattva does not seek any other meaning than that and, by the penetration of this noble meaning, he conquers supreme joy and satisfaction. The [conviction] thus conquered by this bodhisattva on the basis of magical syllables should be called the conviction of the bodhisattva. By taking hold of it, this bodhisattva acquires the purity of high resolution in a short time and finally finds himself in the higher conviction belonging to the stage of the practice of conviction (adhimuktīcaryābhūmi: cf. Siddhi, p. 731). This is, in the bodhisattva, the dhāraṇī leading to the conviction of the bodhisattva.

- The canonical sūtras mentioned at the beginning of this note had already defined the steps required in order to accede to the truth: hearing the teachings (dharmasravaṇa), memorization (dhāraṇā), examination (upaparīkṣā) and acquiescence (kṣānti). While following the same framework, the Bodhisattvabhūmi, a work of Yogācāra origin, introduces a new element by bringing in magical formulas (mantrapada). In the mantradhāraṇī, they serve to pacify the scourges (īti) of beings, not by themselves but insofar as they are blessed or consecrated (adhiṣṭhita) by the bodhisattva. In the kṣāntilābhāya dhāraṇī, they show the inadequacy of language to express the absolute. In the Yogācāra view, the absolute is the true manner of existence (bhūtatathāta) of things or their absolute intrinsic nature (pariṇiṣpannasvabhāva), but from the Madhyamaka point of view, the only one of interest to us here, the absolute is the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā) of beings and of things which in no way can be hypostatized.

- For the Buddhābhūmisūtropadeśa, T 1530, k. 5, p. 315cc23-28, which frequently cites the Yogācārabhūmi, the miraculous pratyavekṣanajñāna of the Tathāgatas contains (dhārayati) all the dhāraṇīmukhas and, in general, up to the miraculous attributes of the Buddha that it can bring associated with these dhāraṇīmukhas. Dhāraṇī is a higher memory and wisdom (adhimāstrasmurtiprjñā) capable of retaining in its entirety the immense teachings of the Buddhas without forgetting them. In a single dharma, dhāraṇī bears upon all the dharmas; in a single vyāñjana, it is concerned with all the vyāñjanas; in a single artha, it is concerned with all the arthas. Adding up innumerable qualities (guṇa), it is called an inexhaustible treasury (akṣayaakośa).

2. Middling dhāraṇī

According to the Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, p. 147, the middling or intermediate (madhyā) dhāraṇī belongs to the bodhisattva who is still on the impure bhumis (asuddhabhūmika), in other words, the first seven bhumis.

There he is still afflicted with a fleshly body that limits his movements. However, listening respectfully to the collected teachings of the Buddhas, he enters into religion and becomes, from the fifth bhūmi onward, an excellent preacher of the Dharma, endowed with the dhāraṇīs of recollection and practice (śrūtācāradhāraṇīpratīlabdha dharmabhāṇaka): cf. Daśabhūmika, p. 46.

3. Higher Dharaṇī

This is the prerogative of the bodhisattvas on the pure bhumis (parisuddhabhūmika), i.e., the last three bhumis. From the eighth bhūmi onward, the bodhisattva, rid of his fleshly body, assumes a body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhānujakāya), travels through the ten directions of universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, worships the Buddhas, collects their words and communicates them to beings. On the ninth bhūmi, he utilizes an infinite number of dhāraṇīs: cf. Daśabhūmika, p. 71, 79.

This higher (adhimātra) dhāraṇī described by the Prajñās (cf. p. 328F) as asaṅgadhāraṇī, is beyond the range of the heretics, śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and even beginning (ādikarmika) bodhisattvas. Only bodhisattvas endowed with immense merit, great wisdom and great power can possess it.

It is not questionable that the earliest Mahāyānasūtras and the great scholars may have wished to see, in the dhāraṇīs, a memory (smṛti) increased twofold by wisdom (prajñā), capable of retaining the immense teachings of the Buddhas but still contained in the texts.

In early Buddhism, the word of the Buddha, good in meaning (svārtha), good in the letter (svyañjan), distinguishes itself by numerous qualities, but is, first of all and above all, true. It derives its efficacy from truth alone; it has nothing magical about it. It does not act mechanically like a mantra and asks only to be heard (śruta), thought about (cintita) and meditated on or practiced (bhāvita). It teaches deliverance and the path leading to it, but it does not depend on the Buddha whether the traveler follows his indications or not. Among his disciples, only a few will attain the supreme goal, nirvāṇa. The Buddha can do nothing about it: he is only the mārgakhyāyin ‘the one who shows the Path’ (Majjhima, III, p. 6).

In the canonical works, mantras are rare and seem to be a foretaste of things to come: Upasenaśūtra of Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 252, k. 9, p. 60c14 – 61b28 (cf. E. Waldschmidt, Das Upasenaśūtra, ein Zauber gegen Schlängenbiss aus dem Saṃyukāgama, NGAW, 1957, p. 27-44); Tripura-Bhakkikasūtra (cf. F. Bernhard, Zur Entstehung einer Dhāraṇī, ZDMG, 117, 1967, p. 148-168); Ājāṇāṭikasūtra (ed. H. Hoffmann, Leipzig, 1939); Śārdūlakarnāvarāṇa (ed. S. Mukhopadhyaya, Santiniketan, 1954, p. 4-5); Kāraṇḍavyūha (ed. P. Vaidya, in Mahāyānasūtrasamgraha, I, Darbhanga, 1961, p. 297).

It is only half-heartedly and rather belatedly that the Theras of Ceylon attributed a magical value to some suttas, used them as ‘protections’ (paritta, pīṭi) and arranged collections of them (cf. Milinda, p. 150-151; Khuddakapāṭha, Catubhāṇvāra). In the reign of Goṭhābhaya (309-322) the science of exorcism (bhūtavijjā) was introduced into Ceylon by Saṃghamitta, a Coḷa sectarian monk of the Vetullavāda, and welcomed favorably by the Dhammarucika monks of the Abhayagiri (Mahāvamsa, XXXVI, v. 113). A great festival with recitation of a paritta, the Ratanasutta (Suttanipāta, v. 222-238; Mahāvastu, I, p. 290-295) was institutionalized at Poḷonaruwa by king Sena II (Cūlavamsa, LI, v. 79-82).

In our own times in Ceylon and Burma, a Book of Paritta (pirit-pota) is found in all Buddhist households; paritta ceremonies are held regularly according to the norms of a strictly regulated ritual (cf. E. Waldschmidt, Das Paritta, eine magische Zeremonie der buddhistischen Proester auf Ceylon, Baessler-Archiv, 17, 1934, p. 139-150); a mass of paritta, partly non-canonical, circulates among the public. These magical practices, along with the cult of popular gods, constitutes what H. Bechert calls 'the 'Little Tradition' in contrast to the traditional Buddhist teaching (sāsana), the 'Great Tradition' directly oriented towards detachment from the world and nibbāna. The interface between the two tendencies has been masterfully described by Bechert in a work recommended both for its precision and extent of its information as well as the soundness of his judgment: Buddhismus, Staat und gesellschaft in den Ländern des Theravāda-Buddhismus, 3 vols., Frankfurt und Wiesbaden, 1966-19067-1973. We may mention as well the following articles: Einige Fragen der Religionssoziologie und Struktur des südasiatischen Buddhismus, in Beiträage zur religionssoziologischen Forschung, 4, 1968, p. 251-295; Eine alte Gottheit in Ceylon und Südindien, in WZKSOA, 12-13. 1968-69, p. 33-42; Theravāda Buddhist Sangha: Some General Observations on Historical and Political Factors in its Deverlopment, in Asian Studies, 29, 1969-70, p. 761-778; Sangha, State, Society, 'Nation': Persistence of traditions in 'post-traditional' Buddhist Societies, in Daedalus, Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Winter, 1973, p. 85-95.

It is more difficult to detect the importance of this 'Small Vehicle' on the Indian subcontinent. Acceptance of the Holy Dharma has never involved renunciation of ancestral beliefs, local cults or even popular superstitions. The Buddha did not favor them; he condemned as vulgar and unworthy all the forms of charlatanism by which some śramaṇas and brāhmaṇas derived their subsistence (Dīgha, I, p. 9-12); he condemned monks who unjustifiably attributed to themselves superhuman powers (Vinaya, III, p. 90-91); he forbade his monks to show their miraculous powers in public (Vinaya, II, p. 110-112); he hated, detested and abhorred feats of magic and clairvoyance: ṛddhi and ādeśanāprātihārya (Dīgha, I, p. 213-214); he placed among wrong views śīlavrataparāmarśa, the blind belief in the efficacy of ascetic practices and rituals (Vinaya, I, p. 184; Majjhima, I, p. 433; Anguttara, III, p. 377; IV, p. 144 seq.) and if he was forced to recognize a certain efficacy of formulas (mantra), mumbling (japa), medicinal plants (auśadha), illusionists (māyākarma), therapeutic practices (cikitsā), clairvoyance (divyacakṣus) and magicians (ṛddhi), he did not fail to emphasize that all this had nothing to do with the Path to nirvāna and did not lead to pacification of suffering (Vidyāsthānopamasūtra, in E. Waldschmidt, Kleine Brāhmī-Schriftrolle. NAWG, 1959, p. 1-25).

The warnings of the Master were not always taken into consideration. The śramaṇa Śrīmītra, from a princely family and native of the Western lands, came to China in the yong-kia period (307-313), introduced the science of incantation in the Kiang-tong (lower Yang-tseu) region. When his friend Tcheou Yi was executed, he paid a visit to his orphaned children and, in the presence of the body, recited three prayers in Sanskrit and then pronounced mantras of several thousands of words. He remembered well mantras that were efficient in all situations (Kao seng tchouan, T 2059, k. 1, p. 328a; transl. R. Shih, Biographie des moines éminents, 1968, p. 44; E. Zürcher, Buddhist Conquest of China, I, p. 103, where Śrīmītra is presented as a specialist of dhāraṇī, whereas it probably was mantra; the two words are not exactly synonymous). According to the evidence, unfortunately late, of Hiuan-tsang, the Mahāśāṃghikas had a canon of five baskets incuding, apart from the four traditional baskets – Sūtra, Vinaya, Abhidharma and Kṣudraka – a Kin-tcheou-tsang or mantrapīṭaka and not a dhāraṇīpīṭaka as is generally translated (Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 923a7-9).

By contrast, still on the subcontinent, the powerful learned sect of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika was careful not to allow magical practices to occur in the economy of the Path and if, by chance it makes mention of mantra and vidyā in its Abhidharmas (Śatpāda and Vibhāṣā), this is at a purely documentary level: it ignores or pretends to ignore even the name of dhāraṇī. Its most illustrious spokesman, Vasubandhu, denies any value to magical syllables. He states: "In the curative action of medicinal herbs, the Phat svāhā muttered by the charlatan (kuhakavaidya) has no efficacy whatsoever" (Košabhāṣya, p. 475; Kośavyākhyā, p. 716).

One should not look for an unconditional restoration of charlatanism and magic in the Mahāyāna. Like the Buddha, it condemns blind belief in the efficacy of rituals and practices (śīlavrataparāmarśa, Pañcaviṃśati, p. 79, l. 9; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 296, l. 12; as example, it proposes the avaivartika bodhisattva of the eighth bhūmi who definitively renounces the magical arts using mantra, japa and vidyā (Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 83; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 17, p. 342b; T 220, vol. VII, k. 449, p. 266a).

On the other hand, its great heroes, the bodhisattvas, are holders of dhāraṇī (dhāraṇīpratilabdha) insofar as they hold the teachings of all the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions, and its adepts are all also thus favored who hold, in the form of books (grantha), the sūtras, voluminous or brief, where these teachings are recorded.

There are great differences between the sūtras of the canonical Tripiṭaka and the Mahāyānasūtras the sermons of which constitute the first and the second turnings, respectively, of the wheel of the Dharma, dharmacakrapravartana (Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 442; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 12, p. 311b; T 220, vol. VII, k. 437, p. 201b; Traité, T 1509, k. 65, p. 517a-b).

The sūtras of the Tripiṭaka are concerned primarily with renunciants 'who have gone forth to lead the homeless life'. After the death of the Buddha, these bhikṣus recited them together and transmitted them orally to their successors. At the beginning, these recitations, accessible to all, appeared as the spiritual heritage of the Buddha and the very expression of the truth, but nobody thought to attribute to them any occult or mysterious power.

The Mahāyānasūtras, on the other hand, were addressed originally only to the great bodhisattva assemblies and to a few chosen śrāvakas; they remained unknown to ordinary people who were incapable of understanding them. Written down, entrusted to the care of the great bodhisattvas, they remained hidden for centuries in mysterious inaccessible places. It was only five centuries after the Buddha's parinirvāṇa, when the Holy Dharma was in danger of being extinguished, that they were discovered and began to circulate in Jambudvīpa (cf. vol. II, p. 933-941F; vol. III, Introduction, p. xxxii-xxxviiF). There then developed in India a bibliolatry, unknown in the first centuries, but which has many parallels in other religious systems, the Bible, the Koran, etc.

In the very origins of the Mahāyāna, the first Prajñāpāramitāsūtras appeared as a mahāvīdyā (in the Chinese versions, ta ming tcheou), i.e., a great magical science (cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 203, l. 10; 233, l. 7; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 9, p. 283b9; T 220, vol. VII, k. 429. p. 156a18; Aṣṭādaśa, T 220, vol. VII, k. 502, p. 556a24; Śatasāhasrikā, T 220, vol. V, k. 102, p. 568b19; k. 105, p. 580b27). The sons and daughters of good family who take, keep, recite, study and propagate these sūtras, who write them down and make them into a book (pustaka), and pay homage to them (pūjā) by offering flowers, perfume, cloth, banners, bells and lamps, these sons and daughters of good family gain immense merit which brings them, before long, to supreme complete enlightenment, but – and this is essential – assures them in this very lifetime of considerable material benefit (dṛṣṭadhārmika guṇa). Māra and evil spirits have no hold (avatāra) on them; enemies who try to fight them, quarrel with them and contradict them vanish by themselves; the four gods, Śakra, Brahmā and all the Buddhas guarantee them safekeeping, defense and protection (raṁṣāvaraṇagupti); anger and madness give place in them to loving-kindness and presence of mind; no weapon can attack them; they are invulnerable in battle, etc. (cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 187-203; E. Conze, The Perfection of Wisdom in eight thousand lines, 1973, p. 102-119; The Large Sūtra on Perfect Wisdom, 1975).

What has been said here about the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras is equally valid for all the other Mahāyānasūtras as is well expressed in the dedications (parīṇāna) that end them. Different from the sūtras of the Tripiṭaka which originally have only didactic value, the Mahāyānasūtras do not merely contain the teachings of the Buddhas but also have innumerable magical virtues that assure their adherents spiritual and immediate material benefits. These are correctly called ‘protections’ (paritrā), ‘safeguards’ (raṁṣā), dharāṇīs. By a quite natural shift in meaning, the word dhāraṇī, originally conceived of by the bodhisattvas as the memorizing of the Buddhas’ teachings, here comes to mean the sacred texts in which they are written down and which become, in regard to their wondrous effects, a cult (pūjā) object.

Aṣṭādaśa, I, p. 84 and Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 20, p. 364a, transl. – This profound perfection of Wisdom, O Ānanda, is the entry into all the phonemes; it is the doorway of all the dhāraṇīs in which the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must exert himself. All the unhindered knowledges, eloquence, etc., appear in the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas bearing these dhāraṇīs. I have said, O Ānanda, that this Perfection of Wisdom is the inexhaustible treasure of the Holy Dharma in the blessed Buddhas, future and past. This is why, O Ānanda, I declare this to you: He who will take, retain, recite and penetrate this profound Perfection of Wisdom will carry the bodhi of the blessed Buddhas, past, present and future. This Perfection of Wisdom, O Ānanda, is called dhāraṇī by me, and by carrying these dhāraṇīs of the Perfection of Wisdom, you will retain all these teachings.

- The miraculous action that produces the bodhi of the Buddhas and brings innumerable benefits in this very lifetime (dṛṣṭadhārmika guṇa) is characteristic of the Mahāyānasūtras in general and of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras in particular. It does not reside in the total of the ślokas, 8,000, 18,000, 25,000 100,000, that make up these sūtras of lengthy development, but is found complete in each of these ślokas and, what is more, in each of the phonemes (akṣara) of which they are constituted, for, as we have seen, the forty-two phonemes of human language are interpenetrating and it is enough to pronounce one of them to express them all. And just as the Buddha can preach the Dharma in its entirety by means of a single sound (cf. p. 1380F, n. 1), so his disciples can reproduce it by a single vocalization and derive all the benefit.

One of the major characteristics of Tantrism is to have condensed the thaumaturgic power of the sūtras into short mantras, bringing together understandable words, transparent expressions, more or less justifiable, with bizarre incoherent phonemes, hrīm, hrām, hrūm, phat, the ancient sound Om, often written with the anunāsika, the svāha of the Vedas and the Upaniṣads. These unintelligible sounds constitute an important element of mantra: in many cases, the bīja, the seed, the nucleus of the formula and its thaumaturgical power, resides in it. They incarnate the deity, the person who possesses the bīja, the hṛdaya, the mysterious name, possesses the deity. The tantric liturgy rests on this principle as ancient as the Vedas and the abhicāra rituals: pūja, offering, sādhana, etc. (L. de La Vallée Poussin, Bouddhisme, Étude et Matériaux, London, 1898, p. 121).

For the rôle of dhāraṇī in the Prajñāpāramitā literature, we should mention the works of E. Conze: The Prajñāpāramitā Literature, 1960, p. 79-90; various articles in Thirty Years of Buddhist Studies, 1967; The Short Prajñāpāramitā Texts, 1973. – Tantric definitions of mantra (gsaṅ snags), vidyā (rig snags) and of dhāraṇī (gzuis snags) in A. Wayman, The Buddhist Tantras, 1973, p. 64-65).

[268a] Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21, l. 15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 68, l. 3-4). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to acquire the gates of remembrance and the gates of concentration should exert himself in the perfection of wisdom (Dhāraṇīmukhasamādhimukhāni pratilabdhuḥkāmēna bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. GATES OF REMEMBRANCE (DHĀRAṆIMUKHA)

In regard to dhāraṇīs, refer (p. 317-321F) to the Tsan-p’ou-sa (Bodhisattvastutiparivarta). The ‘gates’ (mukha) of the dhāraṇīs are preparatory practices (prāyogikadharmā) to obtaining the dhāraṇīs. In a similar way, the three ‘concentrations’, samādhis, are called ‘gates of deliverance’ (vimokṣamukha).²¹⁵ What are these preparatory practices?

1. Śrutadharadhāraṇī ‘dhāraṇī for retaining what one has heard’²¹⁶

²¹⁵ The three higher samādhis, śūnyatāsamādhi, etc., are commonly designated by the name of vimokṣamukha: see p. 1213F.

²¹⁶ See above, p. 318F, 328F; and later, k. 49, p. 415a8; k. 69, p. 540b5-9; k. 74, p. 579c10-12; k. 85, p. 657a15-19. – See also Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra, T VII, no. 220, k. 515, p. 634b27-c1.

1) Whoever wishes to retain that which he has heard must think of it attentively so as to develop his memory (smṛti). First he should think of an analogous thing (already familiar to him) and to join that to his mind so as to discover a thing that he has not yet seen. Thus Tcheou-li-p'an-t'o-kia (Cūḍapanthaka) paid so much attention to cleaning leather shoes that his mind (manas)²¹⁷ became concentrated and he eliminated the stains of his mind (cittamala).²¹⁸ In the beginner (ādikarmika), this is the dhāraṇī of retaining what one has heard.

When one is able to retain what one has heard three times, the faculty of the mind is developed and sharpened; when one can retain what one has heard twice, it is strengthened; when one can retain what one has heard once, it is acquired (prāpta) and one does not forget anything; that is the first exercise (prayoga) of the dhāraṇī of retaining what one has heard.

2) Sometimes the bodhisattva who has entered into concentration (samādhi) obtains the liberation free of forgetfulness (asampramoṣavimokṣa) and by its power he retains, without forgetting, all the words (vacana) and sermons (dharmadeśana) down to the smallest syllable and the smallest phoneme (akṣara):²¹⁹ that is the second practice.

3) Sometimes by the power of a magical phrase (mantra), the bodhisattva obtains the dhāraṇī of retaining what he has heard.

4) Finally, sometimes on assuming a rebirth (upapatti) as a result of actions of his previous lifetimes (pūrvajanman), he retains all that he has heard and does not forget.

That is what is called the gate of remembrance of retaining what one has heard.

2. Ghoṣapraveśadhāraṇī

*‘The dhāraṇī of entering into the true nature of articulated sounds’*²²⁰

Furthermore, the bodhisattva, hearing articulated sounds (ghoṣa), words (vacana), distinguishes their beginning and end (pūrvāparānta) and considers their true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa); he knows that these words arise and perish from moment to moment.

²¹⁷ Adopting the variant yi.

²¹⁸ The bhikṣu Cūḍapanthaka was known for his stupidity. The Buddha gave him two sentences to meditate on: “I am removing the dust, I am removing the stain” and sent him to clean the monks’ shoes. While performing this humble task, Cūḍapanthaka meditated on the Buddha’s words. He finally understood that removing the dust consisted not only of brushing the shoes but also and above all of eliminating the threefold poison of desire, hatred and stupidity. His conflicting emotions were immediately cut and he attained arhathood. See references given above, p. 1543-1544F.

²¹⁹ Cf. the Asaṅgadhāraṇī referred to above, p. 328F.

²²⁰ Cf. p. 319-321F

[Normally], when articulated sounds have just perished, beings recall them (anusmaranti) and grasp their characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇanti). Thinking of these words that have just perished, they say to themselves: “This man has insulted me”, and they feel hatred (dveṣa). [Mutatis mutandis], if it is a matter of praise (varṇana), it is the same.

The bodhisattva, however, considers beings (sattvān samanupaśyati) in such a way that, although they may have insulted him for a hundred thousand kalpas, he has no hatred (dveṣa); they may have praised him for a hundred thousand kalpas, he has no joy (muditā). He knows indeed that articulated sounds (ghoṣa) arise and perish like an echo (pratiśrutkā) and, like the sound of a drum (duṇḍubhisvara), they are without an agent (kāraṇa). Without an agent, they are without stability (asthitika) and, being absolutely empty (atyantaśūnya), they deceive only the ears of fools (mūḍha).²²¹

That is what is called the dhāraṇī of entering into [the true nature] of articulated sounds (ghoṣapraveśadhāraṇī).

3. Akṣarapraveśadhāraṇī ‘the dhāraṇī of penetrating the phonemes’²²²

²²¹ The inexpressibility of language is a favorite theme of the Mahāyānasūtras: see Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, tr., p. 148-149; Śūraṅgamasamādhi, tr., p. 188-189.

²²² Dhāraṇī based on the Arapacana alphabet of which the forty-two letters are supposed to represent all the phonemes of the spoken language. It notes some sounds that are not of Indian origin but belong rightly to Iranian languages; it was a matter of a Scythian alphabet introduced into India by the Śaka about the time of the Christian era (cf. Mémoires de Sylvestre Lévai, Ysa, Paris, p. 355-363).

In the viewpoint of the Prajñāpāramitā, the forty-two phonemes noted in this alphabet are not yet of magical worth; they are simply mnemotechniques (dhāraṇīmukha) recalling the essential points of the Buddhadharma. They appear in turn at the beginning of a phrase used to define the true nature of dharmas.

This very simple catechesis is reproduced fully in the various versions of the large Prajñāpāramitāsūtras:

- a. Pañcaviṃśati, ed. Dutt, p. 212-214; T 221, k. 4, p. 26b-27a; T 222, k. 7, p. 195c-196b; T 223, k. 5, p. 226a-b; T 220, vol. VII, k. 415, p. 81c-82b. – Passage commented on in the Traité, T 1509, k. 48, p. 408b-409b.
b. Aṣṭasāśasāharikā, T 220, vol. VII, k. 490, p. 489b-490a.
c. Śatasāhasrikā, ed. Ghosa, p. 1450-1453; T 220, vol. V, k. 53, p. 302b – 303a.

Here are translations of several extracts from the original Sanskrit restored according to the editions of N.

Dutt and P. Ghosa: Punar aparāṇ Subhute bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya mahāyānaṃ yaduta dhāraṇīmukhāni/katamāni dhāraṇāimukhāni/akṣarasamatā bhāṣyasamatā tasya viṃśatir anuṣaṃsāḥ pratikāṅkṣaitavyāḥ ...

Transl. – Furthermore, O Subhūti, the Great Vehicle of the bodhisattva-mahāsattva is the gates of dhāraṇī. What are these gates of dhāraṇī? The similarity of phonemes, the similarity of utterances, the gate of entry into the phonemes. What is this gate of entry into the phonemes? The letter A is gate because all dharmas are, from the beginning, without birth (an-uppanna). The letter RA is gate because all dharmas are rid of dust (ra-jas). The latter PA is gate because all dharmas are signs of the absolute (pa-ramārtha). The letter CA is gate because all dharmas are

Furthermore, there is a dhāraṇī that, by using the forty-two phonemes (dvācatvāriṃśad akṣara), includes (saṃgrhṇāti) all words (vacana) and names (nāman).

What are these forty-two phonemes? A, LO, PO, TCHÖ, NA (A, RA, PA, CA, NA), etc.

[The first phoneme A condenses the phrase A-t'i-a-neou-po-nai (ādy-anutpanna)]. A-t'i, in the language of the Ts'in, means 'beginning'; a-neou-po-nai, in the language of the Ts'in, means 'unborn'.²²³

As soon as the bodhisattva who is practicing this dhāraṇī hears the phoneme A, at once he penetrates that fact that 'all dharmas are unborn from the beginning' (sarvadharmāṇām ādyanutpannatvam). And so on for the other phonemes [LO PO TCHÖ NA], etc.: to the extent that they hear them, the bodhisattva penetrates [even further] into the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas.

This is called the dhāraṇī of penetrating the phonemes (akṣaramukhapraveśadhāraṇī). In the Mo-ho-yen p'in (Mahāyānaparivarta), these akṣaramukhas will be discussed.²²⁴ [268b]

The bodhisattva who acquires all the concentrations of the three times (tryadhvasamādhi) – concentration of unhindered brilliance (ānantaryaprabhā), etc., - acquires each of these innumerable incalculable free of death (cya-vana) and birth. The letter NA is gate because all dharmas are without name (nā-man). [And so on for the other 37 letters of the alphabet].

Apart from these [forty-two letters], there is no other usage of phonemes. Why? Because there is no other name that can be used thanks to which it could be expressed, designated, characterized, perceived. All dharmas, O Subhūti, should be understood to be like space. This is called the entry into the gates of dhāraṇī, the entry into the phonemes, beginning with the letter A.

Every bodhisattva-mahāṭtva who manifests this skill in the phonemes beginning with the letter A will not fail in any of his utterances...

Every bodhisattva-mahāsattva who will hear this seal of the phonemes beginning with the latter A and having heard it, will study it, retain it, recite it and teach it to others, can attain twenty benefits...

- In the Avataṃsaka, a young scholar named Viśvāmitra informs Sudhana that by pronouncing the phonemes listed in the Arapacana alphabet, he broke through each of the forty-two gates (mukha) of the Prajñāpāramitā in turn. See the section of the Gaṇḍavyūha, ed. Suzuki, p. 448, l. 21 – 450, l. 21, and the various Chinese translations, complete or partial (T 278, k. 57, p. 765b-766a; T 279, k. 76, p. 418a-c; T 293, k. 31, p. 804a-805a; T 295, p. 876c-877b; T 1019, p. 707c-709a; T 1020, p. 709b-c).

- The Mahāyānists were not alone in using the alphabet in question. The Dharmaguptakas, a Hīnayānist sect, recited it as well but we do not know what meaning they attributed to it. It was forbidden for the monks to pronounce the phonemes at the same time, similar to the brāhmaṇas; the phoneme intoned by the leader of the ritual was to be repeated in chorus by the monks. This, at least, seems to be what the sixth pāyantika of the Dharmaguptaka Vinaya says, T 1428, k. 11, p. 638c21-639a28.

- The Arapacana formula was called on to play an important part in the cabbala of tantric Buddhism. On this subject, see H8bb8girin, s.v. Arahashana, p. 34; Ceylon Encyclopedia, II, p. 67-70.

²²³ This paragraph is evidently a Chinese gloss introduced into the text.

²²⁴ See references on p. 1867F.

dhāraṇīs. Together, they are given the name of pañcaśatadhāraṇīmukha, 'the five hundred means of memorizing' and constitute the treasury of the good attributes and qualities of the bodhisattva (bodhisattvakuśaladharmaguṇakośa).²²⁵

That is what is called the dhāraṇīmukhas.

II. GATES OF CONCENTRATION (SAMĀDHIMUKHA)

The samādhis 'concentrations' are of two kinds: i) samadhi belonging to the śrāvaka system; ii) samādhi belonging to the Mahāyāna system.

1. Śrāvaka concentrations

The samādhis belonging to the śrāvaka system are the three samādhis: i) [samādhi of emptiness (śūnyatā), ii) of signlessness (ānimitta) and iii) of wishlessness (apranihita)].

There are also three samādhis: i) śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi, ii) ānimittānimittasamādhi, iii) apranīhitāpranīhtasamādhi.²²⁶

There are also three other samādhis: i) with examination and analysis (śavitārkasavicāra), ii) without examination and with analysis only (avitarkavicāramātra), iii) with neither examination nor analysis (avitarka-avicāra).²²⁷

There is also the five-membered (pañcāṅga) samādhi,²²⁸ the innate samādhi of five knowledges (pañcājñāna); all are called samādhi.

Moreover, all the absorptions are sometimes called samāpatti and sometimes samādhi. The four trances are sometimes called dhyāna, sometimes samāpatti and sometimes samādhi. The other absorptions with the ²²⁵ As far as I [Lamotte] can tell, this is not a matter of a Basket (piṭaka) of texts – dhāraṇīpiṭaka or bodhisattvapīṭaka – but a group of attributes belonging to the bodhisattvas. In the large Prajñāpāramitāsūtra (T VI, no. 220, k. 378, p. 952a26-27; T VII, no. 220, k. 467, p. 364b14; k. 529, p. 717b25; T VIII, no. 223, k. 24, p. 394c4-9), the five hundred dhāraṇīmukhas are part of a long series of supramundane (lokottara) attributes belonging only to the bodhisattvas and distinguishing them from worldly people.

²²⁶ Cf. p. 1094F, and Kośa, VIII, p. 187-190.

²²⁷ Cf. p. 1487F.

²²⁸ Cf. p. 1028F, n. 1.

exception of the four trances are sometimes called samāpatti and sometimes samādhi, but not dhyāna. The absorptions coming under the ten levels [of the śrāvaka]²²⁹ are called samādhi.

Some say that the stage of the desire realm (kāmadhātu) possesses samādhis as well. Why? Since in the realm of desire there are twenty-two auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipākṣika), we know that this realm possesses samādhis. If there were no samādhis there, one would not find these profound and wondrous qualities (guṇa) [which are the auxiliaries] there. Moreover, in the Ts'ien-wen 'Thousand Aporias',²³⁰ it is a question of the four families of saints (āryavaṃśa): how many belong to the desire realm (kāmadhātvacara), how many to the form realm (rūpadhātvacara), how many to the formless realm (ārūpyadhātvacara) and how many to no realm (anavacara)? The answer is that distinctions (vibhaṅga) are obvious concerning them: sometimes they belong to the desire realm, sometimes to the form realm, sometimes to the formless realm and sometimes to no realm. It is the same for the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna) and the four foundations of magical power (ṛddhipāda). Consequently, we should know that the desire realm has samādhis. If it were [exclusively] distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta), how would the wonderful dharmas just mentioned occur there? Therefore the samādhis occur in the eleven levels [of the śrāvaka].²³¹ These samādhis are fully analyzed in the Abhidharma.

2. Mahāyāna concentrations

[a. Lists of Mahāyānist concentrations.]

The Mahāyānist samādhis go from the concentration of the Heroic Progress (śūraṃgamasamādhi) up to the detached liberated unstained concentration like space (ākāśaśaṅgavimuktinirupalepasasmādhi),²³² or the concentration of seeing all the Buddhas (sarvabuddhadarśanasamādhi),²³³ up to the contemplation of ²²⁹ These ten levels are the anāgāmya, the four dhyānas, the dhyānāntara and the four ārūpyas: cf. p. 1185F.

²³⁰ See p. 1186F.

²³¹ The eleven levels of the śrāvaka are the kāmadhātu, the four dhyānas, the dhyānāntara and the four ārūpyas.

²³² Classic list of the 108 or 118 bodhisattva samādhis, enumerated and defined in the large Prajñās:

Pañcaviṃśati, ed. Dutt, p. 142, l. 6-144, l. 7; T 221, k. 3, p. 16b; T 222, k. 4, p. 172b-173a; T 223, k. 3, p. 237c-238a; T 220, vol. VII, k. 409, p. 50c-51b.

Pañcaviṃśati, ed. Dutt, p. 108, l. 11-203, l. 21; T 221, k. 4, p. 23b-24c; T 222, k. 6, p. 190a-193a; T 223, k. 5, p. 251a-253b; T 220, vol. VII, k. 414, p. 74a-77c.

Śatasāhasraika, ed. Ghosa, p. 825, l. 16-835, l. 22; T 220, vol. V, k. 41, p. 220c-230b.

Śatasāhasrikā, ed. Ghosa, p. 1412, l. 7-1426, l. 14; T 220, vol. V, k. 52, p. 292a-297b.

Mahāvvyut., no. 506-623

²³³ Mentioned in Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 942, l. 5.

the deliverance of all the Tathāgatas (sarvatathāgatavimuktisamanupaśyana), the stretching of the lion's spine (siṃhavijrmbhita)²³⁴ and the innumerable incalculable samādhis of the bodhisattva.

[b. Examples of bodhisattva concentrations.]²³⁵

1) There is a samādhi called 'immense purity' (apramāṇaviśuddhi): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi can manifest pure bodies.

2) There is a samādhi called 'mark of power' (anubhāvanimitta): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi can eclipse the power of the sun (sūrya) and the moon (candra).

3) There is a samādhi called 'burning mountain' (ādīptagiri): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi eclipses the power of Śakra and Brahmā.

4) There is a samādhi called 'removing the dust' (rajoḥārin): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi destroys the three poisons (viśatraya) of all the great assemblies. [268c]

5) There is a samādhi called 'unhindered brilliance' (ānantaryaprabhā): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi can illumine all the buddhafields (buddhakṣetra).

6) There is a samādhi called 'not forgetting any dharma' (sarvadharmāsaṃpramoṣa): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi remembers the teachings preached by all the Buddhas; moreover, he communicates the Buddha's words to other people.

7) There is a samādhi called 'sound like the noise of thunder' (meghasvaraghoṣa):²³⁶ the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi can fill the buddhafields (buddhakṣetra) of the ten directions with brahmic sounds (brahmasvara).²³⁷

8) There is a samādhi called 'rejoicing all beings' (sarvasattvasaṃtoṣaṇin): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi makes all beings take pleasure in their high aspirations (adhyāśaya).

9) There is a samādhi called 'tirelessly pleasant to see' (priyadarśa): when the bodhisattva acquires this samādhi, all beings rejoice in seeing him and hearing him, without ever getting tired.

10) There is a samādhi called 'inconceivable reward of qualities' (acintyaḡuṇacipāka), fortunate in every object': the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi realizes all the supraknowledges (abhijñā).

11) There is a samādhi called 'knowledge of all articulated sounds and all languages' (sarvaghoṣabhāṣyaḡjñāna): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi can produce all articulated sounds and speak all languages; in one single phoneme (akṣara) he produces all the phonemes and in all these phonemes he produces only one.²³⁸

²³⁴ A samādhi already appearing in the list of the 108 samādhis; it can also mean 'concentration of the lion's yawn'.

²³⁵ Unidentified list; the retoration of the proposed Sanskrit terms is purely conjectural.

²³⁶ Cf. Mahāvvyut. no. 478.

²³⁷ See p. 279F.

²³⁸ On the single and multiple sound, see p. 1380F, n. 1.

12) There is a samādhi called ‘accumulation of the fruits of retribution of all meritorious actions’ (*sarvapuṇyakarmāṇāṃ*²³⁹ vipākaphalasamuccayaḥ): when he acquires this samādhi, the bodhisattva, although remaining silent (nuṣṭibhūta), penetrates into the trances (dhyāna) and absorptions (samāpatti) and makes all beings hear the Buddhadharmas, hear the sounds of the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas and the six pāramitās, whereas he himself utters not a single word.

13) There is a samādhi called ‘surpassing the king of all the dhāraṇīs’ (sarvadhāraṇīrājātikakrānta): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi penetrates innumerable infinite dhāraṇīs.

14) There is a samādhi called ‘universal eloquence’ (samantapratibhāna): the bodhisattva who acquires this samādhi is happy to utter all the phonemes (akṣara), all the articulated sounds (ghoṣa), as well as the languages (bhāṣya), the deeds (avadāna) and the stories of events (nidāna).

There are innumerable powerful samādhis of this kind.

[c. Concentrations and ‘gates’ of concentration.]

Question. – Are these samādhis the samādhimukhas?

Answer. – Yes. These samādhis are the samādhimukhas.

Question. – If that is so, why not simply say samādhi, without adding mukha?

Answer. – The samādhis of the Buddhas are numberless, incalculable and infinite like space (ākāśa). Therefore how could the bodhisattva acquire them in full? Knowing this, the bodhisattva falls back and becomes discouraged. This is why the Buddha here speaks about the ‘gates’ (mukha) of samādhi. By passing through one single gate, one captures innumerable samādhis, just as when one pulls on the corner of a robe the whole robe is pulled off, or when one captures the queen bee (bhṛīgādhipa) all the other bees are taken as well.

Furthermore, as uninterrupted series (pāraṃparya), the samādhis are gates. Thus, by maintaining pure morality (śīlaviśuddhi), by being mindful (smṛtimat) and energetic (vīryavat), by diligently reflecting from the first to the last watch (yāma), by abandoning the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), by concentrating the mind one-pointedly, in brief, by using all these practices (prayoga), one acquires these samādhis: these are what is called the gates of samādhi. [269a]

Furthermore, the samādhis belonging to the desire realm (kāmadhātuvavacara) are the gate of samādhi of the anāgāmya ‘vestibule of the first dhyāna’, the samādhis of the anāgāmya are the gate of the first dhyāna, the samādhis of the first dhyāna and the second sāmāntaka are the gate of the samādhis of the second dhyāna, and so on up to the samādhis of the sphere of neither-awareness-nor-nonawareness (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana).²⁴⁰

The samādhis of the heats (ūṣmagata) are the gate of the samādhis of the summits (mūrdhan), the summits are the gate of the samādhis of the acquiescences (kṣānti), the acquiescences are the gate of the samādhis of the supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma),²⁴¹ the supreme worldly dharmas are the gate of the samādhi of the duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti,²⁴² and the duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti is the gate of the samādhis leading finally to the diamond-like concentration (vajropamasamādhi).²⁴³

In brief (saṃkṣepena), all the samādhis have three characteristics: they are characterized by i) an entrance (praveśa), ii) a duration (sthiti) and iii) an exit (vyutthāna). The entry and the exit are the gates (mukha); the duration is the body of the samādhi.

In the śrāvaka system, these things are the gates of concentration (samādhimukha). As for the gates of concentration in the Mahāyāna system, see (p. 1043-1057F) the explanations relative to dhyānapāramitā where the concentrations are fully analyzed and described.

[d. The perfections are also gates of concentration.]

1) The perfection of morality (śīlapāramitā) is a gate of concentration. Why? Three elements make up the Buddhist path (mārga): the morality element (śīlaskandha), the concentration element (samādhiskandha) and the wisdom element (prajñāskandha).²⁴⁴ The element of pure morality (viśuddhaśīlaskandha) is the gate of the concentration element (samādhiskandha) and produces samadhi. The concentration element produces the wisdom element. These three elements destroy the conflicting emotions (kleśa) and give nirvāṇa.

This is why the perfection of morality (śīlapāramitā) and wisdom (prajñā) are called gates close to (saṃnikṣṭamukha) samadhi.

2) The other three perfections, while being gates, are called distant gates (viprakṣṭamukha) of samādhi.

Thus, as a result of generosity (dāna), one gains merit (puṇya); as a result of merit, vows (prañidhāna) are realized; as a result of vows, the mind becomes gentle (mṛduka); by thoughts of loving-kindness and compassion, one fears wrong-doing (āpatti) and one thinks of other beings.

Having determined that the world is empty (śūnya) and impermanent (anitya), one concentrates one’s mind and practices patience (kṣānti). Thus patience also is a gate of samādhi.

Exertion (vīrya) in the face of the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) controls the mind, removes the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa),²⁴⁵ concentrates the mind and prevents distractions (vikṣepa). When the mind wanders off, exertion brings it back and prevents it from scattering. It also is a gate of samādhi.

[c. The bodhisattva levels are also gates of concentration.]

²³⁹ Adopting the variant fou-tō-ye.

²⁴⁰ For details, see p. 1027-1034F.

²⁴¹ These are the four nirvedhabhāgiyās of the prayogamārga.

²⁴² The first moment of the darśanamārga.

²⁴³ Before the first moment of the bhāvanamārga.

²⁴⁴ Cf. p. 1183-1184F.

²⁴⁵ Cf. p. 1013-1020F.

Finally, the first bhūmi [of the bodhisattva is the gate of concentration of the second bhūmi, and so on up to the ninth bhūmi which is the gate of concentration of the tenth. The tenth bhūmi is the gate of the innumerable samādhis of the Buddha. This is how the bhūmis are samādhimukhas.

III. DIFFERENCES BETWEEN DHĀRAṆĪMUKHA AND SAMĀDHIMUKHA

Question. – The dhāraṇīmukhas ‘gates of remembrance’ and the samādhimukhas ‘gates of concentration’ are either identical or different. If they are identical, why repeat them? If they are different, what is the difference?

Answer. – Above, I spoke of the differences between samādhimukha and dhāraṇīmukha, but I must repeat myself here. The samādhis are associated with the mind only (cittasamprayuktadharmā), whereas the dhāraṇīs are sometimes associated with (samprayukta) and sometimes dissociated from (viprayukta) the mind.

Question. – How do you know that the dhāraṇīs can be dissociated from the mind?

Answer. – If a person who has the dhāraṇī of retaining what one has heard (śrutadharadhāraṇī) conceives wickedness (vyāpāda), the dhāraṇī does not leave him: it always follows this person like the shadow (chāyā) follows the body. [269b] The practice of samādhi (samādhībhāvanā), by being prolonged, ends up by realizing a dhāraṇī. Just as a person who has cultivated pleasures (kāma) for a long time ends up by entering into their nature (svabhāva), so the samādhis joined with the wisdom of the true nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa) gives rise to the dhāraṇīs.

On the condition that it is baked in the fire, a vessel of unbaked clay (mṛdghata) can contain water without letting it leak out and can even help a man cross a river. The samādhi lacking wisdom is like the unbaked vessel, but if it obtains the wisdom of the true nature, it is like the baked clay vessel: it can contain the numberless qualities (guṇa), past and present, of the bodhisattva; thanks to that, the bodhisattva can effect the crossing and arrive at buddhahood.

Such are the many differences between samādhi and dhāraṇī.

IV. SILENCE OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS ON THE DHĀRAṆĪS

Question. – There is no mention of dhāraṇīs in the śrāvaka system. Why is it that only the Mahāyāna speaks of them?

Answer. – Do not ask why a small thing is not contained in a big thing; rather, ask why a big thing does not contain small things. We do not wonder why a humble house contains neither gold nor silver!

Furthermore, the śrāvakas do not try hard to accumulate qualities (guṇa); they only try, by means of wisdom (prajñā) to try to free themselves from old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa). This is why the śrāvakas do not use dhāraṇīs to maintain the qualities. They are like a thirsty man who is content with a little water in his two hands and has no need of a pitcher (bhājana) to hold water. But if one must provide water for a large crowd of people, a jar is needed to hold the water. In the interest of beings, the bodhisattva must have the dhāraṇīs to maintain the qualities.

Furthermore, in the śrāvaka system, it is above all a matter of the [three] characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of conditioned dharmas: i) production (utpāda), ii) disappearance (vyaya) and iii) impermanence (anityatā).²⁴⁶ Their scholars (upadeśācārya) say: “Dharmas are impermanent (anitya) and since they are impermanent, there is no need of dhāraṇīs. Why? Because things of impermanent nature are not to be retained (na dhārayitavya). Only the cause and conditions (hetupratyaya) that constitute past actions (atītakarman) do not perish; similarly also the fruits of retribution in the future (anāgatavipākaphala) which, although not yet born, are conditioned by past actions.”²⁴⁷

According to the Mahāyāna system, the characteristics of production and disappearance (utpādayavyaya lakṣaṇa) are not real, neither are the characteristics of non-production and non-disappearance; the complete removal of views (vipaśyanā) and characteristics (lakṣaṇa), that is what is real. If therefore the bodhisattva remembers (dhārayati) past dharmas, that is not a mistake (doṣa). In order to retain good dharmas, good faculties (kuśalendriya) and other good qualities (guṇa) of the past, the dhāraṇīs are necessary. The dhāraṇīs always follow the bodhisattva from lifetime to lifetime. This is not the case for the samādhis: sometimes they disappear at the changing of the lifetime.

Such are the many distinctions to be made in regard to the dhāraṇīs and the samādhis. This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here: “The bodhisattva who wishes to acquire the dhāraṇīmukhas and the samādhimukhas must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

²⁴⁶ Cf. p. 36F, n. 3; 1163F, n. 1.

²⁴⁷ The scholars who express themselves in this way are not the Sarvāstivādins but the Vibhajyavādins. See Kośabhāṣya, p. 296: “Those who affirm the existence of everything, past, future and present, are Sarvāstivādins. On the other hand, those who are the Vibhajyavādins make distinctions and say: ‘The present and the past action that has not yet given its fruit exist; the past that has already produced its fruit and the future do not exist.’ “

CHAPTER XLIV SYMPATHETIC JOY AND TRANSFER OF MERIT

By means of a simple mind of sympathetic joy in regard to the qualities of another, the bodhisattva gains merit (puṇyakriyāvastu) infinitely superior to the merit of all other beings, for he applies this merit to supreme complete enlightenment. Taking delight in the qualities of another (anumodanā, souei-hi, rjes su yi ran bu) and applying the merit to anuttarā samyaksambodhi (pariṇāmanā, houei-hiang, yois su bsno ba) place the bodhisattva in the first rank of the Buddha's disciples.

Chapter VI of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā entitled Anumodanāpariṇāmanā (p. 325F) begins as follows: Yac ca khalu puṇaḥ ārya Subhūte bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasyānumodanāpariṇāmanāśahagataṃ puṇyakriyāvastu yac ca sarvasattvānāṃ dānamayaṃ puṇyakriyāvastu śīlamayaṃ puṇyakriyāvastu bhāvanāmayam puṇyakriyāvastu idam eva tato bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasyānumodanāpariṇāmanāśahagataṃ puṇyakriyāvastu agram ākhyāyate.

Free translation. – There is in the bodhisattva-mahāsattva, O noble Subhūti, a merit accompanied by sympathetic joy and transfer, and in all beings there are merits consisting of generosity, morality and meditation (cf. Kośa, IV, p. 231) respectively. The first is placed ahead of the following ones.

In the following pages, the Traité will explain how, by a simple thought of sympathetic joy, the bodhisattva surpasses the highest and most meritorious qualities of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, namely:

1. the generosity manifesting by way of material gifts (āmiśadāna).
2. the five pure elements (anāsravaskandha) turned directly toward detachment from the world, nirvāṇa, characterizing the arhat 'delivered by means of wisdom' (prajñāvimukta). These five elements are: śīla, samādhi, prajñā, vimukti and vimuktijñānadarśana.
3. the very profound concentrations (distinct from samādhi included here among the five pure elements), not directly turned toward nirvāṇa and characterizing the 'doubly delivered' arhat (ubhayatobhāgavimukta).

The first two points will be dealt with in section I of the present chapter; the third, in section II.

It should be noted that anumodanā is taken here in the strict sense of sympathetic joy toward the qualities of another, as in the Bodhicaryāvatāra, III, v. 1-3. There are, however, other anumodanās, e.g., on a given exposition of the Dharma (dharmaparyāya): cf. Saddharmapuṇḍ. p. 349, l. 6, and they too are very meritorious.

Along with confession of sins (pāpadeśana), anumodanā and pariṇāmanā make up an integral part of the Mahāyānist ceremonialism (Bodhisattvapārimokṣasūtra, IHQ, VII, 1931, p. 272-273; Upālipariprcchā, transl. P. Python, Paris, 1973, p. 102-103; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 170). They appear in the spiritual practice of the Triskandhas which the bodhisattva performs three times each day and three times each night (Traité, above, p. 415F, n. 1; 421F; Bodhicaryāvatāra, V, v. 98; Pañjikā, p. 152, l. 11-13; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 171, l. 5-6; 290, l. 1-3). Finally, they are classified among the seven higher forms of worship: saptadhānuttarapūjā (Dharmasaṃgraha, § 14).

First Section SURPASSING THE HIGH QUALITIES OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 21. l. 17-20; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 68, l. 4-69, l. 8). - The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who, by a thought of sympathetic joy, wishes to surpass the generosity of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, must practice the perfection of wisdom. The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who, by a thought of [269c] sympathetic joy, wishes to surpass the morality of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas must practice the perfection of wisdom.²⁴⁸ The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who, by a thought of sympathetic joy, wishes to surpass the concentration, wisdom, deliverance, knowledge and vision of deliverance of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas must practice the perfection of wisdom (Sarvaśrāvakaṇṇakapratyekabuddhānāṃ dānam anumodanācittanābhībhavitukāmena bodhisattvena mahācittena prajñāpāramitātāyāṃ śikṣitavyam. sarvaśrāvakaṇṇakapratyekabuddhānāṃ śīlam anumodanācittanābhībhavitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitātāyāṃ śikṣitavyam. sarvaśrāvakaṇṇakapratyekabuddhānāṃ samādhiprajñāvimuktivimukti-jñānadarśanam anumodanācittanābhībhavitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitātāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. DEFINITION OF SYMPATHETIC JOY

For the mind of sympathetic joy (anumodanācitta), see the Souei-hi p'in (Anumodanāparivarta).²⁴⁹

Here is an example of sympathetic joy. Someone is practicing the qualities [in question, viz., generosity, morality, etc.]; a spectator rejoices in it (anumodate) and congratulates him, saying: "That is good; in this impermanent world (anityalokadhātu) enveloped in the shadows of ignorance (avidyāndhakāra), you are strengthening the great mind [of bodhi] and you are planting this merit (puṇya)."

²⁴⁸ In the Taishō edition, this phrase is repeated.

²⁴⁹ Chapter XXXIX of the Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 11, p. 197b-302a. It is entitled Souei-hi p'in (Anumodanāparivarta) or Souei-hi-houei-hiang p'in (Anumodanāpariṇāmanāparivarta). Cf. Chapter VI of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā.

Imagine there is a seller (vikretr) and a purchaser (kretr) of all sorts of wonderful perfumes (gandha); a third person comes near and stands to one side. He also breathes the perfumed air; the perfume, nevertheless, does not diminish at all and the two people doing business lose nothing.

Imagine also a donor (dāyaka) and a beneficiary (pratigrāhaka); a third person, standing beside them, is joyful in the good action. He rejoices with them, but the other two lose nothing.

Such is the characteristic of sympathetic joy (anumodanā).

Thus, just by a mind of sympathetic joy, the bodhisattva surpasses the practitioners of the two Vehicles. What more could be said (kaḥ punarvādah) if he himself practices [the qualities in which he is rejoicing]?

II. SUPERIORITY OF SYPATHETIC JOY OVER GOOD ACTION

Question. – How can the bodhisattva, by means of a mind of sympathetic joy, surpass the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas who, themselves, give in kind (āmiṣa)?

Answer. – While the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas are making such gifts, the bodhisattva who is standing by, notices them. He thinks about it carefully, is pleased thereby and congratulates the authors. Taking the merit (puṇya) resulting from this sympathetic joy (anumodanā), he applies it (pariṇāmayati) to supreme and perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksambodhi) to save all beings. Thus he gains immense Buddha attributes. By means of the twofold merit [of sympathetic joy (anumodanā) and the application of merit (puṇyapariṇāmanā)], he surpasses the generosity carried out by the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

Furthermore, by means of his knowledge of the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and his sympathetic joy, the bodhisattva surpasses the generosity of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

Moreover, by means of his thought of sympathetic joy, the bodhisattva gains a merit (puṇya) the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) of which he applies to veneration (satkartum) of the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions. Thus he surpasses the generosity of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. This is like a man who, having made a small offering to the king, derives a great reward from it. Or it is like a man who, by blowing gently into a conch (śaṅkha), produces a very powerful sound.

Finally, by the quality (guṇa) of his sympathetic joy, the bodhisattva brings together numberless other qualities that, until the end of things (dharmakṣaya), will not disappear (akṣaya). In the same way, if one pours a little bit of water into the ocean (mahāsamudra), it will not disappear until the end of the kalpa.²⁵⁰

[What has been said here about generosity] is also true [for the other qualities of the śrāvaka, viz., morality (śīla), concentrations (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā), deliverance (vimukti), knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana): [By means of a single thought of sympathetic joy, the bodhisattva surpasses all these qualities].

²⁵⁰ At the end of the kalpa of disappearance (saṃvartakalpa) involving the disappearance of beings (sattvasaṃvartanī) and the disappearance of the receptacles (bhājanasaṃvartanī): cf. Kośa, III, p. 184, n. 4.

III. SUPERIORITY OF THE BODHISATTVA OVER THE OTHER DISCIPLES

After the Buddhas come the bodhisattvas, and after the bodhisattvas come the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. However, here [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] speaks of the “bodhisattva who wishes to surpass the [270a] generosity, etc., of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.” What is there to be astonished at [in the fact that the bodhisattva surpasses the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas who are hierarchically lower than he is]?

Answer. – It is not a matter here of comparing the merits (puṇya) of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas – generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), etc. – with the qualities of the bodhisattva. The bodhisattva surpasses them only by means of a mind of sympathetic joy (anumodhanācitta); what more could be said (kaḥ punarvādah) when he himself is practicing the qualities [that he is admiring in others]?

The śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha adepts are diligent and struggle to practice the qualities; the bodhisattva, on the other hand, is silent, but by his sympathetic joy (anumodanā) and the strength of his wisdom (prajñābala), his merits surpass those of the former. He is like a foreman (śilpin) who uses only his knowledge and goes away after having given instructions, whereas the unskilled workman wearies himself using the axe (kūṭhāra); at the end of the day, when the work is examined and the wages are paid, the foreman gets three times as much as the workman. In the same way also, in wartime, the soldiers risk death but it is the general (senāni) who wins the victory.

Question. – Since the mind of sympathetic joy surpasses generosity (dāna) and morality (śīla), why do you speak only of the superiority of the bodhisattva’s mind of [without mentioning others’ sympathetic joy]?

Answer. – Worldly people in whom the afflictive emotions (kleśa) cover over the mind and who have not eliminated egotism (ahaṃkāra) are attached to the happiness of this world (laukikasukha); how then would they surpass the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas?

In the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, the strong (tīkṣṇa) surpass the weak (mṛdu), but all remain at the śrāvaka stage (śrāvakabhūmi). This is why, [for them] there is no question [of the mind of sympathetic joy].²⁵¹

Question. – The qualities (guṇa) and attributes (dharma) of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas are very numerous. Why does the Prajñāpāramitā mention only six here, [generosity, morality, etc.]?

²⁵¹ Usually worldly people and śrāvakas do not take delight in the qualities of others, the former because they are exclusively preoccupied with the happiness of this world, the latter because they seek their own personal salvation without being concerned about others. The śrāvakas excel in the degree of their spiritual faculties (indriya), weak among some, strong among others, but they all remain at the stage of śrāvaka, caring little about the qualities of others.

Among the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, the strong (tīkṣṇa) surpass the weak (mṛdu), but all are at the stage of śrāvaka (śrāvakabhūmi). This is why there is no question [in them] of the thought of sympathetic joy.²⁵²

Answer. – All the attributes of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas are contained (saṃgrhīta) within those six.

1. To speak of generosity (dāna) already presupposes the qualities (guṇa) faith (śraddhā), erudition (śruta), etc. Why? Because it is necessary to have heard in order to believe and it is necessary to have believed in order to give. This generosity is of two types: material generosity (āmiśadāna) and generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna).

2. Morality (śīla) contains three kinds of morality: morality of discipline (saṃvaraśīla), morality of meditation (dhyānaśīla) and pure morality (anāsravaśīla).

3. Concentration contains the concentrations of meditation (dhyāna), absorption (saṃāpatti) and liberation (vimokṣa).

4. Wisdom (prajñā) contains the wisdom resulting from hearing (śrutamayī), the wisdom resulting from reflecting (cintāmayī) and the wisdom resulting from meditation (bhāvanāmayī).

5. Deliverance (vimukti) contains two kinds of deliverance: impure (sāsrava) and pure (anāsrava).

6. The knowledge and the vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana) contains the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (kṣayaajñāna). When one knows that the impurities are destroyed, one attains deliverance (vimukti) with respect to the threefold world and one knows and sees this clearly. I have already spoken about the auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipāṣika dharma) and the dharmas of the noble Path (āryamārga).

Finally, as for the qualities of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas not turned toward nirvāṇa, the sūtra does not say here that [the bodhisattva] surpasses them because these qualities are too slim (tanu).

Question. – ‘Surpassing’ (abhibhavitum) means to take away by force. But here the bodhisattva is not struggling against the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Why is it said that he ‘surpasses’ them?

Answer. – He surpasses them only in the sense that, by means of his wisdom (prajñā), his skillful means (upāya) and the strength of his mind (cittabala), he obtains an increase of merit (puṇyabāhulya) on a given point. Thus, in respect to a given flower (puṣpa), a person grasps only the color and the fragrance (gandha) whereas the bee (ali) grasps the juice (rasa) and makes honey (madhu) out of it. In the same way also, in order to draw water (vāri), if the vessel (bhājana) is big, one gets a lot; if it is small, one gets only a little. By means of these comparisons (upāma), we can know that, by means of a mind of sympathetic joy (anumodanācitta) associated with profound and keen wisdom (gambhīratīvrprajñā), the bodhisattva surpasses (abhibhāvati) all the qualities (guṇa), generosity (dāna), etc., of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

²⁵² Usually, worldly people and śrāvakas do not take delight in the qualities of others, the former because they are preoccupied with worldly enjoyments exclusively, the latter because they seek their own personal salvation without caring for others. The śrāvakas excel by the degree of their spiritual faculties (indriya), weak in some, strong in others, but they all remain at the śrāvaka stage, caring little about the qualities of others.

[The bodhisattvas surpass them] in six things (dharma). For the first, [270a] generosity (dāna), see my explanations on the perfection of generosity (chapter XX, [p. 692-769F] where I defined this attribute of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. [For the second], morality (śīla), see the chapter explaining the perfection of morality (Chapter XXIII, p. 853-864F) where I defined this attribute of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. [For the other four], concentrations (saṃadhi), wisdom (prajñā), deliverance (vimukti), the knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana), see my explanations on the recollection of the Buddha (chapter XXXVI, p. 1349-1359F) where I defined these attributes of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

Second Section SURPASSING THE HIGH CONCENTRATIONS OF THE ŚRĀVAKAS

Sūtra (cf. Śatasāhasrikā, p. 69, l. 6-8). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes, by means of a mind of sympathetic joy, to surpass the meditations, absorptions and concentrations of liberation of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, must practice the perfection of wisdom (Sarvaśrāvaka-pratyekabuddhānāṃ dhyānasamāpattivimokṣasamādhīṇ anumodanācittēṇābhibhavitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Surpassing the high concentrations of the śrāvakas

Sūtra (cf. Śatasāhasrikā, p. 69, l. 6-8). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to surpass the trances, absorptions and concentrations of liberation of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas by means of a mind of sympathetic joy, must practice the perfection of wisdom (Sarvaśrāvaka-pratyekabuddhānāṃ dhyānasamāpattivimokṣasamādhīṇ anumodanācittēṇābhibhavitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. -

I. HIGHER CONCENTRATIONS

1. By meditations (dhyāna) and absorptions (saṃāpatti), we mean the four trances and the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvāmaṃpatti).

2. By concentrations of liberation (vimokṣasamādhi), we mean the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the three gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha), the deliverance by means of wisdom (prajñāvimukti), the twofold deliverance (ubhayatobhāgavimukti), the occasional deliverance (samayavimukti), the non-occasional deliverance (asamayavimukti), the conditioned deliverance (saṃskṛtavimukti), the unconditioned deliverance (asaṃskṛtasamādhi), etc., the concentration with examination and with analysis (śavītarkaḥ savicāraḥ samādhi), the concentration without examination but with analysis only (avītarko vicāramātrah samādhi), the concentration without either examination or analysis (avītarko 'vicāraḥ samādhi), the concentration of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi), the concentration of signlessness (ānimittasamādhi), the concentration of wishlessness (apraṇihitasamādhi) and other concentrations of the same kind.

II. CONCENTRATION OF THE DOUBLY LIBERATED SAINT

Question. – Of the six meditations (dhyāna), the absorptions (samāpatti) and concentrations of liberation (vimokṣasamādhi) have already been represented. Why speak of them again?

Answer. – There are two types of samādhi: i) those that are the prerogative (bhāga) of the saint delivered by means of wisdom (prajñāvimukta); ii) those that are the prerogative of the doubly delivered saint (ubhayatobhāgavimukta).

The preceding section dealt with the prerogative of the prajñāvimukta and, since the latter does not penetrate into the trances (dhyāna) and the absorptions, it spoke only of the concentration belonging to the anāgamyā, ‘the absorption preliminary to the first dhyāna’. But here we are talking about the prerogative of the ubhayatobhāgavimukta who has the dhyānas, samāpattis and vimokṣasamādhis all together.²⁵³

²⁵³ By the mind of sympathetic joy, the bodhisattva surpasses not only the generosity and the five anāsravaskandhas present in all the arhats but also the eight vimokṣas present in the doubly delivered arhat.

The prajñāvimukta and the ubhayatobhāgavimukta are included among the seven or ten types of persons worthy of veneration and offerings (Dīgha, III, p. 105, 253-254; Anguttara, IV, p. 10; V, p. 23). Both are arhats, aśaikṣas, having destroyed their impurities (kṣiṇāsrava), but the latter has in addition the eight profound liberations of vimokṣas (cf. p. 1282). Majjhima, I, p. 477 defines them as follows: Katamo ca bhikkhave puggalo ubhatobhāgavimutto: Idha bhikkhave ekacco puggalo ye te santā vimokkhā atikkamma rupe āruppā te kāyena phassivā viharati, paññāya c'assa disvā āsavā parikkhīnā honti. Ayaṃ vuccati bhikkhave puggalo ubhatobhāgavimutto. – Katamo ca bhikkhave puggalo paññāvimutto. Idha bhikkhave ekacco puggalo ye te santā vimokkhā atikkamma rupe āruppā te na kāyena phassivā viharati, paññāya c'assa disvā āsavā parikkhīnā honti. Ayaṃ vuccati bhikkhave puggalo paññāvimutto.

Transl. - O monks, what is a person doubly delivered? There is, O monks, a certain person who, having physically touched the peaceful liberations of the formless realm transcending form, remains there, and whose impurities are completely destroyed, for that person has seen by means of wisdom. That person, O monk, is called one who is doubly delivered. – O monks, what is a person liberated by means of wisdom? There is, O monks, a certain person who, without having physically touched the peaceful liberations [of the formless] realm transcending

Sometimes it is a question of a short explanation (saṃkṣepenokti); here it is a question of a developed explanation (visatarenokti).

Sometimes just the name (nāman) samādhi is mentioned; here the meaning (artha) of it is explained.

Furthermore, earlier it was a question of ‘mastering the samādhis [of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha]’ and, according to some, this would be one or two samādhis only and not the profound samādhis (gambhīrasamādhi). Here we are speaking of the group of the very profound samādhis, viz., the dhyāna, samāpatti and vimokṣasamādhi.

Furthermore, the dhyānas, samāpattis and vimokṣasamādhis are of two types: i) those that are acquired by means of detachment (vairāgyalābhika); ii) those that are acquired by means of effort (prāyogika). Those that are acquired by means of detachment have been treated previously; those that are acquired by effort are treated here.²⁵⁴

Finally, the dhyānas, samāpattis and vimokṣasamādhis are very difficult to obtain (sudurlabha): it is necessary to seek them energetically and diligently in [270c] order to obtain them. Only by a mind of sympathetic joy (anumodnācitta) will the bodhisattva succeed in surpassing them, but he does not yet possess these qualities. This is why we speak about them again here.

form, remains there and whose impurities have been completely destroyed, for that person has seen by means of wisdom. That person, O monks, is called a person delivered by means of wisdom.

On this passage, see the explanation of Horner, The Middle Length Sayings, II, p. 151-152, n.

The santā vimokkhā āruppā are the four samāpattis of the Ārūpyadhātu and the nirodhasamāpatti, situated above the four dhyānas of the Rūpadhātu.

Kāyena phassativā = kāyena sāksātṛtvā of the canonical sūtras (cf. p. 1282F) where the expression appears only in the definition of the third and eighth vimokṣa. On leaving the samāpatti, the saint immediately perceives the ‘bodily’ calm acquired during this samāpatti (see Kośa, VI, p. 224).

- Kośabhāṣya, p. 381, I, 3-4: Yo nirodhasamāpattilābhī sa ubhayatobhāgavimuktaḥ / prajñāsamādhibalābhīyāṃ kleśavimokṣāvaraṇavimuktatvāt / itaraḥ prajñāvimuktaḥ / prajñābalena kevalaṃ kleśavaraṇavimuktatvāt / - Transl. - He who possesses the destruction and the absorption is ‘doubly delivered’, for he is delivered from the obstacle [consisting of] the passions (kleśāvaraṇa) and from the obstacle [opposing the production of the eight] liberations (vimokṣāvaraṇa) by means of the two powers of wisdom and concentration. The other is ‘delivered by means of wisdom’ for, by the power of wisdom, he is liberated only from the obstacle [consisting of] the passions’.

- Abhidharmasamuccaya, ed. P. Pradhan, p. 88, I, 17-18 (transl. W. Rahula, p. 151): Prajñāvimuktaḥ katamaḥ / kṣiṇāsravo no tv aṣṭavimokṣadhyāyī yaḥ puḍgalaḥ // Ubhayatobhāgavimuktaḥ katamaḥ / kṣiṇāsravo 'ṣṭavimokṣadhyāyī yaḥ puḍgalaḥ /

²⁵⁴ With the exception of the Buddha, the other āryas attain these high qualities only by effort (prayoga) and not by detachment (vairāgya), since they all do not have them. Only the Buddha obtains them by detachment, for the Buddha obtains all the qualities at once from the beginning, at the moment of kṣayañāna, by means of detachment: cf. Kośa, VII, p. 97.

Question. – But the concentrations (śamādhi), wisdom (prajñā), deliverance (vimukti), knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana) that you spoke of previously, they too are difficult to obtain. Why then do you say that these you are speaking of now are difficult to obtain?

Answer. – I have already said that the preceding ones – [concentration, wisdom, deliverance, knowledge and the vision of knowledge] – were the prerogative of the saint delivered by wisdom (prajñāvimukta) and did not add up to the profound meaning (gambhīrārtha) of śamādhi. On the other hand, the doubly delivered arhat (ubhayatobhāgavimukta) possessing the threefold knowledge (vidyātraya) – [who holds dhyāna, śamāpatti and vimokṣasamādhi] – is rare and that is why it is necessary to speak of him again.

Furthermore, the concentrations (śamādhi), wisdom (prajñā) deliverance (vimukti), knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana) – [of which the previous section spoke] – although they are hard to attain, are not widely extensive, for they aim directly at nirvāṇa. On the other hand, [the dhyānas, śamāpattis and vimokṣasamādhis] of the present passage concern the arhat who wants to obtain the bliss (sukha) of the dhyānas and śamāpattis during the present lifetime (drṣṭa eva dharme), i.e., the absorption of cessation (nirodhasamāpatti), the dhyāna attaining the summit (prāntakoṭika), the knowledge resulting from vows (prañidhijñāna), the concentration that prevents the arising of another's passions (araṇāsamādhi), etc.²⁵⁵ These do not lead directly to nirvāṇa; this is why it is necessary to return to them at length.

How do we know that [the śamādhi] of the previous section leads directly to nirvāṇa? In that passage, the author mentioned in turn deliverance (vimukti), the knowledge and the vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana); therefore we know that that śamādhi leads exclusively and directly to nirvāṇa.

III. WISDOM, INSEPARABLE FROM CONCENTRATION

Question. – Given that the dhyānas, śamāpattis and vimokṣasamādhis are hard to obtain (durlabha), they are spoken of again here. But of all the dharmas, wisdom (prajñā) is the most difficult and most subtle. Then why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] not return to it at all?

Answer. – It spoke of it above (p. 1839F) by saying: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to control the knowledge of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas must practice the perfection of wisdom.” Up until now it has not spoken of the [higher] dhyānas and śamāpattis; this is why it stresses it here.

Dhyāna and śamāpatti on the one hand, prajñā on the other hand, are both wonderful dharmas. Those who practice these two things see their vows (prañidhāna) realized. They are like a bird (paśin) that, having two wings (paśa), reaches its destination. Deliverance (vimukti) results from these two things; the knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana) are prajñā.

²⁵⁵ See above, p. 1041-1042F, and Kośa, VII, p. 85-96.

As for generosity (dāna) and morality (śīla) – [of which it was a question in the preceding section, (p. 1880F)], these are physical (kāyika) and vocal (vācika) actions. Since they are coarse (stūlākāra) in nature and easy to obtain (sulabha), the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra does not speak of them again.

IV. THE MIND OF SYMPATHETIC JOY CAN BE DIRECTED TO THE CONCENTRATIONS

Question – It is possible for the bodhisattva to surpass the generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and wisdom (prajñā) of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas by means of a mind of sympathetic joy (anumodanācitta). Why? Generosity and morality are visible to the eye and audible to the ear. Wisdom also is something audible; therefore it is possible to produce a mind of sympathetic joy towards it. On the other hand, the dhyānas, śamāpattis and vimokṣasamādhis can neither be seen nor heard.²⁵⁶ Then how could the bodhisattva rejoice in them?

Answer. – The bodhisattva rejoices in them by using his knowledge of another's mind (paracittajñāna).

Question. – But if the mind of another is impure (sāsrava), he cognizes the impure minds (sāsravacitta) of others; if it is pure (anāsrava), he cognizes the pure minds (anāsravacitta) of others. But not yet being Buddha, the bodhisattva [does not possess a pure paracittajñāna]. How then could he cognize the pure minds of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas?

Answer. – In the system of the śrāvakas, you would be correct, but according to the Mahāyāna system, the bodhisattva has acquired the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣanti), has cut all the fetters (saṃyojana) and, from one lifetime to the next, never loses the six superknowledges (abhijñā).

Therefore he can, by means of an impure cognition of another's mind (sāsravaparacittajñāna), know pure minds and, a fortiori, by means of a pure cognition, know the mind of another (anāsravaparacittajñāna).

[271a]

Furthermore, some say: Take a bodhisattva who is about to produce for the first time the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpādika) and who does not yet have the body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya). If he sees or hears that a śrāvaka is giving gifts or observing the discipline, this bodhisattva knows perfectly well that the man in question will become arhat and he rejoices in it (anumodate). He says: “That is a man who has found the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and will escape from the threefold world. My own wish is to save all beings from birth (jāti), old age (jarā) sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa). That this man may find deliverance, that's up to me!”

For many reasons of this kind the bodhisattva rejoices (anumodate) and his sympathetic joy (anumodanā) is faultless (nirdoṣa).

²⁵⁶ On the limits of paracittajñāna, see Kośa, VII, p. 26-27.

CHAPTER XLV (p. 1891F) APPLICATION OF MERIT

First Section OBTAINING EASILY AN IMMENSE QUALIFICATION

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 22, l. 13-17; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 69, l. 8-70. l. 4). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who, practicing minor generosity, minor discipline, minor patience, minor exertion, minor meditation and minor wisdom, wishes to obtain an immense and infinite qualification by means of skilful application of merit, must exert himself in the perfection of wisdom (Alpaṃ dānaṃ dadatā, alpaṃ śīlaṃ rakṣatā, alpaṃ kṣāntiṃ bhāvayatā, alpaṃ vīryaṃ ārabhamānena, alpaṃ dhyānaṃ samāpadyamānena, alpaṃ prajñāṃ bhāvayatā, upāyakaūśalyapariṇāmanayāprameyam aparyantaṃ guṇaṃ pratilabdhuḥkāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitātāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. THE ESSENCE OF THE PERFECTIONS RESIDES IN THE MIND

Previously (chapters XVII-XXX), the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra has spoken of the six perfections (pāramitā). Why return to them here?

Answer. – Above it spoke about their general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa): here it wants to talk about their specific characteristics (śvalakṣaṇa). Above it spoke about their causes and conditions (hetupratyaya); here it will talk about their fruits of retribution (vipākaphala).

Question. – That is not so. Above it spoke about the six perfections in their extension and fullness; here it is talking about ‘minor generosity’ and so on up to ‘minor wisdom’; these minor perfections are similar to but not identical with the six perfections treated above.

Answer. – Nothing of the sort! It is a matter of the same perfections. Why? Because the essence (artha) of the six perfections resides in the mind (citta) and not in the greater or lesser quantity of the things. Whether the bodhisattva practices them to a greater or a lesser extent, they are always the same perfections.

Thus the Hien-kie king (Bhadrakalpikasūtra) talks about eighty-four thousand perfections (pāramitā),²⁵⁷ and the present sūtra also says: “There is a mundane (laukikī) perfection of generosity (dānapāramitā) and a supramundane (lokottara) perfection of generosity, and so on up to the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā), it too being mundane or supramundane.”²⁵⁸

²⁵⁷ The Hien-kie king which the Traité will cite later (k. 62, p. 498a17) under the title Hien-kie-san-mei (Bhadrakalpikasamādhi) was translated into Chinese at Tch’ang-ngan by Dharmarakṣa, under the title of Hien-kie king (T 425) and others as well; according to the K’ai-yuan (T 2154, k. 2, p. 494c12), this translation was made on the 21st day of the 7th moon of the first year of the yong-k’ang period (August 22, 300). It also exists in a Tibetan

Pariṇāmanā

II. THE PRACTICE OF THE ‘MINOR’ PERFECTIONS

1. Lesser practice of generosity

Question. – Why does the bodhisattva [sometimes] practice minor generosity (alpaṃ dānaṃ)?

Answer. – There are many reasons for minor generosity:

1. There are some bodhisattvas who have just produced the bodhi mind for the first time (prathamacittotpāda) and who, not yet having accumulated merit (puṇya), are poor and can give only a little.
2. There also are some bodhisattvas who have learned that generosity is not measured by the amount of things given but that its virtue (guṇa) resides in the mind. This is why they do not seek to give a lot of things but seek only for good intention.
3. There are some bodhisattvas who have the following thought: “If I seek to accumulate a lot of wealth (vasu), I will violate the discipline (śīla), I will lose my good intention, I will be distracted (vikṣiptacitta) and I will torment many beings. Tormenting beings in order to pay homage to the Buddha has been condemned by the Buddha, for that is to violate the Dharma and seek wealth. If by giving to one worldly person I dispossess another, that is not equanimity (samatā). For a bodhisattva, it is the rule to love all beings equally like one’s own child.” That is why these bodhisattvas give only a little.
4. Furthermore, there are two kinds of bodhisattvas: i) the debased bodhisattva (vinaṣṭa); ii) the accomplished bodhisattva (sampanna).

version entitled Bskal pa bzan po pa (Tib. Trip., vol. 27, no. 762). In this text the names of the thousand Buddhas of the fortunate period appear (T 425, k. 6, p. 46a-50a) to which F. Weller has dedicated an important work: Tausend Buddhanamen des Bhadrakalpa nach einer fünfssprachigen Polyglotte, Leipzig, 1928.

The Hien-kie king, as the Traité names it, mentions the 84,000 pāramitās (T 425, k. 6, p. 44c25). See also the Fo ming king, T 441, k. 21, p. 270c25.

²⁵⁸ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 263, l. 20-21: Asti dānaparamitā laukikī, asti lokottarā / evaṃ śīlapāramitā yāvad asti prajñāpāramitā laukikī, asti lokottara /

The beginning of a passage from chapter XXVI where the six pāramitās are defined in their mundane and supramundane aspects: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 263, l. 20-266, l. 19; T 223, k. 7, p. 272b1-272c6; T 220, vol. VII, k. 498, p. 534a3-535b8.

The debased bodhisattva had at first produced the mind of complete perfect [271b] enlightenment (anuttarasamyakṣambodhi); then, not coming upon favorable conditions and his mind being clouded by the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa), he lived a life of mixed conduct (miśracarita) and has been reborn into a wealthy noble family (kṣatriyamahāśālakula) or has even become the king of a country or a great yakṣa king, etc., As a result of the bad physical, vocal or mental actions that he previously committed, he is not pure and consequently, he is not reborn in the presence of the Buddhas (buddhānām antike) or among gods and men in faultless places (anavadyasthāna). This bodhisattva is called a debased bodhisattva. Although he has lost the bodhi mind, by virtue of [his actions] in previous existences (pūrvajanman), this person still likes to give. [To this end], he torments many people, he pillages, he robs and unjustly takes over wealth which he uses, nevertheless, to gain merit (puṇya).

The accomplished (sampanna) bodhisattvas do not lose the mind of complete perfect enlightenment. Out of loving kindness and compassion for beings, some remain at home and take on the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla); others go forth from home and take up the [tenfold] discipline (daśaśīla).

a. The lay bodhisattva (grhastha) is actually of perfect conduct (sampannakarmānta), but as a result of actions of his previous lives (pūrvajanman), he is poor (daridra). Learning that there are two kinds of generosity in the Buddhadharma, the gift of the Dharma (dharmadāna) and the material gift (āmiśadāna), that the monastic (pravrajita) practices especially the gift of the Dharma and that the lay person (grhastha) practices especially the material gift, the bodhisattva says to himself: “As for myself, because of my previous actions, I do not belong to a wealthy family.” Then, determining that debased (vinaṣṭa) bodhisattvas commit wrongdoing (āpatti) in order to give gifts, this pleases him not at all. He finally learns that the Buddha has not praised copious material gifts but praises only the gift given out of purity of mind (cittaviśuddhi). This is why the bodhisattva gives only according to his means.

b. As for the monastic (pravrajita) bodhisattva, wanting above all to protect discipline (śīla), he does not pursue material goods (vasu). He thinks only of the virtues of the one single discipline that surpasses all gifts. This is why he gives only according to his means.

5. Furthermore, the bodhisattva has learned from the Jātakas and Nidānas of the Buddhist literature that a small gift gives a large fruit of ripening (vipākaphala).

[Avadāna of Bakkula.]²⁵⁹ – Thus the arhat Po-kiu-lo (Bakkula), who had given a single a-li-lō fruit (haritākī), did not fall into the lower realms (durgati) for ninety-one kalpas; he enjoyed happiness among gods and men; he was never sick and, in his last lifetimes (paścime janmani), he obtained the bodhi of the arhat.

[Avadāna of Koṭṭivimśa.]²⁶⁰ – Thus the śrāmaṇa Eul-che-yi (Koṭṭivimśa), at the time of the Buddha Vipaśyin, built a house (layana) and gave it to the community of bhikṣus; he laid down a sheepskin for the community to walk on. For this reason, for ninety-one kalpas, his feet did not touch the ground; among gods and men, he enjoyed immense happiness; in his last lifetime, he was born into the house of a great man (śreṣṭhin), had a splendid body (abhirūpakāya), and, on the soles of his feet (pādatala), there grew hair two inches long, the color of pure beryl and curling toward the right (romāṇi dyaṅgulani vaidūryasadrśāni pradakṣiṇāvartāni). When he was born, his father gave him twenty koṭi ounces of gold. Later, disenchanted with the five objects of worldly enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), he went forth from home and obtained bodhi. The Buddha proclaimed him as the foremost of the energetic bhikṣus (ārabdhavīryāṇām agryah).

[Avadāna of Sumana.]²⁶¹ – Thus in a previous life, the bhikṣu Siu-man-eul (Karnasumana) saw the stūpa of the Buddha Vipaśyin and gave the sumanā flower that he was wearing behind his ear to it. As a result of this, for ninety-one kalpas, he never fell into the bad destinies (durgati), he enjoyed happiness among gods [271c] and men, and in his last lifetime, he had, on his ear, a sumanā flower the perfume of which filled the whole house; this is why he was called Karnasumana. Later, disenchanted with the world, he went forth from home and obtained the bodhi of the arhats.

With the example of these Jātakas and Nidānas, the bodhisattva who gives only a small amount obtains a great reward (vipāka). Therefore, according to his means, he gives a lot or a little.

6. Moreover, the bodhisattva is not compelled (niyata) always to give only a small gift. According to his fortune, he gives a lot when he has a lot, and he gives a little when he has but little.

7. Finally, it is in order to praise virtues and the greatness of the Prajñāpāramitā that the Buddha said that a small gift gives a big reward and that its qualities are immense.

2. Efficacy of the application of merit

Question. – But the arhats, Bakkula, etc., they too, by giving only small gifts, obtained a great reward (mahāvīpāka). Why then introduce the Prajñāpāramitā here?

Answer. – Bakkula and others indeed obtained a fruit of retribution, but it was limited to a certain number of kalpas and, having found the lesser bodhi (hīnabodhi), they entered into nirvāṇa. By contrast, the bodhisattva, ‘by skilful application of merit’ (upāyakaṣaḥalyaparīṇāmanayā)²⁶² as a result of Prajñāpāramitā, by giving only a little, wins immense, infinite, incalculable merit (aprameyam anantam asaṃkhyeyam puṇyam).

Question. – What is this skilful application by means of which, by giving only a little, he wins an immense infinite qualification?

Answer. – 1. Although it is a matter of small gifts, all are applied (pariṇata) to supreme perfect enlightenment. The bodhisattva thinks as follows: “As for myself, by means of this merit (puṇya), I have no ambition for royalty among gods or men or for happiness in this world; I seek only supreme complete ²⁵⁹ References, p. 1386-1387F.

²⁶⁰ References, p. 1388-1389F, n.

²⁶¹ References, p. 1426F, n. 3.

²⁶² [Translator’s note (Migme)]: Parīṇāmanā = ripening, maturing: Monier-Williams Dictionary.]

enlightenment. And since this supreme complete enlightenment is immense and infinite, my merit also will be immense and infinite. Furthermore, by means of this merit, I wish to save all beings and, as beings are immense and infinite in number, my merit also will be immense and infinite. Finally, this merit utilizes great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and, as this great loving-kindness and great compassion are immense and infinite, my merit too will be immense and infinite.”

2. Moreover, since it is associated with the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharma, the merit of the bodhisattva is triply pure (trimaṇḍalapariśuddha) because the beneficiary (pratigrāhaka), the donor (dāyaka) and the thing given (deya) do not exist (nopalabhyante). Thus, at the beginning of the present Prajñāpāramitāsūtra (cf. p. 650F), the Buddha said to Śāriputra: “When the bodhisattva gives without distinguishing donor or beneficiary or thing given, he fulfils the Prajñāpāramitā fully.” The bodhisattva gains immense and infinite merit by implementing the knowledge of the true nature of dharma and the gift.

3. Finally, the bodhisattva thinks that the merits he possesses have as their nature (lakṣaṇa) suchness (tathatā), the fundamental element (dharmadhātu), the limit of the truth (bhūtaakoṭi); and since suchness, the fundamental element and the limit of the truth are immense and infinite, his merits also are immense and infinite.

Question. – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who considers the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharma knows that suchness, the fundamental element, the limit of the truth are in their nature unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) and cessation (nirodha).²⁶³ How can he still have a mind and create merit? [272a]

Answer. – The bodhisattva has, for a long time, practiced the mind of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta). At the very moment when this mind of great compassion arises, he says to himself: “Beings do not know this true nature of dharma and I must help them find it.” By the power of the perfection of exertion (vīryapāramitā), he returns to practicing the causes and conditions of meritorious action (puṇyakarman) and, by means of this perfection of exertion, he maintains the mind of great compassion. Thus when a fire (agni) on the point of being extinguished encounters the support of wind (anila) and fuel (indhana), it is revived.

Moreover, the bodhisattva recalls his previous vows (pūrvapraṇidhāna) and, as well, the Buddhas of the ten directions come and say to him: “Remember the moment when you first produced the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda). You had at that time received only a single talk on the Dharma (dharmaparyāya) but there are still innumerable sermons of the same kind that you have not yet heard. Therefore go back and accumulate the qualities (guṇa).” On this account, see what is said in the Tsien-pei king (Daśabhūmikāsūtra) on the seventh bhūmi.²⁶⁴

²⁶³ Tathatā, dharmadhātu, bhūtaakoṭi are synonyms of asaṃskṛtadharmas: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 168, l. 14-17, and the explanations in the Traité, k. 44, p. 380c20 seq.

²⁶⁴ Section of the Avatamsaka, the Daśabhūmikāsūtra designated here under the abridged title of the Chinese version (T 285) composed at Tch’ang-ngan by Dharmarakṣa, on the 21st day of the 11th month of the 7th year of the yuan-k’ang, or December 21, 297 (K’ai-yuan, T 2154, k. 2, p. 494a3). Later (k. 49, p. 411a29; k. 93, p. 712c17), it

3. Minor practice of the other perfections

Question. – That generosity has degrees is correct; that morality (śīla), of which the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla), the discipline of one day and one night (rātridivaśīla) and the tenfold discipline (daśaśīla) make up a part²⁶⁵, also is composed of degrees is evident. These are material things (rūpidharma) where it is possible to establish differences. But as for the other perfections [patience (kṣānti), exertion (vīrya), meditation (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā)], how can degrees be distinguished there?

Answer. – We may know that all involve degrees.

a. Minor practice of patience.

Thus, patience (kṣānti) is of two types: i) physical patience (kāyikī kṣānti); ii) mental patience (caitāsikī kṣānti).²⁶⁶

Even though the body (kāya) and the voice (vāc) remain motionless (acala), physical patience cannot prevent the mind (citta) from becoming agitated, for it is a minor patience, incapable of controlling the mind. In mental patience, on the other hand, body and mind both remain ‘patient’ like a piece of wood.

Furthermore, an individual who has minor patience does not react if someone strikes him or insults him. An individual who has major patience makes no distinction between the insulter, the one who is being insulted and the thing to endure.

Finally, patience with regard to beings (sattvakṣānti) is minor patience; patience with regard to things (dharmakṣānti) is major patience.²⁶⁷

These are the distinctions to be made concerning patience.

b. Minor practice of exertion.

Exertion is of two types: i) physical exertion (kāyika vīrya) and ii) mental exertion (caitasika vīrya).²⁶⁸ Physical exertion is minor; mental exertion is major. External (bāhya) exertion is minor; internal will be cited under the name of Che-ti king ‘The ten bhūmis’ or again (k. 33, p. 308a6; k. 100, p. 756b8) under the name of Fa yun king (Dharmameghasūtra), the name of the tenth bhūmi.

In the early references, the eighth bhūmi overlaps the seventh. In going back here to the seventh bhūmi, the Traité undoubtedly has in mind a short passage of the eighth bhūmi, ed. J. Rahder, p. 66: Api tu khalu punaḥ kulaputraikas tavaṣa āloko yo ‘yaṃ sarvadharmānirvikapālokaḥ / idṛśās tu kulaputra dharmālokaḥ tathāgatānām paryantaḡatā aparyantakṛtā aparyantabaddhā yeṣaṃ saṃkhyā nāsti gaṇanā pramāṇam upaniṣad aupamyam nāsti / teṣāṃ adhigamāyābhinihārām utpādaya /

²⁶⁵ These three kinds of discipline have been studied in chapter XXII, p. 818-852F.

²⁶⁶ Cf. p. 903-904F.

²⁶⁷ Patience with regard to beings has been defined, p. 867-898F; patience with regard to things, p. 902-926F.

²⁶⁸ Cf. p. 870-972F

(ādhyatmika) is major. Exertion of the body (kāya) and voice (vāc) is minor; exertion of the mind (manas) is major. Thus the Buddha said that mental action (manaskarman) is very strong and this is how the angry great ṛṣis were able to destroy entire kingdoms [by a mental act].²⁶⁹

Furthermore, it is by means of the body (kāya) and the voice (vāc) that the five sins of immediate retribution (pañcānantarya) involving a very serious fruit of retribution (vipākaphala), viz., remaining in Avicī hell for a kalpa.²⁷⁰ Mental action is even more powerful for by it one succeeds in being reborn in the sphere of neither conception nor non-conception (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana) with a lifespan of eighty-four great kalpas²⁷¹ or also in remaining in the buddhafiels (buddhakṣetra) of the ten directions with an unlimited lifespan. This is why we know that physical and vocal exertion are minor whereas mental exertion is major.

Finally, a sūtra says:²⁷² “Destruction of physical, vocal and mental actions (kāyavācmanaskarmanirodha), the unmovable (aniñjita)” is the major exertion, whereas the movable (iñjita) is the minor exertion.”

This is what is called minor exertion.

c. Practice of minor trance.

The concentrations of the desire realm (kāmadhātusamādhi) and those of the ānantarya ‘preliminary absorption of the first dhyāna’, not being liberated from desire (avirakta), are described as minor. Compared with the second dhyāna, the first dhyāna is minor and so on up to the absorption of cessation ²⁶⁹ Allusion to the Upālisutta of Majjhima, I, p. 371-387, where the Buddha said to the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatappassin that, of the three actions, bodily (kāyikakamma), vocal (vācīkamma) and mental (manokamma), mental action is by far the most formidable when it is a matter of doing or accomplishing a bad action (mahāsāvajjatarāṃ pāpassa kamma kiriya pāpassa kamma pavattiyā). The Buddha wanted to show (ibid., p. 378) the vengeance of the ṛṣis who, without making any motion or pronouncing any word, with a mental act of malice (manopadosa) alone, destroyed entire forests. The episode has already been told above, p. 894F seq. To the references listed there, we should add Milindapañha, p. 130; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 118, p. 617c28; Kośabhāṣya, p. 246, l. 12.

²⁷⁰ See Kośa, III, p. 41.

²⁷¹ See Kośa, III, p. 174; IV, p. 218.

²⁷² In the Laṭṭhikopamasutta of Majjhima, I, p. 454-455, the Buddha explains to Upāli that the first three jhānas are in restlessness (iñjitasmim): in the first, examination and analysis have not been destroyed (vitakkavicārā aniruddhā honti); in the second, joy and happiness have not been destroyed (pīṭisukkhāṃ aniruddhā honti); in the third, equanimity and happiness have not been destroyed (upekkhāsukkhāṃ aniruddhā honti). – On the other hand, the fourth jhāna is in the non-restlessness (aniñjitasmim) due to the destruction of happiness, the destruction of suffering, etc. (sukkhassa ca pahānā dukkhassa ca pajāna –pe-).

Dīgha, III, p. 217 and Samyutta, II, p. 82 distinguish three kinds of activities (abhisamkharā): meritorious (puñña), demeritorious (apuñña) and unmoving (āneñja). For Kośa, IV, p. 107, meritorious action is good (śubha) action of the desire realm; unmoving action is good action of the two higher (ūrdhvaja) realms.

That being the case, I [Lamotte] do not see how the Traité presents the aniñjita here as being the pacification and stopping (tsi-mie) of physical, vocal and mental actions. For this difficult problem, see notes of L. de La Vallée Poussin in Kośa, IV, p. 106-107.

(nirodhasamāpatti). The impure (sāsrava) dhyānas are lesser whereas the pure (anāsrava) dhyānas are greater.

While the bodhisattva has not become irreversible (avaivartika) and has not obtained the acquiescence that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti), his dhyānas are minor; when he has become irreversible and has obtained the acquiescence that dharmas do not arise, his dhyānas are major. [272b]

When the Bodhisattva was sitting on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍa), the concentrations associated with the first sixteen liberations (vimukti) were minor but, at the seventeenth moment, the diamond-like concentration (vajropamasamādhi) was major.²⁷³

Finally, when the bodhisattva considers (samanupaśyati) all the dharmas as being eternally concentrated (satatasamāhita) and free of distraction (avikṣipta), when he does not rely on them and does not distinguish them, it is a matter of major considerations. The others are minor.

d. Lesser practice of wisdom.

Wisdom is of two kinds: i) mundane (laukikī); ii) supramundane (lokottara). The mundane wisdom is lesser; the supramundane wisdom is greater.

In the same way [contrasting in the order of greatness] pure (visuddha) wisdom and mixed (miśra) wisdom, characterized (sanimitta) wisdom and non-characterized (nirnimitta) wisdom, speculative wisdom and non-speculative wisdom, the wisdom in accordance with the Dharma and the wisdom contrary to the Dharma, the wisdom turned toward samsāra and the wisdom turned toward nirvāṇa, the wisdom directed toward one’s own good (svārtha) and the wisdom directed toward the good of all beings (sarvastvārtha), etc.

Furthermore, the wisdom coming from hearing (śrutamayī) is lesser in comparison to the wisdom coming from reflection (cintamayī) which is greater. The wisdom coming from reflection is lesser in comparison to the wisdom coming from meditation (bhāvanāmayī) which is greater.

The wisdom which produces the mind of supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksambodhi) is lesser in comparison to the wisdom utilizing the six perfections (pāramitā) which is greater. The wisdom of practice (bhāvanāprajñā) is lesser in comparison to the wisdom of skillful means (upāyaprajñā) which is greater. In the course of the ten bodhisattva bhūmis, skillful means is always being developed up to the tenth bhūmi.

These are the degrees to be distinguished [in the various pāramitās]. The Buddha praises the deeds of the bodhisattva who, by accomplishing lesser things, “obtains an immense and infinite qualification”. What then can be said (kaḥ punarvādah) when the bodhisattva accomplishes greater things? Other people who give up their wealth (vasu) and try very hard by means of their body (kāya), speech (vāc) and mind (manas), painfully gain a small amount of merit (punya). It is the same when they practice discipline, patience, exertion, meditation and wisdom: they do not reach the bodhisattva who, by means of lesser efforts, gains a great retribution, as we have said above.

²⁷³ When the Bodhisattva was sitting under the bodhi tree, he was still tied to the bhavāgā by nine categories of passions (kleśa). He became detached from them by eighteen mind moments: nine moments of abandoning or expulsion (prahāṇa or ānantaryamārga) and nine moments of deliverance (vimuktimārga). At the seventeenth moment, he abandons the ninth category of passion by a path of abandoning called Vajropamasamādhi; the eighteenth moment is a path of deliverance in which the ascetic takes possession of the cessation of all the passions (kleśa) or impurities (āsrava).

The air that escapes from the mouth produces an articulated sound (ghoṣa) but this sound does not reach very far; by contrast, the sound that comes from a horn (śṛṅga) has a long range. It is the same for [the perfections] of generosity, etc., practiced to a lesser degree [by the bodhisattva]. Whereas among other people who practice these virtues, the merits gained are little rewarded, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva, by means of Prajñāpāramitā and skillful application of his merits (upāyakaūśalapariṇāmanā), obtains an immense and infinite merit.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speaks here of the bodhisattva “who wishes to practice a lesser generosity, a lesser discipline, a lesser patience, a lesser exertion, a lesser trance and a lesser wisdom.”

Pāramitācarāṇa

Second Section PRACTICING THE SIX PERFECTIONS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 22, l. 17-20; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 70, l. 4-17). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to practice the perfection of generosity, the perfection of discipline, the perfection of patience, the perfection of exertion and the perfection of meditation, must practice the perfection of wisdom (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena dānapāramitāṃ śīlapāramitāṃ kṣāntipāramitāṃ vīryapāramitāṃ dhyānapāramitāṃ caritukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. – For the meaning of ‘perfection’ (pāramitā), see what has been said above (p. 701-702F).

I. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PRAJÑĀ AND THE OTHER PERFECTIONS

Question. – Either the first five perfections are the same as prajñāpāramitā or they are not. If they are the same as prajñāpāramitā, there is no need to posit five distinct (viśiṣṭa) perfections. If they are different (anya), how can you claim that, in order to practice the perfection of generosity, it is necessary to practice the prajñāpāramitā?

Answer. – They are both the same and different. They are different in the sense that the prajñāpāramitā that considers (samanupaśyati) the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas presupposes and holds no dharma. Generosity itself rejects (tyajati) all inner and outer good. But if one practices generosity in the spirit of the prajñāpāramitā, the generosity (dāna) takes the name of perfection.

Furthermore, the first five perfections establish (avaripayanti) the qualities (guṇa) and the prajñāpāramitā chases away persistent thoughts (saṃgacitta, abhiniveśa) and wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi). It is as if one man planted grain and another man hoed and weeded to strengthen the grain. In the same way, the prajñāpāramitā makes the four other perfections ripen (paripācayati).

II. PRAJÑĀ AND GENEROSITY

Question. – Why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra say that “in order to practice the perfection of generosity, one must exert oneself in the perfection of wisdom”?

Answer. – Generosity is of two kinds: i) pure (viśuddha); ii) impure (aviśuddha).²⁷⁴

1. Impure generosity

Impure generosity is:²⁷⁵

1. Giving from pride (abhimāna, mānastambha), thinking: If destitute people (dīna) give, why should I not give?
2. Giving from jealousy (īrṣyā), thinking: My rival (pratyarthika) has acquired a reputation and has surpassed me by giving. Now I should give more generously still in order to surpass him.
3. Giving from love for reward (vipākachanda), thinking: By giving a little bit, my reward will be ten million times better: therefore I give.
4. Giving for the glory (kīrtyartha), thinking: Now that I like to give, I am esteemed by people and loved by the crowd.
5. Giving in order to win over people (puruṣasaṃgrahaṇārtha), thinking: The person to whom I am giving now will certainly take refuge in me.

Practicing generosity with many fetters (saṃyojana) of this type is impure generosity.

2. Pure generosity

Pure generosity does not have these mean tricks.

²⁷⁴ Cf. p. 664F.

²⁷⁵ For impure generosity, see references above, p. 664F, n. 1 and also Saṅgītisūtra and its commentary, transl. Kusum Mittal and V. Stache-Rosen, Dogmatische Begriffsreihen im älteren Buddhismus, II, Berlin, 1968, p. 188-189.

1. Guided only by pure intention, he thinks about the fruit of ripening (vipākaphala) as a result of causes and conditions; he has consideration and pity for the beneficiary (pratigrāhaka) and does not seek for actual profit; he aims only for the benefit (anuśamsa) of future lifetimes.
2. Furthermore, there is a pure generosity that does not seek the advantages of future lifetimes but which favors access to nirvāṇa by way of mind cultivation (cittabhāvanā) alone.
3. Finally, there is a pure generosity that, out of great compassion for beings, seeks neither personal benefit (svārtha) nor the accelerated acquisition of nirvāṇa but strives only for supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi).

This is pure generosity, and it is in the spirit of the prajñāpāramitā that it is possible to practice it. And so the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says that “in order to practice the perfection of generosity, it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Moreover, by means of the power of prajñāpāramitā, any feeling of attachment (abhiniveśacitta) to dharmas is rejected. Why should the feeling of self (ātmacitta) then not be rejected? Having rejected the feeling of self, one regards one’s body, one’s spouse, one’s son, as a blade of grass and, without the least consideration, one renounces them completely. This is why the Prajñāpāramitā says that “in order to practice the perfection of generosity, it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom.”

It is the same for the other perfections, morality, patience, exertion and trance, for they are maintained by the spirit of the prajñāpāramitā.

III. POWER OF PRAJÑĀ

Moreover, the other perfections would not have the name of perfection without prajñāpāramitā and would also lack solidity (sāratā). As will be said in the next chapter: “Without prajñāpāramitā, the first five perfections do not have the name of perfection.”

It is like a noble cakravartin king: if he does not possess the jewel of the wheel (cakraratna), he is not called cakravartin king, and it is not his other jewels [273a] that give him his name. Or again, it is like blind people (andha): if they have no guide (nāyaka), they can go nowhere. It is the same with the prajñāpāramitā: it guides the first five perfections to omniscience (sarvajñatā).

A great chariot (ratha), without a good driver, does not fulfill its function. The human body, if deprived of sight, goes nowhere even if it is provided with the other organs. When a person loses their vital organ (jīvitendriya), all the other organs are destroyed; it is because they possess the vital organs that the other organs function. It is the same with the prajñāpāramitā; in the absence of the prajñāpāramitā, the first five perfections do not progress; it is because they possess the prajñāpāramitā that the five perfections progress and rare perfected.

This is why the Buddha says here: “The bodhisattva who wishes to practice the perfection of generosity, etc., should exert himself in the perfection of wisdom.”

Buddhasaḍṛśakāya

Third Section POSSESSING A BODY ENDOWED WITH THE MARKS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 23, l. 3-5; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 70, l. 18-71, l. 4). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to have a body like that of the Buddha in all his existences and who wishes to be assured of the thirty-two major and eighty minor marks of the Great Man, must exert himself in the perfection of wisdom (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena sarvajātiṣu buddhasaḍṛśaṃ kāyaṃ nispādayitukāmena dvātriṃśanmahāpuruṣalakṣaṇāny asīṭyanuvyañjanāni ca pratilabdhuḥkāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. THE PHYSICAL MARKS ARE NOT ‘PLANTED’ JUST AT THE END OF THE CAREER

Question. – In the śrāvaka system, it is said that the bodhisattva plants (avaropayati) the causes and conditions for the thirty-two marks (lakṣaṇa) during the hundred kalpas that follow the three incalculable periods (asaṃkṣeyekalpa) of his career. Why does the Prajñāpāramitā say here that “from lifetime to lifetime the bodhisattva has a body like that of the Buddha endowed with the thirty two major marks (lakṣaṇa) and the eighty minor marks (anuvyañjana)”?

Answer. – In the Vibhāṣā in the Kātyāyanīputrābhidharma it talks about [these hundred supplementary kalpas],²⁷⁶ but this is not in question in the Tripiṭaka. Why? Others [besides the bodhisattva] also have these thirty-two marks. What would suffice to distinguish them?

[Nanda’s marks.]²⁷⁷ – Thus in a previous lifetime, Nan-t’o (Nanda) gave a single bath (snāna) to the Community (saṃgha) making the following aspiration (prañidhāna): “From one lifetime to the next, I would like to be handsome (abhirūpa) and graceful (prāsādika).” In yet another lifetime, he encountered a pratyekabuddha stūpa, adorned it with multicolored designs and brightened up a pratyekabuddha statue (pratimā), formulating the following aspiration: “From lifetime to lifetime, I would like to have a body adorned with fine marks”. For this reason, from lifetime to lifetime, he had a body adorned with marks and in his last lifetime, he went forth from home (pravrajita) and became a śramaṇa. Seeing him from far off, the members of the Community mistook him to be the Buddha and all stood up to go to welcome him.

²⁷⁶ Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 177, p. 890b5-8. See also Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 1552, k. 11, p. 961c9-11. and above, p. 249F, n. 1.

²⁷⁷ References, p. 286F, n. 1. Add Anavataptagāthā, ed. Bechert, p. 175-176; tr. Hofinger, p. 262-263; Fo wou po ti tseu, T 199, p. 199b12-199c11; Mūlasarv. Vin., Bhāṣajyavastu, T 1448, p. 87b24-87c25.

If Nanda, a practitioner of the Lesser Vehicle (hīnayānika) received such a reward for having planted these few minor merits, what could be said about the Bodhisattva who, during innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa), has cultivated merit?

[Bāvari's marks.]²⁷⁸ – When the bodhisattva Maitreya was still a lay-man with white robes (avadātavasana), his teacher Po-p'o-li (Bāvari) had three marks: i) the white tuft of hairs between the eyebrows (ūrṇā bhruvor madhye jātā); ii) the tongue able to cover the entire face (jihvā mukhaṃaṣalam avacchādayantī); iii) the secret organs enclosed in a sheath (kośagatabastiguḥya).

If those people, who were not bodhisattvas, themselves possessed these marks, how could it be said that the Bodhisattva plants these marks (lakṣaṇa) only after the three incalculable periods?

Besides, according to the Mahāyāna, the bodhisattva who, from the first mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) until supreme complete enlightenment, does not produce a bad mind, possesses the five superknowledges (abhijñā) and a body like that of the Buddha from one lifetime to the next.

II. THE BODHISATTVA IS ABLE TO CREATE FOR HIMSELF A BODY ENDOWED WITH THE MARKS

Question. – How does the bodhisattva who has not yet acquired the bodhi of the Buddha obtain a body and marks like those of the Buddha?

Answer. – In order to save beings, the bodhisattva creates for himself a body of the noble cakravartin king, of Śakra Devendra, of Brahmarāja, of a śrāvaka, of a pratyekabuddha, of a bodhisattva or of Buddha.

[Śūraṃgamasamādhisūtra.]²⁷⁹ – Thus, in the Cheou-leng-yen king (Śūraṃgamasamādhisūtra), Mañjuśrī himself said that he appeared as a pratyekabuddha 7,200,000 times and entered into nirvāṇa, that he also manifests under the aspect of a buddha named Long-tchong-tsouen (Nāgavaṃśāgra).

This is how, at a time when there could not be a Buddha, beings saw [in Mañjuśrī] the body of the Buddha, were happy, submitted and became converted.

²⁷⁸ References, p. 286F, n. 2.

²⁷⁹ Śūraṃgamasamādhisūtra, T 642, k. 2, p. 642c10-14 (transl. p. 245, §147) and k. 2, p. 644a18-20 (transl. p. 263, §162). If Mañjuśrī feigned the pratyekabuddha nirvāṇa so often, it was at the period when beings could be converted only by pratyekabuddhas (see Traité, above, p. 602F, and later, k. 75, p. 568a28 seq.). – As for the buddha Nāgavaṃśāgra (in Chinese Long-tchong-tsouen, in Tibetan Kluḥi rigs mchog), identical with the ‘actual’ bodhisattva Mañjuśrī, he reigned at a distant past over the Samā universe, on the borders of the southern region (cf. Śūraṃgamasamādhi, T 642, k. 2, p. 644a; transl. p. 260-262).

III. BODHISATTVA BODY AND BUDDHA BODY

Question. – If the Bodhisattva makes a buddha body for himself, preaches the Dharma and saves beings, how does he differ from a Buddha?

Answer. – 1. The Bodhisattva possesses a great magical power (rddhibala), resides in the ten bhūmis and is endowed with the attributes of the Buddha; nevertheless, he remains in saṃsāra in order to save the mass of beings; therefore he does not go into nirvāṇa.

2. Like a master magician (māyākāra), he creates for himself a body of metamorphosis (nirmāṇakāya) in order to preach the Dharma to people, but that is not the true body of the Buddha. That being so, the beings whom he will save are limited in number, whereas those saved by the Buddhas are limitless in number.

3. Although the bodhisattva creates for himself a buddha body, he is unable to completely fill the universes of the ten directions; the body of the Buddha, on the other hand, fills innumerable universes completely.

4. To the beings whom he converts, the bodhisattva shows a buddha body comparable to the moon of the fourteenth day: brilliant as it is, it is not like the moon of the fifteenth day.²⁸⁰

²⁸⁰ Above, (p. 393F), the Traité noted that the bodhisattvas differ slightly from the Buddhas: they are like the fourteenth day moon (caturdaśīcandra) of which one wonders if it is really full (paripūrṇa); the Buddhas, on the other hand, are like the fifteenth day moon (pañcadaśīcandra) which is incontestably full. Later (k. 94, p. 719b), the Traité explains that the fourteenth day moon does not yet raise the tide, whereas the fifteenth day moon does raise it.

However, in the Mahāyānasūtras, sometimes it is the Buddha and sometimes the Bodhisattva who is compared to the fifteenth day moon. It is said in Kāśyapapariparta, §88: Tad yathāpi nāma Kāśyapanavacandro namaskṛyate sā ceva pūrṇacandro na tathā namaskṛyate / evam eva Kāśyapa ye mama śraddhadhamṇi te balavaṃṣataraṃ bodhisatvaṃ dmamskartavya / na tathāgataḥ tat kasya heo bodhisatvanirjātā hi tathāgataḥ (text not corrected). – O Kāśyapa, just as one venerates the new moon rather than the full moon, so those who believe in the self must venerate the Bodhisattva more than the Tathāgata. And why? Because the Tathāgatas derive their origin from the Bodhisattva.

No matter that the Buddhas are superior to the Bodhisattva, as the fifteenth day moon is more important than the fourteenth day moon. In this regard, a particularly interesting passage from the Gayāśrīsaṃvāsa (T 464, p. 482b; T 65, p. 485a; T 466, p. 488a; T 467, p. 490c) should be noted: “[In the bodhisattva’s career], what are the four minds (citta)? 1) The first [production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda); 2) the mind of the path of the practices (caryāmārgacitta); 3) the mind of the irreversible bodhisattva (avaivartikacitta); 4) the mind of the bodhisattva separated from buddhahood by one single lifetime (ekajātipratibaddhacitta)... The prathamacittotpāda is like the new moon (navacandra); the caryāmārgacitta is like the fifteenth day moon (variant: like the moon of the fifth or seventh day of the month); the avaivartikacitta is like the moon of the tenth day; the ekajātipratibaddhacitta is like the moon of the fourteenth day; the wisdom (prajñā) of the Tathāgata is like the moon of the fifteenth day. By the prathamacittotpāda, the bodhisattva transcends the śrāvaka stage; by the caryāmārgacitta he transcends the pratyekabuddha stage; by the avaivartikacitta, he transcends the unstable bhūmis (anīyatabhūmi, i.e., the first seven bhūmis); by the ekajātipratibaddhacitta he is established in the stable bhūmi (niyatabhūmi, i.e., the tenth bhūmi).

These are the differences.

Sometimes there are bodhisattvas who, having obtained the certainty that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) and the body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya), remain in the seventh bhūmi, abide in the first five superknowledges (abhijñā), create by transformation a body like that of a buddha and convert (paripācayanti) beings. – Sometimes there are bodhisattvas who, having just produced the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpādika), practice the six perfections (pāramitā) and, by virtue of the actions that they accomplish, obtain a body like that of the Buddha and convert beings.

IV. THE PERFECTIONS ARE CAUSES AND CONDITIONS OF THE MARKS²⁸¹

²⁸¹ For the actions that produce the marks, there are two theories which are not contradictory:

1. A scholastic Abhidharma theory, elaborated by the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas. The bodhisattva accomplishes these acts in Jambudvīpa; as a male; in the presence of the Buddha; thinking about the Buddhas; stemming from reflection; at the time of the hundred cosmic ages following the three incalculable periods of his career. Each of the marks arises from one hundred merits and, according to the most valid explanation, these hundred merits consist of fifty volitions (cetanā) produced in the bodhisattva when he thinks about the Buddha, another fifty when he too wishes to become Buddha.

This theory is explained in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 177, p. 887b-892a; Kośa, IV, p. 223-227; Kośavyākhyā, p. 430-431; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 590b-591a. The Kośakārikā, IV, 109-110a (Kośabhāṣya, p.266) summarizes this in two and a quarter lines:

Jambudvīpa pumān eva saṃmukhaṃ buddhacetanaḥ / cintāmayam kalpaśate śeṣa ākṣipate hi tat // ekaikaṃ puṇyaśatajam.

The Traité has fully and faithfully set forth this theory above (p. 246-255F), but has also refuted it in detail (p. 283-297F).

2. A less complicated but certainly older theory presents the marks as fruits of accomplishment of various actions (vicitrakarmābhisaṃskārāphala). The choice of these actions is subjective and largely imaginary. That is why the lists drawn up in the course of time show many differences. Here are some:

Lakkhaṇasuttanta of Dīgha, III, p. 145-177.

Commentary of the Arthavinīścayasūtra, ed. N. H. Samtani, The Arthavinīścayasūtra and its Commentary, Patna, 1971, p. 285-307.

Lalitavistara, p. 429, l. 3-433, l. 2.

A passage of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, revised to conform to the Abhisamayālaṃkāra, ed. and transl. by E. Conze, The Buddha's lakṣaṇa in the Prajñāpāramitā, in Journal of the Oriental Institute (Baroda), XIV, 1965, p. 225-229; The Large Sūtra on Perfect Wisdom, Berkeley, 1975, p. 659, l. 35-661, l. 27.

Abhisamayālaṃkāra, p. 918, l. 25-919, l. 20.

Bodhisattvabhūmi, p. 377, l. 20-380, l. 23, which claims to be representative of the Lakṣaṇasūtra (of the Dīrghāgama).

Almost all the virtues appear in the actions producing the marks of which the Traité gives us the list here. This is a list coming from the śrāvaka system, but not claiming to be representative of one or another canonical Question. – The thirty-two marks are fruits of ripening (vipākaphala) of generosity (dāna), etc., but the prajñāpāramitā is non-existent (asat) and like space (ākāśasama). How can one say that it is necessary to practice the prajñāpāramitā in order to obtain the major and minor marks?

Answer. – The thirty-two marks are of two kinds: i) complete (saṃpanna, pariṇiṣpanna), as in the Buddha; ii) incomplete, as in the noble cakravartin kings, in Nanda, etc.

Although the prajñāpāramitā is associated with generosity, it completes the major and minor marks as is the case in the Buddhas. Among other people who practice only generosity [without the inspiration of the prajñāpāramitā], the marks are incomplete.²⁸²

Question. – How do generosity, etc., bring about the thirty-two marks?

Answer. – When the dānapati gives, the recipient (pratigrāhaka) obtains five things: color (varṇa), strength (bala), etc.,²⁸³ and profits from them; the donor (dāyaka) himself is marked with the sign of the wheel (cakra) on his hands and feet, as has been fully described (p. 668F) in regard to the dānapāramitā.

It is the same for the other perfections, morality (śīla), patience (kṣānti), etc.: each of them favors the thirty-two marks. [273c]

What are these thirty-two marks? The mark consisting of having the soles of the feet well-planted (supraṭṭhiṭapādāta). For the rest of them (p. 272-279F), refer to the Ts'an-p'ou-sa p'in (Bodhisattvastutiparivarta).

Question. – For what reasons (hetupratyaya) does one get the mark consisting of having the sole of the foot well-planted?

Answer. –

[Mark no. 1]. – From lifetime to lifetime, the Buddha mindfully (smṛtimat) and firmly (sthānavat) kept morality (śīla) and did not allow others to break it. For this karmic cause and condition, he obtained the first mark. This first mark means that he himself is unshakeable (acala) in the Dharma. Had he become a noble cakravartin king, nobody in his kingdom could have attacked him.

[Mark no. 2]. – In accord with justice (saha dharmēṇa), he nourished and protected the populace, the wandering mendicants (parivṛājaka), the śramaṇas, etc. For this karmic cause and condition, he obtained the mark consisting of having thousand-spoked wheels [on the soles of his feet] (adhastāt pādatalayoś cakre jāte sahasrāre). This mark lets him turn the wheel of the Dharma (dharmacakra). Had he become a noble cakravartin king, he would have turned the jewel of the wheel (cakratna).

source. Above (p. 668-670F), the Traité shows how the virtue of generosity is foremost in the making of each of the thirty-two marks.

²⁸² The marks of the Bodhisattva prevail over those of a cakravartin in seven points: cf. p. 279-280F.

²⁸³ Citation from Anguttara, III, p. 42; see above, p. 218F and 668F.

[Mark no. 3]. – He abstained from killing living beings (prāṇātipātā). For this karmic cause and condition, he obtained the mark of having long fingers (dīrghāṅgulī).

[Mark no. 4]. – He abstained from theft (adattādāna). For this cause and condition, he obtained the mark of having a broad heel (āyatapādapārṣṇī).

[Mark no. 5]. – By means of the four ways of winning people (saṃgrahavastu), he captivated people. For this cause and condition, he obtained the mark of having webbed hands and feet (jālāṅgulihastapāda).

[Mark no. 6]. – He offered his teachers (mahāmātra, guru) robes (vastra), food (annapāna) and fine beds (śayanāsana). For this karmic cause and condition, he obtained the mark of having soft and delicate hands and feet (mṛdutaruṇapāṇipāda).

[Marks nos. 7, 13, 12]. – He developed the cultivation of merits (puṇyabhāvanā). For this karmic cause and condition, he obtained the marks of having a high instep (utsaṅgacaraṇa), single hairs arising from each of his pores (ekaikaromakūpebhya ekaikāni romāṇi jātāni) and hair standing up (ūrdhvāgraroma).

[Mark no. 8]. – In accord with the Dharma, he bequeathed all that he could contribute to the welfare and harmony and quickly taught it to people. This is why he obtained the mark of the marvelous ankles (jaṅghā) like those of Aiṇeya, king of the antelopes (mṛgarāja).

[Marks no. 9, 11]. – In accord with the Dharma, he gave pure things without troubling his beneficiary. This is why he obtained the mark of having arms that, when he was standing, reached his knees (sthitānavanatājānupralambabāhu), and the mark of having a broad body like the banyan tree (nyagrodhaparimaṇḍala).

[Mark no. 10]. – He always cultivated the sense of modesty and honor (hrīrapatrāpya), avoided lust (kāmamithyādāra) and practiced generosity by giving away houses (grha), garments (vastra), rugs (praticchādana), etc. This is why he obtained the mark of having his secret organs contained in a sheath (kośagatavastiguhyā) like a stallion (ājāneya).

[Marks no. 14, 15]. – He cultivated the concentration of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi), purity of faith (śraddhaviśuddhi), mental activity (saṃtānabāhulya)²⁸⁴ and distributed excellent alms-food (annāpāna), garments. (cīvara) and coverlets (śayanāsana). This is why he obtained the marks of having a golden color (suvarṇavarṇa) and a brilliance of an arm's-width (vyāmaprabhā).²⁸⁵

[Mark no. 16]. – He always liked to consult, venerate and gather reverend and holy individuals (satpuruṣa). This is why he has obtained the mark of having a fine soft skin (sūkṣmacchavi).

[Marks no. 19, 18, 21]. – In order to settle matters in accord with the Dharma, he himself did not administer but delegated his powers of governing. This is why he obtained the marks of having the front part of his body like that of a lion (siṃhapūrvārdhakāya), his armpits rounded (citāntarāṃsa) and his shoulders perfectly round (susamvṛttaskandha).

²⁸⁴ According to the Mahāvvyut., no. 9429, the characters sin-to translate saṃtānabāhulya.

²⁸⁵ Adopting the variant tchang-kouang in place of ta-kouang. For this mark, see p. 454-456F.

[Mark no. 20]. – He respected his teachers (mahāmātra, guru), came to them and accompanied them. This is why he obtained the mark of having a great straight body (brhadṛjukāya).

[Mark no. 17]. – His gifts were perfect (sampanna) and copious (paripūrṇa). This is why he obtained the mark of having the seven parts of his body rounded (saptosada).

[Mark no. 25]. – There was no restriction in any of his gifts. This is why he obtained the mark of having a square jaw [like that of a lion] (siṃhahanu).

[Marks no. 22, 23]. – He abstained from malicious gossip (paśūnyavāda). This is why he obtained the mark of having forty teeth (catvāriṃśaddanta), the mark of having joined teeth (aviraladanta) and the secret mark of the teeth.

[Mark no. 24]. – He always cultivated loving-kindness (maitrī) and good thoughts (manasikāra). This is why he obtained the mark of having incomparably white teeth (śukladanta).

[Mark no. 27]. – He abstained from falsehood (mṛṣāvāda). This is why he obtained the mark of having a wide thin tongue (prabhūtatanujihvā).

[Mark no. 26]. – He gave excellent food without troubling his recipient (pratigrāhaka). This is why he obtained the mark of having the best of flavors (rasarasāgra).

[Mark no. 28]. – He abstained from harmful words (pāruṣyavāda). This is [214a] why he obtained the mark of having a brahmical voice (brahmasvara).

[Marks no. 29, 30]. – He contemplated beings with a good mind (kuśalacitta) and a kindly regard (priyadarśana). This is why he obtained the marks of having deep blue eyes (abhinīlanetra) and eyelashes like a cow (gopakṣmanetra).

[Mark no. 31]. – He honored venerable individuals, he himself maintained discipline (śīla) and taught it to people. This is why he obtained the mark of having a fleshy protuberance on his head (uṣṇīśaśīrṣa).

[Mark no. 32]. – He praised those who ought to be praised. This is why he obtained the mark of having a tuft of white hair (ūrnā bhruvor madhye jātā).

According to the śrāvaka system, those are the karmic causes and conditions for the thirty-two marks and they are also the karmic causes and conditions for the thirty-two marks in the Mahāyāna.

V. BODY WITH MARKS AND BODY WITHOUT MARKS

Question. – The Buddhas of the ten directions (daśadīghubuddha) and the dharmas of the three times (tryadhva-dharma) have, as their mark, being without marks (alakṣaṇalakṣaṇa). One mark by itself is already unreal, let alone thirty-two marks.

Answer. – The attributes of the Buddha are of two kinds: i) of conventional truth (saṃvṛtisatya); ii) of absolute truth (paramārthasatya). From the point of view of the conventional truth, we say that the Buddha has thirty-two marks; from the point of view of the absolute truth, we say that he is without marks.

There are two paths (mārga): i) the first commits beings to cultivate the path of merit (puṇyamārga); ii) the second is the path of wisdom (puṇyamārga). For the path of merit, we say that the Buddha has thirty-two marks; for the path of wisdom, we say that he has no marks.

In regard to the body of birth (janmakāya), we say that he has thirty-two marks; in regard to the body of Dharma (dharmakāya), we say that he has no marks.

By its thirty-two major and eighty minor (anuvyañjana) marks, the body of the Buddha adorns (alamkaroti) the body of the Dharma; by its ten powers (bala), four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), its four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid), its eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā) and other qualities (guṇa), it adorns beings.

There are two kinds of causes and conditions (hetupratyaya): i) causes and conditions for merit (puṇya); ii) causes and conditions for wisdom (prajñā). In order to guide beings by means of the causes and conditions of merit, the Buddha uses the body endowed with the thirty-two marks; in order to guide beings by means of the causes and conditions for wisdom, he uses the Dharma body (dharmakāya).

There are two kinds of beings (sattva): i) those who know that dharmas are pure designations (prajñapti); ii) those who are attached to names (nāmābhiniṣṭa). For beings attached to names, we say that the Buddha has no marks; for beings who take dharmas as pure designations, we say that the Buddha has thirty-two marks.

Question. – But the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) and the other qualities each have their special mark; how can you say that the Dharma body is without marks?

Answer. – Because they are associated with the sixteen aspects of the truths (ṣoḍaśākāra) and the three concentrations (samādhi), all the pure qualities (anāsravadharma) are said to be ‘without marks’. Wanting beings to penetrate them, the Buddha analyzed them in many ways and said that all the attributes of the Buddha, marked with the seal (mudrā) of emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita), all partake in suchness (tathatā), the fundamental element (dharmadhātū), the pinnacle of the truth (bhūtakoti). However, so that beings would rejoice and produce the mind of bodhi on seeing his body, the Buddha shows them his body adorned with the thirty-two marks.

Moreover, in order to manifest his great superiority to all beings, the Buddha shows his thirty-two marks without, however, offending the principle of the absence of marks.

[The horoscope of the Bodhisattva].²⁸⁶ – On the seventh day after the birth of the Bodhisattva, he was wrapped in white woolen blankets and the experts in signs (lakṣaṇavaipācaka) were summoned. The latter, having consulted an old [274b] venerable book of signs, made a prediction and said to the king:

²⁸⁶ This version is very close to that of the Mahāvastu, II, p. 27, l. 1-39, l. 6. – On the nature of this horoscope, the simple prediction about the future of a child, see A. Foucher, La Vie du Bouddha, p. 57-60. – Comparative study of

“According to our diagrams, if the person who is endowed with the thirty-two marks stays at home, he will become a noble cakravartin king; if he leaves home, he will become a buddha. There are only these two possibilities, there is no third.”²⁸⁷ When the experts in signs went away, the Bodhisattva fell asleep.

[The prediction of Asita].²⁸⁸ – Again, there was a ṛṣi named A-sseu-t’o (Asita) who said to King Tsing-fan (Śuddhodana): “By means of my divine ear (divyaśrotra), I heard the devas and yakṣas announcing that king Śuddhodana had just had a son endowed with the bodily marks of a buddha. That is why I have come to visit him.”

The king was very happy and said: “This man is a noble ṛṣi, come from afar to see my son.” He ordered his servants to go and get the crown prince (kumāra), but they said to the king: “The crown prince is sleeping.”

Then Asita said: “Let the noble king invite everybody. Those who are satisfied with ambrosia (amṛta) cannot sleep.”²⁸⁹ Saying this, he rose from his seat and went to get the crown prince. He took him in his arms, examined him from head to toe and, having examined him, burst into tears uncontrollably.

Greatly moved, the king asked the expert in signs: “Is there something unfortunate that makes you weep like that?” The ṛṣi answered: “If even the sky could rain down a mountain of diamonds (vajra), it would be unable to move a single hair of this child: how then could any misfortune menace this child? The crown prince will definitely become a Buddha. As for myself, in the evening of this present year, I will be reborn in the formless heavens (ārūpyasvarga) so that I will be unable either to see the Buddha or hear his teachings: that is why I am so sad.”

The king said: “The experts in signs (lakṣaṇavaipācaka) did not come to one single solution: they said that if my son remained at home, he would become a noble cakravartin king and if he went forth from home he would become a Buddha.” Asita replied: “The experts in signs base themselves on worldly convention (saṃvṛti) and deductive knowledge (anvayañāna), and not on the divine eye (divyacakṣus). They know the holy books of prognosis but they do not know the future fully and completely. They consider the marks in general but are unable to interpret them clearly. That is why they say that if the crown prince remains at home he will become a noble cakravartin king but if he goes forth from home he will early sources, in A. Bareau, La Jeunesse du Buddha dans les Sūtrapīṭaka et les Vinayapīṭaka anciens, BEGE, LXI, 1974, p. 209-213. – Illustrations in A. Foucher, AgbG, I, p. 296-300; G. Tucci, Il trono di diamante, p. 71, 72-73.

²⁸⁷ Mahāpadānasuttanta (Dīgha, II, p. 16) and Mahāvadānasūtra (p. 95), in regard to Vipāṣyīn: Ayaṃ hi deva kumāro dvattiṃsa mahāpurīsalakkhaṇehi samannāgato yehi samannāgataṃ mahāpurissa dve gatiyo bhavanti anaññā. sace agāraṃ ajjhāvasati rājā hoti cakkavatti... sace kho pana agārasmā anagāriyaṃ pabbajati araham hoti sammāsambuddho.

²⁸⁸ References, p. 1344F, n. 2.

²⁸⁹ Cf. Lalitavistara, p. 103: Evam ukte ‘sīto maharṣī rājānaṃ śuddhodanaṃ etad avocat / putras te Mahārāj jātas tam ahaṃ draṣṭukāma ihāgata iti // rājā āha / svapitimaharṣe kumāro muhūrtam āgamaṃ yāvas uthāsyatīti // ṛṣir avocat / na mahārāja tādṛśā mahāpuruṣāsa ciraṃ svapanti jāgasasītās tādṛśāḥ satpuruṣā bhavanti /

This detail is passed over in silence in the Mahāvastu and the Nidānakathā.

become a Buddha. Now the thirty-two marks are indeed complete in the crown prince, clearly imprinted, very deep, pure and complete. He will certainly become a Buddha and not a cakravartin king.”

By this, we know that the Buddha, by means of his thirty-two marks, is far superior to all beings. If we speak of the absence of marks, it is in order to destroy [the purely imaginary marks] such as the marks of eternity (nitya), purity (śuci) and happiness (sukha), the marks of self (ātman), the marks of man (puruṣa) or woman (stri), of birth (jāti) or death (maraṇa), etc. Thus, although the attributes of the Buddha have, as their mark, being without marks (alakṣaṇalakṣaṇa), by manifesting his thirty-two marks, the Buddha leads beings to recognize the primacy (paramatā) and to experience pure faith (prasāda) toward him. Speaking of the thirty-two marks is not a fault (doṣa).

VI. JUSTIFICATION OF THE NUMBER OF MARKS²⁹⁰

Question. – Why assume thirty-two marks, no more and no less?

Answer. – Assuming more or assuming less would provoke difficulties in either case.

Furthermore, the body of the Buddha is six arm-spans (vyāma) in height. If he had less than thirty-two marks, they would not extend on all sides and would insufficiently ornament him; if he had more than thirty-two marks, they would [274c] be disorderly in arrangement. It is like jewels adorning the body: even if a large quantity of pearls (maṇi) is used, it is not fitting to be overloaded with necklaces (keyūra, niṣka). This is why the target (lakṣya) is reached with exactly thirty-two marks.

²⁹⁰ This subject has already been treated above, p. 280F. The author is faithfully following the Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 177, p. 889a12-19: Why are there precisely thirty-two lakṣaṇa, no more and no less (dvātriṃśad eva mādhikāni nālpatarāṇi)? The venerable Pārśva says: Adding or subtracting from them would in both cases be a difficulty: exactly thirty-two are necessary so as not to contradict the nature of things (dharmatā). Others say: The number thirty-two is generally considered in the world to be a favorable number and nothing should be added to it or subtracted from it. Others say: If thirty-two marks adorn the Buddha’s body, the latter enjoys incomparable superiority in the world: if he had fewer, he would be lacking; if he had more, he would be untidy; in both cases, it would not look good. Just as one can neither add nor subtract from the Buddha’s attributes, so it is for his lakṣaṇa: there is no deficiency to increase and surplus to decrease.”

This is the traditional opinion in regard to the variety of the marks and their number. It could convince only the Indians, and it left foreigners skeptical. Its subjective nature did not escape the author of the Traité, at least according to one of his Chinese or Serindian interpreters. In fact, he will comment in k. 88, p. 684a-b that the Buddha takes into consideration the preferences of beings to be converted and local customs to manifest one particular mark rather than another. There are countries, he says, where the Buddha manifested sometimes myriads of marks, sometimes an incalculable number of marks, and sometimes fifty-six or thirty-four marks. When he conforms to the taste of India, he manifests thirty-two major and eighty minor marks.

Finally, if this small number of marks really adorned him imperfectly, the Buddha still has eighty minor marks (anuvyañjana): going beyond that would not be appropriate.

Question. – If eighty minor marks must be added, why not call them ‘marks’ and why give them the special name of ‘minor marks’?

Answer. – The marks adorn the body particularly, and to mention these major marks is to imply the minor ones.

Moreover, the major marks are coarse (sthūla) whereas the minor marks are fine (sūkṣma). When beings see the Buddha they see his major marks; the minor marks, on the other hand, are hard to see.

Finally, the major marks are commonly obtained by other men. The minor marks are sometimes shared (sāmānya) and sometimes special (āveṇika). This is why we speak of the major and minor marks separately.

VII. WHY IS THE BUDDHA ADORNED WITH NON-EXISTENT MARKS?

Question. – The Buddha cut through the mark of existence (sattvalakṣaṇa), the mark of substantial self (ātmalakṣaṇa) absolutely (atyantam) and was satisfied with the mark of empty (śūnya) dharmas. Why then does he adorn his body in the manner of those who seize characteristics (nimittāny udgurrhṇanti)?

Answer. – If the Buddha adorned just his mind (citta) with wonderful attributes,²⁹¹ and if his body were lacking the major and minor marks, some beings capable of being converted (vaineyasattva) would mistake him under the pretext that the Buddha is without bodily marks. They would not welcome the Buddhadharma with open hearts. Thus, if one filled a dirty bowl (aśucibhājana) with choice food, the latter would not be appreciated by people; and if one filled a stinking goatskin (durgandhājina) with precious things, those who received them would be miserable. This is why the Buddha adorns his body with the thirty-two marks.

Moreover, often the Buddha utters the lion’s roar in the great assembly (mahāparṣadi śimhanādam nadati)²⁹² and states that, among men, all his qualities are superior. If the Buddha did not adorn his body of birth (janmakāya) with the major and minor marks, some would say: “His body is ugly (durvarṇa); why believe him?” When the Buddha adorns his body with the thirty-two major and eighty minor marks, there are still people who do not believe him. What would it be like if he did not adorn his body with the major and minor marks?

²⁹¹ The punctuation of the Traité is defective: the period should be placed between sin and chen. The attributes with which the Buddha adorns his mind go from the ten powers (bala) to great loving-kindness (mahāmātrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā); they have been discussed in chapters XXXIX to XLII (at the beginning).

²⁹² Cf. p. 1594-1598F.

Finally, the attributes of the Buddha are very profound (gambhīra) for they are eternally destroyed (nityaniruddhatvāt). Fanatical madmen, beings do not believe in them and do not accept them; they say that in this destruction of the body (kāyanirodha), nothing is to be had. That is why the Buddha uses his broad tongue (prabhūtajihvā) and his brahmic voice (brahmasvara) emits great rays of light from his body (mahāraśmin niścārayati) and, by means of all sorts of nidānas and avadānas, teaches his marvelous attributes.²⁹³ Seeing the majesty of the physical marks of the Buddha and hearing his [brahmic] voice, beings rejoice in them and believe.

Moreover, the ornaments are internal (ādhyātmika) or external (bāhya). The meditations (dhyaṇa), absorptions (samāpatti), wisdom (prajñā) and other qualities (guṇa) are internal ornaments. The majesty of the physical marks and the perfections of morality (śīlasaṃpad) are external ornaments. Inwardly and outwardly the Buddha is perfect.

Finally, out of compassion for all beings, the Buddha appeared (prādurbhavati) in the world. By means of his qualities of wisdom, etc., he benefits beings of sharp faculties (tīkṣṇendriya); by utilizing his physical marks, he benefits beings of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya). By the adornment of his mind (citta), he [275a] opens the door to nirvāṇa; by the adornment of his body, he opens the door to godly and human happiness. By the adornment of his body he establishes beings in all the three meritorious activities (puṇyakriyāvastu);²⁹⁴ by the adornment of his mind, he establishes beings in the three gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha). By the adornment of his body, he pulls beings out of the three bad destinies (durgati); by the adornment of his mind, he pulls beings out of the prison of the threefold world (traiḍhātuka).

It is in view of these immense benefits that the Buddha adorns his body of birth with the major and minor marks (janmakāya)

²⁹³ See above, p. 456F, the manifestations that precede the preaching of the Prajñāpāramitasūtra.

²⁹⁴ See Dīgha, III, p. 218; Anguttara, IV, p. 241; Kośa, IV, p. 321.

Bodhisattvakula

Fourth Section BEING BORN INTO THE FAMILY OF THE BODHISATTVAS, ETC.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 23, l. 2-3, 5-6; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 72, l. 2, 5, 7). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to be born into the family of the bodhisattvas, to attain the level of the crown prince and to never be separated from the Buddhas must practice the perfection of wisdom (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena upapattukāmena, kumārabhūmim anupraptukāmena, buddhair avirahitena bhavitukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. BEING BORN INTO THE FAMILY OF THE BODHISATTVAS

“The family of the bodhisattvas”.²⁹⁵ – If someone produces a very profound mind of profound great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta) towards beings, he takes birth in the bodhisattva family. In the same way when one is born into a royal family, no one dares to despise you; furthermore, you fear neither hunger nor thirst (kṣutpipāsā), cold nor heat (śītoṣṇa), etc. It is the same for the one who enters into the assurance (niyāma) of bodhisattva and is born into the family of the bodhisattvas: because he is the child of the Buddha, devas, nāgas, yakṣas, satpuruṣas, etc., do not dare to scorn him but increase their veneration (arcanā); he does not fear the bad destinies (durgati) or the lower places among gods or men; he is not afraid that the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas or heretical masters (upadeśācārya) will come to destroy his resolution (āśaya).

Furthermore, from his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva makes the following vow (prañidhāna): “Starting from today onward, I will not follow any bad thought (akuśalacitta); I wish only to save all beings and to attain supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarasamyakṣambodhi).”

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who knows that the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas is unborn (anutpāda) and unceasing (anirodha) acquires the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpatikadharmakṣānti); henceforth he is definitively settled in the position of the bodhisattva (bodhisattvaniyāma).

²⁹⁵ Just as there are two kinds of avaivartika bodhisattvas (cf. p. 1804F), so there are two kinds of birth in the family of the bodhisattvas: the first is when the practitioner produces the thought of bodhi for the first time and thus enters the first bhūmi of his career; the second birth, the definitive one, is when the bodhisattva attains anutpatikadharmakṣānti and thus enters into the eighth bhūmi. It is this second birth that the Sūtra has in mind here.

[Viśeṣacintibrahmapariprcchā].²⁹⁶ - Thus the Buddha²⁹⁷ said in the Tche-sin king (Viśeṣacintisūtra): “When I saw the Buddha Ting-kouang (Dīpaṃkara), I obtained the conviction that dharmas do not arise and I completely fulfilled (pariyapūram) the six perfections (pāramitā). Prior to that moment, I did not really possess generosity, discipline, etc.”²⁹⁸

Furthermore, the bodhisattva has the following thought: “Suppose that kalpas as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgānadīvālukopamakalpa) were only one day and one night, that thirty of these days were a month, that twelve of these months were a year, that the number of these years were more than a hundred thousand myriads of hundreds of thousands of kalpas and that finally there appeared a single Buddha in whose presence a bodhisattva would offer his homage (pūjā), observe morality (śīla) and accumulate qualities (guṇa). Suppose, moreover, that such Buddhas, in number as many as the sands of the Ganges [followed one another] and that afterwards only this bodhisattva receives the prediction (vyākaraṇa) of someday becoming buddha, well then, the mind of this bodhisattva would show neither laziness (kausīdya) nor discouragement (laya) nor weariness (nirveda), and he would fulfill all the practices of his estate completely.”

Furthermore, the bodhisattva experiences loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) toward beings predestined to perdition (mithyātvaniyata) and guilty of the five misdeeds of immediate retribution (ānantarya) and toward people who have broken the roots of good (kuśalamūla), and he introduces them into the right path without waiting for their gratitude (kṛtyajñatā).

Furthermore, from his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva is no longer enveloped by or ruined by the conflicting emotions (kleśa).

Furthermore, although he contemplates the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, the bodhisattva no longer experiences any attachment (abhiniveśa) towards this consideration. [275b]

Furthermore, the bodhisattva always spontaneously (svarasena) offers words of truth (satyavacana) and, even in his sleep (svapna), tells no lies (mṛṣāvāda).

Furthermore, for the bodhisattva, all the visible forms (rūpa) that he sees are visions of the Buddha, but by the power of the concentration of recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛtisamādhi), he is not attached to these visions.

Furthermore, seeing all beings wandering in the sufferings of saṃsāra, the bodhisattva is not attached to any happiness and forms only the following aspiration (praṇidhāna): “When will all beings and myself be saved?”

²⁹⁶ For this sūtra which the Traité cites under different titles, see p. 1268-1269F, note.

²⁹⁷ Adopting the version fo in place of ts'ien.

²⁹⁸ Viśeṣacintin, T 586, k. 2, p. 46a22; T 587, k. 3, p. 78a13. The future Śākyamuni, at the end of the second asaṃkhyeyakalpa of his career, while he was still the brahmacārin Sumedha, Megha or Sumati, met the buddha Dīpaṃkara and from him received the prediction: see above, p. 248F, n. 2.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva is not attached to precious objects and rejoices only in the Three Jewels (triratna).

Furthermore, the bodhisattva has always cut through lust (rāga) until he no longer has either the memory (smṛti) of it or the notion (saṃjñā) of it; how could it have any reality for him?

Furthermore, beings who see the bodhisattva attain the concentration of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi) immediately. Furthermore, the bodhisattva has reduced all teachings into ‘the teachings of the Buddha’ and the various classifications (nānāviśeṣa) such as ‘teachings of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas’ or ‘teachings of the tīrthikas’ no longer exist for him.

Finally, having analyzed all the teachings, the bodhisattva feels neither the notion of true teachings (dharmasaṃjñā) nor the notion of false teachings (adharmaśaṃjñā) towards them.²⁹⁹

These are the innumerable reasons why “he is born into the family of the bodhisattvas”.

Question. – From his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva has already been born into the family of the bodhisattvas. The why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra here speak about the bodhisattva who, wishing to be born into the family of the bodhisattvas, must practice the perfection of wisdom?

Answer. – The family of the bodhisattvas (bodhisattvakūla) is of two kinds: i) the family with regression (savivartana) and the family without regression (avaivartika); ii) the nominal family and the real family; iii) the pure family and the mixed family; iv) the family strong in faith (śraddhāsārātā) and the family without strength. It is the ‘family without regressions’ and so on up to the ‘family strong in faith’ that the bodhisattva wishes to obtain. This is the sense in which the Prajñāpāramitā here says that “the bodhisattva who wishes to be born into the family of the bodhisattvas must practice the prajñāpāramitā”.

Kumārakabhūmi

II. OBTAINING THE LEVEL OF THE KUMĀRAKA

“The bodhisattva wishes to obtain the level of Kumāraka.”³⁰⁰

1. Some bodhisattvas, from their first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), have destroyed lust (samucchinnarāga) and, up to their acceding to supreme complete enlightenment

²⁹⁹ See Kolopamasūtra of the Majjhima, I, p. 135, already cited above, p. 64F and to which the Traité will refer again, k. 31, p. 290c22; 295b29; k. 85, p. 657a2.

³⁰⁰ Kumāra or kumārakabhūmi is one of the many terms used to designate the eighth bhūmi, the Acalabhūmi. These terms are expounded and justified in the Daśabhūmika, p. 71, l. 11-17 (T 285, k. 4, p. 483c25-484a2; T 286, k. 3, p. 522b15-21; T 287, k. 6, p. 561b24-c2): avivartya, durāsada, kumāra, janma, pariṇiṣpanna, pariṇiṣṭhita, nirmāṇa, adhiṣṭhāna and anābhogabhūmi. Kumārabhūmi, because it is beyond reproach.

(anuttarasamyaksambodhi), are always in the position of bodhisattva (bodhisattvaniyāma):³⁰¹ this is called kumārakabhūmi (level of the child).

2. Furthermore, some bodhisattvas have made the following aspiration (prañidhāna): “From lifetime to lifetime as a kumāra (an unblemished child), I will go forth from home, I will practice the path (mārga) and I will have no worldly sexual relations (maithuna)”: this is called the kumārabhūmi (level of the unblemished child).

3. Furthermore, a king’s son (rājaputra) is called kumāraka (crown prince). The Buddha is the king of the Dharma (dharmarāja) and, from his entry into certainty of the supreme law (dharmasamyaktvaniyāmāvakrānti)³⁰² up to the tenth bhūmi inclusively, the bodhisattva is called ‘prince with the right of succession to the state of Buddhahood’.

Thus Mañjuśrī, with his ten powers (daśabala), his four fearlessnesses (caturvaiśāradya), etc., completely carries out buddha activity (buddhakārya), dwells in kumārakabhūmi (the level of the crown prince) and saves beings everywhere.

4. Furthermore, a boy who is over four years old but not yet twenty years old is called kumāraka (adolescent). The bodhisattva who has just been born into the family of bodhisattvas is like a baby (bāla). But as soon as he obtains the acquiescence that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) and up to the tenth bhūmi inclusive, he eliminates all bad things: this is what is called kumārabhūmi (level of the adolescent). [275c]

If one wishes to obtain that level, it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom.

Buddhāviraḥitātā

III. NEVER BEING SEPARATED FROM THE BUDDHAS

“The bodhisattva wishes never to be separated from the Buddhas.” – In all the lifetimes into which he is reborn, the bodhisattva always meets the Buddhas.

1. Benefits of the presence of the Buddhas

Question. – The bodhisattva must convert beings. Why does he want always to meet the Buddhas?

³⁰¹ Here p’ou-sa-tao renders the Sanskrit bodhisattvaniyāma. Sometimes the character tao used by Kumārajīva has as correspondent ries par hgyur ba = niyāma in the Tibetan versions: cf. Śūraṃgamasamādhisūtra, transl. p. 122, n. 13.

³⁰² For the bodhisattva this niyāmāvakrānti is in the eighth bhūmi.

Answer. – Some bodhisattvas have not entered into the certainty of the bodhisattva (bodhisattvaniyāma) and have not received the special prediction (vyākaraṇaviśeṣa) reserved for the non-regressing (avaivartika) bodhisattvas.³⁰³ This is why, if they wander away from the Buddhas, they destroy their roots of good (kuśalamūla), fall into the afflictive emotions (kleśa) and, unable to save themselves, how could they save others? They are like a sailor who, in a storm, tries to save the others but himself falls into the water. A little bit of boiling water poured onto a great frozen pool melts only a little place and soon itself changes into ice. It is the same for a bodhisattva who, not yet having entered into the certainty (dharmaniyāma), would stray from the Buddhas. Equipped with limited qualities (alpaḡaṇa), lacking power in skillful means (upāyabala), he wants to convert beings but, even though rendering small services, he himself takes a tumble. This is why a beginning (ādikarmika) bodhisattva cannot stray from the Buddhas.

Question. – If that is so, why is he not advised him to stay away from the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas? The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas would also be able to render service to the bodhisattva.

Answer. – The bodhisattva has the great mind (mahācitta) [of bodhi]. Although they have the benefit (upakāra) of nirvāṇa, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do not have omniscience (sarvajñā) and consequently cannot guide the bodhisattva. By their knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā), the Buddhas alone can guide the bodhisattva.

Thus when an elephant gets stuck in the mud, no animal other than an elephant can pull him out. It is the same for the bodhisattva; if he engages in a bad path (amārga), only the Buddhas can put him back onto the great Path. This is why the Prajñāpāramitā speaks of the bodhisattva here ‘never wishing to be separated from the Buddhas.’

Moreover, the bodhisattva has the following thought: “Not having the Buddha eye (buddhacakṣus), I am no different from a blind man (andha). If I am not guided by the Buddhas, I will be committed to dead-ends. But if people hear the Buddha dharma, finding themselves abroad, they will be ignorant of the time for conversion (paripacana) and the exact number of rules of conduct (pratipatti).”

Moreover, the bodhisattva who sees the Buddhas acquires all kinds of benefits (nānāvidhopakāra). When he sees them with his eyes, his mind is purified and when he hears their words, he is pleased with the Dharma and acquires great wisdom (mahāprajñā). Acting in accordance with the Dharma, he finds liberation (vimukti). Since meeting with the Buddhas brings him these immense benefits, why would he not ardently seek to see the Buddhas?

The new-born baby (bāla) cannot be separated from its mother. The traveler (pānthaka) cannot be separated from his gear; in times of great heat, he does not avoid the cold wind or icy water; in times of great cold, he does not flee from fire; in order to cross deep water, he does not leave his boat behind. The sick person does not renounce good medicine. The bodhisattva has many more good reasons not to wander away from the Buddhas. Why? Father, mother, relatives, friends, humans, gods, etc., are far from equaling the Buddhas in kind deeds. It is [276a] thanks to the kind deeds of the Buddhas that the bodhisattvas escape from the places of suffering and are established in the lands of the Blessed Ones.

³⁰³ This is a matter of the anutpattikadharmakṣāntilabdhasaṃmukhavyākaraṇa, the prediction conferred in the presence of and for the benefit of a bodhisattva of the eighth bhūmi who has obtained the conviction that dharmas do not arise.

For these reasons, the bodhisattva never strays away from the Buddhas.

Question. – Conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharma) are deceivers (viśaṃvādaka), unreal and do not merit belief. How then can one hope never to stray away from the Buddhas?

Answer. – In order to become Buddha, it is necessary that merit (punya) and wisdom (prajñā) be fulfilled (sampanna), and a fortiori not to become separated from the Buddhas.

As a result of sins (āpatti) accumulated during innumerable kalpas, beings do not come to realize their aspirations (praṇidhāṇa). If they gain in merit, their wisdom is slender (tanu), and if they cultivate wisdom, their merit is slender: this is why their aspirations are not realized.

The bodhisattva who seeks the bodhi of the Buddhas must cultivate two patiences (kṣānti): i) patience in regard to beings (sattvaḥkṣānti); ii) patience in regard to things (dharmakṣānti).³⁰⁴ Cultivating patience toward beings, he experiences the feelings of loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) for all beings, he destroys the sins committed during numberless kalpas and he gains immense merit (punya). Cultivating patience toward things, he destroys the ignorance (avidyā) relating to things and acquires immense wisdom (prajñā). Once these two cultivations are joined, how could his wishes not be realized? This is why, from lifetime to lifetime, the bodhisattva does not stray away from the Buddhas.

Moreover, the bodhisattva is always happy to recollect the Buddha. When he leaves one body to take up another, he always gets to meet the Buddhas.

Thus a being who has cultivated lust (rāgacarita) and whose mind is weighed down takes on the body of a lustful bird, such as a peacock (mayūra) or a duck (cakravāka), etc. A being who has cultivated hatred (dveṣa) is inevitably reborn among the poisonous species such as wicked dragons (nāga), rākṣasas, centipedes (śatapaḍin), venomous snakes (āśīviṣa), etc. The bodhisattva himself has no ambition for the fate of a noble cakravartin king or human or divine happiness: he recollects only the Buddhas; this is why he assumes the forms to which he attaches the greatest weight.

Finally, the bodhisattva always practices the concentration of the recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusr̥ptisamādhi) splendidly;³⁰⁵ this is why, wherever he is reborn, he always meets the Buddhas.

[Pratyutpannabuddhasaṃmukhāvasthitasamādhisūtra].- Thus it is said in the Pan-tcheou san-mei (Pratyutpannasamādhī): “The ‘By what karmic cause and condition does one get to be reborn in that field (kṣetra)?’ – The Buddha answered: “Son of good family (kulaputra), by always practicing the concentration of recollecting the Buddha and ceaselessly thinking about it, one gets to be born in my field.”³⁰⁶

2. Subjective nature of the appearance of the Buddhas³⁰⁷

³⁰⁶ Pan-tsheou-san-mei king, T 418, k. 1, p. 905b8-14. This sūtra is known by four Chinese translations (T 416-419) and one Tibetan translation (Tib. Trip., vol. 32, no. 801). In China at the end of the 4th century, it contributed to the development of the cult of Amita. On this subject, see P. Demiéville, La Yogācārabhūmi de Saṅgharakṣa, BEFEO, XLIV, 1954, p. 353-355, 431-432.

³⁰⁷ The meeting of the bodhisattva with the buddhas of the three times and the ten directions is a purely subjective phenomenon: the buddhas do not come to the bodhisattva and the bodhisattva does not go to the buddhas. The phenomenon occurs at two times: a vision and a reflection.

A. The bodhisattva enters into the ‘concentration of the recollection of the buddhas’ (buddhānusr̥ptisamādhi) and sees them in mind (cittena), not in any mind whatsoever, but according to the very words of the sūtras (Majjhima, I, p. 23, etc.) “in concentrated, purified, cleansed, stainless mind rid of minor stains, softened, amenable, stable mind that has reached immovability” (samāhita citte parisuddhe pariyodāte anaṅgaṇe viḡatūpakkilese mudubhūte kammaniye ḡhite ānejjappatte). He directs it to and fixes it on the body of the Buddha, a body of the color of gold, luminous, endowed with the major and minor marks. Because the mind of the bodhisattva is pure, it receives the image of the body of the Buddha like the mirror of clear water reflects the face of the person who is looking into it. The image of the Buddha impresses the mind of the bodhisattva so that he ceases to see any other object and any other color. He remains fixed in contemplation before the red gold (kanaka) surrounded by beryl (vaiḡūrya) representing the buddhas. He enters into conversation with them, asks them questions and hears their answers. Subjective though it may be, this meeting with the buddhas plunges him into rapture (muditā).

These practices of autosuggestion are not new to Buddhism. The śrāvakas already used a whole arsenal of practices where the directed will (adhimokṣa) overtakes objectivity and allows the seeing of things not as they are but as one wants to see them. During the course of the Apramāṇas or the Brahmaviḡhāras, for the purification of one’s own mind, they consider beings of the ten directions in turn as happy, rejoicing or miserable when similar generalizations are, to say the least, unlikely. The practice of the eight vimokṣas, the eight abhivḡvāyatanas and the ten kṛtsnāyatanas allows the ascetic to substitute the vision of external objects for that of the internal objects and vice versa, to contemplate the universe under the form of a single element (earth, water, fire or wind) or under the aspect of a single color (blue, yellow, red or white), of bringing everything to the notion of space, infinite consciousness or nothingness, and finally to eliminate the notions and sensations without a residue. The ascetic having entered into the aśubhabhāvanā finally sees the cosmos in the form of a gigantic skeleton. Subjectivism is pushed so far that the theoreticians attribute to the pariṇāmanarddhi the power of really transforming things, for example, of changing stone into gold. In a word, samādhī is the triumph of the arbitrary over reality. But if, with use, the arbitrary is revealed as being useful and beneficial, it is appropriate to use it provisionally even if it means abandoning it definitively a posteriori.

B. The bodhisattva who has ‘met’ the buddhas in the course of the buddhānusr̥ptisamādhi ends up by coming out of samādhī without losing, for all that, the results of the experience that he has undergone. He retains the memories of the meetings he has had with the buddhas and eventually writes them down in a book (pustakaṃ karoti). We think this is the origin of the enormous literature of the Mahāyānasūtras that flooded Buddhism during ³⁰⁵ Distinct from the simple commemoration of the Buddha (p. 1340-1361F), this samādhī of the ‘commemoration of the Buddhas’ according to the Mahāyāna is to ‘commemorate all the Buddhas of the ten directions and the three times present in innumerable buddha-fields’: see above, p. 409-415F.

³⁰⁴ Cf. p. 865F.

Question. – How does this concentration of the recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛtisamādhi) bring about being born in that field?

Answer. – ‘Recollecting the Buddha’ is to meditate on his thirty-two major marks and his eighty minor marks (anuvyañjana), on his golden colored body (suvarṇavarṇa kāya), on the rays (raśmi) that shine forth from his body and fill the ten directions, on the clarity and purity of his brilliance like the molten gold of the Jambu river (jāmbūnadasuvarṇa). The Buddha is like Sumeru, king of the mountains, in the middle of the great sea, which, at the moment the sun shines on it, illuminates everything.³⁰⁸ the first centuries of our era. Between the sūtras of the Tripiṭaka compiled by the śrāvakas at the beginnings of Buddhism and the Vaipulyasūtras that accumulated over the course of time, there is the major difference that the former were collected from the very mouth (kaṇṭhoka) of the historical Buddha Śākyamuni whereas the latter came from a meeting in samādhi with the buddhas of the three times and ten directions. Without saying anything about the value of the teachings they contain, we can simply state that the sūtras of the Tripiṭaka transmit historical evidence whereas the Vaipulya sūtras tell of a mystical experience.

The Mahāyānists who benefit from this experience do not believe in the objectivity of their meeting with the buddhas. Having come out of concentration, they first establish that the buddhas came from nowhere and that they themselves have gone nowhere, that it is only to the extent that they have thought they have seen the buddhas. And each of them says: “It is by means of mind (citta) that I have seen the buddhas; it is by means of the mind that I have fabricated the buddhas. The mind is the buddhas; the mind is myself.”

Following their reasoning, they establish that, contrary to the common way of speaking, consciousness (vijñāna) does not discriminate (na vijñānati), mind does not cognize itself, does not see itself, and to cling to the nature of mind is fundamentally ignorance (ajñāna). Pushing to their ultimate conclusions the criticisms raised by the Sautrāntikas against mental operations (cf. Kośa, I, p. 86; IX, p. 280), the Prajñāpāramitās (Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 37-40; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 121-122; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 495) affirm that the mind is the opposite of mind (cittam acittam), that in this absence of mind, existence or non-existence of the mind does not occur and is not perceived (tatrācittatāyām astitā vā nāstitā vā na vidyate nopalabhyate), that this absence of mind excluding all modification and all concept constitutes the very nature of everything (avikāra avikalpā acittatā yā sarvadharmāṇām dharmatā). In this view, “the bodhisattva penetrates the true nature of things (dharmāṇām bhūtalakṣaṇam) which is none other than eternal emptiness (nityaśūnyatā).”

In samādhi, the bodhisattva meets the buddhas, converses with them and enjoys their presence; by means of prajñā he penetrates the emptiness of beings and things by virtue of which nobody meets anybody and nothing is said about things that are neither existent nor non-existent. Supported by the two wings of samādhi and prajñā, the bodhisattva takes flight like a garuḍa, king of the birds which soars supremely in empty space.

³⁰⁸ Compare this common passage incessantly repeated in the Sarvāstivādin Avadānas (Avadānaśataka, I. p. 3; Divyāvadāna, p. 46. 3tc.): Atha... bhagavantam dadarśa dvātriṃśatā mahāpuruṣalakṣaṇaṇi samalanṅkṛtam aśītyā cānuvyañjanair virhājitaḡātram vyāmaprabhālankṛtam sūryasahasrātirekaprabham jaṅgamam iva ratnaparvatam samantato bhadrakam. – Then N... saw the Blessed One adorned with the thirty-two major marks of the Great Man, his body resplendent with the eighty minor marks, adorned with a halo, one arm-span in width, with a brilliance surpassing a thousand suns, like a mountain of jewels in movement, captivating in every way.

During this concentration, the yogin loses the notion (saṃjñā) of other colors (rūpa) – the colors of the mountains, earth, forests, etc. –; in space he sees only the bodily marks. If the Buddhas, marks like an appearance of molten gold (kanaka) in the center of a real beryl (vaiḍūrya).

A bhikṣu who has entered onto the meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvana) see only bloated bodies (vyādhmātaka), putrified (vipūyaka), torn apart (vidhūta), finally seeing nothing other than a skeleton (asthiśataka).³⁰⁹ This [276b] skeleton is immobile (akāraka); it comes from nowhere and it goes nowhere (na kutaścid āgacchati, na kvacid gacchati): the bhikṣu sees this skeleton by means of his memory (anusmaraṇa) and as a concept (saṃjñā). In the same way, the bodhisattva-mahāṣasattva who has entered into the concentration of the recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛtisamādhi) sees the Buddhas insofar as he has concentrated his mind (cittasamādhānā) and insofar as his mind is pure (cittaviśuddhitvā). When a person whose body is adorned with ornaments looks into a mirror (ādarśa) or clear water, he sees all his ornaments without exception. In the mirror of the clear water, there is no real (ākṛti) form but, since it is clear and limpid, the person contemplates his own image therein (pratīkṛti). From the very beginning, the dharmas [of Buddha] are eternally pure (nityaviśuddha) and it is by means of his well purified mind (supariśuddhacitta) that the bodhisattva sees all the Buddhas at will (yathecccham). He questions them about his doubts (saṃśaya), and the Buddhas answer his questions. Hearing the words of the Buddhas, the bodhisattva experiences great joy (muditā).

Emerging from concentration (saṃādher vyutthitah), the bodhisattva has the following thought: “From where do the Buddhas come when I myself have gone nowhere?” At that very moment, he knows that the Buddhas have come from nowhere and that he himself has gone nowhere. – Once again he has the following thought: “Everything that exists in the threefold world (traiḡātuka) has been manufactured by the mind (citta). Why? It is insofar as I have thought in my mind that I have seen all these Buddhas. It is by means of the mind that I have seen the Buddhas; it is by means of the mind that I have created the Buddhas. Mind is the Buddhas; mind is myself.”

And yet the mind cannot cognize itself and does not see itself. Clinging to the nature of the mind (cittanimittānām udgrahaṇam) is fundamentally ignorance (ajñāna). The mind itself is deception (mṛṣā) and comes from ignorance (avidyā). By separating from his deceptive and erroneous nature of mind, the bodhisattva penetrates into the true nature of things (dharmāṇām bhūtalakṣaṇa or dharmatā), namely, eternal emptiness (nityaśūnyatā).

The bodhisattva thus obtains the concentration of the recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛtisamādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) [about the true nature, the emptiness of things]. By the power of these two factors (saṃskāra), he comes to never be separated from the Buddhas at will (yathecccham) and according to his wishes (yathāpranidhānam). In the same way that the garuḍa, king of the birds, furnished with two wings (pakṣa), soars supremely in space (ākāśa), so the bodhisattva, in his present lifetime (ihajanmani), by means of the power of concentration and wisdom, is able to pay homage to the Buddhas at will and, after his death, he is able to meet the Buddhas again.

³⁰⁹ See above, p. 1316F seq.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that “the bodhisattva who wishes to never be separated from the Buddhas must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

CHAPTER XLVI (p. 1931F) VENERATING WITH THE ROOTS OF GOOD

Buddhapūjā
First Section HONORING ALL THE BUDDHAS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 23, l. 15-18; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 72, l. 11-15). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to have at his disposal the roots of good capable of honoring, venerating, respecting and praising all the Buddhas as he wishes should practice the perfection of wisdom (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena yair kuśalamūlair ākāṅkṣet sarvabuddhān pūjayituṃ satkartuṃ gurūkartuṃ varṇayituṃ tāni me kuśalamūlāni samr̥dhyeyur iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. THE DESIRE TO OFFER

[276c] The bodhisattva who gets to be never separated from the Buddhas must honor them (pūjayitum); if he meets the Buddhas and has nothing to offer them, he is very unhappy.

[Offering of Sumati].³¹⁰ – Thus the bodhisattva Siu-mo-t'i (Sumati), in the Ts'in language “Good Intellect”, seeing the Buddha Jan-teng (Dīpaṃkara) and having nothing to offer him, set out to look everywhere. Seeing a seller of flowers, he bought five blue lotus flowers (nīlotpala) for five hundred gold pieces (kāṛṣāpaṇa) and offered him the flowers.

[Offering of Sadāprarudita].³¹¹ – The bodhisattva Sa-t'o-po-louen (Sadāprarudita) sold his body, his blood and his flesh to honor the Teacher. Such bodhisattvas who would meet a Buddha and would wish to honor him were very upset if they did not have any offerings.

When inferior people meet superior individuals and do not offer them any present, it is a lack of respect. Also, the bodhisattvas look for offerings to honor the Buddhas. The Buddhas have no need of [the offerings] but by honoring them, the bodhisattvas perfect themselves mentally.

Thus when a laborer (karmāntika, kāṛṣaka) finds a good field (kṣetra) but has no seed (bīja), he has to increase his work: it is useless for him to use up his energy and he feels great sadness. It is the same for the bodhisattva who meets the Buddha but has no offering at his disposal. Even if he has something but which does not correspond to his idea, he is sad.

³¹⁰ See p. 248F, n. 2. Also later, k. 35, p. 316b20-24.

³¹¹ See p. 1353F, n. 1.

II. METONYMICAL MEANING OF ‘ROOTS OF GOOD’

Here, by ‘roots of good’ (kuśalamūla), we mean the fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) coming from the roots of good, such as flowers (puṣpa), perfumes (gandha), necklaces (niṣka), garments (vastra), banners (patāka), parasols (chattra) and all kinds of precious gems (maṇiratna). Why is that?

Sometimes, [and this is the case here], the effect is designated by means of the cause (kārye kāraṇopacāraḥ), as in the expression: “to eat a thousand ounces of gold monthly”. Gold is not edible but it is by means of gold that one finds something to eat: hence the expression: ‘to eat gold’.

Also, sometimes the cause is designated by means of the result (kāraṇe kāryopacāraḥ) for example, when on seeing a beautiful picture, one says: “That is a good artist”. The artist is not the picture, but seeing the beauty of the picture, one speaks of the talent of the artist.³¹²

It is the same in regard to the roots of good and their fruits of retribution. By virtue of the karmic causes and conditions constituted by the roots of good, one obtains, [as fruits of retribution], objects to offer (pūjokaraṇa) called here [by metonymy] ‘roots of good’, [whereas they are really the results of the roots of good].

Question. – If that is so, why not speak specifically of flowers (puṣpa), perfumes (gandha), etc., by name instead of designating them indirectly by their causes?

³¹² ‘To honor the Buddhas by the roots of good’ means to honor the Buddhas by the offerings resulting from the roots of good. Expressing oneself thus is to designate the result (the offerings) by the name of the cause (the roots of good).

1) It is kārye kāraṇopacāraḥ when one metaphorically applies [the name of] the cause to the effect, in other words, when one designates the effect by the cause.

The classical example given here and above (p. 218F) already appeared in the Śatakaśāstra by Āryadeva, T 1569, k. 1, p. 170a16-17: “He eats a thousand ounces of gold monthly”. Gold is not food, but it is the cause of food.

Another example given above (p. 218F): “Woman is the stain of morality”. Woman is not the stain but the cause of the stain.

2) Conversely, there is kāraṇe kāryopacāraḥ when one metaphorically applies the name of the effect to the cause, in other words when one designates the cause by the effect.

The classical example given here already appeared in the Śatakaśāstra by Āryadeva, T 1569, k. 1, p. 170a17-18: “When, on seeing a beautiful painting, one says that it is a good artist. The artist is not good; it is the painting created by him that is good.”

Another classical example given by the Kośabhāṣya, p. 7, l. 11-13 is taken from a stanza of the Dhammapāda, v. 194, and the Udānavarga, XXX, v. 22: Sukhaṃ buddhasya cotpādaḥ: “The appearance of the Buddha is happiness”. The appearance of the Buddha is not happiness; it is the bliss that it brings that is the happiness. In saying that this appearance is happiness, one is applying an attribute of the effect to the cause.

Answer. – Offerings (pūjā) are of two kinds: i) material offerings (āmiṣapūja); ii) spiritual offerings (dharmapūjā).³¹³ If the sūtra mentions only flowers, perfumes, etc., as offerings, it would not include spiritual offerings. But as it speaks here of ‘roots of good’ as offerings, we know that it includes both material and spiritual offerings.

III. SIGNS OF HONOR, RESPECT, VENERATION AND PRAISE

1. Pūja

Here is what is meant by honors (pūjā). When one sees the Buddhas or hears their qualities spoken of, one honors them in mind, respects them, goes to meet them, accompanies them, bows before them with joined palms, or if they have withdrawn to a quiet place, one hastens to send them food (annapāna), [277a] flowers (puṣpa), perfumes (gandha), precious gems (maṇiratna), etc. – In many ways, one lauds their qualities (guṇa) of discipline (śīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā). If they preach the Dharma, one accepts it with faith and one teaches it.

These good physical, vocal and mental actions constitute pūjā.

2. Satkāra

Tsouen-tchong (satkāra ‘veneration’). – Knowing that nobody surpasses the Buddhas in virtue is tsouen; feeling for them a reverential fear surpassing that which one experiences toward one’s father, mother, master or princes, serving them and respecting them is tchong.

3. Gurukāra

Kong-king (gurukāra ‘respect’). – Being humble and fearful is kong; esteeming their knowledge and virtues is king.

4. Varṇana

Tsan-t’an (varṇana ‘praise’) - Praising their qualities is tsan; lauding the ceaselessly and exalting them is t’an.³¹⁴

IV. HAVING OFFERINGS AT ONE’S DISPOSAL AS ONE LIKES

“The bodhisattva wishes to have [offerings] at his disposal as he likes.” – If he has need of a flower to offer, it comes to him as he wishes (yathaccham), whether he looks for it or he gets it without looking for it. Actually there are things that arise spontaneously (svarasena): apparitional beings (upapāduka) on up to musical instruments (tūrya); and it is the same for all the things to be offered (pūjopakaraṇa).

³¹³ Anguttara, I, p. 93: Dve ‘mā bhikkhave pūjā. katamā dve. āmiṣapūjā ca dhammapūjā ca.

³¹⁴ These semantic explanations are obviously a Chinese gloss as is customary with the Chinese.

Question. – If the bodhisattva finds them this way, it is easy for him to offer them. Why then does he seek for them as he wishes (yathecccham)?

Answer. – Merit (puṇya) comes from the mind (cittāpekṣa). Using as an offering something that one loves produces an increase in merit (puṇyavardhana).

Thus, king A-yu (Aśoka) became king of Jambudvīpa and built eighty thousand stupas in one single day because, as a child, he had offered to the Buddha a bit of earth (pāṃśu) that he loved very much.³¹⁵ If an adult placed earth in the Buddhas’ bowl, even a lot of it, he would gain no merit because [to him] this earth is of no value. Some people have a liking for flowers and, when they offer those they prefer to the Buddha, merit increases for them. It is the same for other precious objects.

Moreover, offerings are adjusted according to the conventions of the times: in cold weather, kindling (indhana), clothing (pariccechādāna) or food (annapāna) should be given; in hot weather, ice water, fans (vijāna), parasols (chattra), cool rooms, very fine garments and very light food should be given; in rainy or windy weather, the needed gear should be procured. Those are offerings adjusted according to the weather. Offerings should also be adjusted according to the conventions of place and the needs of the recipients (pratigrāhaka).

Moreover, the offerings are adjusted according to the desires. Some bodhisattvas know that the Buddhas need nothing; they also know that objects (dravya) are false like a magic show and have as their single characteristic the absence of characteristics. However, in order to convert beings (sattvapariṇāmanā), they adjust themselves to the preferences of beings and countries to make their offerings.

There are as well bodhisattvas who possess very deep concentrations (samādhi) and have acquired the bodhisattva superknowledges (abhijñā). By the power of these superknowledges, they fly to the Buddhas of the ten directions. Sometimes, in the buddha-fields (buddhakṣetra), if necessary, they rain down celestial flowers (divyapuṣpa), filling the trichiliocosm (trisāhasralokadhātu) and offer these to the Buddhas; sometimes they rain down heavenly sandalwood (candana); sometimes they rain down cintāmaṇi as large as Sumeru; sometimes they rain down musical instruments (tūrya) with wondrous sounds; sometimes, taking a body as high as Sumeru, they use it as a lamp-wick to pay homage to [277b] the Buddhas. Those are material offerings.

Moreover, the bodhisattvas who are practicing the six perfections (pāramitā) make spiritual offerings (dharmapūjā) to the Buddhas. By using the practices of a single bhūmi, some bodhisattvas pay homage to the Buddhas; they go up to fulfilling the practices of the ten bhūmis to honor them. Sometimes, having obtained conviction that dharma do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti), they destroy their own afflictions (kleśa) and those of beings. Those are spiritual offerings (dharmapūjā).

Sometimes the bodhisattva dwelling in the tenth bhūmi exerts his magical power (rddhibala) so well that the fires of the damned (naraka) are extinguished, the pretas are satisfied, the animals are liberated from their fears (bhaya), humans (manuṣya) and gods (deva) gradually reach the non-regressing bhūmi (avaivartikabhūmi). Such qualities and such powers are also spiritual offerings.

³¹⁵ Pāṃśupradānāvadāna: references, p. 723F, n. 2

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says that the bodhisattva “who wishes to have roots of good at his disposal [to honor the Buddhas] should practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Manorathapūraṇa

Second Section FULFILLING THE WISHES OF ALL BEINGS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 23, l. 19-22; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 72, l. 18-73, l. 5). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to fulfill the desires actually of all beings for food and drink, garments, bedding, ointments and perfumes, vehicles, houses, couches, lamps, etc., should practice the perfection of wisdom (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena sarvasattvenānāṃ manorathān paripūrayitukāmena annapānavastrāṣaṇāsanavilepanaghandhayānagrhakhaṭvādīpādibhiḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. WHAT IS FULFILLING THE WISHES?

Question. – What order (anukrama) is the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra following here when it says that the bodhisattva “wishes to fulfill the desires of all beings”?

Answer. – The activity of the bodhisattva is twofold: i) honoring the Buddhas (buddhānāṃ pūjā); ii) saving beings (sattvānāṃ paritrāṇa). By honoring the Buddhas, the bodhisattva gains immense merit (puṇya) and, with this merit, he helps beings (sattvān upakaroti) in the sense that “he fulfills their wishes”.

The master merchant goes to sea and collects jewels (ratna); then, having returned safe and sound, he helps his relatives (bandhu), his friends (mitra), etc. Similarly, the bodhisattva goes to the sea of the Buddhadharma and gathers immense precious qualities there, thanks to which he helps beings.

A petty king in paying homage to the great king has to satisfy him and the latter, in return, grants him the offices and the wealth he desires. Having returned to his native land, the petty king helps beings and drives away thieves (caura). Similarly, the bodhisattva who has paid homage to the Buddha, the king of the Dharma, receives in return a special prediction (vyākaraṇa) and, thanks to the immense treasure of his roots of good (kuśalamūla), attains the indestructible power of knowledge (akṣayajñānabala). Then, going among beings, he honors good people, gives to the poor whatever they need and destroys the armies of Māra as well as the holders of wrong views and heresies. This is how, after having honored the Buddhas, he fulfills the wishes of beings.

Question. – Does the bodhisattva truly fulfill the wishes of all beings? If he completely fulfilled the wishes of beings, what would be the use of the other Buddhas and bodhisattvas? If he does not completely fulfill them, why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speak of the bodhisattva wanting to fulfill the wishes of all beings and practicing the prajñāpāramitā for this purpose?

Answer. - There are two kinds of wishes (manoratha, āśā): i) the realizable wish; ii) the unrealizable wish.

When someone wants to measure space (ākāśa) and reach its limits, when someone seeks to reach the limits of time or place, when a child wants to grab [277c] his image in water or in a mirror, these are all unrealizable wishes.

When one bores wood to make fire, when one digs the earth to find water, when one cultivates merit (punya) to attain birth among humans or gods, to find the fruit of arhat or pratyekabuddha or even to become a Buddha, the king of Dharma, these are all realizable wishes.

The realizable wish is of two types: i) worldly (laukika), ii) supraworldly (lokottara). In the present passage, it is a matter of fulfilling the worldly wishes of beings. How do we know that? Because [here the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is talking about] supplying them with objects of current need: food and drink (annapāna), couches (khaṭvā), bedding (śayanāsana), etc., up to lamps (dīpa).

Question. – Why does the bodhisattva give beings things that are easy to find (sulabha) and not things that are hard to find (durlabha)?

Answer. – Things wished for are inferior (hīna), middling (madhya) or superior (adhimātra). The inferior ones are the causes and conditions bringing about happiness (sukha) in the present life (ihajanman), the middling ones are the causes and conditions assuring happiness in the future life (parajanna), the superior ones are the causes and conditions assuring nirvāṇa. This is why the bodhisattva first fulfills the inferior wishes, then the middling wishes and finally the superior wishes.

Moreover, beings often cling (abhiniviṣṭa) to present happiness, rarely to future happiness, and even more rarely to the happiness of nirvāṇa. By speaking here of things to which beings are most attached, [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] is also including the things to which they are least attached.

Moreover, from beginning to end, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speaks above all about future lives and the path of nirvāṇa; rarely does it speak of things of the present life. The bodhisattva's rule is to assure beings all kinds of benefits (anuśaṃsa) without omitting any. Why? His first and foremost intention is to lead beings to the Mahāyāna Dharma. If they are unable to adopt it and become converted, the bodhisattva presents to them the path of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha. If they are resistant to that, the bodhisattva presents them with the practices of the ten good ways of conduct (daśa kuśaladharmapatha), the four limitless ones (brahmavihāra), etc., so that they can cultivate merit (punya). If, finally, beings do not appreciate any of these practices, the bodhisattva does not abandon them but gives them the good things of the present life, namely, food and drink (annapāna), etc.

Finally, when worldly people (prthagjana) give someone food, drink, etc., and thus fulfill their wishes, they are fulfilling the causes and conditions [required for this result], insofar as it is things of the present lifetime and those of future lifetimes. Even without fulfilling these causes and conditions, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas also fulfill the wishes of beings but the services that they render are very small. The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who practices the perfection of wisdom, due to his actions, is able, on the other hand, to become king or an important person (mahāśreṣṭhin) enjoying immense wealth. When beings come from the four directions (caturdiśasattva) to call upon him, he satisfies them completely.

[The fabulous gifts of Bindu]. – Thus, the vaiśya P'in-t'eou (Bindu?) was a great benefactor (dānapati). He sat on a great bed (khaṭva) adorned with the seven jewels (saptaratna). This bed had diamond (vajra) feet, was covered with a heavenly mattress and had rubies (padmarāga) as curtains (vitāna). Eighty thousand servants stood on guard on all sides; their adornments were marvelous; they opened the four great doors [of the palace] and authorized all requests. Six times during both the day and the night the drum was beaten and rays of light shone forth. Of the numberless beings of the ten directions, all those who heard the drum or who were touched by the rays did not fail to rush [278a] to the spot in order to receive all kinds of food and drink (annapāna). At the sight of this huge crowd, the śreṣṭhin [Bindu] silently raised his eyes to the heavens and immediately there fell from the sky a rain of different foods of a hundred flavors (śatarasasāhāra) and everybody received as much as they wished. If people did not collect it themselves, the servants gave it to them, dividing it up and distributing it. When all were satisfied, the rain stopped. Whether people had need of food and drink (annapāna), bedding (śayanāsana), clothing (vastra), etc., it was the same.

Having thus satisfied the desires of beings, Bindu then preached the Dharma to them and led them to renounce the four foods (caturvidha āhāra).³¹⁶ All were then established in the non-regressing bhūmi (avaivartikā bhūmi).

By the power of their superknowledges (abhijñā), bodhisattvas fulfill the wishes of beings.

II. DO THE BUDDHAS AND BODHISATTVAS FULFILL WISHES WITHOUT EXCEPTION?

Question. When the Buddha was present in the world³¹⁷, beings were still hungry and thirsty (kṣutpipāsā), the sky did not always pour down rain (varṣṭi), and beings were distressed. If the Buddha himself could not fulfill the wishes of all beings, how then could the bodhisattva fulfill them?

Answer. – The Bodhisattva abiding on the tenth bhūmi and in the concentration of the progress of the Hero (Śūraṃgamamsamādhi) is in the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu, and sometimes he manifests there the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) and practices the six perfections (pāramitā); sometimes he manifests as non-regressing (avaivartika); sometimes he manifests as being separated from Buddhahood by one single lifetime (ekajātīpratibaddha) and, in the Tuṣita heaven, he preaches the Dharma to the devas; sometimes he comes down from the Tuṣita heaven and is born in the palace of king Śuddhodana; sometimes he leaves home (pravrajati) and becomes Buddha; sometimes he appears in the midst of the great assembly, turns the Wheel of the Dharma (dharmacakram pravartayati) and saves innumerable beings; sometimes he manifests his entry into nirvāṇa and seven precious stūpas are erected for him so that beings can honor his relics (śarīra) everywhere in all the kingdoms; sometimes finally his Dharma becomes extinct.³¹⁸ If the Bodhisattva helps in those ways, what can be said about the Buddha?

³¹⁶ See Dīgha, III, p. 228.

³¹⁷ Adopting the variant tsai che.

The body of the Buddha is of two kinds: i) the true body (bhūtakāya); ii) the emanated body (nirmāṇakāya). In beings who see the true body of the Buddha, there is no wish that is not fulfilled. The true body of the Buddha fills space; his rays illumine the ten directions; the sounds of his sermons fill innumerable universes in the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅganadīvālukopama lokadhātu) equally; all the members of the great assembly hear the Dharma simultaneously and he preaches the Dharma uninterruptedly; in the space of one moment, the listener obtains the understanding of what he has heard.

When the kalpa is finished and by virtue of actions [collectively] accomplished, the great rain (mahāvarṣa) comes down without interruption, it cannot be governed by the other three great elements (mahābhūta); only the winds (vāyu) that come from the ten directions at the end of the kalpa and come up against one another can withstand this water (ap).³¹⁹ In the same way, the Dharma preached by the Buddha [of the true body] or the body of the fundamental element (dharmadhātukāya), cannot be accepted by the practitioners of the three Vehicles with the exception of the Bodhisattvas of the tenth bhūmi; only the Bodhisattvas of the tenth bhūmi whose skillful means (upāya) and power of knowledge (jñānabala) are inconceivable can hear and accept this Dharma.

Beings who see the Buddha of the body of the Dharma (dharmakāya) are [278b] liberated from the threefold poison (triviṣa), the afflictive emotions (kleśa), the sufferings of cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), and all of their wishes are fulfilled. If the cintāmaṇi brings all that one desires, what can be said of the Buddha? The ³¹⁸ Having entered into the concentration of the progress of the Hero, the bodhisattva of the tenth bhūmi can carry out all the deeds of the career of a Buddha. See the Śūraṅgamasamādhisūtra, transl., p. 123, 140, 223-224, 263.

³¹⁹ The Mahākālpā, or great cosmic period, is divided into four incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa) each lasting twenty small kalpas (antarakalpa): 1) one period of disappearance of the world (saṃvartakalpa) resulting from one disappearance by fire (tejaḥsaṃvartanī), one disappearance by water (apsaṃvartanī) and one disappearance by wind (vāyusaṃvartanī); 2) one period during which the world remains destroyed (saṃvartasthāyikakalpa); 3) one period of creation (vivartakalpa); 4) one period during which the world remains created (vivartasthāyikakalpa). At the moment when the second period is consumed and the third is about to begin, as a result of the collective action of beings light winds arise in space that are the first signs of the future receptacles (sattvānāṃ karmādhīpatyena bhājanānām pūrvanimittabhūtā ākāśe mandamandā vāyavaḥ syandante). They constitute the 'primordial wind' (prāgvāyu). With the increasing of these winds, there arises the circle of wind (vāyumaṇḍala) which rests on space (ākāśa). Then on this circle of wind, by virtue of the [collective] actions of beings, masses of clouds arise, jets of water like axle-trees begin to rain down, and that becomes the circle of waters (tasmin vāyumaṇḍale sattvānāṃ karmabhir meghāḥ saṃbhūyākusamātrābhir dhārābhir abhivaṛṣanti, tad bhavaty apāṃ maṇḍalam). – See Kośabhāṣya, p. 158 and 179.

The Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 34, p. 243a23-26 alludes to this primordial rain, and its text is cited in Kośabhāṣya, p. 113, l. 23-26: Īṣādhāre deve varṣatī nāsti vīcīr vā antarikā vā anatīkṣād vāridhārāṇāṃ prapatatīnām / evaṃ pūrvasyāṃ dīśī nāsti vīcīr vā antarikā vā lokadhātūnām saṃvartamānānām vivartamānānām ca / yathāpūrvasyāṃ dīśī evaṃ dakuṣṭasyāṃ paścimāyām uttarasyām iti / cintāmaṇi satisfies all worldly wishes (laukika manoratha); the Buddha, on the other hand, satisfies all supraworldly wishes (lokottara manoratha). Claiming that the Buddha does not fulfill the wishes of beings completely is a false statement.

Moreover, the Buddha Śākyamuni who took birth in the palace of the king seemingly took on human qualities; he endured cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsā), sleep (nidrā); he underwent criticism (paṃsana), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), death (maraṇaṇa), etc., but in his mentality, wisdom (prajñā) and divine qualities, he was no different from a fully and completely enlightened buddha (samyaksaṃbuddha). Had he wished to fulfill the desires of beings, he would have fulfilled them all. Actually he did not fulfill them because already for numberless lifetimes he had satisfied the desires of beings in regard to garments and food, but without their escaping from suffering. Presently,³²⁰ he wanted only to bring them the unconditional and eternal bliss of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasyāsaṃskṛtānityasukha). When one has compassion for one's relatives (bandhu), one does not give them good food mixed with poison. Now worldly (laukika) favors produce fetters (saṃyojana) and, furthermore, if they are untimely, they give rise to great suffering. This is why Śākyamuni does not consider them to be necessary.

Finally, some say that Śākyamuni did indeed fulfill the wishes of beings but that the latter did not profit from them.³²¹

[Vimalakīrtinirdeśa].³²² – Thus it is said in the P'i-mo-lo-kie king (Vimalakīrtisūtra): “The Buddha tapped the earth with his toe and at once his field (kṣetra) was adorned with the seven jewels. [And the Buddha said to Śāriputra]: My Buddha-field is always like that, but because there are many bad people, it appears to be different from a Buddha-field.”

Also when the nāgarāja impartially (samacittena) makes it rain, the rain is water for humans, but for the pretas, it is burning embers.³²³

³²⁰ ‘Presently’, i.e., in the course of his last existence and after his enlightenment.

³²¹ Subject to the law of karma, they do not fulfill the conditions necessary to profit from the teachings and favors of Śākyamuni. See above, p. 541-542F, the misadventure of the old woman of Śrāvastī whom the Buddha was unable to save.

³²² Wei-mo-kie-king, T 475, k. 1, p. 538c20-29; transl. p. 122-123.

³²³ The example of the pretas and water is often evoked by the Mādhyamikas and the Vijñānavādins to prove, respectively, the non-existence of the object or its reduction to mere-mind.

For the former, see Candrakīrti's Madhyamakāvatāra, p. 164 (transl. Muséon, 1910, p. 348): Like someone who has an organ afflicted by ophthalmia, pretas take water to be blood.

For the latter, see Viṃśatīka, p. 3, l. 23-4, l. 6. Samtānāṇīyamaḥ siddha iti vartate prīṭhānām iva pretavat katham siddhaḥ saman / sarvaih pūyanadyādīdarśane / tulyakarmavipākāvasthā hi pretaḥ sarve 'pi pūyapūrṇam nadīm paśyanti naika eva / yathā pūyapūrṇam mūtrapurīṣādīpūrṇam daṇḍāsidharaiś ca puruṣair adhiṣṭhitām ity ādigrahaṇena / eva samtānāṇīyamo vijñaptīnāl apy arthe siddhaḥ / Transl.: ‘The indetermination of the mental series’ is demonstrated ‘as in the pretas,’ similarly to the pretas. How is that demonstrated? Because all see rivers at the same time as full of pus. Actually, all pretas who are in the same condition of retribution of actions equally see the river full of pus and not just one single one. Similarly to pus, also full of urine, excrement, etc., guarded by men

Question. – If the bodhisattva fulfilled the wishes of all beings, since the latter are finite (antavat) in number,³²⁴ nobody would suffer from thirst and cold any longer. Why? Because [according to this hypothesis], all beings realized their wishes and all wanted to escape from suffering and find happiness.

Answer. – When the sūtra says: “Fulfilling the wishes of all beings”, the word ‘all’ is taken in a broad sense and not in a narrow sense. It is like the stanza in Fa-kiu (Dharmapada) where it says:

All fear death,

There is no one who does not fear the suffering of being beaten.

By being inspired by the leniency one feels for oneself

One avoids killing, one avoids inflicting a beating.³²⁵ carrying sticks and swords: that is the meaning of ‘etc.’ Thus, even if ideas have no object, the indetermination of the mental series is demonstrated.

The same example is repeated in a paracanonical sūtra, the Jñānacatuṣkaśūtra, cited by Asaṅga and his school in the Saṃgraha, p. 103-107; the Abhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā, T 1606, k. 5, p. 715b13-c1; and the Siddhi, p. 421-423. The bodhisattva needs four knowledges in order to be convinced of the absolute absence of object (artha). The first is the viruddhaviṣṇānanimittatvajñāna noticing that one single thing, or supposedly such, is the object of contradictory cognitions. Thus, hungry ghosts (preta), animals (tiryāṇc), humans (manuṣya) and gods (deva) have differing concepts (bhinnaviṣṇapti) of one and the same thing (ekadravya).

Commenting on this passage, Asvabhāva states: Where the pretas, by the power of the retribution of their actions (vipākabala), see a river full of pus (nadī pūyapūrṇā), animals (tiryāṇc), fish (matsya), etc., see something to drink (pāna), a home, and settle there. Humans (manuṣya) see in it delicious pure clear water: they use it to bathe, to quench their thirst. As for the gods gathered (samāhitadeva) in the sphere of infinite space (ākāśanantyāyatana), they see in it only space (ākāśa), for they no longer have any notion of substance (rūpasamjñā). But it is impossible to have so many different cognitions of one and the same thing [if the latter is real]. How could this same river filled with pus (pūya), urine (mūtra) and excrement (purīṣa), guarded by men carrying sticks and swords (daṇḍāsidharaiś ca puruṣair adhiṣṭhitā) play the role of sweet-smelling (sugandha), fresh (śīṭala) water, of a dwelling place and a beverage? How could it be identified with space? But if it is accepted that the outer object does not exist, that is all explained.

Asvabhāva ends his commentary by citing a stanza of which the original Sanskrit appears in the Sarvadarśanasamgraha (Ānandaśrama edition, p. 12, l. 3-4):

Parivṛāṅkamukaśunām ekasyām pramadātanau / kuṇapaḥ kāmīnī bhakṣya iti tisro vikalpanāḥ //

“The monk, the lover and the dog have three different concepts of one and the same female body, namely, a rotting carcass, a mistress, or food.”

³²⁴ The responsibility for this statement must be placed on the objector. The Buddha placed among the questions that he declined to answer that of knowing if the loka (not only the receptacle-world, but the world of beings) is finite or infinite (see above, p. 155F). However, the current opinion among scholars is that the number of beings is infinite: satakāyo ananto (Atthasālinī, p. 160), that the beings of the innumerable universes will never be exhausted, as is the case for space: nāsti satvānām pariṣaya ākāśavat (Kośabhāṣya, p. 113, l. 21).

Although this stanza claims that everybody fears the suffering of being beaten, the formless beings (arūpisattva) who have no body escape the suffering of the stick, the beings of the subtle form realm (rūpadhātu), while having a body, also escape the suffering of the stick; and among the beings of the desire realm (kāmadhātu), there also are some who do not undergo the suffering of the stick. Here, when the stanza says ‘everybody’, it means ‘all those who are susceptible to being beaten’ and not really everybody. Thus, when the bodhisattva fulfills the wishes of all beings, it means ‘all beings capable of being satisfied’.

[278c]

But the good intentions of the bodhisattva are limitless and the fruits of retribution of merit [that he has acquired] are likewise limitless. Nevertheless, hindered by the sins (āpatti) they have committed during innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa), beings are unable to receive the benefits of them.

[Story of Losaka-tiṣya].³²⁶ – Thus, a disciple of Śāriputra, the monk Lo-p’in-tcheou (Losaka-tiṣya?) observed discipline (śīlavat) zealously (vīryavat). When he begged for alms, he was unable to get anything for six days. When the seventh day came, there was only a short time for him to live. A colleague begged for food and gave it to him but a bird carried it away. Then Śāriputra said to Maudgalyāyana: “With your great magical power (rddhibala), watch over his food so that he can eat it.” Then Maudgalyāyana took some food and went to offer it to Losaka-tiṣya; but as soon as the latter tried to bring it to his mouth, it changed into mud. Śāriputra in turn begged for food and presented it to him, but Losaka-tiṣya’s mouth closed up by itself. Finally, the Buddha came with some food and offered it to him; by means of the Buddha’s immense merit (punya), Losaka-tiṣya was finally able to eat it. After having eaten, the monk developed joy and increased faith and veneration. The Buddha said to the bhikṣu: “All conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmas) have suffering as their nature”, and he preached the four noble truths to him. At that very moment, the bhikṣu’s impurities (āsrava) disappeared and his mind opened: he became an arhat.

³²⁵ As it has already done above (p. 1513F), the Traité here cites, under the title of Dharmapada, a stanza appearing in the Udānavarga, V, v. 19, p. 144:

Sarve daṇḍasya bibhyanti, sarveṣāṃ jīvitam priyam / ātmānam upamāṃ kurtvā, naiva hanyān na ghātayet //

In Pāli, Dharmapada, v. 130:

*Sabbe tasanti daṇḍassa, sabbedam jīvitam piyam /
attānam upamaṃ katvā, na hanyeyya na ghātaye //*

“All have fear of the stick; life is dear to all. By taking this as comparison, one avoids killing or making someone else kill.”

³²⁶ Lo-p’in-tcheou has already been mentioned above, p. 931-932F. His story, as it is found here, is told in the same words in the Tsa-p’i-yu king, T 207, p. 525b9-19 (transl. in Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 22-23), but attributed to the monk Lo-yun-tchou. Another basically related tale, differing in details, is in the Pāli Jātaka, no. 41, I, p. 24-236 and is about the therā Losaka Tissa: it is summarized above, p. 932 note.

Lo-p’in-tcheou has traits in common with many other individuals ugly by nature, especially with Lavaṇabhadrika (cf. p. 1439F, n. 4). On this subject, see Lin Li-Kouang, L’Aide Mémoire de la Vraie Loi, Appendix IV, p. 278-290.

However, there are beings whose merits are so small and whose sins are so heavy that even the Buddha himself cannot save them.³²⁷ Also, knowing that beings do not exist (nopalabhyante) and deeply penetrating the fundamental element (dharmadhātu), the Buddhas are without any memories (anusmarana) and thought-constructions (vikalpa) that say: “This one can be saved, that one cannot be saved”: their thoughts (citta) are always calm (śānta) and their minds neither increase nor decrease (anūnānadhika).

This is why the bodhisattva wants to fulfill the wishes of all beings, but as a result of their sins (āpatti), the latter cannot receive their favors. It is not the fault of the bodhisattva.

III. MATERIAL BENEFITS GRANTED BY THE BODHISATTVA

[Here the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is speaking about fulfilling the wishes of beings “in regard to food and drink, garments, bedding, ointments and perfumes, vehicles, houses, couches and other utensils”. What is meant by these objects?]

1. By food and drink (annapāna) we understand briefly ‘[mouthfuls] of food which is twofold, coarse or subtle’ (kavaḍḍikārāhāra audārikaḥ sūkṣmaś ca).³²⁸ on the one hand, cakes (maṇḍa), cooked rice (odana), etc.; on the other hand, the food of a hundred flavors (śatarasāhāra).

Although a sūtra says that “all beings subsist by means of the four foods” (sarvasattvāś caturāhārasthitikāḥ)³²⁹, here it is a matter of food in mouthfuls only. The other three foods, being immaterial (arūpin), cannot be passed on. Besides, if one gives food in mouthfuls, one is giving by the very ³²⁷ This was the case for the old woman of Śrāvastī (above, p. 541-542F).

³²⁸ Dīgha, III, p. 228, 276; Majjhima, I, p. 48, 261; Saṃyutta, II, p. 11, 13, 98, 101; Vibhaṅga, p. 402-403: Cattāro āhārā: kabalīkārō āhāro oḷārilo vā sukhuma vā, phasso duttiyo, manosañcetanā tatiyā, viññāṇaṃ catuttham. – Nidānasaṃyukta, p. 190; Daśottarasūtra, ed. K. Mittal, p. 62-63; Saṃgītisūtra, ed. K. Mittal and V. Rosen, p. 104; Mahāvīyut., no. 2283-2285: catvāra āhārāḥ: kavaḍḍikāra āhāra audārikaḥ sūkṣmaś ca, sparśo dvitīyaḥ, manaḥsañcetanā tṛtīyaḥ, viññāṇaṃ caturthaḥ. - “There are four foods: i) food as mouthfuls which is coarse or subtle; ii) food as contact; ii) food as mental activity; iv) food as consciousness.”

They are defined and explained in Visuddhimagga, p. 285; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 130, p. 674c seq.; Kośa, III, p. 119-127.

³²⁹ Saṅgītisuttanta in Dīgha, III, p. 211: Sabbe sattā āhārasthitikā, sabbe sattā saṃkhārasthitikā, ayaṃ kho āvuso tena bhagavatā jānatā passatā arahatā sammāsambuddhena eko dhammo sammadakkhāto. – All beings subsist by means of food. All beings subsist by means of conditioning. This single doctrine, O venerable ones, has been completely stated by the Blessed One who knows and who sees, the completely and perfectly enlightened One.

Anguttara, V, p. 50, 55; Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 5, 122; Khuddakapāṭha, IV; Sabbe sattā āhārasthitikā.

Saṅgītisūtra, p. 45; Daśottarasūtra, p. 55: Sarvasattvā āhārasthitayaḥ.

Kośabhāṣya, p.152: Eko dharmo bhagavatā svayam abhijñāyābhisambodhyākhyāto yad uta sarvasattvā āhārasthitikā iti.

Madh. vṛtti, p. 40: Eko dharmāḥ sattvasthititaye yad uta catvāra āhārāḥ.

fact of the other three. Why? Because food in mouthfuls strengthens (abhivardhayati) the other three as is said in the sūtra: “When the benefactor (dānapati) gives food (bhojana), he is giving five benefits to the recipients (pratigrāhaka).”³³⁰ Beverages (pāna), as they are usually called, are of two types: i) wines from plants such as the grape-vine (drakṣā), sugar-cane (ikṣu), etc.; ii) plant liquors: mead from honey (madhu), pomegranate liquor, pear liquor, etc., and all cereal liquors.

This whole grouping constitutes food and drink of humans, but there is also the food and drink of the gods, namely, nectar (sudhā), ambrosia (amṛtarasa), foods consisting of the heavenly fruits, etc., the liquor of the madhumādhava (Gaertnera racemosa), etc.

Each being has his own food: beings eat grains, meat, pure food or impure food. When they approach the bodhisattva, all are satisfied.

2. Garments (vastra) are of two kinds: i) some come from living beings such as silks (paṭṭaka), furs (roman), tanned leathers (carman), etc.; ii) others come from plants such as cottons (kārpāsa), tree bark (valkala), etc. [279a]

There are also the garments of the gods: they have no fabric and arise spontaneously (svarasena) on trees: they are brilliant in color, light and soft.

3. Bedding (śayanāsana) consist of beds (khaṭvā), coverlets (chādana), mattresses (mañcaka), curtains (vitāna) and pillows (upadhāna).

4. Ointments and perfumes (vilepanagnidha) are of two kinds: i) powdered sandalwood (candana), etc., which is put on the body; ii) all kinds of mixed perfumes that are reduced to powder (cūrṇa) and put on the body, used to perfume clothing, or put on the ground or on walls.

5. Vehicles (vāna), i.e., elephants (hastin), horses (aśva), chariots (ratha), carriages (śakaṭa), etc.

6. Houses (grha) such as dwellings (harmya), palaces (rājakula), temples (prāsāda), etc., built of earth, wood or precious objects, to protect from cold (śīta), heat (uṣṇa), wind (vāta), rain (vr̥ṣṭi), thieves (caura).

7. Lamps (dīpa), such as tallow candles, oil lamps, wax candles, luminous pearls, etc.

8. Other utensils (upakaraṇa), i.e., everything that beings have need of. As it would be impossible to mention them completely, the sūtra gathers them all together into one group.

Question. – Why does it not speak of incense, marvelous flowers, etc?

Answer. – The sūtra has already included them in speaking of ‘other utensils’.

Question. – If that is so, it should have spoken in brief about three things only: food and drink (annapāna), clothing (vastra) and adornments (alamkāra).

Answer. – The [six] things [of which the sūtra spoke] are absolutely essential. Whoever wishes the good of beings first of all gives them food and drink (annapāna); next he gives them clothing (vastra); the body being dirty and bad-smelling, he gives ointments and perfumes (vilepanagandha); then he gives bedding (śayanāsana); cold (śīta) and rain (vr̥ṣṭi) require houses (grha); finally, darkness (andhakāra) requires lamps (dīpa).

³³⁰ Sūtra of Anguttara, III, p. 42, cited above, p. 218F, n. 1; 668F, n. 2.

Question. – But the perfume of flowers (puṣpagandha) also chases away bad smells. Why does the sūtra not speak of it?

Answer. – Flowers do not last and quickly fade; their usefulness is minimal and that is why the sūtra does not speak of them. As for incense-burners, they are necessary in cold weather but difficult in hot weather. Ointments and perfumes are useful in both kinds of weather: when it is cold, they are put into water; when it is hot, they are mixed with sandalwood powder and put on the body. This is why the sūtra speaks only of ointments and perfumes.

IV. GENEROSITY INFORMED BY THE PERFECTION OF WISDOM

Question. – The person who practices the perfection of generosity (dānapāramitā) obtains immense fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) and can fulfill the wishes of all beings. Why then does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] say that in order to fulfill the wishes of beings, the bodhisattva should practice the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā)?

Answer. – As I said above, it is by union with the perfection of wisdom that generosity becomes truly ‘the perfection of generosity’. I must repeat myself here.

The wishes of the beings that it is a matter of fulfilling are not those of a single territory nor a single Jambudvīpa. The bodhisattva wants to fulfill completely the wishes of people dwelling in the universes of the ten directions and throughout the six destinies (gati). Such a task cannot be realized by simple gifts but, indeed, by the perfection of wisdom. The latter destroys the notions (saṃjñā) of near and far; it destroys the notions of what is ‘all beings’ and what is not ‘all beings’; it escapes the obstacles (āvaraṇa). This is why, in the time of a fingersnap (acchaṭāsamghātamātra), the bodhisattva creates by metamorphosis an immense body that extends everywhere in the ten directions and fulfills the wishes of all beings. Such superknowledge (abhijñā), such benefits (anuśaṃsa), necessarily have their origin in wisdom (prajñā).

This is why “the bodhisattva who wants to fulfill the wishes of all beings [279b] must practice the prajñāpāramitā.”

Sattvapratisthāpana

Third Section ESTABLISHING BEINGS IN THE SIX PERFECTIONS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 24, l. 1-5; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 73, l. 5-11). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes that all the people living in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges be established in the perfection of generosity, be established in the perfections of morality, patience, exertion, ecstasy and wisdom, should practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparaṃ, Śāriputra, bodhisattvena mahāsattvena Gaṅganadīvālukopameṣu lokadhātuṣu sattvān dānapāramitāyāṃ pratiṣṭhāpayitukāmena śīlakṣāntivīryadhyānaprajñāpāramitāsu prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. ESTABLISHING IN THE SIX PERFECTIONS

Question. – What are the reasons for the order (anukrama) adopted here [by the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra]?

Answer. – The good (hita) is of three kinds: i) the good of the present life (ihatra), ii) the good of the future life (amutra) and iii) absolute good (atyantahita). Again, there are three kinds of happiness (sukha): i) the happiness of the present life, ii) the happiness of the future life and iii) supramundane happiness (lokottarasukha). In the previous section, the sūtra spoke of the good and the happiness of the present life; here it speaks of the good and the happiness of the future life and supramundane (lokottara) good and happiness: this is why it makes sure “that beings are established in the six perfections.”

The fondness for beings of the bodhisattva surpasses the fondness of parents for their children; feelings of loving-kindness and compassion (maitrīkaruṇācitta) penetrate him even into the marrow of his bones (asthimajjā). First he fills beings with food and drink (annapāna) and drives away the torments of hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsā); then he adorns their bodies with garments (vastra) and makes them feel comfortable. But the good feelings of the bodhisattva are not fully satisfied.

Then he has the following thought: “Beings have already obtained happiness in the present life, but I am still thinking that they should obtain happiness in the future life. If I teach them the six worldly perfections (laukikapāramitā), they will enjoy happiness among humans (manuṣya) and gods (deva), but later they will return to wander in saṃsāra. Therefore I still must teach them the six supramundane perfections (lokottarapāramitā) so that they can obtain unconditioned eternal bliss (asaṃskṛtanityadukha). Moreover, I have already adorned their bodies with garments (vastra), flowers (puṣpa), perfumes (gandha), etc.; now I will adorn their minds with qualities (guṇa). If they possess the three kinds of adornments (alamkāra), they will be complete (sampanna) and faultless (nirdoṣa), namely: i) garments (vastra), the seven jewels (saptaratna),³³¹ etc.; ii) merits (punya); iii) the dharmas of the Path (mārgadharma).”

As the bodhisattva wishes to array beings with this triple adornment, [the Prajñāpāramitā] first spoke [in the preceding section] of the fruits of retribution of the qualities (guṇānāṃ vipākaphalāni); here it speaks of the causes and conditions of these qualities (guṇānāṃ hetupratyayāḥ).

Furthermore, as I previously said (p. 1944F), although they receive great gifts, beings cannot completely profit from them as a result of their sins (āpatti).

³³¹ See p. 598F, n. 2.

[Pretasūtra]. – Thus the Ngo-koue king (Pretasūtra) says: “Even if they are given food, [the pretas] are unable to eat it, for it is changed for them into glowing embers or into some impure thing.”³³²

Finally, the bodhisattva does not give anything whatsoever (na kiṃcit tyajati), but he uses skillful means (upāya) so that beings obtain clothing, food and other benefits. This is why the bodhisattva teaches them to practice meritorious actions (puṇyakarman), each before collecting himself what he has done himself. The bodhisattva knows well that [the mechanism] of causes and conditions cannot be violated and that beings must first receive his teachings in order that they [themselves] collect the fruits. This is why, according to the order (anukrama) adopted here, he teaches beings to become established in the six perfections.

II. BEINGS TO BE ESTABLISHED IN THE SIX PERFECTIONS

1. Their number

Question. – The bodhisattva wants all the beings of the ten directions to become established in the six perfections. Why then does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra here speak only of the beings populating universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges?

Answer. – For the auditors of the Dharma, the expression ‘as numerous as the sands of the Ganges’ (gaṅgānadīvālukopama) is familiar. Moreover, for a bodhisattva who has just produced the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), to speak of beings ‘infinite and innumerable’ would be too much and would throw [279c] him into confusion; on the contrary, for a great bodhisattva, the expression ‘numerous as the sands of the Ganges’ is not used by way of computation. Moreover, the expression ‘numerous as the sands of the Ganges’ also means an infinite immense number, as will be said in a later chapter. Finally, the expression ‘numerous as the sands of the Ganges’ has already been used to designate the universes of the ten directions and, as here we are not speaking of one single Ganges, there is no objection to be raised. As a result, to speak of universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges is not wrong.

On the meaning of the expression ‘universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges’, see what has been said above (p. 449–452F).

2. The various categories of beings

Beings (sattva). – The name (prajñapti) of ‘being’ is given to the five skandhas (skandha), to the eighteen elements (dhātu), to the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana), to the six elements (dhātu) [of the human body]³³³, to the twelve causes (nidāna) and to a quantity of dharmas; they are gods (deva), humans (manuṣya), cows (go), horses (aśva), etc.

³³² The preta eaters of charcoal (aṅgārabhakṣa) appear in the list of 36 categories of pretas in the Smṛtyupasthānasūtra, T 721, k. 16, p. 92b16.

There are two kinds of beings: mobile (cala) or still (śānta): the mobile ones produce physical and mental actions (kāyavākkarman), the still ones are unable to do so; material (rūpin) or immaterial (arūpin); with two feet or without feet; four-footed or multi-footed; worldly (laukika) or supraworldly (lokottara); big (mahat) or small (alpa); noble (bhadrārya) or ordinary (prthagjana).

There are beings predestined to damnation (mithyātvaniyata), predestined to salvation (samyaktvaniyata) or without predestination (aniyata); unhappy (duḥkha), happy (sukha) or neither unhappy nor happy (aduḥkhāsukha); higher (agra), middling (madhya) or lower (avara); still practicing (śaikṣa), no longer practicing (aśaikṣa) or neither one nor the other (naivaśaikṣanāśaikṣa); conscious (saṃjñā), unconscious (asaṃjñā), or neither conscious nor unconscious (naivasamjñināsamjñin); belonging to the desire realm (kāmadhātu), to the form realm (rūpadhātu) or to the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).

Beings belonging to the desire realm are of three kinds: as a result of their roots of good (kuśalamūla), they are higher (agra), middling (madhya) or lower (avara). The higher ones are the six classes of the gods of desire (kāmadeva); the middling ones are those among humans who are wealthy and noble; the lower ones are those among humans who are vile. The four continents (dvīpaka) are distinguished by differences in face.

Bad beings are also of three categories: the higher are the damned (naraka); the middling ones are the animals (tiryāṇc), the lower are the pretas.

Moreover, the beings of the desire realm are of ten types [as they are arranged] in the three bad destinies (durgati), the world of humans and the six classes of gods [of karmadhātu].³³⁴

There are three kinds of hells (niraya): the hot hells (uṣṇaniraya), the cold hells (śītaniraya) and the dark hells (lokāntarīkaniraya).³³⁵

There are three types of animals: aerial, terrestrial, or aquatic; diurnal, nocturnal or both diurnal and nocturnal; and other differences of the same kind.³³⁶

³³³ Cf. p. 1217F, n. 1.

³³⁴ This is the Sarvāstivādin–Vaibhāṣika doctrine: Kośa, III, p. 1: Narakapretatiryāṇcō mānuṣā ṣaḍ divaukasah / kāmādhātuh.

³³⁵ The hells have been the topic of a long discussion above, p. 955–968F. For further details, see the analysis of the Smṛtyupasthānasūtra in Lin, Aide-Mémoire.

As for the ‘dark hells’ of which the Traité speaks here, they are certainly lokantarikā aghā asaṃvutā andhakārā andhakāratimisā “intermediate spaces between the worlds, miserable spaces full of miseries, shadows and the darkness of the shades” where the light of the sun or the moon does not penetrate. See Dīgha, II, p. 12, 15; Majjhima, III, p. 120; Samyutta, V, p. 454; Anguttara, II, p. 130; Divya, p. 204; Mahāvastu, I, p. 41; Lalita, p. 51, 410; Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 163. – Various translations have been proposed (see Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 464, under lokāntarikā).

³³⁶ Above, p. 951–952; J. May, in Hobogirin, IV, p. 309–319, under Chikushḥ

There are two kinds of pretas:³³⁷ lecherous pretas and emaciated pretas (kṣutkṣāma). The lecherous pretas enjoy happiness like the gods but they live with the starving pretas of whom they are the leaders. The starving pretas have an enormous belly (sthūlodara) like a mountain, a mouth like the eye of a needle (sūcimukha) and consist of three things: a black skin (kṛṣṇatvac), tendons (snāyu) and bones (asthi). For innumerable hundreds of years, they have not even heard the words “food and drink” (annapāna), still less have they seen their shapes.

There are also pretas who emit fire from their mouth (ulkāmukha): flying butterflies throw themselves into this fire, and the pretas eat them. There are also pretas who eat excrement (gūtha), spit (śleṣman), pus and blood (pīyaṣonita), the water from laundry, who feed on oblations (śraddhabhokṭṛ) or who devour the afterbirth (garbhamalāhāra). There are all kinds of starving pretas of this kind.

The six classes of the desire gods (kāmadeva) are the Caturmahārājadevas, etc. Besides these six classes of gods, there are yet other gods, for example, the Wearers of necklaces, the Corrupted by Joy (kṛidāpramoṣaka), the Corrupted by Mind (manahpradūṣika),³³⁸ the Gods with birds’ feet, the Gods of pleasant looks [280a (priyadarśin?)]. These gods are included in the six classes of desire gods.

Some say that the beings of the desire realm (kāmadhātu) are of eleven types.³³⁹ Sometimes five destinies (gati) are spoken of; actually the destiny of asuras is added to that.

3. The destiny of the asuras³⁴⁰

Question. – No! The asuras are included in the five destinies; they are not gods (deva); they are not humans (manuṣya), [neither are they] the damned (nāraka) whose sufferings abound, nor animals (tiryāṇc) differing in shape (saṁsthāna): therefore these asuras should be included in the destiny of the pretas.³⁴¹ ³³⁷ Above, p. 954-955F; Lin, Aide-Mémoire, p. 16-23. – In the present passage, the Traité is very close to the Ṣaḍgatikārikās, ed. P. Mus, Six Voies, p. 248-261.

³³⁸ These are the Khiddāpadosikas and the Manopadosikas of the Pāli sources: cf. Brahmajāla (Dīgha, I, p. 19-21), and the Pāṭikasuttanta (Dīgha, III, p. 31-33). They appear also in the Saṁgūtiparyāya, T 1536, k. 9, p. 403c22-24; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 37, p. 190c18 and 22; k. 151, p. 771c1-4; Kośa, II, p. 219, and Yogācārabhūmi, part 1, p. 103.

These gods destroy their own lives by their excessive joy or anger.

³³⁹ Eleven classes by adding the category (pradeśa) of the asuras to the traditional ten classes. This is the opinion of the Traité and also of Buddhaghosa in Atthasālini, p. 62..

³⁴⁰ Here the author returns to an opinion dear to him: the separate existence of the asura destiny. To the references gathered on p. 613F, n. 1, we should add Lin, Aide-Mémoire, p. 24-29 and the article Asura in Ceylon Encyclopedia, II, p. 286-291.

³⁴¹ Limiting the destinies to the number of five, the objector places the asuras with the pretas, and the Vibhāṣā (T1545, k. 172, p. 868c16) agrees with this opinion, but as we have seen above (p. 613F, n. 1) there are other divisions.

Answer. – That is not so. The power of the asuras is equal to that of the devas. Why? Because sometimes they are vanquished by the devas and sometimes they vanquish the devas. Thus it is said in the sūtras: Śakra Devendra was vanquished by the asuras and his four armies (caturaṅginī senā) went into the hollows of lotus roots (bisamūla) to hide.³⁴²

The asuras who enjoy the five pleasurable objects (pañcakāmaguṇa) are like the devas and were disciples of the Buddha as well.³⁴³ If such is their strength (prabhāva), why would they be included among the pretas? Therefore there must be a sixth destiny (gati) [reserved specially for the asuras].

Great gods such as the asuras, kiṁnaras, gandharvas, kumbhāndas, yakṣas, rakṣasas, bhūtas, etc., are asuras, and when their troops increase, those of the devas decrease.³⁴⁴ Their power (anubhāva) and their transformations (nirmāṇa) were exercised at will (yathaccham).

³⁴² Victory of the devas and defeat of the asuras: Dīgha, II, p. 285; Majjhima, I, p. 253; Saṁyutta, IV, p. 201; V, p. 447-448; Anguttara, IV, p. 433.

Saṁyutta, V, p. 447-448: (cf. Saṁyutta, T 99, no. 407, k. 16, p. 108c-109a; Ekottara, T 125, k. 21, p. 657c26-28: Bhūtapubbaṃ bhikkhave devāsurasamgāmo samupabbūlho ahoṣi. tasmim kho pana bhikkhave samgāmo devā jiniṃsu asurā parājiniṃsu. parājitā ca kho bhikkhave asurā bhūā bhisamūlālena asurapuram pavisiṃsu devānaṃ yeva kho mohayamānā. - Once, O monks, war broke out between the devas and the asuras. In this battle, the devas vanquished the asuras. Thus vanquished, the frightened asuras went into the lotus roots in the city of the asuras, completely panic-stricken by the devas.

Victory of the asuras and defeat of the devas: Saṁyutta, I, p. 224; Anguttara, IV, p. 432.

Saṁyutta, I, p. 224: Bhūtapubbaṃ bhikkhave devāsurasamgāmo samupabbūlho ahoṣi. tasmim kho pana bhikkhave samgāme asurā jiniṃsu devā parājiniṃsu. parājitā kho bhikkhave devā apāyaṃsveva uttarena mukhā abhiyaṃsveva ne asurā. – Once, O monks, war broke out between the devas and the asuras. In this battle, the asuras vanquished the devas. Then the vanquished devas fled to the north and the asuras pursued them.

³⁴³ Above, p. 614-615F, the Traité has given, as examples of converted asuras, Punarvasu’s mother, the yakṣa Vajrapāṇi and the kiṁnara Drumā.

³⁴⁴ In the words of a sutta from Anguttara (I, p. 142-145) cited in full above (p. 832-835F), Śakra and the Trayastrimśa gods send their messengers to the world three times per month to inquire about the moral state of mankind and to find out how many men honor their mothers and fathers, the śramaṇas and brāhmaṇas, the elders of their clan, the ministers of the Caturmahārāja gods, their sons, and finally these gods themselves lead their inquiries on earth in turn on the 8th, 14th and 15th lunar days. Having gotten their information, they return to the Trayastrimśa heaven to make their reports. If the number of good men is too small, the Trayastrimśas are unhappy and cry: “To be sure, the troops of the gods will decrease and the troops of the asuras are going to increase” (dibbā vata bho parihāyissanti, paripūrissanti asurakāyā). If on the other hand, good men are many, the gods rejoice and say: “To be sure, the troops of the gods will increase and the troops of the asuras will diminish” (dibbā vata bho kāyā paripūrissanti, parihāyissanti asurakāyā). – This saying appears again in Dīgha, II, p. 208, 209, 221, 271, in the form of ‘Dibbā vata bho kāyā paripūrenti, hāyanti asurakāyā’. – In Mahāvastu, III, p. 200, l. 6-7, there is: Hāyanti āsurāḥ kāyā, divyā kāyā abhivardhanti.

The Traité has used this very ancient legend (cf. Odyssée, XVII, 485-487) in order to prove that the asuras were in a position to rival the devas.,

This is why people who are in doubt wonder: “Are these suras or are these not suras?” Sura, in the Ts’in language, indicates ‘deity’.³⁴⁵ But the time-honored expression is asura and not sura. The asura destiny is called thus because the asuras appear at the head [of a list]; the others, [namely, the kimnaras, gandharvas, kumbhāṇḍas, yakṣas, bhūtas, etc.] constitute one and the same destiny with them.

Question. –But the sūtras say that there are five destinies (pañcagati).³⁴⁶ Then why are you speaking of six destinies (ṣaḍgati)?

Answer. – Once the Buddha disappeared, the old sūtras were broadly disseminated; having been propagated for five hundred years, today they present many differences (viśeṣa) and the various schools do not agree; some assert five destinies, others assert six.³⁴⁷ Those who accept five destinies are modifying the ³⁴⁵ Read t’ien instead of ta. – Other interpretations of the word in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 172, p. 868b3-8; H8b8girin, p. 41b.

³⁴⁶ For example, Majjhima, I, p. 73: Pañca kho imā Sāriputta gatiyo, katamā pañca: nirayo tiracchānayoṇi pīṭṭivisaṇo manussā devā.

The Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 172, p. 868b2-3) on the basis of these sūtras, says: “There are schools that make the asuras into a sixth gāti: they should not say that because the sūtras speak only of five gati.”

The opinion of the Traité is diametrically opposed and has declared above (p. 616F): “The Buddha never spoke explicitly of five gatis. The five gatis are an invention of the Sarvāstivādins.”

³⁴⁷ The Hīnayāna schools that postulate five gātis (in Chinese wou ts’iu or wou tao) are three in number: the Sthaviras or Theravādins, the Sarvāstivādins and the Dharmaguptakas.

1) Theravāda. – A. Bareau, Les sects bouddhiques du Petit Véhicule, p. 223, thesis 74; Kathāvatthu, VIII, I, p. 360.

The canonical sūtras, Pāli as well as Sanskrit, of which the “Elders” appointed themselves compilers and guardians, count only five gātis:

Dīgha, III, p. 234; Majjhima, I, p. 73; Saṃyutta, V, p. 474-477; Anguttara, IV, p. 459. – Dīrgha, T 1, p. 86b28; Madhyama, T 26, p. 5999c1-3; 683c15-16; Saṃyukta, T 99, p. 108c14; 112b25; 243b8; Ekottara, T 125, p. 549b14; 563b4; 631a25; 637c22; 701a29; 723b22; 756b26; 811b1-9.

It is true, as the Vibhāṣā has it, that the sūtras speak only of five gātis. However, three passages must be mentioned where it is a matter of six gātis: Dīgha, III, p. 264; Petavatthu, p. 66; Saṃyukta, T 99, p. 44a8, but the first two are among the latest canonical scriptures and the third has no correspondent in the Pāli nikāya.

Referring al;ways to the sutta from Majjhima, I, p. 73, cited above, the Abhidharmikas, the exegetists of the canonical schools, Buddhahosa and his school accept only five gatis in the strict sense of the word: the gatigati defined “destinies to which it is necessary to go by virtue of good or bad actions” (M.A., II, p. 36: sukatadukkatakammavasena gantabbā): the Vidusshimagga, p. 471 speaks of the “retribution-consciousness, fivefold because of the destinies” (vipākaviññāṇaṃ gativasena pañcavidhaṃ).

2) Sarvāstivādin-Vaiḥbhāṣika. – The Traité (p. 616F) considers the five gatis as an invention of their school; these disciples of Kātyāyanīputra recognize only five gātis:

Ṣaṭpādābhidharma: Saṃgītiparyāya, T 1536, p.415c17; Dharmaskandha, T 1537, p. 461a13; Vijñānakāya, T 1539, p. 537b5-6; Prakaraṇapāda, p. 712b27; Jñānaprasthāna, T 1544, p. 1017a27; 1030b17.

The Vibhāṣā (T 1545) assumes five gatis (p. 358b3; 943b10) and does not accept a sixth (p. 730a4; 868b2-3; 992a9-11).

Buddhist sūtras as a result, and they assume five destinies; those who accept six destinies are modifying the text of the Buddhist sūtras as a result and are accepting six destinies. Moreover, the Mahāyāna, the Fa-houa king (Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra) speak of “beings distributed in the six destinies”,³⁴⁸ and from the viewpoint of the real meaning (abhiprāya) of the texts, there must be six destinies.

Kośa, III, p. 11-15.

3) Dharmaguptaka. – Bareau, Sectes, p. 196, thesis 18; Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, p. 951b22.

Of the schools professing six gatis (in Chinese, lieou ts’iu, or lieou tao), there are the Mahāśāṃghikas, the Andhakas, the Uttarapāthakas and the Vātsīputriyas.

1) Mahāśāṃghika. – From the evidence of their works such as the Mahāśāṃghika Vin., T 1425, 260c25; 511a11, and the Mahāvastu, I, p. 42, 337; II, p. 368.

2) Andhaka. – Bareau, Sectes, p. 94, thesis 34; Kathāvatthu, VIII, I, p. 360.

3) Uttarapāthaka. – Bareau, Sectes, p. 248, thesis 11; Kathāvatthu, VIII, I, p. 360.

4) Vātsīputrīya. – Bareau, Sectes, p. 120, thesis 36, according to Vibhāṣā, T 1545, p. 8b24, and Traité, (above, p. 616F). See also Sāṃmitīyanikāyaśāstra, T 1649, p. 470a12.

³⁴⁸ The Saddharmapuṇḍarīka generally lists six destinies (ṣaḍgati), p. 6, 9, 135, 244, 346, 372, but occasionally notes five destinies (pañcagati), p. 131. However, the Traité can hardly excuse the scriptures of the Greater Vehicle for establishing the existence of the sixth gati.

1. The Mahāyānasūtras sometimes refer to six, sometimes to five gatis as though this option was unimportant.

The most striking example is that of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā (T 223) which establishes six gatis on p. 271b8, 348c8, 584b23, but five on p. 390b29, 405a29, 409b7, 422a2. This detail has not escaped the notice of the author of the Traité who inserts the entire text of this sūtra and did not think it necessary to modify it in the four places indicated (cf. T1509, p. 675c18, 700c1, 710a19, 745a19).

The other Mahāyānasūtras show the same inconsistencies. Here only the main ones are noted with the following examples:

Avatamsaka (T 279). – Five gatis, p. 92b17, 288a13, 370b27, 396a3, 417a14, 422b25, 424c10, 426a15. – Six gatis, p. 94a9, 119b13, 170b1, 182a1, 198c16, 204b8, 256c12, 318b8.

Ratnakūṭa (T 310). – Five gatis, p. 42b27, 46b22, 217b28, 237b13, 288c9, 441a25, 460c19, 491b29, 530a20, 536b9, 658b27, 668b21. – Six gatis, p. 361a4, 370b26, 371b18, 378c26, 379a1, 382b23, 475c5, 530c2, 615c27.

Mahāsaṃnipāta (T 397). – Five gatis, p. 102a10, 181a26-27, 202a24, 226a29, 232a13, 288c5, 304a16, 397c28, 405a28. – Six gatis, 43a16, 252b18.

What is more, the two great Mahāyāna schools, the Madhyamikas and the Yogācāras, hold only five gatis.

Prasannapāda by Candrakīrti, which speaks of pañcagati saṃsāra (p.218, l. 2-3; 269, l. 9; 304, l. 4).

Śatakaśāstra by Āryadeva, T 1569, k. 1, p. 170a22, 171a8.

Prajñāpradīpa by Bhāvaviveka, T 1566, k. 10, p. 99c16.

Śikṣasamuccaya by Śāntideva, which speaks of pañcagati saṃsāra (p.91, l. 9-10) or of pañcagatika cakra (p. 176, l. 6).

Yogācārabhūmi, Part I, p. 44, l. 16-17.

Abhidharmasamuccaya by Asaṅga, p. 28, l. 25 (transl. W. Rahula, p. 46). – His Vyākhyā by Sthiramati, T 1606, K. 4, p. 713b22.

Furthermore, since the good is distinguished from the bad, there must be six destinies. The good being of superior (agra), middling (madhya) and inferior (avara) categories, there are three good destinies. Namely, the deva ‘gods’, the manuṣya ‘humans’ and the asuras. The bad being of higher, middling and lower categories, there are three bad destinies (durgati), namely the naraka, ‘damned’, the tiryāṇic ‘animals’ and the pretas. If it were not so – [i.e., if there were only five destinies] – there would be three fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) for the bad and only two fruits for the good. This would be conflicting (virodha). On the other hand, if there are six, the sense of equality is not violated.

Question. – But the good dharmas involve three fruits (phala) as well: the lower fruit is a human destiny, the middling fruit is that of deva and the higher fruit that of nirvāṇa.

Answer. – In the present subject, nirvāṇa is not included: only the abodes (avasthā) constituting fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) for beings are being distinguished. Nirvāṇa is not a fruit of retribution.³⁴⁹

The good dharmas (kuśaladharmā) are of two kinds: i) the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipākṣika) that lead to nirvāṇa; ii) the dharmas producing happiness (sukha) in the course of rebirths (punarbhava). Here we are speaking only of the good dharmas occurring in the reincarnations [280b] (ātmabhāvapratiṅmbha); we are not talking about the good dharmas leading to nirvāṇa.

The good of the mundane order (laukikakuśala) is of three categories: i) the superior category gives as fruit of retribution a deva destiny; ii) the middling category gives as fruit of retribution a human destiny; iii) the inferior category gives as fruit of retribution an asura destiny.

Question. – But you yourself just said (p. 1954F) that the asuras are equal in power to the devas and that their bliss does not differ from that of the devas. Why do you now say that the good of the lower category gives as fruit of retribution an asura destiny?

Answer. – Among humans (manuṣya), it is possible to go forth from home, take up the precepts (śīla) and thus arrive at bodhi; in the destiny of the asuras, the fetters (saṃyojana) cover the mind and it is very difficult to arrive at bodhi. Although they are inclined towards the fetters, the devas have right mind and believe in bodhi; the asuras, whose minds, however, are bad and twisted, seldom come near to bodhi. This is why, although they are similar to the devas, it is hard for the asuras to come near to bodhi and this is why they are also inferior to humans. Just as the nāga kings (nāgarāja) and the birds with golden wings (garuḍa), despite their great power (anubhāva) and their power of transformation, belong to the animal destiny (tiryaggatī), so the asuras [belong to a good destiny, but one which is of lower order].

Question. – If the nāga kings and the birds with golden wings, despite their great power, are ranked in the animal destiny, the asuras in turn should be ranked in the preta destiny. Why are you still making a sixth destiny?

Answer. – The nāga kings and the birds with golden wings, even though they too enjoy bliss, walk horizontally³⁵⁰ and resemble animals in shape; this is why they are classed in the animal destiny. Although they are shaped like humans, the damned (nāraka) undergo great suffering; this is why they are not placed in the human destiny. As for the asuras, their power is great and their shape is like that of humans and gods; this is why they are placed separately in a sixth destiny.

All this is said in summary. For the beings of the desire realm (kāmadhātu), the form realm (rūpadhātu) and the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu), see the following chapters.³⁵¹

Pāramitāstava

III. EXHORTATIONS TO THE PRACTICE OF THE PERFECTIONS

1. Perfection of generosity

Generosity (dānaparamitā). – The bodhisattva invites beings to practice generosity:

Poverty (dāridrya) is a great suffering but it is not out of poverty that one commits evil actions (duṣkṛta) and falls into the bad destinies (durgati). It is by committing evil actions that one falls into the three bad destinies from which it is impossible to become free.

Hearing this, beings give up thoughts of avarice (mātsaryacitta) and practice the perfection of generosity as will be said at length in the following chapters.

Moreover, in the presence of beings, the bodhisattva preaches the Dharma by means of all kinds of nidānas and avadānas and criticizes avarice:

Siddhi, p. 191.

3. One can object that the Madhyamakāśāstra by Nāgārjuna commented on by Piṅgala (?) proposes six gatis. Actually, we read in T 1664, k. 4, p. 36b10-22: “Beings, enveloped by ignorance in regard to rebirth, carry out actions (saṃskāra) of three kinds. Having carried out these actions, they fall into the six destinies in accordance with them. Conditioned by these actions, consciousness assumes an existence in the six destinies.”

But the original text is known to us by the Mādyamakākārikā, XXVI, 1-2ab:

Punarbhavāya saṃskārān avidyānivṛtas tridhā / abhisamṣkurute yāṃs tair gatim gacchati karmabhiḥ // vijñānaṃ saṃniviśate saṃskārapratyayaṃ gatau /

“In view of rebirth, the being, enveloped in ignorance, carries out actions (saṃskāra) of three kinds, and by these actions, goes to his destiny. The consciousness conditioned by these actions goes to its destiny.”

In the places where the original speaks of destiny in general, the translator, in this case Kumārajīva, speaks of six destinies. The Serindian master sometimes takes liberties with the texts.

³⁴⁹ Nirvāṇa, being asaṃskṛta by definition, unconditioned or uncreated.

³⁵⁰ According to etymology tiriyam āñchitā tiracchānā (Comm. of Majjhima, II, p. 37). Hence the Tibetan translation dud hgro “that which walks bending over; opposite to man who walks upright” (S. C. Das) and the Chinese translation p’ang hing or, more often, ich’ou cheng. See also Hōbōgirin, IV, p. 310.

³⁵¹ Especially Pañcaviṃśati, p. 64 seq.

The miser, even for his personal needs, stints and spends nothing. He becomes nervous and turns red in front of beggars (yācaka). In the present lifetime, his voice (svara) and his color (rūpa) are ugly (durvarṇa). Having planted bad actions for the future (paratra), he will be left with physical ugliness; not having previously planted the seeds of generosity, he is presently miserable. The miser is attached to wealth (dhana) and his greed does not cease. He opens the gate of sin (āpattidvāra) and does especially bad things; this is why he falls into the bad destinies.

Moreover, while the wheel of transmigration (saṃsāracakra) is in movement, among the profitable actions there is none that surpasses generosity. Conveniences obtainable at will (yatheccham) in the present lifetime (iha) and in future lifetimes (amutra) all come from generosity. Generosity is the good guide [200c] that opens the doorway to the threefold happiness: heavenly happiness (divyasukha), human happiness (manuṣyasukha) and the happiness of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasukha). Why?

[Sīhasutta.]³⁵² – The reputation of the honest and generous man spreads: among the people well-disposed in the ten directions, there is no one who does not love him; in the great assembly, he is without fear (viśārada); at the moment of death, he has no fear.

This man says to himself: “I have planted³⁵³ my wealth in the good fields of merit (punyaśīla); I will certainly cross through the gate of human happiness, of heavenly happiness and the happiness of nirvāṇa.”

Why? Generosity destroys the fetter of avarice (mātsaryasaṃyojana), favors the beneficiary (pratigrāhaka), drives away malice (vyāpāda) and suppresses jealousy (īrṣya). The person who honors his beneficiary drives out his own pride (mānastambha) and, by giving with a settled mind (niyata-citta), breaks the thread of his own doubt (saṃśaya-jāla). Knowing the fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) of generosity, he drives away wrong views (mithyā-dṛṣṭi) and destroys ignorance (avidyā). Suppressing all the passions (kleśa) in this way, he opens the doorway to nirvāṇa.

Finally, he opens not only the door to the threefold happiness but also the door to immense Buddhahood and the state of Bhagavat. Why is that? Because the six perfections (pāramitā) are Buddhahood, and generosity (dāna) is the first doorway to it: the other practices (caryā) all follow from it.

These are the immense benefits (anuśaṃsa) of generosity, and for this reason the bodhisattva “wants beings to become established in the perfection of generosity”. Regarding the perfection of generosity, see what has been said above (p. 662-769F) in regard to generosity.

2. Perfection of morality

Morality (śīla). – The bodhisattva praises the practice of morality in the presence of beings:

³⁵² Anguttara, III, p. 38-41, cited above, p. 658F.

³⁵³ Adopting the variant tche in place of tche.

You, O beings, should learn to observe morality. The virtue of morality uproots the three bad destinies (durgati) and excludes a position of inferiority among men; it assures [a rebirth] among the gods, an honorable position among men and even attains the bodhi of the Buddhas.

Morality is the root of bliss (sukhamūla) for all beings. It is like a great treasure (mahānidhi) bringing pearls (maṇi) and jewels (ratna). Morality is a great protector (mahāpāla) that suppresses fears (bhaya). It is like a great army (mahāseṇa) that destroys thieves (caura). Morality is an ornament (ābharaṇa) to be worn like a necklace (keyūra, niṣka). Morality is a great ship (mahānau) capable of crossing the great ocean of saṃsāra. Morality is a great vehicle (mahāyāna) capable of transporting heavy jewels to the city of nirvāṇa. Morality is the good medicine (bhaiṣajya) capable of curing the sick of their fetters (saṃyojanavyādhi). Morality is a friend (kaḷyāṇamitra) who follows you from lifetime to lifetime, never leaving you, and that assures the serenity of the mind (cittayogaśema): thus when a well is dug, as soon as wet mud is noticed, one rejoices and has no more sadness or worry. Morality perfects and improves all practices like a father and mother who are bringing up their children. Morality is the ladder of wisdom (jñānasopāna) that penetrates into purity (anāsrava). Morality terrorizes the fetters (saṃyojana) like a lion (siṃha) that captures gazelles (mṛga). Morality is the root of the qualities (guṇamūla) and the prerogative of monks. He who practices pure morality sees his aspirations (praṇidhāna) realized at will (yatheccham): it is like the cintāmaṇi that realizes all the desires of beings as soon as it is invoked.

By praising the qualities of morality thus in many ways, the bodhisattva leads beings to rejoice and make the resolution to become established in the perfection of morality.

3. Perfection of patience

Patience (kṣānti). – In the presence of beings, the bodhisattva praises patience:

Patience is the strength of all monks (pravrajita): it humbles the wicked [281a] and manifests wondrous things (āścaryavastu) in the assemblies. Patience is the guardian that watches that generosity and morality are not broken. Patience is a great armor (mahāsaṃnāha) that soldiers cannot pierce. Patience is the good medicine (bhaiṣajya) that eliminates bad poisons (viṣa). Patience is a great victory (mahājaya) that assures safety (yogaśema) and peace (anupadrava) over the dangerous paths of saṃsāra. Patience is a great treasure that gives to the poor and the unfortunate an unlimited quantity of jewels. Patience is a great boat (mahānau) that takes one from this shore (apāra) of saṃsāra to the other shore (pāra) of nirvāṇa. Patience is a file that makes the qualities shine: actually, the person who does you wrong is like a pig that by rubbing against the golden mountain increases its brilliance still further.³⁵⁴ Of the cutting tools used to seek the bodhi of the Buddhas and save beings, patience is the most admirable.

The yogin should make the following reflection: If I answer this man maliciously (vyāpāda), I am wounding myself. Besides, I too, in a previous existence, have committed such a fault; it is impossible to change it, I must necessarily atone for it. If I do not pardon this man, others will torment me again and I will be unable to escape from them. Then why should I get angry? Moreover, if a being carried away by passion (kleśa) commits an evil deed [towards me], it is because he cannot control himself [and, knowing that, I ought to pardon him]. When a man possessed by a demon (amanuṣya) insults his physician (vaidya), the good physician limits himself to chasing away the demon and does not complain about the insults. The good yogin does the same: when a being commits an evil deed against him, he does not complain about the offense and limits himself to freeing this being from his fetters (saṃyojana). Finally, the patient man, seeing someone cursing him, acts like parents toward their son who is insulting them: he increases his affection and loves him even more.

³⁵⁴ Translation proposed with reservations.

The yogin also says to himself. If this man attacks me, it is because of actions that I myself committed in my previous lives the results of which I now must endure. If now I answer [this offense] with anger (dveṣa), I am creating new suffering for the future and when will I finally be freed from it? If I now endure this offense, I will escape the suffering forever. This is why I must not feel angry.

Condemning malice (vyāpāda) thus in many ways, the yogin produces loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) and penetrates into patience towards beings (sattvaḥkānti). Having entered into this patience, he has the following thought: According to the Dharma preached by the Buddhas of the ten directions, there is no self (ātman) and no ‘mine’ (ātmiya), it is only an assemblage of dharmas (dharmasāmagrī) designated (prajñapta) under the name of ‘a being’ (sattva). The being is like a mechanical doll (yantra): it moves and acts, but inwardly there is no master entity (svāmin). It is the same for the body (kāya): it is just an arrangement of skin (tvac) and bone (asthi) that turns with the wind of the mind; being born and perishing from moment to moment, it is impermanent (anitya), empty (śūnya) and pacified (śānta). No one is acting, no one is cursing, no one is undergoing curses for, from beginning to end, there is absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnya); it is only by error (viparyāsa) and falsehood (mṛṣā) that worldly people (prthagjana) are attached in their minds to it.

For the person who has reflected in this way, there is no being and, since the being does not exist, dharmas do not depend on anything (anapekṣa). Simple assemblages of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), they are without self nature (niḥsvabhāva). The being is an assemblage to which the name of being is wrongly given and it is the same for the dharmas. Knowing this is to enter into [281b] possession of patience in regard to things.

Having obtained this sattvaḥkānti and this dharmakānti, one attains supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi) and a fortiori yet other benefits.

Having heard these exhortations, beings “become established in the perfection of patience”.

4. Perfection of exertion

Exertion (vīrya). – Speaking to beings, the bodhisattva tells them: Do not be lazy (kuśīda), O beings. For the energetic person, there is no aspiration (prañidhāna) that is not realized. The higher qualities usually obtained are not without causes and conditions, but all of them come from exertion.

Exertion has two characteristics (lakṣaṇa): i) it gives rise to good dharmas; ii) it eliminates bad dharmas.

It also has three characteristics: i) it wants to do something; ii) it does it with exertion; iii) it does not desist.

It also has four characteristics: i) it destroys and eliminates bad dharmas that have already arisen; ii) it prevents bad dharmas that have not yet arisen from arising; iii) it makes good dharmas that have not yet arisen arise; iv) it assures the development of good dharmas that have already arisen.³⁵⁵ These are the characteristics of exertion.

Exertion contributes to the realization of all the good dharmas: thus, when fire (anala) meets with the help of wind (anila), burning is activated. And just as in this world, a strong man (dhīra) is able to cross mountains and seas, so exertion applied to the dharmas of the Path, succeeds in attaining the bodhi of the Buddhas and, a fortiori, yet other things.

Beings who hear these exhortations are “established in the perfection of exertion”.

Moreover, seeing that some beings have not yet produced [the mind] of supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi), the bodhisattva praises this anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi to them:

Among all the dharmas, it is by far the foremost and the most noble. It helps everyone. It finds the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and of the non-deceptive Dharma (avañcanadharmā). It has great loving-kindness (mahāmātrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā). It holds omniscience (sarvajñatā), the physical mark of golden color (suvarṇavarṇatā), the supreme miracles of the thirty-two major marks (lakṣaṇa) and the eighty minor marks (anuṣyañjina), the immense [anāsravaskandha] – morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā), liberation (vimukti), knowledge and vision of liberation (vimuktijñānadarśana) -, the three knowledges (tiśro vidyaḥ), the unhindered [knowledges] (pratisaṃvid), and the unhindered penetration into all dharmas.

Those who have attained it are the most venerable among all beings and have the right to the worship (pūjā) of the whole world. If the person who limits himself to mentally commemorate the Buddhas gains immeasurable indestructible immense merit (punya), what can be said of those who exercise exertion (vīrya), generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), worship (pūjā), service (paryupāsana) and respect (vandana)?

Speaking to beings, the bodhisattva again tells them: Buddha activity (buddhakārya) being like that, you must produce the mind of supreme bodhi (anuttarabodhicitta). By diligently practicing exertion and by acting in accordance with the Dharma, you will attain it without any difficulty.

Having heard these exhortations, beings produce the mind of supreme bodhi. Those who produce it do not do so in vain; they will succeed in practicing the perfection of generosity and, having practiced it, they will also practice the [281c] perfection of morality, the perfection of patience, the perfection of meditation and the perfection of wisdom. Now the practice of these five perfections is precisely the fact of the perfection of exertion.

³⁵⁵ Compare the definition of the four samyakpradhānas, p. 1123F

To those who do not produce the mind of the Mahāyāna, the bodhisattva must teach the pratyekabuddha bodhi. To those who do not have the pratyekabuddha bodhi, he teaches the development of the śrāvaka bodhi. To those who do not have the śrāvaka bodhi, he teaches the renunciation of form (rūpa) and the tasting of the calm of the formless absorptions (ā rūpyasamāpatti). To those who do not have the formless absorptions, he teaches the renunciation of desire (kāma) and to taste the many blisses of the trances (dhyāna) of the form realm (rūpadhātu). To those who do not have the dhyānas, he teaches the development of the ten good paths of action (kuśala karmapatha) and to taste the many happinesses belonging to gods and humans.

[To all, the bodhisattva says:] Do not give yourself up to empty and ineffective laziness (kausīdya). Poor people (daridra) and lowly people (itvara) are afflicted by all kinds of painful efforts, but laziness is the lowest of the faults: it destroys the benefits (anuśaṃsa) and good paths (kuśalapatha) of the present life and the future life (ihaparatra janman).

Hearing these exhortations, beings gather the good dharma and practice exertion diligently.

5. Perfection of trance

In the presence of beings, the bodhisattva praises the pure bliss (viśuddhasukha) of the trances (dhyāna) and the absorptions (samāpatti), inner bliss (adhyātmāsukha), the bliss of lordship (aiśvaryasukha), the bliss of renunciation of sin (āpattiviratisukha), the bliss of the present and the future life (ihaparatrasukha), the bliss experienced by the saint (ārya), the bliss of the Brahmadevarājas, the bliss felt by the entire body (kāyasākṣātkurtasukha)³⁵⁶, deep, solid and wonderful bliss.

[He says to beings:] Why do you cling, O beings, to the defiled bliss (aśucisukha) of the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa)? Like animals, you are tasting the defiled bliss of sins and you are abandoning the wonderful bliss [mentioned above]. If you could renounce limited bliss, you would obtain great bliss. Do you not see that the farmer sacrifices a few seeds (bīja) in order to subsequently reap great fruits (mahāphala)? The person who makes the king a moderate gift receives in return a great reward; with a small fish as bait, one captures a big fish: if the sacrifice is modest, the capture is very important. It is the same for the wise person: by rejecting worldly happiness (laukika sukha), he obtains the intense happiness of the profound dhyānas and samāpattis; having this happiness, he looks back at sensual bliss (kāmasukha) and finds it very impure (aśuci). He is like a man who has come out of prison or like a man sick with scabies (kacchū) who, once he is cured, no longer looks for the medicine.

³⁵⁶ Bliss is experienced bodily during or rather on leaving the saṃjñāveditanirodhasamāpatti: explanation of the Vaibhāṣikas and the Sautrāntikas in Kośa VI, p. 224.

Moreover, the dhyānas and samāpattis are the first gateway of true knowledge: they clarify wisdom (prajñā) and illumine the dharma. Like a lamp in a secret room, their light is very useful. The yogin who is based on the dhyānas and samāpattis attains the four immeasurables (apramāṇa), the liberations (vimokṣa), the sources of mastery (abhibhāvāyatana), the superknowledges (abhijñā), eloquence (pratibhāna) and other very profound qualities (guṇa). Possessing them fully, he is able to transform bricks and stones into cintāmaṇi and, a fortiori, into other things. There is nothing he cannot accomplish at will:

- 1) he dives into the earth as into water,
- 2) he walks on water as on the earth,
- 3) he touches the sun and moon with his hand without either being burned or frozen,³⁵⁷
- 4) he is transformed into all kinds of animals without taking on their properties,
- 5) sometimes he transforms his body and fills space with it,
- 6) sometimes he reduces it to the size of a grain of dust,,
- 7) sometimes he makes himself as light as a feather of a crane (sārasaroman),
- 8) sometimes he makes himself as heavy as a huge mountain,
- 9) sometimes he taps the earth with his toe and the heaven and the earth [282a] begin to shake like grass or leaves being shaken.

These superknowledges (abhijñā) and this power of transformation (nirmāṇaśāla) come from all the dhyānas.

Hearing these exhortations, beings “become established in the perfection of trance.”

6. Perfection of wisdom

The perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā). – The bodhisattva teaches beings to practice wisdom:

Wisdom, whose light is most brilliant, is called the ‘eye of wisdom’ (prajñācakṣus). Without this eye of wisdom, a person, even though he has a fleshly eye (māṃsacakṣus), is like a blind man (andha); although he claims to have an eye, he is no different from the animals. The person who has wisdom distinguishes by himself the beautiful (suvarṇa) from the ugly (durvarṇa) without depending on another’s teaching. The person without wisdom follows others from east to west like a cow (go) or a camel (uṣṭra) with pierced nose following its leader.

Wisdom is the foremost of all conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharma) for, cherished by the saints (āryakānta), it destroys conditioned dharma precisely. As is said in the sūtras: Of all the jewels, the jewel of wisdom (prajñāratna) is foremost.³⁵⁸ There is no further sadness or torment for the person who is established at the summit of wisdom: considering unfortunate and troubled beings, there is nothing that he does not discover except by the sword of wisdom; he breaks the passions which have had no beginning (anādikakleśa) and the shackles (tālaka) of saṃsāra.

³⁵⁷ Without being burned by the sun or the stars with hot rays (uṣṇarāśmi), or frozen by the moon or the stars with cold rays (śītarāśmi).

By the power of wisdom, one is able to perfect the six perfections, one obtains the inconceivable (acintya) immense (apramāṇa) bodhi of the Buddhas, one realizes omniscience (sravjñatā) and, a fortiori, the high qualities of the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and worldly people. When this wisdom has grown, been purified and rendered indestructible, it is called ‘perfection’.

Hearing these exhortations, beings “become established in the perfection of wisdom.”

We may add that the bodhisattva does not always preach orally: sometimes he manifests the bases of his miraculous power (ṛddhipāda) and emits rays so that beings become established in the six perfections; sometimes he resorts to many other methods and even goes so far as to exercise his activity in dreams (svapna) so that beings “awaken” and “become established in the six perfections.”³⁵⁹

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra has said: “The bodhisattva who wishes that beings become established in the six perfections must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Akṣayaṃ kuśalamūlam

Fourth Section PLANTING INEXHAUSTIBLE ROOTS OF GOOD

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 24, l. 5-7; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 73, l. 11-14). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to plant even one single root of good in the field of merit of the Buddhas and make it inexhaustible until he accedes to supreme complete enlightenment must practice the perfection of wisdom (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvenaikam api kuśalamūlaṃ buddhānāṃ puṇyakṣetre varopitukāmena tac cākṣayaṃ kartukāmena yāvad anuttarāyāṃ samyaksambodhāṃ abhisambodheḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. ONE SINGLE ROOT TO BE PLANTED IN THE FIELD OF THE BUDDHAS

Roots of good (kuśalamūla). – There are three roots of good: i) absence of desire (alobha); ii) absence of hatred (adveśa); iii) absence of delusion (amoha).³⁶⁰ All the good dharma derive their birth (utpāda) and their increase (ṛddhi) from the three roots of good, just as plants, trees, grasses and bushes derive their arising and growth from their roots. This is why they are called ‘roots of good’.

Here by ‘roots of good’ the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra means [not the roots of good themselves] but rather things to be offered (pūjopakaraṇa) which are the roots of good for causes and conditions, e.g., flowers (puṣpa), perfumes (gandha), lamps (dīpa) or also spiritual offerings (dharmapūjā) such as the observance of morality (śīlasamādāna), the recitation of sūtras (sūtrodgrahaṇa), etc. [Here, actually, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] is metaphorically designating the effect by the cause (kārye kāraṇopacārah).³⁶¹ Why is that? Perfumes and flowers are morally indeterminate (aniyata); they must be offered with a good intention (kuśalacitta) to really be roots of good. [In itself] the gift (dāna) is not meritorious (puṇya): it [282b] is only when it destroys avarice (mātsarya) and opens the door to the good dharma that it is a root of good and qualifies as meritorious. Thus, the needle (sūci) guides the thread (sūtra) and sews the garment, but the sewing is not the needle.

[Here the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is speaking about] a “single root of good”, one flower, one perfume, one lamp, one ceremony, one recitation of a sūtra, one observance of morality, one trance (dhyāna), one wisdom (prajñā), etc. Taken one by one, these material offerings (pūjā) and these spiritual offerings (dharmapūjā) are planted (avaropita) in the Buddha field.

The ‘field of the Buddhas’ (buddhakṣetra) is the Buddhas of the ten directions and the three times. Whether it is a matter of one Buddha present in the world, one statue (pratimā), one relic (śarīra) or simply one recollection (anusmṛti) of a Buddha, one is planting it (avaropayati) in the sense that one’s mind is being firmly attached to it.

Question. – The sūtras mention many fields of merit (puṇyakṣetra);³⁶² why is it a question here of planting in the field of the Buddhas only?

Answer. – Although there are many fields of merit, the Buddha is the foremost field of merit because he has the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā) and innumerable Buddha attributes of the same type. That is why it is a matter here of planting only in “the field of the Buddhas”. It is true that the Jewel of the Dharma is the Buddha’s teacher (buddhācārya), but if the Buddha did not preach the Dharma, this Jewel would be unused. In the same way, although there are good medicines (bhaiṣajya), if there are no good physicians (vaidya) to prescribe them, they would be unused. This is why, although the Jewel of the Dharma is superior, we always mention the ³⁵⁸ Unidentified passage, but the images called forth are canonical: for the Saṃyutta, I, p. 36 and 37, and Udāna, VI, st. 4, wisdom is the jewel of men (paññā narānaṃ ratanaṃ), and the heroes of the Theragāthā, st. 1094, hope to cut the creeper of thirst by taking up the pointed sword of wisdom (paññāmayam tikhiṇam asim gahetvā).

³⁵⁹ The oratorical skills of the bodhisattva are the results of his pratibhānapratīsamvid; see p. 1623-1624F.

³⁶⁰ Dīgha, III, p. 214; Majjhima, I, p. 47; Anguttara, I, p. 203: Tiṇi kuśalamūlāni: alobho kuśalamūlaṃ, adoso kuśalamūlaṃ, amoho kuśalamūlaṃ. – Nidānasamyukta, p. 189: Trīni kuśalamūlāni / alobhaḥ kuśalamūlam / adveśo ‘mohaḥ kuśalamūlam /

³⁶¹ Other examples of upacāra, above, p. 1932F, n. 1.

³⁶² References in Śūraṅgamasamādhisūtra, transl. p. 231-233, note.

[Jewel of the] Buddha (buddharatna) first and a fortiori, [only third], the Jewel of the Community (saṃgharatna).³⁶³

Moreover, the field of the Buddhas produces immense fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) whereas the fruits produced by the other fields, immense though they are, are indeed inferior. This is why the field of the Buddhas is placed first.

II. ‘INEXHAUSTIBLE’ ROOT

[The bodhisattva wants the root of good that he is planting in the field of the Buddhas] ‘to be inexhaustible’ (akṣaya). The Buddhas are endowed with inexhaustible qualities (akṣaya-guṇa);³⁶⁴ this is why the merits that are planted therein are also inexhaustible.

Moreover, since the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddhas are immense (apramāṇa), infinite (ananta), innumerable (asaṃkhyeya) and unequalled (asama), the merits that are planted therein are also inexhaustible.

Moreover, when the Buddha was still a bodhisattva, he had in mind the universality of beings (sarvadattva). But these beings are immeasurable and infinite [in number]. Therefore his merit also was inexhaustible.

Finally, the field of the Buddhas is very pure (pariśuddha), for all the dirty weeds of the passions (kleśa), craving (tṛṣṇā), etc., have been uprooted. Pure morality (viśuddhaśīla) is its leveled soil; great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā) are its beauties; it is free of poor brackish fields; the thirty-seven auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipāṅkṣika) are its canals; the ten powers (bala), the ³⁶³ Respective value of the Three Jewels, in the order: Buddha, Dharma, Saṃgha, of which the first and the third constitute puṇyakṣetras.

Theoretically the Dharma is superior to the Buddha. Shortly after his enlightenment, Śākyamuni began to search for a teacher to venerate, respect and serve, but not finding one anywhere, he decided to take as teacher the Dharma that he had discovered (cf. Gāraṇa sūtra, Saṃyutta, I, p. 138-140; Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 1188, k. 44, p. 321c18-322a7; T 100, no. 101, k. 5, p. 410a3-b8; Traité, p. 586F). If the Buddha appears at the head of the Three Jewels, it is because he is the physician (vaidya), the Dharma is the medicine (bhaiṣajya) and the Saṃgha, the patient (upasthāyaka), as has been said above (p. 1393F, n. 1). Although it effects the cure, the medicine is lower than the physician, for without the latter, it would neither be prescribed nor applied.

There remains to be known in which buddhakṣetra one should plant preferentially. Here the sūtras differ: according to the Majjhima, III, p. 254, l. 27-29, gifts should be made first of all to the Buddha, but the latter on several occasions (Anguttara, III, p. 286, l. 7-9) has given the Saṃgha of disciples as the buddhakṣetra par excellence (anuttara). Hence divergences among the Buddhist sects, described above p. 1400F, n. 1.

A related problem is the taking of refuge (śaraṇagamana) in the Three Jewels; cf. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Documents d’Abhidharma, MCB, I, 1931-32, p. 64-109.

³⁶⁴ Adopting the variant pou-tsin.

four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid), etc., are its great walls; it produces the three Vehicles (yānatraya), nirvāṇa and the fruits of ripening (vipākaphala). Whoever plants in this peerless (anuttara) and unequalled (asama) field reaps inexhaustible merit.

Question. – However, all the conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmā), having impermanence as their nature (anityalakṣaṇa), all end up in being exhausted (kṣaya). How then could merit (puṇya), the result of causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpanna), be inexhaustible (akṣaya)?

Answer. – [The Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] here does not say that it is always inexhaustible, but rather that it is inexhaustible during the interval of time [that it takes for the bodhisattva] to become Buddha.³⁶⁵

Moreover, although they arise and perish from moment to moment, the conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmā) are inexhaustible (akṣīṇa) insofar as their series (saṃtāna) is not cut and the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) is not lost. It is like the lamp (dīpa) which, although its successive flames arise and are extinguished [from instant to instant], is not said to be “extinguished”: it is necessary that the tallow (medas) be melted and the wick (vartī) be consumed for the lamp to be ‘extinguished’. It is the same for merit: resolutely planted (adhyāśayenāvaropita) in an excellent field, it remains non-extinguished (akṣīṇa) until the disappearance of things (dharmakṣaya). [282c]

Finally, the Bodhisattva knows that the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas is inexhaustible (akṣaya), like nirvāṇa. But the merit (puṇya) is part of to the true nature of the dharmas, therefore it too is inexhaustible.

If that is so, nirvāṇa being inexhaustible, merit too should be always inexhaustible. Why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] say that it remains inexhaustible during the interval of time [required for the bodhisattva] to become Buddha?

Answer. – By the power of the wisdom (prajñābala) [that it inspires], this merit becomes a quality (guṇa) ‘comparable to nirvāṇa’: absolutely empty (atyantaśūnya), unborn (anutpāda) and unceasing (anirodha). This is why it is compared to nirvāṇa, but it is not nirvāṇa.³⁶⁶ If it were confused with nirvāṇa, one would be unable to establish a comparison (upamāna) [between this merit and nirvāṇa]. If it were really nirvāṇa, then what would this fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) that remains indestructible consist of when one becomes Buddha?

This can be compared to the three gates of deliverance (vimoṣamukha), namely, emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apranihita).

³⁶⁵ The passage of the Pañcaviṃśati commented on here says textually: yāvad anuttarāyāṃ samyaksaṃbodhāv abhisambodheḥ; literally: “until the great awakening [of the bodhisattva] into supreme complete enlightenment”.

³⁶⁶ The merit that consists of planting a root of good, i.e., an offering, in the field of Buddha is so great that, while being renewed from moment to moment, it lasts until arriving at Buddhahood. If it disappears at that moment, it is because this merit is the result of causes and conditions and, as conditioned (saṃskṛta), it must finally perish. This merit may be compared to nirvāṇa, but nirvāṇa which, by definition, is unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), escapes all destruction, as well as all production. It is not a fruit of retribution.

Just as deliverance (vimokṣa) has absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā) as nature, so the śūnyatā-vimokṣamukha considers the world to be absolutely empty. – Just as deliverance (vimokṣa) has the absence of nature (ānimitta) as nature, so also the ānimitta-vimokṣamukha considers the world to be without nature. – Just as deliverance (vimokṣa) has wishlessness (apraṇihita) as nature, so also the apraṇihita-vimokṣamukha considers the world as excluding any wishing.

[In summary,] just as the three gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha) are like deliverance (vimokṣa) but are not deliverance, so the merit planted in the field of the Buddhas is like nirvāṇa but is not nirvāṇa.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here: “The bodhisattva who wants to plant even one single root of good in the field of merit of the Buddhas and make it inexhaustible until he accedes to supreme complete enlightenment must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

CHAPTER XLVII PRAISES MADE BY THE BUDDHAS

First Section WINNING THE PRAISES OF THE BUDDHAS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 24, l. 7-8; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 73, l. 14-74, l. 16). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes that the Buddhas of the ten directions praise him must practice the perfection of wisdom (Ye daśasu diṁṣu buddhā bhagavantas te me varṇaṃ bhāṣerann iti bodhisattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Bodhisattvavarṇa

I. CONVENTIONAL NATURE OF THE DESIRE FOR PRAISE

Question. – Considering the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnatā) of dharma and inwardly being free of egoism (ahaṃkāra), the bodhisattva has already destroyed all pride (mānastambha); why would he still want the Buddhas to praise him? Besides, it is the rule among bodhisattvas to pay homage to the Buddhas; why would he expect the Buddhas to pay homage to him in return?

Answer. – The Buddhist system has two gates (mukha): i) the gate of absolute meaning (parāmārtha); ii) the gate of conventional meaning. Conventionally, the bodhisattva wants the Buddhas to praise him, but when he is praised by the Buddhas, he does not see [in himself] any substantial self (ātman) and does not grasp any nature of existence (na sattvanimuttam udgrhṇāti). It is purely a manner of speaking (lokaprajñati), therefore, that the sūtra expresses itself thus.

Are you wondering why the bodhisattva “would expect in return that the Buddhas would pay homage (pūjā) to him?” In a subsequent chapter,³⁶⁷ the bodhisattva praised by the Buddhas is the bodhisattva “completely non-regressing in his course towards supreme complete enlightenment” (atyantāvinivartanīyo 'nuttarāyāḥ samyaksaṃbodheḥ). In the present case, this bodhisattva wishes to know with certainty (niyatam) if he is or is not non-regressing. This is why he seeks the ‘praise’ (varṇa) of the Buddhas but does not seek their ‘homage’ (pūjā).

II. VALUE OF THE PRAISES GIVEN BY THE BUDDHAS

³⁶⁷ Chapter LV of the Pañcaviṃśati (T 223, k. 16, p. 339a8-341b6) entitled Pou t'ouei p'in (Avinivartanīyaparivarta).

Furthermore, other people, other beings, whose minds are clouded by lust (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha), are unable to praise in accordance [283a] with the truth. Why? If they have the tendency to love, they do not see the real defects (doṣa) and they see only the qualities (guṇa); if they have the tendency to hate, they see only the defects and do not see the qualities; if delusion is predominant in them, they are incapable of really discerning the beautiful (suvarṇa) from the ugly (durvarṇa).

Gods and humans have a [certain] wisdom (prajñā) and the threefold (triviṣa) poison is subdued (tanu) in them; however, they too are incapable of praising in accordance with the truth. Indeed, they are still subject to error (vañcana), they do not have omniscience (sarvajñatā) and their fetters are not broken (asamucchinnasamyojana).

The śrāvakas³⁶⁸ and pratyekabuddhas, while they have eliminated the threefold poison, they too cannot praise in accordance with truth for they have not yet exhausted all the traces of passion (vāsanā) and, in addition, their wisdom (prajñā) is not perfect (sampanna).

The Buddha alone has definitively destroyed the three poisons and their traces (vāsanā) and his omniscience (sarvajñatā) is complete. This is why he can praise in accordance with the truth, without exaggerating or minimizing (anūnādhikam). Consequently the yogin wants to obtain the praise of the Buddhas in order to know his real qualities. He does not seek the praise of other people.

III. ALTHOUGH NON-EXISTENT, THE BODHISATTVA MERITS SPECIAL PRAISES

Question. – “The Buddhas born into the threefold world are detached from the world”³⁶⁹ and for them there is neither ‘me’ (ātman) nor ‘mine’ (ātmīya). They consider that the heretics (tīrthika) and bad people on the one hand and the great bodhisattvas and arhats on the other hand are equal and no different. Why then do they praise the bodhisattva?

Answer. – Although the Buddhas are without egotism (ahaṃkāra), without aversion (pratigha) or affection (anunaya), although their minds are detached from all the dharmas, they have pity on beings and guide them all by means of feelings of great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā). This is why they distinguish honest men and praise them. They also want to destroy the evil Māras.

What the Buddhas wish by praising [the bodhisattva] is that innumerable beings should love the bodhisattva, respect him, honor him, and then all attain the bodhi of the Buddhas. This is why the Buddhas praise the bodhisattva.

³⁶⁸ Here, these are the śrāvakas who have attained arhathood.

³⁶⁹ Compare Saṃyutta, III, p. 140; Anguttara, II, p. 39: Tathāgato [loke jāto] loke samvaddho lokaṃ abhibhūya viharati anupaliṭṭo lokena.

Question. How do they praise him?

Answer. – The Buddhas who preach the Dharma in the great assembly and want people to penetrate into the very profound Dharma (atigambhīradharma) praise the bodhisattvas such as, for example, Sa-t’o po-louen (Saddāprarudita),³⁷⁰ etc.

Moreover, the Buddhas who praise the bodhisattva express themselves in this way.³⁷¹

1) The bodhisattva is able to contemplate the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā) of dharmas and can also have great loving-kindness and great compassion for beings.

He is able to practice patience in regard to beings and also to not see beings.

Even though he practices patience towards things (dharmakṣānti), he experiences no attachment (abhiniveśa) for all these things.

Although he sees the events of past lifetimes (pūrvanivāsa), he does not fall into the wrong view of the earlier time (pūrvānta).

Although he sees beings enter into nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa), he does not fall into the wrong view of the later time (aparānta).³⁷²

While knowing that nirvāṇa is the peerless (anuttara) true dharma, he still accomplishes good bodily, vocal and mental actions (kāyavānmanaskarman).

While traveling through saṃsāra, he resolutely (adhyāśayena) loves nirvāṇa.

³⁷⁰ References above, p. 1353F, n. 1.

³⁷¹ Explanation dedicated to the “double life” of bodhisattvas: the practice of the pāramitās by the method of non-abiding: asthānayogena (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 18, l. 7-15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 56, l. 1-9); the path of the twofold practice of skillful means and the truth (Avatamsaka, T 279, k. 56, p. 296v22-297c3); the “deviations” (agati) of the bodhisattva (Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, transl. p. 285-289).

³⁷² The wrong views of earlier time and later time, i.e., relating to the past and the future, have already been condemned by the canonical texts where it is said that the learned noble disciple (śrutavān āryaśravaka) does not concern himself with them. Whereas the Pāli sutta (Saṃyutta, II, p. 26-27) asks a question to which it replies in the negative: Netaṃ thāṇṇi vijjati, the Sanskrit sūtra (Nidānasamyukta, p. 150-151) and its Chinese version (T 99, k. 12, p. 84b17-c1) expresses itself directly in the negative form:

Sa na pūrvīṭaṃ pratisarati / kin nv aham abhūvam atīte ‘dhvani / aho svin nāham atīte ‘dhvani / ka nv aham abhūvam atīte ‘dhvani / kathaṃ nv aham abhūvam atīte ‘dhvani / Aparāntaṃ vā na pratisarati / ko nu anāgate ‘dhvani / kathaṃ nu bhaviṣyāmy anāgate ‘dhvani /

This [noble learned disciple] does not care about previous time by asking: What was I in the past? Or else, was I not in the past? Who was I in the past? How was I in the past?

He does not care about later time by asking: What will I be in the future? Or else, will I not be in the future? Who will I be in the future? How will I be in the future?

While abiding in the three gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha) and contemplating nirvāṇa, he does not violate his earlier vows (pūrvapranidhāna) or his good practices (kuśalacaryā). The many extraordinary qualities are very difficult to find.

2) Furthermore, when the bodhisattva has not yet obtained the acquiescence that dharmas do not arise (anutpādaḥkānti) or the five superknowledges (abhijñā), his fleshly body of birth-death (samsāramāṃsakāya or cyutyupapādasāṃsakāya) has feelings of great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā) [283b] for beings, and he distributes completely his most precious inner (adhyātmika) and outer (bāhya) goods: his outer goods, such as his dearly loved wife and children, five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) of great value, pacified lands, etc.; his inner goods, such as his body (kāya), flesh (māṃsa), skin (tvac), bones (asthi), blood (lohita), head (śiras), eyes (nayana), marrow (majjan), skull (mastaka), ears (śrota), nose (nāsā), hands (pāṇī), feet (pāda), etc. Such things are very rare (durlabha). This is why the Buddhas praise the virtues of this bodhisattva.

3) When the bodhisattva has entered into his position assured of attaining enlightenment (dharmanīyāma) and possesses the superknowledges (abhijñā), he devotes himself to the austerities (duṣkaracaryā) without ever getting tired of the difficulties. In this bodhisattva, the body of birth (janmakāya), the fleshly eye (māṃsacakṣus) and the aptitudes (abhiprāya) are very extensive. He has feelings of great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and he loves the bodhi of the Buddhas. Such feats are very extraordinary (adhbhuta).

4) Furthermore, when the bodhisattva is endowed with the purity of morality (śīlasuddhisampanna), he no longer distinguishes between morality (śīla) and immorality (dauḥśīlya).³⁷³ In the face of dharmas absolutely without birth (atyantānutpanna) and always empty (sadāśūnya), his dharmakṣānti and his exertion (vīrya) are unceasing. He has neither attraction nor aversion. [To his eyes] exertion (vīrya) and laziness (kausīdya) are of the same nature (ekalakṣaṇa) and no different.³⁷⁴ For immense (paramāṇa) infinite (ananta) and incalculable (aśaṃkhyeya) kalpas, he has practiced exertion diligently and, in general, he takes up and practices the most profound concentrations (gambhīrasamādhi), but without being attached to them, for concentrations (samādhi) and distraction (vikṣepa) are no different.³⁷⁵ Without leaving concentration, he creates for himself (nirmimīte) an immense body that fills the ten directions completely, preaches the Dharma and saves people.

5) Applying profound wisdom (gambhīraprajñā), he considers all dharmas as anutpanna-aniruddha “unborn and undestroyed”, not anutpanna-aniruddha, both anutpanna-aniruddha and non-anutpanna-aniruddha, neither anutpanna-aniruddha and non-anutpanna-aniruddha;³⁷⁶ beyond all speech

³⁷³ See above, p. 770F and 861F.

³⁷⁴ See above, p. 981F

³⁷⁵ See preceding note.

³⁷⁶ In the muddle of the Chinese negations, we seem to recognize here one of the terelemmas (catuṣkoṭi) of which the Madhyamika logic is fond (see above, p. 155F). On this mode of argumentation (A, non-A, A and non-A, neither A nor non-A), see J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 16; S. Schayer, Ausgewählte Kapitel aus der Prassanapadā, Cracow, 1931, p. xxxv-xxvi.

(sarvavādasamatikrānta); inalterable, indestructible ungraspable; realm of the saints (āryāṇām gocarah) and pure like nirvāṇa. But the bodhisattva is no longer attached to these considerations and [thus] his mind does not weaken (nāvalīyate). By this wisdom he is able to assure his own good (svahita). It is this bodhisattva that the Buddhas praise.

6) Furthermore, when the bodhisattva³⁷⁷ has not obtained the prediction (vyākaraṇa), has not obtained the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti), has not met the Buddhas and has not seen the saints (bhadrārya), he is able, by means of right thought (samyaksaṃkalpa) to contemplate the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and, while contemplating this true nature, his mind is not attached to it. The Buddhas of the ten directions together praise this bodhisattva.

7) Furthermore, when he hears speak of the very profound (gambhīra) immense (apramāṇa) infinite (ananta) and inconceivable (acintya) Buddha attributes, even though he has not yet himself obtained wisdom, the bodhisattva can believe strongly in these attributes without feeling any doubt (vicikitsā). If Māra, changed into buddha, came to create doubt in him, the mind of the bodhisattva would show neither high nor low (anūnānadhika). This bodhisattva is praised by the Buddhas.

8) There are also bodhisattvas who, from their first production of the mind of bodhi (bodhicittotpāda), immediately become buddhas.³⁷⁸ The Buddha praises them for they have great power of exertion (mahāvīryabala).

Thus, when the [future] Buddha Śākyamuni and the bodhisattva Maitreya simultaneously produced the mind of bodhi (cittotpāda), the Buddha Śākyamuni, by the power of is exertion, crossed over nine kalpas [over the hundred that he normally would have had to course through].³⁷⁹ [283c] 9) Finally, there are bodhisattvas who are endowed with bodhisattva attributes, namely, the ten bhūmis, the six perfections (pāramitā), the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid), the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmas) and innumerable pure Buddha attributes.³⁸⁰ However, for beings, they remain in samsāra for a long time and, without taking

³⁷⁷ It is a matter here of a bodhisattva who has not yet reached the eighth bhūmi.

³⁷⁸ These are upapadyaparinirvāyin bodhisattvas who attain saṃbodhi at the moment when they produce the mind of bodhi. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 66, l. 4-7 defines them as follows: Santi bodhisattvā mahāsattvā ye prathamacittotpādenaivānuttarāṃ samyaksambodhim abhisambudhyante, dharmacakram pravrttayanty aprameyāṇām aśaṃkhyeyāṇām satvānāṃ cārtham kṛtvā nirupadhiṣeṣe nirvāṇadhātau parinirvānti, teṣāṃ parinirvṛtānāṃ kalpaṃ vā kalpāvaśeṣaṃ vā saddharmas tiṣṭhati. ity upapadyaparinirvāyī.

They correspond to the upapadyaparinirvāyin anāgāmins of the early Buddhism who attain nirvāṇa on taking rebirth (see Kośa, iii, p. 38).

³⁷⁹ The simultaneous cittotpāda of the future Buddha and Maitreya has already been told above. For parallel sources, see p. 252F, n. 2 and also Kośabhāṣya, p. 267, l.11-17. For the nine kalpas skipped (pratyudāvarita) by Śākyamuni, see p. 252F, n. 1. The question of ‘skipping’ has been treated by J. May in detail, HbBggirin, IV, p. 353-360, see under chßjß.

³⁸⁰ Note that the balas, vaśitas, vaiśāradyas and āveṇikadharmas of the bodhisattvas are not the same as those of the Buddhas: cf. Mahāvvyut., chaps. XXVI to XXIX. Here it is a matter of the bodhisattva of the tenth bhūmi.

up supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksambodhi), they save beings widely.³⁸¹ The Buddhas praise these bodhisattvas. Who are they? They are, for example, Wen-chou-che-li (Mañjuśrī), P'i-mo-lo-kie (Vimalakīrti), Kouan-che-yin (Avalokiteśvara), Ta-che-tche (Mahāsthāmaprāpta), Pien-ki (Samantabhadra). These leaders among the bodhisattvas appear in the threefold world (traidhātuka), create for themselves innumerable bodies by transformation, enter into saṃsāra and convert beings. From such exploits (adbhuta) comes the entire very profound prajñāpāramitā.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here: “The bodhisattva who wishes to obtain the praises of the Buddhas must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

³⁸¹ The best-known bodhisattvas of legend and worship are precisely those who retard their entry into parinirvāṇa indefinitely in order to dedicate themselves to the welfare and happiness of beings. The Traité here cites six with Mañjuśrī in first place. Like that of all bodhisattvas, his career is encapsulated between two crucial moments: i) the production of the mind of enlightenment (bodhicittotpāda) or the grand resolution (adhyāśaya) of becoming buddha; ii) the arrival at supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksambodhi).

According to the Mañjuśrībuddhakṣetrāgavyūha (T 318, k. 2, p. 896c-899b; T 310, k. 59, p. 345b-347c; T 319, k. 2-3, p. 912b-915b; OKC 760, no. 14), - formerly – kalpas as numerous as the sands of 70 myriads of an incalculable number of Ganges – the Tathāgata Megasvara appeared in the east, in the Anutpāda universe, separated from ours by 72 nayutas of Buddha fields.

It was in the presence of this Buddha and in this universe that a religious king named Ākāśa produced the mind of enlightenment and formulated his vows and intentions in words the original of which appeared in Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 14:

Nāhaṃ tvaritarūpeṇa bodhiṃ prāptum ihotsahe / parāntakoṭiṃ sthāsāmi satvasyaikasya kāraṇāt // kṣetraṃ viśodhayisyāmi aprameya, acintiyam / nāmadheyam kariṣyāmi daśa dikṣu ca viśrtam //

“I have no eagerness to attain enlightenment and I shall remain here below as long as there will remain one being to be saved. I will purify an immense inconceivable field and I will make my name famous in the ten directions.”

This king Ākāśa was none other than the actual bodhisattva Mañjuśrī. Kalpas as numerous as the sands of 70 myriads of Ganges ago, he produced for the first time the mind of enlightenment; kalpas as numerous as the sands of 64 Ganges ago he obtained the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anupattikadharmakṣānti) and acceded thus to the eighth bhūmi. Now that he has become a great bodhisattva of the tenth bhūmi, he has no thought of entering into parinirvāṇa.

It is only after an incalculable number of incalculable periods that he will attain supreme complete enlightenment. In the Vimala universe of the southern direction, he will be the buddha Samantadarśin, so called “because he will make himself visible everywhere in the innumerable hundreds of thousands of hundred thousands of nayutas of buddhakṣetras.” – The legend of Mañjuśrī may be taken as typical and its framework useful for all the great bodhisattvas with slight modifications of time and place.

That of Vimalakīrti is less detailed; see, however, the Sūtraṃgamasamādhisūtra, transl. p. 191-192, n. 181.

Lokadhātūpasamkramaṇa

Second Section ACCEDING TO INNUMERABLE UNIVERSES

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 27, l. 4-7; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 74, l. 16-75, l. 19). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes, in one single production of mind, to go to universes in the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparāṃ, Śāriputra, bodhisattvena mahāsattvena, ekacittotpādenadaśasū dikṣu gaṅgānādīvālukopamān lokadhātūnūpasamkramitukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. MAGICAL POWERS OF MULTIPLICATION AND DISPLACEMENT

The bodhisattva who has acquired the power of transformation of bodies (kāyanirmāṇabala) creates for himself bodies as numerous as the sands of the Ganges of the ten directions and goes simultaneously to universes of the ten directions also as numerous as the sands of the Ganges.

Question. – A sūtra says: “In one single fingersnap, there are sixty moments” (acchaṭmātreṇa ṣaṣṭiḥ kṣāṇā atikrāmantī).³⁸² It is already incredible that in a single instant the bodhisattva is able to go to universes of a single direction as numerous as the sands of the Ganges; what can be said then if he goes to universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges? In such a short time, the destinations are truly too numerous!

Answer. – A sūtra says: “There are five incomprehensible (acintya) things, namely: i) the number of beings; ii) the retribution of action (karmavipāka); iii) the power of a person in meditation (dhyāyabala); iv) the power of the nāgas; v) the power of the Buddha. Of these five incomprehensible things, the power of the Buddha is the most incomprehensible.”³⁸³

³⁸² The Ābhidharmikas hesitate between 60, 64 or 65 moments:

Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 136, p. 701b14: In the time that a strong man snaps his fingers, there are 64 kṣaṇa.

Kośabhāṣya, p. 176, l. 13-14: Balavatpurūṣācchaṭmātreṇa pañcaṣaṣṭiḥ kṣāṇā atikrāmantī

Ābhidhārmikāḥ.

Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 32, p.521c13-14: 65 kṣaṇa.

Madh. vṛtti, p. 547: Balavatpurūṣāddhaṭmātreṇa pañcaṣaṣṭiḥ kṣāṇā atikrāmantīti pāṭhāt.

³⁸³ See references above, p. 1639F, n. 1.

The bodhisattva in profound concentrations (gamnbhūrasamādhi) produces incomprehensible superknowledges (acintyābhijñā) and by means of them, in a single moment, goes everywhere in the Buddha universes of the ten directions.

As has been said (p. 329-330F, 1819-1820F) in regard to the four magical powers of movement (gamanaṛddhi), only the Buddhas and bodhisattvas have the magical powers (rddhiabhijñā) of moving at the speed of thought (manojavā gati). As soon as the chick of the bird with golden wings (garuḍa) comes out of its shell, it goes from Sumeru to Sumeru. It is the same with the bodhisattvas; by the power of their conviction of the non-arising of things (anutpādakṣānti) they have destroyed the passions (kleśa) and broken the egg-shell of ignorance (avidyā). From then on, in a single instant, they create innumerable bodies for themselves and go in the ten directions.

Furthermore, for the bodhisattva, all the sins (āpatti) committed during innumerable lifetimes are completely erased and, by the power of wisdom (prajñābala), he is able to transform things: to make huge that which is small and to make small that which is huge. He is able to reduce a thousand myriads of immense kalpas into a single day and to extend a single day into the space of a thousand myriads of kalpas. This bodhisattva is the master of the world (lokasvāmin) and his wishes are sovereign. What wish would not be fulfilled? Thus [284a] it is said in the P'i-mo-lo-kie king (Vimalakīrtisūtra): “The bodhisattva makes seven nights last for a kalpa”.³⁸⁴

This is why the bodhisattva, mounted on the power of the superknowledges (abhijñābalarūḍha) is able to leap quickly in the universes of the ten directions.

II. THE POWER OF THE BUDDHA IS DEPENDENT ON THAT OF THE BODHISATTVA

Question. – But the bodhisattva does not appear in the list if the five incomprehensible (acintya) things mentioned above. Why then do you mention the incomprehensible [power] of the bodhisattva here?

Answer. – Sometimes the effect is designated by the cause (kārye kāraṇopacārah), e.g., when it is said that somebody eats a hundred pounds of gold sterling each day: gold is inedible, but since it is because of gold that food can be obtained, it is said that he eats gold. Here, it is designating the effect by the cause.

But sometimes the cause is designated by the effect (kāraṇe kāryopacārah), e.g., when on seeing a fine painting, we say that it is a good artist: that is designating the cause by the effect.³⁸⁵ It is the same here for the bodhisattvas, for [in this case] the bodhisattvas are cause and the Buddhas are effect. If it is said that “the power of the Buddha is incomprehensible” (buddhabalam acintyam), we should know that that is already valid for the bodhisattva [for the bodhisattva is, in reference to the Buddha, an antecedent cause].

³⁸⁴ Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, transl. p. 254.

³⁸⁵ Examples of upacāra have already been used above: see p. 1932F, n. 1

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here: “The bodhisattva who wishes, in a single thought, to go to the universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Ekasvaratā

Third Section SPEAKING TO INNUMERABLE UNIVERSES BY MEANS OF A SINGLE SOUND

Sūtra (cf. Śatasāhasrikā, p. 75, l. 19-76, l. 22). – Furthermore, Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to emit a single sound spoken in such a way that the universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges hear this sound, must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparaṃ, Śāriputra ye daśasu dikṣu gaṅgānadīvālukopamā lokadātavaś tān sarvān ekasvaraghoṣeṇa vijñāpayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. RANGE OF VOICE OF THE BUDDHAS AND BODHISATTVAS

The bodhisattva who has acquired the six superknowledges (abhijñā) has developed the mark (lakṣaṇa) of the brahmic voice (brahmasvara) which, going beyond the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu, reaches the universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges.

Question. – If that is so, how does his voice differ from that of the Buddha?

Answer. – The voice of the bodhisattva is measured by the number of sand grains of the Ganges, whereas the range of the voice of the Buddha is unlimited (maryādā).

[Tathāgatācintyaguhyānirdeśa]. – Thus it is said in the Mi-tsi king (Guhyakasūtra): “In order to experience the Buddha’s voice, Maudgalyāyana went very far in the direction of the west, but he still heard the Buddha’s voice as if they were face to face.”³⁸⁶

Question. – So be it! But when the Buddha was dwelling in the kingdoms (rāṣṭra) and the towns (nigama) to preach the Dharma and convert the people, the inhabitants of Jambudvīpa who were not nearby did not hear him. How do we know that? Because many came from distant regions to listen to the Dharma.

³⁸⁶ Passage cited in full above, p. 560-561F.

Answer. – The voice of the Buddha is of two kinds: i) the voice hidden in the mouth (mukhagūḍhaghoṣa);³⁸⁷ ii) the unhidden (nirgūḍhaghoṣa) voice. It has just been a matter of the hidden voice; as for the unhidden voice, one must come near the Buddha to hear it.

Also, there are two kinds of disciples: i) the supramundane (lokottarikārya) saints; ii) mundane ordinary people (laukikapṛthagjana). The supramundane saints such as Maudgalyāyana, etc., are able to hear the subtle hidden voice; ordinary people hear [the unhidden voice] to the extent that they come near the Buddha.

Furthermore, the bodhisattvas who have entered into the position of salvation (samyaktvaṇiyāmāvakrānta), who have abandoned the body of birth and death (saṃsārakāya or cyutyupapādakāya) and have acquired the true body of the fundamental element (dharmadhātukāya), these bodhisattvas, I say, see the innumerable Buddha bodies of the ten directions and their brilliant rays (raśmi); they also succeed in hearing the sixty kinds of sounds (ṣaṣṭyaṅgasvara),³⁸⁸ distant and immense, uttered by the Buddhas.

[284b] Although the great bodhisattvas are not endowed with sounds like those of the Buddhas, nevertheless they have their share (aṃśa, bhāga) in these sounds of the Buddhas.

II. THE THREEFOLD VOICE OF THE BUDDHAS AND THE BODHISATTVAS³⁸⁹

The voice of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas is of three kinds:

1) Having planted the causes and conditions in their previous lives for good vocalization, they have the four subtle and marvelous (prāsādika) great elements in their throat (kaṇṭha),³⁹⁰ and they produce all kinds of marvelous sounds (śabda), distant or close, for a distance of one, two, three, ten, a hundred, a thousand li which go out to fill up the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu.³⁹¹

³⁸⁷ Adopting the variant mi-k'eu.

³⁸⁸ These are the sixty qualities of the voice of the Buddhas listed in the Mahāvīyut., no. 445-504, and the Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 79-81. See also Ekottara, T 125, k. 47, p. 805a2 (64 kinds); Lalitavistara, p. 286 (incomplete list); Pañcaviṃśati p. 234, l. 10, (ṣaṣṭyaṅgopetaḥ svarab); Avatamsaka, T 279, k. 29, p. 158c2; k. 50, [p. 266c19; Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 10, p. 55c20-56a5; k. 85, p. 486c23; k. 101, p. 566a4-5; Tathāgataguhyasūtra, T 312, k. 7, p. 719c7-720c16 (64 kinds). – For other lists of vocal qualities, see H8b8girin, p. 134 under Bonnon.

³⁸⁹ Section partially translated in H8b8girin, p. 216 under Button.

³⁹⁰ These are the subtle material (rūpaprāsāda) or derived material (upādāyarūpa or bhautika) elements constituting the five indriyas (cf. Kośa, I, p. 15, n. 1).

³⁹¹ This voice, or more precisely, this vocal apparatus, is usually acquired by means of the play of causes and conditions; the other two voices, particularly the third, are very difficult to obtain.

2) By the power of their superknowledges (abhijñābala), the four great elements (mahābhūta) of their throat produce sounds that fill not only the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu but also the universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges.

3) The voice of the Buddhas is always able to fill all of space (ākāśa), covering all of the ten directions.

III. WHO CAN HEAR THE VOICE OF THE BUDDHAS?

Question. – If the voice of the Buddhas always fills space, why do actual beings not always hear it?

Answer. – For incalculable eons (asaṃkhyeyakalpa) beings have been clouded over (āvrta) by the bad actions they have committed. This is why they do not hear it. Just as the rumble of thunder and lightning is not heard by the deaf (badhira) without the thunder being diminished by that, so also the Buddhas, like the dragons discharging great bolts of thunder, are always preaching the Dharma to beings but the latter, due to their sins (āpatti), are not in a position to hear them.

However, in the present lifetime, some zealous (vīryavat) and moral (śīlavat) beings enter into the concentration of the recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛtisamādhi). At the moment when their mind acquires this concentration, the defilements of their faults (āpattimala) are no longer an obstacle (āvaraṇa) and henceforth they get to see the Buddhas and to hear distinctly the sounds of their preaching.

Of the three kinds of voice [mentioned above], the bodhisattva wishes to acquire the [last] two, for these two voices are very hard to obtain (durlabha) and are miraculous (āścarya), whereas [the first voice] is the fruit of actions (karmaphala) and is acquired spontaneously (svarasena).

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes [to emit] a single sound articulated in such a way that the universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges can hear this sound, must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Buddhakṣetrānupaccheda

Fourth Section ASSURING THE CONTINUITY OF THE BUDDHA UNIVERSES

Sūtra (cf. Śatasāhasrikā, p. 77, l. 4-5).³⁹² – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes that the Buddha universes never be interrupted must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar

³⁹² This paragraph is absent in the Sanskrit text of the Pañcaviṃśati edited by N Dutt, but occurs in the Chinese versions made by Kumārajīva (T 223, k. 1, p. 219c7) and Hiuan-tsang (T 220, vol. VII, k. 402, p. 8b28). The latter translates: “The bodhisattva who wishes to continue the lineage of the Buddhas (buddhavaṃśa) in such a way that it is not interrupted, etc.”. There is interruption of the lineage of the Buddhas when the Buddhas follow one another in aparaṃ, Śāriputra, buddhalokadhātvanupacchedāya sthātukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. PRECISE RANGE OF THIS WISH

“May all the Buddha universes never be interrupted.” – The bodhisattva wishes that, in the various fields (kṣetra), beings successively formulate the resolution to become buddha.

Question. – You are speaking of succession. This can be a matter of a [Buddha] succession in order of anteriority and posteriority in one single field, or of a [Buddha] series in the universes (lokadhātu) of the ten directions.

Let us suppose that it is a matter of a [Buddha] succession in one single field. Since the great compassion (mahākaruṇā) [of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas] envelops all beings, why does it not extend to other fields as well?

Let us suppose that it is a matter of a [Buddha] series in all the universes of the ten directions. Then what would be the use of other Buddhas and bodhisattvas?

Answer. – The bodhisattva wishes mentally that in all the universes everyone should become buddha. This grand wish is vast and extended and has no limit (maryādā), for it is in this intention that the bodhisattva accumulates the wisdoms (prajñā), immense merit (apramāṇapunya) and the power of the superknowledges (abhijñābala). But it is all the beings who have planted the causes and conditions required to become buddha that the bodhisattva wants to lead to this result.

[284c] If, in all the universes, everyone planted the causes and conditions required to become buddha, the other Buddhas and bodhisattvas would be useless. But such a hypothesis cannot be verified.

Furthermore, the universes of the ten directions are innumerable (apramāṇa) and infinite (ananta) and it is impossible that a single bodhisattva is able to travel to them all in such a way that the Buddha lineage is not interrupted (anupacchinna). The other bodhisattvas, each according to his means, play their part [in this great work]. Since his loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) are great, the wish (prañidhāna) of the bodhisattva is great also, and his desire to do good is limitless (maryādā). Nevertheless, as the race of beings is infinite (apramāṇa), they cannot all be saved by a single Buddha or a single bodhisattva.

II. PURELY SUBJECTIVE RESULT OF THIS WISH

one and the same Buddha universe (buddhalokadhātu or buddhakṣetra) or when one Buddha series is distributed over all the universes.

Question. – Since reality does not come up to his expectation, why does the bodhisattva formulate the wish (prañidhāna)?

Answer. – So that his own mind may progress in purity (viśuddhi). He is like the yogin in the concentration of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi) who, unable to do anything about beings in suffering, only formulates the wish so that his own mind may progress in purity.³⁹³

III. LIMITS TO THE SALVIFIC ACTION OF THE BUDDHAS

Thus, the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas are strong enough that they can save all beings, but, since beings do not possess wisdom and do not fulfill the required cause and conditions, they cannot be saved.

Let us take, for example, the water in the great ocean (mahāsamudrodaka): if all beings drew water from it, it would never run dry; but all beings do not use it. Thus beings in the preta category, because of their own sins (āpatti), are unable to see the water and, even when they do see it, it dries up or changes into molten copper,³⁹⁴ or it becomes pus (pūya) and blood (śoṇita). It is the same with the Buddhas: having great loving-kindness and great compassion, using an immense and infinite wisdom (prajñā), they are able to satisfy all beings, but the latter, because of their sins, do not meet the Buddhas and, even if they do meet them, they are no different from the rest of the people who are angry with the Buddha or who denigrate him. This is why they do not see the power (anubhāva) of the Buddhas or their magical power (rddhibala) and, even if they do meet the Buddhas, they derive no benefit (hita) from it.

Moreover, two causes (hetu), two conditions (pratyaya) are necessary to produce right view (samyagdrṣṭi), namely, an inner cause (adhyātma) and an outer condition (bahirdhā). The Buddha who is the outer cause-and-condition is perfect (sampanna): he possesses thirty-two major marks (lakṣaṇa), eighty minor marks (anuvyañjana), immense rays (raśmi) adorning his body, many magical powers (rddhibala) and many articulated sounds (svaraghoṣa); he preaches the Dharma (dharmam deśayati) as required (yathecccham) and cuts through all doubts (sarvasaṃśayān samucchedayati). Only beings, who are the inner cause-and-condition, are not perfect. Not having previously planted the roots of good (kuśalamūla) required to see the Buddha, they have neither faith in nor respect for him; they have neither exertion (vīrya) nor morality (śīla), having weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), they are deeply attached to worldly happiness (lokasukha) and, consequently, derive no benefit [from meeting the Buddha]. This is not the fault (doṣa) of the Buddha.

The Buddha converts beings (sattvān paripācayati) and the divine tools that he uses are perfect. When the sun rises (sūrya), beings who have an eye (cakṣuṣmat) see it, whereas blind people (andha) do not see it.

³⁹³ The ascetic who, in the course of the meditation on loving-kindness, so that “all beings may be happy”, formulates a purely platonic vow; this vow is of profit only to himself; beings gain no advantage from it (cf. p. 1240F, 1259F).

³⁹⁴ Adopting the variant yang-t'ong.

On the other hand, assuming that there is an eye but there is no sun, there is nothing to see. Thus the fault is not with the sun. It is the same with the Buddha-light.

IV. HOW TO PREVENT THE INTERRUPTION OF THE BUDDHA FIELDS

Question. – What should be done to make the Buddha universes (buddhalokadhātu) not be interrupted (anupacchinna)?

[285a] Answer. - In the midst of beings, the bodhisattva praises the bodhi of he Buddhas so well that beings produce the mind of supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarāyāṃ samyaksambodhau cittamutpādayanti), gradually (anukrameṇa) practice the six perfections (pāramitā) and finally, in the universes, each become buddha.

That they successively become buddha in one and the same field (kṣetra), or that they each become buddha in a different field is what is called “not breaking the Buddha fields” (buddhakusetrānupaccheda).

Furthermore, some bodhisattvas rapidly accumulate the wisdoms (prajñā), become perfect buddhas and save innumerable beings. On the point of entering into nirvāṇa, they make the prediction (vyākaraṇa) to a bodhisattva, saying: “After my nirvāṇa, you in turn will become buddha.” Transmissions (paramparā) such as that thus prevent interruption [of the Buddha fields]. Buddhas who would not give the prediction to a bodhisattva break the Buddha-field. In this way, kings name their crown prince (kumāra) and, by virtue of this transmission), their dynasty is not broken.

V. VALUE OF THE BUDDHA FIELDS

Question. – Why praise the universes that have a Buddha and depreciate those that do not have one?

Answer. – The subject does not lend itself to such a question. The Buddha adorned with the ten powers (daśabala) is the master of the entire universe (lokadhātusvāmin) and, a fortiori, of a single field (kṣetra). The inhabitants of a universe without a Buddha can enjoy human and divine happiness (manuṣyadevasukha), but do not know the extent of the beneficent power of the Buddhas and so are no different from animals.

If Buddhas did not appear in the world, the path (mārga) of the three Vehicles (yānatraya) and of nirvāṇa would not exist; beings would be always shut up in the prison of the threefold world (trai dhātukabandhana) and would never get out. In the universes where there is a Buddha, beings succeed in leaving the prison of the threefold world.

[Acchariyā abbhutadhammā sutta].³⁹⁵ - Thus, in the intermediate spaces between two worlds (lokāntarikā) where there is no sun, beings live and die in the shadows (andhakāra). At the time when a Buddha is born, a brilliant light (avabhāsa) shines temporarily, and all see themselves, see one another (anyonyam paśyanti) and see the sun and moon. Thus illuminated, the beings [of the lokāntarikā] recognize and say: “Those over there are very worthy; we ourselves are great sinners.” Sometimes, the Buddha illumines the Buddha fields with his brilliance completely, and the beings of the universes without Buddha,³⁹⁶ seeing the Buddha’s brilliance, experience great joy (mahāmuditā) and say: “For us, it was shadows (andhakāra), but for them, great light.”

³⁹⁵ Anguttara, II, p. 130-131 (T 125, k. 17, p. 631b19-c10). – On four occasions, when the Bodhisattva descends into the womb of his mother (mātu kucchiyaṃ okkamati), comes out of his mother’s womb (mātu kucchismā nikkhamati), attains supreme complete enlightenment (anuttaraṃ sammāsambodhiṃ abhisambujjhati), or turns the Wheel of Dharma (dhammacakkaṃ pavatteti), there is a grand miracle: a brilliant light illumines the lokāntarikā (fem. pl.). These are the intermediate spaces between the universes of four continents. Grouped into three, these universes, circular in form, touch one another by their outer walls (cakravāla), like three coins brought together. Thus between them they demarcate a surface with the form of a triangle with three arched sides. These lokāntarikās, infinite in number like the universes that demarcate them, are always plunged in deep darkness to the point that their inhabitants cannot even distinguish their own limbs. However, a brilliant light illumines them on the four occasions indicated above. Then the inhabitants of the lokāntarikas notice one another and also discover the beings populating the neighboring universes, normally illumined by the sun and moon.

The illumination of the lokāntarikās is fully described by a stock phrase which, both in the Pāli and the Sanskrit, shows numerous variations:

Pāli, Dīgha, II, p. 12,15; Majjhima, III, p. 120; Samyutta, V, p. 454; Anguttara, II, p. 130. – I. B. Horner, Middle Length Sayings, II, p. 165, translates it as follows: And even in those spaces between the worlds, gloomy, baseless regions of blackness plunged in blackness, where the moon and the sun, powerful and majestic though they are, cannot make their light prevail – even there there appeared the illimitable glorious radiance, surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas. And those beings who had uprisen there recognized one another by means of this radiance, and they thought: “Indeed there are other beings who are uprising here.”

Sanskrit in Sanskr. Mahāpadāna, p. 82-83; Sanskr. Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 214-216; Mahāvastu, I, p. 41, 229, 240; II, p. 162; III, p. 334, 341; Divyāvadāna, p. 204, 205, 206; Lalitavistara, p. 51, 410; Śātasāhasrikā, p. 102; Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 163. F. Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 464-465, translates thus: And even those world-interstitial-spaces, (which are) miseries and covered over with miseries, darkneses, glooms of darkness, - in which the moon and sun here, which possess such great supernatural power and dignity (pr capacity) are not capable of (producing) light by (their) light... even in them a great, magnificent radiance appeared (at that time).

Dīgha, II, p. 12: Yā pi tā lokantarikā aghā asaṃvutā andhakārā andhakāratimīsā ... sañjānant: Aññe pi kira bho sattā idhūpapaṇṇā ti.

Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 163: Sarveṣu ca teṣu lokadhātuṣu yā lokāntatikās tāsu ya akṣaṇāḥ ... anye ‘pi bata bhaḥ sattvaḥ santīhopapaṇṇā iti.

The Traité departs somewhat from the original texts, themselves poorly established.

³⁹⁶ Adopting the variant wou fo kouo.

Finally, in the fields where there is a Buddha, beings recognize the existence of sin (āpatti) and merit (puṇya); the people take the triple refuge (triśaraṇa), the fivefold morality (pañcaśīla) [of the upāsaka] or the fast of eight vows [of the upavāsastha]³⁹⁷, the many profound meditations (dhyāna), absorptions (samāpatti) and wisdoms (prajñā); the four fruits of religious life (śrāmanyaphala), the five kinds of religious stages,³⁹⁸ nirvāṇa with residue (sopadhiśeṣa) or without residue (nirupadhiśeṣa), etc. Because it is the cause and conditions (hetupratyaya) of these many good dharmas, the Buddha field (buddhakṣetra) is honored.

Supposing even that the beings of a Buddha field do not see the Buddha, they meet, however, the Dharma of the sūtras, cultivate the roots of good (kuśalamūla),³⁹⁹ morality (śīla), generosity (dāna), the signs of respect (vandana), etc.; they plant the causes and conditions for nirvāṇa, and even animals can plant the causes and conditions of merit (puṇya).⁴⁰⁰ On the other hand, in the fields without a Buddha, even the gods and humans there are incapable of practicing good. This is why the bodhisattva formulates the vow (prañidhāna) that the Buddha universes not be broken.

³⁹⁷ The pañcaśīla and the upavāsa of the layman have already been studied above, p. 819-839F.

³⁹⁸ Bhikṣu, bhikṣuṇī, śaikṣa, śrāmaṇera and śrāmaṇerī: cf. p. 577F.

³⁹⁹ Adopting the variant chan-ken.

⁴⁰⁰ On the Buddhist behavior towards animals, or the Bodhisattva in animal form, see p. 716-721F, and H8b6girin, p. 317-318, under chikushō.

CHAPTER XLVIII THE EIGHTEEN EMPTINESSES

First Section NOTE ON EMPTINESS

Preliminary note. – The eighteen emptinesses, the subject of the present chapter, are the end-point of a long doctrinal evolution the milestones of which should be marked. The subject is of importance because, to a great extent, it is on account of it that the two first Vehicles, that of the śrāvakas and that of the bodhisattvas, present differences. In general, one can say with the Traité, p. 239F: “The Śrāvakayāna teaches mainly the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā), whereas the Buddhayāna (or Greater Vehicle), teaches both the emptiness of beings and the emptiness of things (dharmāśūnyatā).” The assertion will be developed later, p. 2060F.

Here we will treat in a summary manner the twofold emptiness in the canonical sūtras, the emptiness of beings in the Abhidharmas and the śāstras of the Hīnayānists, and finally the emptinesses according to the Madhyamaka.

I. THE TWOFOLD EMPTINESS IN THE CANONICAL SŪTRAS

1. Sattvaśūnyatā or Pudgalanairātmya

Sattvaśūnyatā is the non-existence of the being (sattva), of the soul, of the self (ātman), of the living being (jīva), of the man (puruṣa), of the individual (pudgala): all these words are only designations (prajñapti) of the group of fragmentary entities.

On the evidence of the Brahmajālasutta (D., I, p. 31-34), the first Buddhists were fully informed about the animistic and spiritualistic concepts current in their time among the śramaṇas and brāhmaṇas: persistence after death of a conscious self (saṃjñī ātmā), in sixteen forms; or of an unconscious self (asaṃjñī ātmā), in eight forms; or of a neither conscious nor unconscious self (naivasamjñīsāsaṃjñī ātmā), in eight forms; annihilation in seven forms of the existent being (sato sattvasya uccheda) or its deliverance, in five forms, in the present lifetime (dṛṣṭadharmanirvāṇa). All these theories were condemned by the Buddha.

More precisely, the notion of ātman against which the Buddhists struggled is that of a permanent (nitya), stable (dhruva), eternal (śāśvata), immutable (avipariṇāmadharman) entity which the ignorant attribute to the great Brahman (D. I, p. 18-19), to some deities (D. I, p. 19-20) to themselves or to others (M. I, p. 8, 135, 137; S. III, p. 98-99, 183): this notion is closely related to that of the Brahman-Ātman of the Upaniṣads and the Vedānta.

The Buddha resolutely moved away from it and declared: Natthi nicco dhuvo sassato avipariṇāmadhammo (S. III, p. 144).

In order to designate this substantial soul, the Indian language uses an extensive vocabulary and a broad range of synonyms: ātman, but also sattva, jīva, poṣa, puruṣa, pudgala, manuṣa, mānava, kartr, kāraka, jānaka, saṃjanaka, paśyaka, vedaka, pratisaṃvedaka, utthāpaka, samutthāpaka, etc. But all these terms do not express what it is, even if only metaphorically.

Nothing is outside of sattvaśūnyatā. In order to be convinced of that, it is necessary to recall some elementary notions.

Dharmas or things occur in two main categories: unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) dharmas and conditioned (saṃskṛta) dharmas.

The asaṃskṛtas, not formed by causes, are unproduced (utpāda), without extinction (vyaya), and without duration-change (sthityanyathātva): cf. A. I, p. 152. The schools debate their number: from one to nine (L. de La Vallée Poussin, Nirvāṇa, p. 180-187).

The saṃskṛtas, also called saṃskāras, formations, are dependently originated (pratītyasamutpanna) from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) and furnished with three (or four) conditioned characteristics: birth (utpāda), extinction (vyaya) and duration-change (sthityanyathātva) as a function of which they arise, endure and disappear: cf. A. I, p. 152; S. III, p. 37; Nidānasamyukta, p. 139; and abovep. 36-37F, 921F, 1163F.

The canonical texts arrange the saṃskṛtas into three classes, all three covering one single grouping:

I. The five skandhas or aggregates: 1) matter or corporeality (rūpa). 2) sensation (vedanā), 3) concept (saṃjñā), 4) volition (saṃskāra), 5) consciousness (viññāna). – See, e.g., S. III, p. 47-48, 100; V, p. 60-61.

II. The twelve āyatanas or bases of consciousness, namely, the six inner bases (ādhyātmika āyatana): 1) eye (caṅṣus), 2) ear (śrotra). 3) nose (ghrāṇa), 4) tongue (jihvā), 5) body (kāya), 6) mind (manas); and the six outer bases (bāhya āyatana): 7) matter (rūpa), 8) sound (śabda), 9) odor (gandha), 10) taste (rasa), 11) touch (sparṣṭavya), 12) dharma. – See, e.g., D. II, p. 302; III, p. 102, 243; M. I, p. 61.

III. The eighteen dhātus or elements, namely the six organs and the six objects in the previous list, plus: 13) eye consciousness (caṅṣurviññāna). 14) ear consciousness (śrotraviññāna). 15) nose consciousness (ghrāṇaviññāna), 16) tongue consciousness (jihvāviññāna), 17) body consciousness (kāyaviññāna), 18) mental consciousness (manovijñāna). See, e.g., S. II p. 140.

The grouping of conditioned dharmas defined by each of the three classes is called sarvam, ‘everything’ (S. IV, p. 15; Mahāniddeśa, I, p. 133; Kośabhāṣya, p. 301, 7-8), loka, ‘the world’ (S. IV, p. 52, 54) or also duḥkha, ‘suffering’ (S. IV, p. 28).

In order to pass valid judgment on all these dharmas, it is necessary always to refer to the four seals of the Dharma (dharmamudra) mentioned above (p. 1369F): Sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, sarvasaṃskārā duḥkhāḥ, sarvasaṃskārā anātmānaḥ, śāntaṃ virvāṇam “All the saṃskāras (= saṃskṛtadharma) are impermanent; all the saṃskāras are painful; all the dharmas (whether saṃskṛta or asaṃskṛta) are non-self; nirvāṇa is peace.”

The asaṃskṛtas and especially nirvāṇa also are just as impersonal as the saṃskṛtas (Vin. V, p. 86:

Nibbānaṃ c’eva paññatti anattā iti nicchayā). Nirvāṇa is the cessation of desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha): cf. S. IV, p. 251, 261. In that capacity, it is necessary to be aware of the non-existence of the self in order to attain nirvāṇa in this life, which abolishes the pride of “I am” (A. IV, p. 353: Anattasaññī asmiṃānasamugghātāṃ pāpunāti diṭṭh’ eva dhamme nibbānaṃ).

Thus the Buddha so often lectured his monks about the list of the five skandhas (Vin. I, p. 14; M. I, p. 138-139; III, p. 19-20; S. II, p. 124-125; III, p. 88-89, 94, 111, 138, 148-149; Catuspariṣad, p. 164-168), the twelve āyatanas (S. II, p. 244-246) and the eighteen dhātus (M. III, p. 271-272). Pausing after each skandha, āyatana and dhātu, he has the following conversation with his monks:

“What do you think, O monks. Is rūpa permanent (niṭya) or impermanent(anitya)?

- Impermanent, Lord.

- But that which is impermanent, is it painful (duḥkha) or pleasant (sukha)?

- Painful. Lord.

- Now, that which is impermanent, painful and subject to change, when one thinks about it, can one say: That is mine, I am that, that is my self (etan mama, eṣo ‘ham asmi, eṣa ma ātmā)?

- One cannot, Lord.”

And the Buddha concludes: Consequently, O monks, every past, future or present (rūpa), internal or external, coarse or subtle, lower or higher, distant or close, all this rūpa is not mine, I am not it, it is not my self: this is what must be truly seen according to the right cognition.

The same dialogue and the same conclusion are repeated in regard to the other four skandhas, the twelve āyatanas and the eighteen dhātus.

If the saṃskāras are not a self and do not belong to a self, it is because they are impermanent and painful: “Short and brief is the life of humans; it abounds in suffering and torments. It is like a mountain river that goes afar, runs rapidly, carries everything in its passing. There is no second, no minute, no hour that it stops; it forges ahead, whirls about and rushes on. For the one who is born here below, there is no immortality.” (A IV, p. 136-137).

Then why look for a self in these saṃskāras “so transitory (anitya), so fragile (adhruva), so untrustworthy (anāsāvāsyā)”? (S. II, p. 191, 193). – Does somebody say: “In the mind”? “But it would be better to take as the self the body (kāya) that can last one year, two years or even a hundred or more years, rather than the mind. For what is called mind (citta, manas) or consciousness (viññāna) arises and disappears in perpetual change, day and night. The mind is like a monkey frolicking in the forest that grasps one branch, then lets it go to grasp another branch.” (S. II, p. 94-95; Traité, p. 1165F).

There are three types of suffering: suffering as suffering (duḥkhaduḥkhatā), suffering as the fact of being conditioned (saṃkāraduḥkhatā) and the suffering resulting from change (vipariṇāmaduḥkhatā): cf. D. III, p. 216; S. IV, p. 259; V, p. 56. All the psychophysical phenomena of existence are the result of causes and must disappear. The result is that everything is suffering (Sarvaṃ duḥkham: S. IV, p. 28); all that is experienced is experienced as suffering (yaṃ kiñci vedayitaṃ taṃ duḥkhasmiṃ: S. IV, p. 216; Traité, p. 1159F, 1446F) and nothing arises but suffering, nothing is destroyed but suffering (nāññatra dukkā sambhoti, nāññaṃ dukkhā nirujjhati: S. I, p. 135; Catuspariśad, p. 354).

The whole process of becoming takes place outside of a self and there is no self to control it: “Form (rūpa) is not a self. If it were a self, this form would not be subject to torments (ābādha) and one would be able to say in regard to the form: ‘My body is thus, thus is not my body.’ But that is not the case. And it is the same for the other skandhas, sensations, concepts, volitions and consciousnesses.” (Vin. I, p. 13-14; S. III, p. 66-67; Catuspariśad, p. 162-164; Mahāvastu, III, p. 335-336).

As conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛta), the skandhas, arising, enduring a very short time and ceasing, evolve ceaselessly in the cycle of existence (bhavacakra) according to the immutable mechanism of the twelve-membered dependent origination (dvādaśāṅgapratītyasamutpāda, detailed above, p. 349F seq). Pratītyasamutpāda was discovered by the Buddhas but was not created by them nor by any agent (kāraṇa) whatsoever: “This pratītyasamutpāda has not been made by me nor by anyone else; but whether the Tathāgatas appear in this world or not, this nature of the dharmas is stable.” (Nidānasamyukta, p. 164, cited in the Traité above, p. 157F and later, k. 32, p. 298a: Na bhikṣo mayā pratītyasamutpādaḥ kṛto nāpy anyaiḥ, api tūpādād vā tathāgatānāṃ anupādād vā sthitā eveyaṃ dharmatā). Dependent origination is inherent in conditioned dharmas. As Kośa III, p. 60, says: “The series of skandhas that develops in three lifetimes [taken at random in the infinite series of lifetimes] is the twelve-membered pratītyasamutpāda. Each of its members is a complex of the five skandhas, although it takes the name of the dharma that is the most important one (Kośa, III, p. 66). Each of its members, including ignorance (avidyā) which opens the list, prevails over its neighbor; all are equally impermanent (anitya), conditioned (saṃskṛta), result from dependency (pratītyasamutpanna), given to destruction, to disappearance, to detachment, to suppression (S. II, p. 26).

One would search in vain in the pratītyasamutpāda for a substantial self or an autonomous agent. The Paramārthaśūnyatāsūtra of the Samyuktāgama which the Traité will cite in full below (p. 2136F) is categorical in this regard: “There is action (karman), there is retribution (vipāka) but there is no agent (kāraṇa) that, [at death], puts aside these skandhas and takes up other skandhas, unless that is a question of a conventional (saṃketa) metaphor to designate the law of dependent origination” (T 99, k. 13, p. 92c12-26; Bimbisārasūtra in E. Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke buddh. Sūtras, p. 131; Catuspariśad, p. 358; Mahāvastu, III, p. 448, 4-6; Kośavyākhyā, p. 707, 13-16).

The non-existence of the self involves or assumes the non-existence of the ‘mine’ and vice versa: “If the ‘me’ existed, there would be a ‘mine’; if the ‘mine’ existed, there would be a ‘me’. But since the ‘me’ and the ‘mine’ do not truly exist certainly (attaini ca attaniye ca saccato thetato anupalabbhāne), is it not complete folly to think: This world (loka here designating the twelve āyatanas, according to Samyutta, p. 87), this world is ‘me’; after my death, I will be permanent (nicca), stable (dhuva), eternal (sassata), immutable (avipariṇamadhamma), and I will remain so for ever (sassatisamaṃ tath’ eva ṭhassāmi)?” (M. I, p. 138).

The group of the *saṃskṛtadharma*s (skandhas, āyatanas and dhātus) designated by the demonstrative pronoun idam or by the noun loka is proclaimed to be empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’: Suññam idaṃ attena vā attaniyena vā (M. I, p. 297, 37; II, p. 263, 26-27; S. IV, p. 296, 33); Yasmā ca kho suññam attena vā attaniyena vā tasmā suñño loko ti vuccati (S., IV, p. 54, 5-6). It is not just in the twofold aspect of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ that emptiness is presented. It can also be envisaged in a number of other aspects (ākāra): the canonical texts distinguish four, six, eight, ten, twelve, and even forty-two (cf. Cullaniidessa, p. 278-280; Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 561-562). To speak plainly, it is a question there of synonyms rather than distinct realities: the emptiness is the same, the expressions alone are different (M. I, p. 297: dharmā ekatṭhā, byañjanam eva nānaṃ).

The emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā) serves as antidote to the fatal satkāyadrṣṭi or belief in an individual. This is a wrong view (drṣṭi) mistakenly attributing a self to the five aggregates of attachment (upādānaskandha). Indeed, Śāriputra said that the five upādānaskandha are called satkāya by the Buddha (S. IV, p. 259): Pañcime upādānakkhandā sakkāyo vutto Bhagavatā, and the Teacher himself stated that the five skandhas, rūpa, etc., must be present in order that satkāyadrṣṭi be produced (S. III, p. 185).

Led astray by this wrong view, the ignorant worldly person considers the rūpa as the ātman (rūpaṃ attato samanupassati), or the ātman as possessing the rūpa (rūpavantaṃ vā attānaṃ), or the rūpa as present in the ātman (attani vā rūpaṃ), or the ātman as present in the rūpa (rūpasmiṃ vā attānaṃ). And it is the same for the other skandhas: vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra and vijñāna (M. I, p. 300; III, p. 17; S. III, p. 3-4, 15-17, 42-43, 46, 56, 102, 113-14, 138, 150, 164-165; S. IV, p. 287, 395; A. II, p. 214-215; Mahāvvyut., no 4685-4704). The worldly person thus nourishing four prejudices (abhiniveśa) in regard to each of the four skandhas, we speak of the vimśatisīkharasamudgataḥ satkāyadrṣṭisailaḥ: the twenty-peaked mountain of the satkāyadrṣṭi (Gilgit Manuscripts.III, 1, p. 21, 7-8; Divyāvadāna, p. 46, 25; 52, 24-25; 549, 16; 554, 20; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 385, 12).

Satkāyadrṣṭi is not a defiled view in the sense that it is not directly the cause of sin and hell. Actually, the person who believes in the self wishes to be happy after his death and, to this end, practices generosity, observes morality: all good actions assuring a rebirth in the world of men or in the heavens (cf. Kośa, V, p. 40).

But belief in an ‘I’ is incompatible with the spiritual Buddhist life, the uprooting of desire, access to nirvāṇa.

Taking a small pellet of dung in his fingers, the Buddha said to his bhikṣus: “Belief in the existence of a permanent, stable, eternal and immutable self, be it as small as this pellet, will ruin the religious life that leads to the complete destruction of suffering (brahmacariyavāso sammādukkhakkhayāya: S. III, p. 144).

“On this account,” the Buddha again said, “I do not see any adhesion to this view that does not engender, in the person who holds it, sorrow, lamentation, unhappiness and torment (M. I, p. 137-138).” Furthermore, satkāyadr̥ṣṭi is followed by the sixty-two wrong views of which the Brahmajālasūtra speaks (S. IV, p. 287).

Mithyādr̥ṣṭi, satkāyadr̥ṣṭi and ātmānuḍr̥ṣṭi are closely linked: in order to overcome them, it is necessary to consider all the conditioned factors as impermanent (anityatas), painful (duḥkhatas) and without self (anātmatas); cf. S IV, p. 147-148.

However, both in the canonical and the paracanonical scriptures, there are passages where the Buddha expressed himself in a more qualified way. Under diverse names (ātman, sattva, jīva, pruṣa, pudgala, kāraka, etc.), he spoke of the ‘soul’ as an obvious reality the existence of which is unquestionable; to some disciples he affirmed the existence of a soul whereas to others he denied it; sometimes, also, questioned about the existence or non-existence of the soul, he refused to answer. How can these apparently contradictory texts be reconciled? The problem has occupied the old and the modern exegesis and many solutions ranging from categorical affirmation to complete negation have been proposed. The most interesting date from the end of the 19th century to the beginning of the 20th century. The description and critique may be found in L. de La Vallée Poussin, Nirvāṇa, Paris, 1925, p. 85-129. Awkwardly without bias, I [Lamotte] will avoid intervening in the debate and will limit myself to summarizing here, as briefly as possible, the position adopted by the author of the Traité.

A. The worldly point of view (laukika siddhanta)

When the Buddha speaks of the ātman as an obvious thing, he is, naturally, coming from a worldly point of view and is adopting the current language. It is hard to think of a language not having recourse to any process (e.g., pronouns or conjugations) to distinguish the one who speaks (first person), the one who is being addressed (second person) and the one who is being spoken about (third person); confusion between the ‘I’, the ‘you’ and the ‘he’ would make speech incomprehensible. It happens a hundred times each day that we pronounce the word ‘I’ without, however, considering it as a spiritual factor, separable from the body and immortal. Moreover, coming from the Sanskrit, the word ātman is not unequivocal: sometimes it can be a noun designating the spiritual soul, but it is also most often a simple reflexive pronoun which, commonly used in oblique singular cases, applies to the three persons no matter what of kind or of what number (cf. H. von Glasenapp, Vedānta und Buddhismus, Ak. Der Wissens. und der Literatur, II (1950), p. 1020; W. Rahula, L’enseignement du Bouddha, Paris, 1961, p. 87).

In some scriptural passages, ātman and its synonyms are taken in a sense that has nothing philosophical about it and they should be translated, accordingly, without giving them meaningful value:

1. Dhammapāda, v. 160, Udānavarga, XXIII, v. 11 foll. (Traité, p. 29F); Attā hi attano nātho – Each one (and not ‘the self’) is his own refuge.

2. D. II, p. 100; III, p. 58, 77; S. III, p. 42; V, P. 154, 163; Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 200: Attadīpā viharathā attasaraṇā anaññasaraṇā. – Remain by taking yourselves (and not ‘the self’) as island, by taking yourselves as refuge and not another; Nehmt euch selbst als Insel, nehmt euch selbst als Zuflucht, habt keine andere Zuflucht (E. Waldschmidt).

3. D. I, p. 82; M. I, p. 23, 348; II, p. 21; Mahāvastu, II, p. 283; Lalita, p. 344 (Traité, p. 28-29): So dibbena cakḍhūṇā... satte passati cavamāṇe upapajjamāṇe... – With the divine eye, he sees people (and not ‘beings’) being born and perishing...

4. A. I, p. 22 (Traité, p. 29F): Ekapuggalo loke uppajjamāno uppajjati bahujanajitāya... Katamo ekapuggalo? Tathāgato arahaṃ sammāsambuddho. – One alone (and not one single ‘individual’), being born into the world, is born for the benefit of many people. Who is that? The Tathāgata, the holy completely enlightened one. – Same interpretation in Kośa, IX, p. 259.

5. The samodhānas that end the Jātaka tales and by means of which the Buddha establishes the connection between individuals of the present story (paccuppannavatthu) and those of the story of the past (atītavatthu), these samodhānas do not constitute any confirmation of a self. “Perhaps you are wondering if, at that time and that epoch, such a one was not another than myself. Well then, no, you should not imagine that. Why? Because at that time and that epoch, I was indeed that one (aham eva sa tena kālena tena aamayena asāv abhūvam).” By means of this formula, comments the Kośa, IX, p. 272, the Bhagavat tells us that the skandhas that constitute his ‘self’ actually make up part of the same series (ekasaṃtāna) as the skandhas that constitute the individual in question, in the way that one says: “The fire came here by burning” (sa evānir dahann āgata itti).

Other canonical passages where the term ātman and its synonyms have no metaphysical intent may be found in chapter IX of the Kośa and in the L’enseignement du Buddha, p. 81-96, by W. Rahula. And we think it is wrong that good minds have seen in the Bhārasutta and the Natumahāka “the affirmation of an ātman distinct from the skandhas.”

Bhārasutta in Saṃyutta, III, p. 25026 (other references above, p. 215F, n. 1). – O monks, I will explain to you the burden (bhāra), the taking up of the burden (bhāradāna), the setting down of the burden (bhāranikṣepaṇa), the bearer of the burden (bhārahāra). The burden is the five aggregates of attachment (upādānaskandha); the taking up of the burden is the thirst that produces rebirth (tr̥ṣṇā paunarbhavikī); the setting down of the burden is the extinction of the thirst (tr̥ṣṇāyāḥ prahāṇam); the bearer of the burden is such and such an individual (pudgala), the venerable one who bears such and such a name who is of such and such a family and such and such a clan, who takes such and such food, who takes part in such and such happiness and suffering, who lives for so and so many years, who dwells for such and such a time.” The Vātsīputrīyas use this sūtra as an excuse to speak about an ineffable pudgala. But in his Kośa, IX, p. 267, Vasubandhu retorts: “It is only in order to conform with worldly usage that one says: ‘This venerable one of such and such a name, of such and such a clan’ and the rest, in order that one may know that the pudgala is utterable, impermanent, without self nature... Therefore the pudgala is not an entity.”

Natumahākasutta and parable of the Jeta Grove, S. III, p. 33-34; IV, p. 81-82, 128-129; Majjhima, I, p. 140, 33-141, 19; Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 269, k. 10, p. 70b; no. 274, k. 11, p. 73a). – “Monks, reject that which is not yours (na tumhākaṃ): form, feeling, concept, volition and consciousness are not yours, reject them and, doing this, you will derive benefit and happiness. But if someone came into this Jeta Grove where we are and took the grass, the wood, the branches and the leaves to burn them, would you say that he takes and burns you? – No, Lord. – Why? – Because, Lord, these things are not ‘me’ and not ‘mine’. – In the same way, monks, reject what is not yours.”

The rejection of skandhas which are not a self and not ‘mine’ does not in any way imply that one will find a self or ‘mine’ or that the self and ‘mine’ exist. The Mahāniddeśa, II, p. 438-439 quite rightly compares the parable of the chariot that does not exist apart from its parts (S. I, p. 135) and the well-known saying: Suñño loko attena vā attaniyena vā (S. IV, p. 54).

If the Buddha orders his monks to “reject the skandhas”, it is not only because they are empty of self and ‘mine’, but perhaps also because they are empty of intrinsic nature and characteristic. Such is the opinion of the Traité (p. 2108F) which sees in the Buddha’s injunction to Rādhā ”These skandhas, O Radha, destroy them, crush them, reduce them to nothing” (S. III, p. 190) an affirmation of dharmasūnyatā.

In summary, for ease and conciseness of language, the Buddha did not hesitate to use the terms āman, sattva, jīva, puruṣa, pudgala which were current in his time: ”Those are”, he said, “names, expressions, phrases, popular designations which the Tathāgata uses, but without being fooled by them (D. I, p. 202: Itimā kho Citta, lokasamaññā lokaniruttiyo lokavohārā lokapaññattiyo yāhi Tathāgato voharati aparāmasan).” They do not imply the existence of a permanent, stable, eternal, immutable entity; they are simple labels to designate conveniently a complex of impermanent, painful and impersonal saṃskṛtas.

To Māra who spoke to her about the self, the nun Vajirā answered: “What do you mean, O Māra? That there is a sattva? Your doctrine is false. It is but a mass of changing formations (saṅkhāra). Just as there where the parts of the chariot are assembled, the word ‘chariot’ is used, so also, there where the five skandhas are, it is appropriate to speak of sattva” (S. I, p. 135).

B. The individual (prātipauruṣika) and therapeutic (prātipakṣika) point of view

According to the Traité (p. 31-38F), the Buddha always varied his teaching according to the aspirations (āśaya) and needs of his listeners: to some he taught the existence of the self, to others, the non-existence of the self.

Influenced by nihilistic views (ucchedadrṣṭi), some of his disciples doubted that there is an afterlife, the reward for the good and punishment for the wicked throughout lifetimes, removing in this way any sanctions on morality. The Buddha therefore taught them that “wherever a self is produced (ātmabhāva), that is where its action ripens, and when this action is ripe it undergoes retribution in the present life, in the next life or in future lives (A. I, p. 134: yatth’ assa attabhāvo nibbattati tattha taṃ kammaṃ vipaccati, yattha taṃ kammaṃ vipaccati, tattha tassa kammaṃ vipākam paṭisaṃvedeti diṭṭh’ eva dhamme uppajje apare vā ariyāye).

On the other hand, drawn to eternalistic views (śāśvatadrṣṭi), others imagine that they go from existence to existence, that they abandon one body to take up another and undergo, from age to age, the consequences of their own actions. They do not endanger the norms of morality but, nonetheless, they fall into the fatal belief in the self (satkāyadrṣṭi), the root of desire and the source of wrong views. To them the Buddha explains that the mechanism of retribution functions perfectly in the absence of any agent or any transmigrating entity. In the Paramārthaśūnyatāsūtra (see below, p. 2136F), he states that there is action and retribution, but that there is no agent to reject these skandhas and to assume others. To Phalguna who asks him: “Then who touches (phussati), who feels (vedayati)?”, the Teacher answers: “I deny that anyone touches or that anyone feels. Your question is badly put. You should have asked me what is the condition (paccaya) of touching and what is the condition of feeling, and I would have answered [that, in terms of dependent origination], touching has, as condition, the six internal āyatanas and that feeling has, as condition, touching” (S. II, p. 13; cited by the Traité, p. 32F, 1683-84F).

In affirming the respective existence and non-existence of the substantial self, the Buddha is obviously contradicting himself but, nevertheless, the two answers are valid. As the Traité will comment (p. 2102F), the Buddha denies the ātman more often than he affirms it, for the good reason that people, moved by the instinct of conservation, aspire to eternal survival rather than to a total annihilation. If people had opted for annihilation, the Teacher would not have omitted insisting on survival. Both being true, the opposing theses do not, however, have the same true potential. From the Hīnayānist point of view at least, the Anātmavāda holds in absolute truth (paramārthasatya) for the skandhas alone exist. The Ātmavāda itself fits into the category of conventional and provisional truth (saṃvṛtisatya) in that it corrects the errors of the nihilists. Now, the Traité will tell us (p. 2101F), a useful opinion is never false.

C. The refused questions

The Buddha often remained silent (tūṣṇībhāva) on the questions under consideration here, and for him, this silence is an answer, a sthāpanīyavyākaraṇa, an answer by not responding (cf. p. 156F). He refuses to say anything not only about the existence of the ātman but also about the various modalities of the latter.

Ānandasutta (S. IV, p. 400-401; Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 961. k. 34, p. 245b; T 100, no. 195, k. 10. p. 444c). – One day the wandering mendicant Vatsagotra came to the Buddha and asked: “Does the ātman exist (atth’ attā)?” but the Teacher remained silent; thereupon Vatsagotra asked: “Does the ātman not exist (natth’ attā)?” and again the Buddha remained silent. The mendicant having gone, the Buddha justified his silence to Ānanda: “If I had answered that the ātman exists, I would have been siding with the eternalists (śāśvatavāda) and I would have been preventing Vatsagotra from reaching the knowledge (jñāna) that the dharmas are without self (Sarve dharmā anātmānaḥ). On the other hand, if I had answered that the ātman does not exist, I would have been siding with the nihilists (ucchedvāda) and poor Vatsagotra would have asked himself: ‘But did I not previously exist? And now I no longer exist!’ “

Here, and despite his reluctance, the Buddha allows us to imply that he is intimately persuaded of the non-self nature of all things.

In regard to the modalities of this ātman in the case that it would exist, the Teacher is even more careful. He declares the fourteen reserved points (avyākṛtavastu), ‘difficult questions’ which his disciples always asked him: eternity and infinity of the world (loka) and of the self (ātman), survival of the Tathāgata (or the saint liberated from desire) after death, connection between the life force (jīva) and the body (references above,

p. 154F seq.). Here the Buddha makes no effort to justify his silence, and the reasons that he invokes are not lacking. Two especially should be remembered: the first practical in nature, and the second logical in nature

a. If the Buddha was silent, it is because knowledge of these things does not make for progress in the holy life since they are of no use to peace and enlightenment (D. I, p. 188-189; III, p. 136; M. I, p. 431; S. II, p. 223).

b. Since everything is empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’, there is no ātman and, since there is no ātman, it is absurd to wonder if it is eternal or transitory, finite or infinite, the same as the body or different from it. One does not go on and on about the height of the son of a sterile woman and a eunuch, on the length of the hair of a tortoise, on the color of a sky-flower, on the shape of the sixth finger of one’s hand, on the number of liters of milk produced by a cow’s horn. The author of the Traité returns to this subject a number of times (e.g., p. 155-158F, 423F, 913-919F) and he concludes (p. 1684F): “It is the anātman that is true”, not without immediately adding, like a good Mādhyamikan, that one cannot grasp its characteristic.

That said, the Buddha is perfectly aware of the outcry that his teachings were to provoke. The theory of dependent origination which explains, without the intervention of a substantial entity, the mechanism of action and retribution, is a profound truth, difficult to see, difficult to understand, pacifying, sublime, surpassing any dialectic, abstruse, comprehensible only to the wise (Vin., I, p. 4; Catuspariśad, p. 108; Mahāvastu, III, p. 314; Lalitavistara, p. 392). As for emptiness - if it is a question only of the self and ‘mine’ – “the entire world is averse to it” (sarvalokavipratyanīka).

The Buddha foresaw that, in future centuries, some bhikṣus would not listen to it, would not lend an ear to it and would not want to understand ‘the sūtras expounded by the Tathāgata, profound sūtras, deep in meaning, superhuman and dealing with emptiness’ (S. II, p. 267; V., p. 407; A. I, p. 72; III, p. 107: suttantā tathāgatabhāsītā gambhīrā gambhīratthā lokottarā suññatāpaṭisaṃyuttā).

If any prediction is realized, that one certainly was. In the early centuries of Buddhism, some schools, in any case, those of the Vātsīputrīyas and the Sāṃmitīyas (cf. p. 43, F, n. 4) professed personalist views (pudgalavāda) in such an insidious way that one wonders if they were still indeed Buddhist (cf. preliminary note of L. de La Vallée Poussin to chap. IX of the Kośa, p. 228). Throughout history, efforts were made to introduce into the holy Dharma the ātman of the Upaniṣads and the Vedānta. Even in our times, some critics maintain the following reasoning: The Buddha denied that the saṃskṛtas are a self or belong to a self, but he did not formally combat an ātman transcending the world of contingencies. E. Frauwallner, in his Philosophie des Buddhismus, Berlin, 1956, expressed himself thus: Der Buddha wird nicht müde, immer wieder zu betonen, dass keine der fünf Gruppen (skandha), aus denen die irdische Persönlichkeit zusammensetzt, für das Ich gehalten werden darf. Ihm selbst lag es zwar fern, damit das Vorhandensein einer Seele überhaupt zu leugnen.

But this argumentum ex silentio bears no weight in face of the similar dialogues, exchanges between Śāriputra and Yamaka (S. III, p. 111-112), between the Buddha and Anurādha (S. IV, p. 383-384) on the existence of the tathāgata, a word that here means not the Buddha but more generally the saint delivered from desire. There it is said that the tathāgata is not any of the five skandhas (rūpa, vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra, vijñāna), is not found in them nor elsewhere (anyatra), is not the group of the five skandhas and yet is not separate from them. In conclusion: Ettha ca te, āvuso Yamaka, diṭṭh’eva dhamme saccato thetato tathāgato anupalabbhiyāmāno.

This finale has been translated and understood differently by H. Oldenberg (Buddha, sein Leben, 13th ed., 1959, p. 296: “So ist also, Freund Yamaka, schon hier in der sichtbaren Welt der Vollendete für dich nicht in Wahrheit und Wesenhaftigkeit zu erfassen”, and L. de La Vallée Poussin who understands: “Donc, mon ami, m’ime maintenant, tu ne perçois pas le Bouddha comme existant réellement, vraiment” (Le bouddhisme, 3rd ed., 1925, p. 172), or “Donc, Yamaka, dans ce monde m’ime, le tathāgata n’est pas perçu, constaté, comme vrai, réel” (Nirvāṇa, 1925, p. 104). Oldenberg sees in this phrase the affirmation of a transcendent ātman, the ātman of the Upaniṣads; de La Vallée Poussin finds in it the same negation of the tathāgata of which one cannot say that it perishes at death for the good reason that in order to perish, it is necessary to exist.

In his fine work, L’Ātman-Brahman dans le bouddhisme ancien, Paris, 1973, p. 67, K. Bhattacharya writes: “The controversy between Oldenberg and de La Vallée Poussin seems senseless, for it is placed on two distinct levels. In fact, however, the learned Indian scholar sides with Oldenberg and Frauwallner by adding: ‘What this text and others similar to it mean is this: ‘The ātman, the Absolute, cannot be the object of ‘grasping’... But that which escapes ‘grasping’ is not ‘non-existent’; its objective ‘non-existence’ is, on the other hand, its metaphysical ‘existence’ par excellence; its ‘non-grasping’ is its ‘grasping’ par excellence’ “.

But the Omniscient One knew very well what he needed to say and what he needed to be silent about, and one would seek in vain in the canonical sūtras of exact and definitive meaning (nīlārthasūtra) any support for an ātman both immanent and transcendent, permanent (nitya), stable (dhrūva), eternal (śāśvata) and immutable (avipariṇāmadharma), whereas they endlessly say and repeat that all things without exception, conditioned or unconditioned, are not an ātman (sarve dharmā anātmānaḥ) and that the most fatal ignorance, whatever the forms they may borrow, is the satkāyadrṣṭi.

Under these conditions and until proof of the contrary, it is best to stick to the recommendation of the Teacher: “What I have not declared, hold that as non-declared, and what I have declared, hold that as having been declared” (M. I, p. 431: Abyākatañ ca me abyākatato dhāretha, byākatañ ca me byākatato dhāretha). By conforming to this golden rule and by endeavoring to realize by themselves the profound meaning of the teachings of the Blessed One, for over twenty-five centuries numerous bhikṣus have found in the doctrine of non-self the pacifying of the mind and joyful hearts. On this subject, see W. Rahula, L’enseignement fondamental du bouddhisme in Présence du bouddhisme, Saigon, 1959, p. 265-266; L’enseignement du Buddha, Paris, 1961, p. 77-96.

“In conclusion,” writes the author of the Traité (p. 747F), “look for the ātman in heaven or on earth, inside (adhyātman) or outside (bahirdhā), in the three times (tryadhvan) or in the ten directions (daśadiś), nowhere will you find it. Only the meeting of the twelve bases of consciousness [dvādaśāyatana, i.e., the six sense organs and their respective objects] produces the six consciousnesses (ṣaḍvijñāna). The meeting of the three [trikaṣaṇnipāta, or the meeting of the organs, the objects and the consciousnesses] is called contact (sparśa). Contact produces feeling (vedanā), concept (saṃjñā), the act of intention (cetanā) and other mental dharmas (caitasikadharmas). According to the Buddhist system, it is by the power of ignorance (avidyā) that belief in the self (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) arises. As a result of satkāyadr̥ṣṭi, one affirms the existence of the ātman. This satkāyadr̥ṣṭi is destroyed by the vision of the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatyadarśana): the knowledge of the truth of suffering (duḥkhe dharmajñāna) and the consecutive knowledge of suffering (duḥkhe 'nvyajñāna). When satkāyadr̥ṣṭi is destroyed, one no longer sees that there is an ātman.”

2. Dharmaśūnyatā

The canonical scriptures do not teach the emptiness of beings alone; occasionally they also talk about the emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā): dharmas are empty of self-nature (svabhāva) and also of characteristics (lakṣaṇa) and are like a magic show. This long before the term existed Madhyamaka shows up in some sūtras of the Tripiṭaka, in theories attributing to samādhi a complete control over things and especially in the philosophical interpretation given to the Middle Way (madhyamā pratipad).

A. Sūtra concerning the emptiness of things

Early Buddhism considered conditioned dharmas, coming from causes, to be impermanent, painful and without self, but as a general rule, did not doubt their reality; it acknowledged their intrinsic nature and definite characteristics. Some sūtras, however, seem to have wandered away from this realism and lean toward nihilism: they would have taught the twofold emptiness of beings and things or only the emptiness of things. Twice, without pretending to be complete, the Traité has tried to set up the list of them:

Mahāśūnyatāsūtra, Brahmajālasūtra, Pasūrasutta (p. 1079-1090F), Śreṇīkaparivṛjakaśūtra, Dīrghanakhasūtra, Sattvasūtra, Kolopamasūtra, and a few sūtras of the Pārāyana and the Arthavarga (p. 2141-2144F). The reader who is interested is referred to the indicated pages.

Candrakīrti likewise thinks that the world deprived of reality has been taught in the sūtras dealing with the śrāvaka path and gives as sample the Phenāsutta (S. III, p. 140-143) and the Kātyāyanāvavāda (S. II, p. 17): see Madh. avatāra, p. 22 (transl. Muséon, 1907, p. 271).

B. Supremacy of samādhi

The Path of nirvāṇa is a path of deliverance, of detachment in regard to the threefold world, of renunciation of the five objects of sensory enjoyment, of the taste of the trances and absorptions felt in the material world, the world of form and the formless world. This detachment follows a pure wisdom (prajñā anāsava) which cannot be acquired without the support of samādhi. The practices of the Path described in preceding chapters (chap. XXXI-XXXVIII) are samadhi insofar as they are practiced in a state of concentrated mind. They are aimed at detaching the mind from contingencies. The practitioner who is concentrated obtains a mastery of mind (cetovaśita), a mental aptitude (cittakarmanya) that makes him capable of seeing things as he wishes and even of transforming them at will. The power of conviction (adhimuktibala) is manifested particularly in the meditation on ugliness (aśubhabhāvana), the four immeasurables (apramāṇa), the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the eight spheres of mastery (abhivyāyatana) and the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana).

By the strength of twisting and kneading the object at will, the practitioner ends up by finding the emptiness of intrinsic nature (svlakṣaṇa), specific mark (nimitta), and wishlessness (apraṇihita). Those are the three doors of deliverance (vimokṣamukha) opening directly onto destruction of the three poisons and nirvāṇa. Having reached this stage, the ascetic śrāvaka practically catches up with the bodhisattva in the awareness of the true nature of things which is none other than the absence of nature. For all of this, see Traité, p. 1213-1232F.

A disciple of the Buddha, well-known in the Pāli tradition as well as the Sanskrit, without being burdened by preliminary considerations, had instinctively found the formula for good meditation. The Samthakātyāyanasūtra (see references above, p. 86F, n. 2) tells us that he had destroyed all notions whatsoever (sarvatra sarvasaṃjñā) and that he meditated by not meditating on anything (na sarvaṃ sarvaṃ iti dhyāyati). And the gods congratulated him saying: “Praise to you, excellent man, for we do not know on what you are meditating (yasya te nābhijñānmaḥ kiṃ tvaṃ nīśṛitya dhyāyasi).” This precursor of Nāgārjuna, Bhāvaviveka, Candrakīrti and Śāntideva had undoubtedly found the truth by not seeing it.

C. Interpretation of the Middle Way

Śrāvakas and bodhisattvas are also in agreement on the philosophical interpretation given to the Madhyamā pratipad, with the difference that the latter have attributed to it an absolutely unlimited extension.

In the Sermon at Benares (V'in. I, p. 10; M. I, p. 15-16; III, p. 231; S. IV, p. 330; V, p. 421; Catuspariṣad, p. 140; Mahāvastu, III, p. 331; Lalitavistara, p. 416), Śākyamuni revealed to his first disciples the Middle Way which “opens the eyes and the mind, which leads to rest, to knowledge, to enlightenment, to nirvāṇa”: this is the noble eightfold Path.

In the sources cited, this Path is a middle way insofar as it is equally distant from hedonism and rigorism, between a life of pleasure (kāmasukhallikānuyoga) and a life of mortification (ātmaklamathānuyoga).

However, other canonical passages see in it a middle way insofar as it reflects, back to back, a series of extreme and opposing philosophical views: “By not adopting these paired groups of extremes, the Tathāgata expounds the Dharma by means of the Middle Way” (etāv ubhāv antāv anupagamā madhyamayā pratipadā tathāgato dharmam deśayati).

Here are some of the extremes to which the Buddha objects:

1. To say “Everything exists” is one extreme, to say “Everything does not exist” is another (sabbaṃ atthīti ayaṃ eko anto, sabbaṃ natthīti ayāṃ dutiyo anto): S. II, p. 17, 21-23; 76, 23-27; III, p. 135, 12-13.

2. For the one who sees precisely with right wisdom the origin of the world, that which in the world is called “non-existence” does not exist; for the one who sees precisely with right wisdom the cessation of the world, that which in the world is called ‘existence’ does not exist (lokasamudayaṃ yathābhūtaṃ samyakprajñayā paśyato yā loke nāstītā sā na bhavati, lokanirodhaṃ yathābhūtaṃ samyakprajñayā paśyato yā loke ‘sthitā sā na bhavati); Nidānasamyukta, p. 169 = S. II, p. 17, 10-13.

The false view of existence, the eternalist view, is not found in the person who sees precisely, by right wisdom, the causal origin of formations. The false view of non-existence, the nihilist view, is not found in the person who sees precisely, with right wisdom, the causal cessation of the formations sahetusamṣkārasamudayaṃ yathābhūtaṃ samyakprajñayā paśyato yā bhavadrṣṭi śāśvatadrṣṭi sā na bhavati, sahetusamṣkāranirodhaṃ ca yathābhūtaṃ samyakprajñayā paśyato yā vibhavadrṣṭi ucchedadrṣṭi sāpi na bhavati); Mahāvastu, III, p. 448, 8-10.

3. The Acelasūtra has come down to us in its Pāli recension (S. II, p. 19-22) and its Sanskrit recension (Nidānasamyukta, p. 170-178), with some differences between them. The Buddha denies that suffering – meaning the world of suffering – is made by oneself (svayaṃkṛta) or made by another (parakṛta). Those who claim that it is made by oneself fall into the eternalist heresy (śāśvatadrṣṭi); those who believe that it is made by another fall into the nihilist heresy (ucchedadrṣṭi). For the same reasons, one cannot say that the person who acts is identical with the person who suffers (so karoti so paṭisaṃvediyati) or that the person who acts is other than the person who suffers (añño karoti añño paṭisaṃvediyati); one cannot say that feeling is identical with the one who feels (sā vedanā so vediyati) or that feeling is other than the one who feels (aññā vedanā añño vedayati). Avoiding these groups of extremes, the Buddha expounds the dependent origination of phenomena.

4. According to the Avijjāpaccayā (S. II, p. 61; Nidānasamyukta, p. 154, 155), to think that the living being is identical to the body (taj jīvaṃ tac charīraṃ) and to think that the living being is different from the body (anyaj jīvaṃ anyac charīraṃ) are two extreme views that make the religious life (brahmacariyavāsa) impossible.

Avoiding all these extremes, the Buddha preaches the Dharma (particularly the pratītyasamutpāda) by means of the Middle Way.

It is true that in these old canonical sūtras the refusal of the extremes is especially directed against belief in a self, but the simultaneous rejection of the astī and the nāstī, of the astitā and the nāstītā, confines the philosophy to a neutral position where it is impossible for it to affirm or deny what is. This is the position adopted by the Madhyamaka, and later (I. 43, p. 370a25-b10), the Traité will comment that it does not go against any limit. To practice the Madhyamā pratipad in the spirit of the Prajñāpāramitā is to reject all extremes: eternity (śāśvata) and annihilation (uccheda), suffering (duḥkha) and happiness (sukha), empty (śūnya) and real (tatva), self (ātman) and non-self (anātman), material things (rūpin) and non-material things (arūpin), visible (sanidarśana) and invisible (anidarśana), resistant (sapratigha) and non-resistant (apratigha), conditioned (saṃskṛta) and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), impure (sāsrava) and pure (anāsrava), mundane (laukika) and supramundane (lokottara), ignorance (avidyā) and destruction of ignorance (avidyāḥaya), old age and death (jarāmaraṇa) and cessation of old age and death (jarāmaraṇanirodha), existence (astitā) and non-existence (nāstītā) of things, bodhisattva and six pāramitās, buddha and bodhi, the six inner organs (indriya) and the six outer objects (viśaya), the perfection of wisdom and the non-perfection of wisdom. – The old canonical sūtras are not there yet but they are on the way.

Why does the Tripiṭaka go on at length about the emptiness of beings and pass rapidly over the emptiness of things? In the words of the Traité, there are several reasons. First, because the Tripiṭaka is addressed to the śrāvakas who, being weak in their faculties, understand the first more easily than the second. The bodhisattvas, on the other hand, are better prepared to understand the doctrines of the Prajñāpāramitās (cf. p. 2061F). Secondly, because beings cling especially to eternity and happiness and much less to impermanence and suffering. The worldly person is more attracted to the eternal happiness of the afterlife than to annihilation on death (p. 2102F). Thirdly and finally, for pedagogical reasons: the doctrine of the non-self serves as introduction to that of the emptiness of things and it is appropriate to speak of it first (p. 2138F).

II. EMPTINESS IN THE HINAYĀNIST SECTS

The Traité (p. 106-108F), in a few lines, has summarized the history of the first centuries of Buddhism: “When the Buddha was in this world, the Dharma encountered no obstacles. After the Buddha died, when the Dharma was recited for the first time, it was still as it was at the time when the Buddha lived. One hundred years later, king Aśoka made a grand five-yearly assembly and the great Dharma teachers debated. As a result of their differences, there were distinct sects (nikāya) each having a name, and they subsequently developed.” Each sect, or rather, each school explained their particular views in scholastic manuals (abhidharma) to which they attributed canonical value and in treatises (śāstra) signed with the names of illustrious authors.

Comparing the doctrines of the Sūtrapiṭaka, recognized broadly by all the schools, to the teachings consigned to the Abhidharmas and the Śāstras, the Traité (p. 1095F) comments as follows: “Whoever has not grasped the Prajñāpāramitā system [will come up against innumerable contradictions]: if he tackles the teaching of the Abhidharma, he falls into realism; if he tackles the teaching of emptiness, he falls into nihilism; if he tackles the teaching of the Piṭaka (= Sūtrapiṭaka), he falls [sometimes] into realism and [sometimes] into nihilism.”

Although this comment concerns especially the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma, it also has a more general range. As we have seen in the preceding section, the canonical sūtras teach mainly the sattvaśūnyatā, but sometimes also the dharmāśūnyatā, and those who read them fall sometimes into realism and sometimes into nihilism. Generally – there are some exceptions – the Abhidharmas insist on sattvaśūnyatā, but remain silent on dharmāśūnyatā; thus they risk their readers falling into realism. The Mahāyānasūtras that teach both the sattva- and the dharmāśūnyatā are difficult to interpret, and a superficial exegesis frequently ends up in nihilism.

In regard to the problem of emptiness, the Hīnayānist sects, traditionally eighteen in number, may be divided into three classes: the personalists, the realists and the nominalists.

1. The Personalists (pudgalavādin). –

Among the sects believing in the individual, in the person, the best known is that of the Vātsīputrīya-Sāṃmittīya. We know their theories roughly by the criticisms their adversaries addressed to them and from an original work, the Sāṃmittīyanikāyaśāstra, translated into Chinese (T 1649). Other authentic sources, notably the Kārikās, have been found by G. Tucci and are presently being studied.

The sect accepts a pudgala, i.e., an individual, a person, acknowledging, nevertheless, that it is neither identical with nor different from the skandhas. It is not identical with the skandhas for it would be condemned to annihilation (uccheda); it is not other than the skandhas for it would be eternal (śāśvata) and thus unconditioned (asaṃskṛta). It behaves towards the elements like fire in regard to fuel: fire is not identical with the fuel for “that which is being consumed” would be confused with “that which is consuming”; it is not different from the fuel for the fuel would not be hot (Kośa, IX, p. 234). For the sect, the pudgala is the only dharma to transmigrate (saṃkrāmatī) from this world to the other world: at death, it abandons the skandhas of the present existence to assume those of the future existence and, at the cessation of its transmigration, it remains in a nirvāṇa of which we cannot say that it does not truly exist.

These theories provoked a lively reaction in the orthodox circles and one wonders if the Pudgalavādins were still Buddhists (cf. Kośa, preliminary note to chap. IX, p. 228). At any rate, the notion of emptiness, whether that of beings or that of things, remained foreign to them.

The Traité makes some allusions to the Vatsīputrīyas (p. 43F, 112F, 424F, 616F) and attests the existence of a Vatsīputrīyābhidharma (p. 43F, 424F).

2. The Realists. –

The epithet renders only imperfectly the basic doctrinal position adopted both by the Theravādins of Ceylon and the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika of the Indian continent. Worried about rendering faithfully and clearly the mind of the Buddha, the two schools have elaborated, in parallel but independently of each other, a scholasticism voluminous in size. For the record, we may cite, on the Theravādin side, the seven books of the Abhidhamma and the Pāli Visuddhimagga; on the Sarvāstivādin side, the Śāṭpādābhidharma gathering six works around the Jñānaprasthāna of Kātyāyanīputra and the Mahāvibhāṣā of the Kashmirian arhats. E. Frauwallner's Abhidharma-Studien (see WZKSA, VII (1963), p. 20-36; VIII (1964), p. 59-99; XV (1971), p. 69-102; 103-121; XVI (1972), p. 95-152; XVII (1973), p. 97-121) has thrown new light on this literature.

The two schools may be described as realists because, while rejecting the existence of an eternal and immutable ātman, they recognize a certain reality in dharmas. In a word, they combine skandhamātravāda, the affirmation of the existence of the five skandhas only (as well as the asaṃskṛta), with nairātmyavāda, the negation of the person.

The author of the Traité seems to be unaware of the existence of the Theravādins of Ceylon; by contrast, he has at his fingertips the works of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas to which he often refers (see, e.g., p. 109-110F, 11F, 245F, 285F, 424F, 614F, 786F, 787F, 1697F, 1715F, etc.). He was broadly dependent on this school; one could say that it is to it that he addresses his work. Here we must say a few words about this.

To begin with, the Sarvāstivādins distinguish two classes of things: i) those that exist by designation only (prajñaptisat), truly conventional (saṃvṛtisatya), and ii) those that really exist (dravyasat, vastusat), truly absolute (paramārthasatya): cf. Kośa, II, p. 186, 214.

The first are names only serving, out of convention, to designate groups, groups that are valid only insofar as their parts are not in turn subdivisible. Thus an army is reduced to the soldiers that compose it, a forest to its trees, cloth to its threads. The chariot does not in itself exist, merely as a designation of the parts that enter into its manufacture: caisson, shaft, wheels, etc. In the same way, the ātman, the soul, the self, is a simple label applied to the groupings of skandhas, āyatanas or dhātus; there is no substantial entity there, no one to be, to act or to feel.

Nevertheless there do exist – and it is in this that the Sarvāstivādins show themselves as realists – simple facts, recalcitrant to analysis, which truly exist, brief though their duration may be, with a specific intrinsic nature or character (svabhāva = svalakṣaṇa) and some general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa). These are, for example, the atom of color which cannot be broken, feeling, concept, mental activity and consciousness, each of which forms in itself an indivisible entity.

The Sarvāstivādins have carefully analyzed these realities and, without necessarily forgetting the classification already proposed by the canonical scriptures, have drawn up a new list, the Pañcavastuka. The dharmas are sixty-six in number and are divided into five classes:

a. the three asaṃskṛtas or unconditioned: space (ākāśa) which does not obstruct matter and is not obstructed by it; the two kinds of nirvāṇa: the cessation of suffering by means of the awareness (pratisaṃkhyanirodha) that consists of the understanding of the truths and the disjunction from impure dharmas; the cessation of suffering not due to the awareness (apratisaṃkhyanirodha) that consists of the absolute prevention of the arising of future dharmas.

The dharmas that follow in the list are sixty-two in number and are all saṃskṛta, conditioned or the results of causes. They are divided into four groups:

b. the 11 rūpa, material dharmas, namely: the 5 indriya, sense organs, the 6 viśaya, objects, and avijñapti.

c. the citta, also called manas, mind, or vijñāna, consciousness. It is pure and simple awareness, without any content.

d. the 46 caitta, mental or psychic factors, concomitant with the mind and cooperating with it.

e. the 14 cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra, dissociated from the mind which are neither matter nor mind. Among these are the four ‘characteristics of conditioned dharmas’ (saṃskṛtalakṣaṇa): birth (jāti), old age (jāra), duration (sthiti) and impermanence (anityatā), by virtue of which conditioned dharmas arise, endure for a brief instant, decay and disappear.

Like the skandhas, āyatanas and dhātus listed by the canonical sūtras, the 72 *saṃskṛtadharma*s of the Sarvāstivādin make up the whole lot (sarvam), suffering (duḥkha), the world (loka) of suffering. Causes and caused, impermanent, painful, empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’, they form a series (saṃtāna) that transmigrates through the existences of the three times, is defiled or is purified due to the delusions and passions (kleśa), as a result of actions (karman). These dharmas are true, but under the action of their general characteristics, the characteristics of the conditioned, their manifestation last only a very short time, so short that they perish there where they are born, which renders movement impossible..

By acknowledging a true nature and true characteristics in dharmas, the Sarvāstivādin show themselves to be realists; by limiting their duration to a strict minimum and refusing to them any ātman worthy of the name, they lapse into phenomenalism and thus endanger their own system.

The Sarvāstivādin were to be attacked head on by one of their subjects, that of the Sautrāntikas, so called because they rejected the Abhidharmas and recognized no other authority than the canonical sūtras. Their most qualified spokesperson was Vasubandhu, the author of the Abhidharmakośa, who lived, according to E. Frauwallner, between 400 and 480 AD. He was certainly later than the author of the Traité, but, although the latter makes no mention of the Kośa, he was perfectly aware of the Sautrāntika doctrines, even if this was only by consulting the Mahāvibhāṣā. In the criticisms that he raises against the Sarvāstivādin, in regard to, for example, the three times (p. 1690-1694F), he meets and uses the Sautrāntika argumentation. However, in the actual state of the information, it is not possible to know with any certitude who was the borrower and who was the lender.

Be that as it may, without lapsing into eternalism or nihilism, the Sautrāntikas seriously gave the realism of the Sarvāstivādin a heavy pounding. The latter, as their name indicates, based their system on the existence of the dharmas of the three times, past, present and future “because the Bhagavat said, it, because the mental consciousness proceeds from the organ and the object and because the past bears a fruit.” The Sautrāntikas reject any temporal distinction “because if past and future things really exist, the dharmas coming from causes (saṃskṛta) would always exist and would thus be eternal. And yet scripture and reasoning declare that they are impermanent.” On this subject, see Kośa, V, p. 50-65, and Documents d’Abhidharma, published by L. de La Vallée Poussin in MCB, V, 1936-1937, p. 7-158.

In addition, the Sautrāntikas noticeably reduced the list of 75 dharmas recognized as real by the Sarvāstivādin. For them, the three asaṃskṛtas are false, for space (ākāśa) is the simple absence of matter, and nirvāṇa is, after the destruction of the passions and the dharmas of existence, the absence of their renewal. Nirvāṇa is the culmination, negative and unreal, of a dependent origination which was positive and real; it is a paścad abhāva, non-existence following after existence, a nirodha, none other than cessation (Kośa, II, p. 282-284). – The Sautrāntikas accept the non-existence of the mind, but reject the caittas completely or partially (Kośa, II, p. 150, n.). – Finally they consider the 14 dissociated dharmas (viprayuktasaṃskāra) as purely inventions of the mind. In particular, birth, duration, old age and impermanence of the conditioned dharmas are not things in themselves, distinct from the dharmas that arise and that perish, but simple modifications of the series which begins, is prolonged, is modified and perishes (Kośa, II, p. 226-238). Destruction is spontaneous (ākasmika): the dharma perishes incessantly by itself, is incessantly reborn from itself under normal conditions. The dharma-cause produces the dharma-effect in the same way that one balance-pan rises when the other descends (Kośa, IV, p. 4-8).

Thus, not content with eliminating a number of dharmas, the Sautrāntikas reduced the duration of those that it wanted to spare practically to zero. The dharmas are instantaneous (kṣanika), for it is in their nature to perish as soon as they are born.

In order to bring about these somber cuts in the Sarvāstivādin forest, the Sautrāntikas claimed to follow, among other sources, a sūtra where the Buddha said: “Here, O monks, are five things that are only names, designations, conventions, manners of speaking, namely: the past, the future, space, nirvāṇa and pudgala” (cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 389; Kośa, IV, p. 5, n. 2). However, their nominalism was not complete, for by maintaining a number, however restricted, of real entities like rūpa and citta, and above all, by accepting the mechanism of dependent origination as the nature of things, these relentless critics remain ‘realists’ on the philosophical level.

3. The Nominalists

– In terms of the old canonical sūtras, the group of the saṃskṛtadharma limited by the five skandhas, the twelve āyatanas, the twelve dhātus constituted a reality called sarvam, the all (S. IV, p. 15), loka, the world (S. IV, p. 52, 54) or, as well, duḥkha, suffering (S. IV, p. 28). It is on this realist basis that the Sarvāstivādin and the Sautrāntikas elaborated their respective theories. In contrast, a Hināyānist sect derived from the Mahāsāṃghikas saw in the skandhas, the āyatanas and the dhātus simple nominal beings only, without the least reality. The practitioners of this sect were designated by the name Prajñāptivādin, i.e., ‘Nominalists’.

In his syllabus of the sects, the Samayabhedoparacanacakra (transl. Hiuan-tsang, T 2013, p. 16a17-18), the historian Vasumitra, who lived in the 4th century after the Nirvāṇa, attributes the following three theses to the Prajñāptivādin: 1) duḥkha is not the skandhas; 2) the twelve āyatanas are not really true; 3) the saṃskāras that combine in interdependence and succession are metaphorically (prajñāpyante) called duḥkha.” To express oneself thus is to deny any reality to conditioned things and their dependent origination; it is complete Madhyamaka.

Moreover, the Prajñāptivādin had inaugurated the Śūnyavāda by drawing up a list of ten emptinesses. In the Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 104, p. 540a20, we read: “The Prajñāptivādin (Che-chō-louen) say that there are many śūnyatās: 1) adhyātma-ś., 2) bahirdhā-ś., 3) adhyātmabahirdhā-ś., 4) saṃskṛta-ś., 5) asaṃskṛta-ś., 6) atyanta-ś., 7) prakṛti-ś., 8) apavṛtti-ś., 9) paramārtha-ś. 10) śūnyatā-ś. These ten types of śūnyatā are examined in other places (cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 8, p. 37a12-15; T 1546, k. 4, p. 27a17-19). Why distinguish so many emptinesses? Because their practice serves as antidote (pratipakṣa) to twenty kinds of belief in personality, [in viṃśaśīkharasamudgata satkāyadṛṣṭisaila]. These twenty kinds of belief in the person, roots of all the passions (sarvakeśamūla), persist in saṃsāra and do not end up in nirvāṇa: they are serious faults and this is why the emptinesses which are their close counteragents are often spoken of.”

Were the Prajñaptivādins the inventors of these ten śūnyatās or were they borrowed from the Mahāyānists? These are questions that cannot be answered at the moment because of the absence of any information. But it will be noted that in the opinion of the Vibhāṣā, the ten śūnyatās of the Prajñaptivādins were directed solely against belief in the ātman whereas they perhaps also countered the reality of things.

Be that as it may, and as the Traité would have it, it should be recognized that, taken altogether, the study of the Abhidharmas and the Hīnayānist śāstras leads to a qualified realism rather than a complete nihilism.

III. EMPTINESS ACCORDING TO THE MADHYAMAKA

As we have just seen, the early schools of the Theravādins and the Sarvāstivādins thought to interpret the canonical doctrines correctly by comparing the dharmas that exist only as designation (prajñaptisat, nāmamātra), such as an army, a forest, the pitcher, the ātman, with a series of dharmas that exist in reality (dravyasat, vastusat) some of which, the saṃskṛtas, arise due to causes and others, the asaṃskṛtas, are uncaused.

1. The canonical sūtras established three lists of saṃskṛtas each covering the same grouping: the five skandhas, the twelve āyatanas and the eighteen dhātus. While keeping these classifications, the Theravādins put next to them a list of 81 *saṃskṛtadharma*s (plus 1 asaṃskṛta), and the Sarvāstivādins, a list of 72 *saṃskṛtadharma*s (plus 3 asaṃskṛtas): see H. von Glasenapp, Die Philosophie der Inder, Stuttgart, 1949, p. 330 and 334.

The saṃskṛtas (also called saṃskāras) are characterized by three or four saṃskṛtalakṣaṇas: arising (utpāda), disappearance (vyaya) and duration-change (sthityanyathātva).

Although they do not exist in themselves, they are real (dravyasat, vastusat) insofar as they have an intrinsic nature or their own character (svabhāva = svalakṣaṇa: Kośa, VI, p. 159) and general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa): they are impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātman).

Basing themselves on the great majority of canonical sūtras, the Theravādins and the Sarvāstivādins, in their Abhidharmas, profess the non-self (nairātmya), the emptiness of the being or the person (satvaśūnyatā, pudgalaśūnyatā). By self (ātman) is meant a permanent (nitya), stable (dhruva), eternal (śāśvata) and immutable (avipariṇāmadharman) entity. Now the saṃskṛtas (skandhas, āyatanas or dhātus) are impermanent, precarious, of very brief not to say instantaneous duration, and show perpetual changing in their own nature and their characteristics. Therefore they are not a self, do not belong to a self: they are ‘empty of me and mine’ (śūnyā ātmanā cātmiyena ca).

Being causes and coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamutpanna), these saṃskṛtas are carried away in the round of a saṃsāra that has had no beginning. The skandhas forming series appear and disappear from moment to moment according to the immutable process of the ‘twelve-membered dependent origination’ (dvādaśāṅgapratītyasamutpāda) going from ignorance to old age-death: “This being, that is; from the production of this, that is produced, i.e., the formations have as condition ignorance, old age and death has as condition birth, and so this is the origin of the entire great mass of suffering.

Conversely, this not being, that is not; by the destruction of this, that is destroyed, i.e., from the destruction of ignorance there results the destruction of the formations, from the destruction of birth results the destruction of old age and death, and such is the destruction of the entire great mass of suffering.” The arising and perishing skandhas are present in each of the twelve stages of the pratītyasamutpāda, for, as the Kośa, III, p. 60 and 66 comments, the series of the skandhas that develops in the existences is the twelve-membered pratītyasamutpāda and its members are called by the name of the dharma that is the most important therein.

The pratītyasamutpāda makes up the true nature (dharmatā) of conditioned dharmas: “Whether the Tathāgatas appear or whether the Tathāgatas do not appear, this dharma-nature of the dharmas (dharmāṇām dharmatā) remains stable” (references in Traité, p. 157F; add Nidānasamyukta, p. 148, 164).

2. In contrast to the saṃskṛtas there are the asaṃskṛtas or unconditioned. The canonical texts and the Abhidharmas of the Theravādins know only one, namely, nirvāṇa; the Sarvāstivādins have three, namely, space (ākāśa) and the two ‘types’ of nirvāṇa. Differing from the saṃskṛtas, they are without birth, without disappearance and without duration-change (A. I, p. 152) and completely escape the law of pratītyasamutpāda. One would like to think that nirvāṇa is an abode of eternal bliss, but it is in no way an ātman. In the words of the third seal of the Dharma, all dharmas, saṃskṛta as well as asaṃskṛta, are non-self (anātmānaḥ sarvadharmāḥ) and, what is more, there is no one to enter into nirvāṇa.

The Sarvāstivādin scholasticism is a grandiose but fragile edifice. We saw above how it was attacked head on by the Sautrāntikas. The last blow was delivered by the Mahāyānists, particularly the Mādhyamikas.

The author of the Traité has, to a great extent, contributed to this work of demolition by taking his inspiration from some canonical sūtras that profess the twofold emptiness, from a number of Mahāyānasūtras among which are primarily the Prajñāpāramitasūtras, and finally from the philosophical śāstras of the Madhyamaka school, signed by the great names of Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva and Rahulabhadra. Here I [Lamotte] will try to summarize his position with the aid of the works of L. de La Vallée Poussin, R. Grousset, E. Conze and J. May which have been especially useful to me. In the pages that follow, the abbreviations used are:

P. = Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā; Ś. = Śatasāhasrikā; Madh. kār. = Madhyamakakārikā by Nāgārjuna; Madh. vṛtti = Prasannapadā by Candrakīrti; Madh. av. = Madhyamakāvatāra also by Candrakīrti.

In the search for the Mystery, the Thomist scholasticism uses the triple method of negation (via negationis), of causality (via causalitatis) and of transcendence (via eminentiae); the Mādhyamika scholasticism resorts to the first, evades the second and substitutes for the third a cautious silence (via silentii).

The system rests on the distinction between the two truths: i) the conventional truth or truth of worldly convention (saṃvṛtisatya) marred by realism, pluralism and determinism and built up on ignorance alone; ii) the absolute truth (paramārthasatya) which, while rejecting realism, keeps itself from falling into nihilism and thus takes a Middle Way (madhyamā pratipad) between negation and affirmation, a path leading to the stopping of the mind and of speech. – See Madh. vṛtti, p. 491-499 (J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 224-234); Traité, p. 27F, 1091F, 1101F, 1379F, etc.

1. Rejection of realism

Capable of being envisaged under various aspects, the doctrine of emptiness is applied to all dharmas (sarvadharmasūnyatā) without exception (atyantaśūnyatā). Dharmas are empty of intrinsic nature (svabhāvasūnyatā), essence (prakṛtiśūnyatā) and specific nature (svalakṣaṇasūnyatā). They are also without general characteristics and elude causality. They do not truly exist: they are merely designations (prajñapti), simple names (nāmamātra). No longer are there distinctions between inner dharmas (adhyātmasūnyatā), outer dharmas (bahirdhāśūnyatā) and both inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā), or between conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtasūnyatā) and unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtadharmasūnyatā).

Without pretending to be complete, the Ś. (p. 930-936) attempts to draw up the list of empty dharmas. Everything imagined by worldly persons (prthagjana) or by the saints (ārya) appears in it: the five skandhas, the twelve āyatanas, the eighteen dhātus, the twelve āṅgas of the prāṭītyasamutpāda, the six pāramitās, the eighteen śūnyatās, the thirty-seven bodhipākṣikadharmas and other dharmas supplementary to the Path (4 āryasatyas, 4 dhyānas, 4 apramāṇas, 4 ārūpyasamāpattis, 8 vimokṣas, 9 anupūrvasamāpattis, 3 vimokṣasamukhas, 6 abhijñās, 112 samādhis, 43 dhāraṇīmukhas), finally, all the Buddhadharmas (10 tathāgatabalas, 4 vaiśāradyas, 4 pratisaṃvids, mahāmaitrī, mahākaruṇā, 18 āveṇikabuddhadharmas): in brief, all possible and imaginable dharmas, from rūpa up to the sarvākārajñatā of the Buddhas.

It is to be noted that the eighteen śūnyatās appear in the list. It is that they perform no action, and each time the sūtra adds: “It is not by means of the thing’s emptiness that this thing is empty; the thing itself is emptiness, the very emptiness is the thing (e.g., na rūpaśūnyatayā rūpaṃ śūnyam rūpam eva śūnyatā śūnyataiva rūpam).

If one examines this universal emptiness, the following deductions are reached:

1) The saṃskṛtas are empty of intrinsic nature (svabhāva), essence (prakṛti) or self-character (svalakṣaṇa). Matter is devoid of materiality and all the rest in keeping (P., p. 128, ii; Ś. p. 554, 6: rūpaṃ rūpeṇa śūnyam). Matter is devoid of the character of matter (P., p. 137, 12; Ś., p. 653, 11: rūpaṃ virahitaṃ rūpalakṣaṇeṇa). The bodhisattva should consider all these dharmas as empty of essence (P., 132, 23; Ś., p. 613, 5: bodhisattvena prakṛtiśūnyāḥ sarvadharmāḥ pratyavekṣitavyāḥ).

If the intrinsic nature of dharmas were a real self-nature, a being in itself, it would be innate (nija), non-artificial (akṛtrima), independent of other (parānapekṣa), permanent (nitya) and immutable (avipariṇāmadhrman) (Madh. kāra., XIII, 1-3; Madh. vṛtti, p. 262-263). But the nature of dharmas seemed to be caused, manufactured, subject to conditions, permanent and changing. Thus water is cold, but if it is put near a pot of hot coals, it becomes hot and takes on the nature of the fire; once the embers are cold, it becomes cold (Traité, p. 2112F). Therefore the intrinsic nature of dharmas is a non-nature: the intrinsic nature of rūpa is a non-nature (P., p. 137, 2-3; Ś. p. 664, 17: abhāvo rūpasya svabhāvaḥ) and it is the same for all the skandhas, dhātus, āyatanas, prāṭītyasamutpāda, up to and including the pinnacle of the truth (bhūtaakoṭi) which is empty of the nature of bhūtaakoṭi (P., p. 137, 9-11).

2) The saṃskṛtas, empty of nature and self characteristics, are likewise devoid of general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa), impermanence, etc., because applied to natures that are not so, these general characteristics are without substratum. It would be futile to try to find impermanence (anityatā), suffering (duḥkhatā), non-self (anātmata), calm (śantatā), emptiness (śūnyatā), absence of marks (animitta), insignificance (aprañihitatā) and isolation (viviktatā) in them. Therefore the impermanence of rūpa is empty of the impermanence of rūpa, and it is the same for all the general characteristics applied to the skandhas (P., p. 131, 5-132, 2; Ś., p. 568, 8-580-16: rūpānityatā anityatāsvabhāvena śūnyā, etc., etc.). Dharmas have but one characteristic: the absence of characteristics (P., p. 164, 225, 244, 258, 261, 262: ekalakṣaṇā yadutālakṣaṇāḥ; Traité, p. 1376F, 1382F, 1694F, 1703F, etc.).

3) The saṃskṛtas are the result of causes (prāṭītyasamutpanna) only in apparent truth. They are dharmas empty of self existence and of characteristics that arise from dharmas empty of self existence and of characteristics (Prāṭītyasamutpādhṛdayakārikā, no. 4, cited in Pañjikā, p. 355, 14; 532, 5: śūnebhya eva śūnyā dharmāḥ prabhavanti dharmebhyaḥ).

The early sources (Saṃyutta, II, p. 25; Nidānasamyukta, p. 147-149; Anguttara, I, p. 286) considered as ‘dharma-nature of the dharmas’ the twelve-membered prāṭītyasamutpāda controlling the production and destruction of the saṃskṛtas throughout the cycle of existence (saṃsāra). This dharma-nature of the dharmas they called dhātu, dharmatthitatā, dharmānīyāmatā, idappaccayatā (Pāli listing); dharmatā dharmasthītītā, dharmānīyāmatā, dharmayathāthātā, avitathatā, ananyathā, bhūtaakoṭi, satyatā, tattvā yathāthātā, avipaṭitā, aviparyāsathātā, idaṃpratyayatā (Sanskrit listing), but we should not be impressed by the accumulation of these abstract nouns.

Actually: “That which arises from conditions is in fact unborn; there is no real production for it. That which depends on conditions is declared to be empty. He who knows emptiness is not fooled.” (Madh. vṛtti, p. 239, 491, 500, 504; Pañjikā, p. 355: yaḥ pratyayair jāyati sa hy ajāto, na tasya utpādu sabhāto ‘eti; yaḥ pratyayādhīnu sa śūnya ukto, yaḥ śūnyatām jānati so ‘pramattaḥ).

A dependent production which, if one may say so, functions in emptiness, is not that. It is inefficacious in itself and in its twelve members (aṅga). In fact, ignorance is empty of ignorance and so on up to old age and death, empty in turn of old age and death (P., p. 129, 17-130, 2; Ś., p. 558, 19-559, 22: avidyā avidyātvēna śūnyā... yāvaj paramāraṇanam jāramaraṇatvena śūnyam). And this alleged ‘dharma nature of dharmas’, that is called tathatā, dharmatā, dharmadhātu, dharmānīyamtatā, bhūtaakoṭi, etc., is likewise empty of intrinsic nature (P., p. 132, 3-8; Ś., 580, 17-582, 3), does not exist and is not perceived (na vidyate nopalabhyate: P., p. 136, 7; Ś., p. 580, 17-582, 3).

Nāgārjuna also said: “Dependent production we call emptiness; it is a metaphorical designation; it is the Middle Way” (Madh. kāṛ., XXIV, 18: Yāḥ pratītyasamutpādaḥ śūnyatām tām pracakṣmahe; sā prajñaptir upādāya pratipat saiva madhyamā. – Cf. J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 237 and note 840). Homage to the Teacher “who has taught that the pratītyasamutpāda is without destruction (anīrodha), without production (anutpāda), without interruption (anuccheda), without permanence (aśāśvata), without identity (anekārtha), without multiplicity (anānārtha), without coming (anāgama), without going (anirgama)” (Madh. vṛtti, p. 3, 11). Those are the “eight non’s” of Nāgārjuna which the Traité cites twice (p. 326F, 1638F); for its author, to teach the pratītyasamutpāda conclusively is to reject the whole system for the experience only of the true nature that underlies it, namely, the absence of nature (p. 351F).

Pratītyasamutpāda being empty, saṃsāra, or the succession of births and deaths due to impassioned actions, has never begun. By that very fact, nirvāṇa, which marks the cessation of saṃsāra, is acquired at any time. Being the interruption of a process that has never begun, nirvāṇa is devoid of the nature of nirvāṇa. “There is the emptiness of the absolute. The absolute is nirvāṇa and this nirvāṇa is empty of nirvāṇa” (P., p. 196, 9; Ś., p. 1408, 20-21; Paramārthaśūnyatā; paramārtha ucyate nirvāṇam, tac ca nirvāṇena śūnyam). Meeting in emptiness, saṃsāra and nirvāṇa are identical: there is not the slightest difference between saṃsāra and nirvāṇa (Madh. kāṛ., XXV, 19; Traité, p. 1142F: Na saṃsārasya nirvāṇāt kiṃcid asti viśeṣaṇam).

4) Devoid of the characteristics of saṃskṛta (production, duration and destruction), would not the saṃskṛtadharma actually be asaṃskṛta, defined precisely by the absence of these same characteristics? Without a doubt, but as we have just seen, the saṃskṛtas are simple designations (prajñaptisat) and, by virtue of the solidarity of opposites (pratidvandvīśādharmya), wherever a given fact does not exist, its contrary does not exist either (Madh. vṛtti, p. 287, 15). But the saṃskṛtas, without production, duration and destruction, do not exist. Therefore their opposite, the asaṃskṛtas, do not exist either (Madh. kāṛ., VII, 33; Traité, p. 2080F).

5) In conclusion, conditioned or unconditioned, dharmas do not exist and are not perceived (P., p. 135, 20; Ś., p. 642: dharmā na vidyante nopalabhyante); they are unborn and without beginning (P., p. 137, 19-138, 1; Ś., p. 675, 5: ajātā aniryātāḥ sarvadharmāḥ); they are in fact pacified from the very beginning, unproduced and nirvaṇized in essence (Ratnameghasūtra, cited in Madh. vṛtti, p. 225, 9: ādiśantā hy anutpannāḥ prakṛtyaiva ca nirvṛtāḥ).

Candrakīrti has summarized fully the Mādhyamika attitude in regard to dharmas and, since his final word scandalizes some of our thinkers, it must be cited here in the original text (Madh. vṛtti, p. 265, 6-8) and in the translation given to it by L. de La Vallée Poussin (Madhyamaka, p. 41):

Akṛtrimaḥ svabhāvo hi nirapekṣaḥ ca iti vyavasthāpayāmbabhūvur ācāryā iti vijñeyam. Sa caṣa bhāvānām anutpādātmakaḥ svabhāvo 'kiṃcittvenābhāvamātravād asvabhāva eveti kṛtvā bhāvasvabhāva iti vijñeyam. – “This intrinsic nature the Teacher has defined as non-artificial, independent (or absolute). This intrinsic nature of things consists of their non-production; being none other than what is (akiṃcittvena), being merely non-existence (abhāvamātra), it is a non-self nature (asvabhāva); therefore the intrinsic nature of dharmas is not (nāsti bhāvasvabhāvaḥ).” (transl. L. de La Vallée Poussin, l.c.).

Whether one speaks of it in positive or negative terms does not change anything. The Prajñās call it non-arising (anutpāda), non-destruction (anīrodha), non-defilement (asaṃkleśa), non-purification (avyavadāna), non-manifestation (aprādurbhāva), non-grasping (anupalambha), non-accomplishment (anabhisamkāra), but also purity (viśuddhi): cf. P., p. 146, 19-20; Ś., p. 842, 12-14.

The Traité prefers to designate it by the name of dharmatā, a term which Kumārajīva usually renders by the characters tshou-fa-che-siang, ‘true nature of dharmas’, but this true nature has as its sole nature the absence of characteristics.

As we have seen in the preceding chapters, the highest aspiration of the bodhisattvas is to accede to the knowledge of non-production (anutpādajñāna) or, according to the time-honored expression, to anutpattikadharmakṣānti, the conviction that dharmas do not arise, a conviction definitively acquired (pratilabha) in the eighth bhūmi. By means of it and without either effort or change in the mind (cittānubhoga), the bodhisattva cognizes the true nature of dharmas (cf. above, p. 1788F).

2. Rejection of nihilism

Opponents of realism, the Mādhyamikas are also resistant to nihilism. Thus they are separated from the radical negativism of the Nāstikas and the semi-negativism of the Theravādins and the Sarvāstivādins.

The Nāstika is a heretic who denies production due to causes, falls into the pit of wrong view par excellence (mithyādrṣṭi), the negation of the life to come, of cause and fruit, of action and retribution. He breaks the roots of good (kuśalamūla) that are innate in everyone and by virtue of which we are able to do good and avoid evil (Kośa, IV, p. 170). Thus he turns his back on nirvāṇa and is infallibly reborn in the hells (cf. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Madhyamaka, p. 25; Traité, p. 1091-1092F).

The Theravādin and, more so, the Sarvāstivādin who ‘professes the existence of everything’, acknowledge a reality and an ephemeral causality in the saṃskṛtadharma, but deny to them a substantial self and proclaim them to be empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’. They grasp an empty aspect in these dharmas (Kośa, VII, p. 31). They profess a qualified nihilism, but a nihilism just the same.

The Mādhyamikas want nothing to do with it. Rejecting respectively the views of existence and non-existence, they halt any subject of preaching and make negation and affirmation both impossible. The predicate assumes a subject and, in the absence of a subject, it loses any meaning. This is why the Mādhyamikas do not grasp, are unable to seize any part whatsoever of a characteristic mark (nimitta), empty or real (Traité, p. 1093F).

In his Madh. kāṛ., V, 8, Nāgārjuna says: “The fools who see the existence (astitva) and the non-existence (nāstitva) of essences do not see the beneficial pacification of the empirical world (draṣṭavyopasaṃaṇ śivam).” And Candrakīrti, in his Madh. vṛtti (p. 135-136) rests this kārīkā on a citation of the Samādhirājasūtra: To say “it is”, to say “it is not”, those are both extremes (anta). “Pure” (śuddhin) and “impure” (aśuddhin) are also extremes. This is why, having sidestepped the two extremes, the wise man keeps his place at the middle (madhya). “It is” and “it is not” give rise to controversy (vivāda); “pure” and “impure” also give rise to controversy. When there is controversy, suffering (duḥkha) is not appeased; beyond controversy, suffering ceases.

By prohibiting affirmation, negation and prevarication, the Mādhyamikas establish themselves on neutral ground where nobody can attack them.

3. Emptiness and the Middle Way

Prajñāpāramitā is the non-grasping and the non-rejection of all dharmas (P., p.135, 2: yaḥ sarvadharmāṇām aparigraho 'natsargaḥ sā prajñāpāramitā). In the same perspective, the śūnyatā that avoids the extremes of existence and non-existence is the rejection of all wrong views (Kāśyapaparivarta, § 65: sarvadr̥ṣṭikṛtānām hi śūnyatā niḥsaraṇam. – Madh. kār., XIII, 8: śūnyatā sarvadr̥ṣṭinām proktā niḥsaraṇam jinaiḥ).

It is a tool by means of which the mind is purified, but a tool that must be used with care and rejected as soon as it has fulfilled its purpose, like the raft after the river has been crossed (Traité, p. 64F), a medicine after the cure (ibid., p. 1227F, 2066F), a magic spell after the miracle (Madh. kār., XXIV, 11).

“But the comparison that the Madhyamaka prefers, inherited from the Majjhima (I, p. 134), is the comparison of the snake (alagadda) that carries miraculous gems on its crest. The gems will make the fortune of the person who ‘captures’ the snake properly, but the snake fatally stings the person who ‘captures’ it improperly” (L. de La Vallée Poussin, Madhyamaka, p. 32, summarizing the Madh. vṛtti, p. 497).

One captures śūnyatā improperly and is stung by the snake when one posits an emptiness in itself. The emptiness which is the means of escaping from wrong views does not posit an absolute that itself would become the object of a wrong view, a śūnyatādr̥ṣṭi. In a paragraph of the Kāśyapaparivarta often invoked by other sources (cf. Traité, p. 1227-1228F), the Buddha says to his disciple: “It is not by means of emptiness that one makes the dharmas empty, but the dharmas themselves are empty... It is this consideration indeed that is called the Middle Way. Actually, those who take refuge in emptiness by grasping an emptiness (śūnyatopamabhena), them I declare to be lost to my teaching (naṣṭaprapaṇṣṭā itopravacanāt). A view of the individual (pudgaladr̥ṣṭi) as high as Sumeru is better than a view of emptiness (śūnyatādr̥ṣṭi) in the one who wrongly clings to it. Emptiness is the means of avoiding all kinds of wrong views; on the other hand, he who has this very emptiness as a belief, him I declare to be incurable (acikitsya).”

The danger is so great that, in order to prevent this sickness, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras, apart from the emptinesses excluding the dharmas, distinguish an emptiness of emptiness (śūnyatāśūnyatā), excluding all the others. Thus, when brigands infest a country, it requires a strong man to destroy them; but when the latter has imposed his law, another strong man must be called upon to kill him (Traité, p. 2066F).

Moreover, as we have already seen, the absolute, which is called tathatā, dharmadhātu. fundamental element, etc., is devoid of absolute self nature: “Tathatā is empty of the intrinsic nature of tathatā, and this emptiness of tathatā is not tathatā; apart from tathatā, there is no emptiness; tathatā itself is emptiness; emptiness itself is tathatā” (P., p. 132, 4-5; Ś. P. 580, 18-20: Tathatā tathatāsvabhāvena śūnyā; yā ca tathatāyāḥ śūnyatā na sā tathatā, na cānyatra tathatāyāḥ śūnyatā; tathataiva śūnyatā, śūnyataiva tathatā).

If you look for emptiness, you will not find it anywhere. It is merged with the ‘dharma-nature’ of dharmas, and these exist and arise only in apparent truth. So little do they exist that in absolute truth it cannot be said that they are or that they are not. Do not say that if you do not find them it is because of the weakness of your knowledge: “It is because the dharmas do not truly exist that they are not perceived, and not because of weakness of knowledge... The Buddha himself acknowledged: ‘Since my first production of the mind of Bodhi to the moment I became Buddha, a Buddha with the ten powers, I have looked for a reality in dharmas without ever finding it.’ That is indeed anupalambhaśūnyatā, or emptiness consisting of non-perception” (Traité, p. 2145-2146F).

This kind of talk is difficult and who is able to hear it? Not, certainly, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Only the bodhisattva skilled in skilful means (upāyakuśala), duly instructed by good friends (kalyāṇamitra) and practicing the Perfection of Wisdom will understand this talk without trembling, without shuddering, without shivering (nottrasyati na saṁtrasyati na saṁtrāsam āpadyate).

Ordinary people – of all eras – will be dizzied by emptiness and will desperately seek a reality (an absolute, a nirvāṇa) onto which they grab hold. And since the views of existence and non-existence are wrong, they will think that they find nirvāṇa in a higher synthesis of existence and non-existence. But here the way of transcendence (via eminentiae) leads to absurdity. The Buddha stated that existence (bhāva) and non-existence (abhāva) should be abandoned, but nirvāṇa, deliverance (mokṣa), should be kept. If nirvāṇa were both existence and non-existence, it should be both abandoned and kept; as nirvāṇa, it would be real, not produced by causes and non-conditioned, but as the synthesis of existence and non-existence, it would be unreal, produced by causes and conditioned (Madh. kār., XXV, 10-13). Thus worldly people, not utilizing emptiness at all, the sole tool that would appease their minds, turn their backs on the Middle Way and are engulfed in stupidity (moha).

The only efficacious absolute, which is not perceived (does not exist), is the emptiness of all dharmas.

In his Pañjikā (p. 427, 2-9) on the Bodhicaryāvatāra, Prajñākaramati writes:

Sarva eva bhāvā āropitam anāropitam ceti rūpadvayam udvahanti / tatra tad avidyāpravāhitam āropitam rūpaṃ tat sarvajanasādhāraṇam iti na tadupalabdheḥ saṃkleśaprahāṇam upapadyate / anyathā sarve bālajanās tathāgatāḥ syur iti prācīnaprasaṅgaḥ / ity anāropitam eva tattvam anu[pa]lambhayoge[nā] dhigamyamānam ajñānasravakṣayāya sāmāthyavad upalabhyate / tac ca prajñayā vivecyamānam sarvadharmānupalambhalakṣaṇam avasitam iti satvadharmasūnyataiva sarvāvaraṇavibhramaprahāṇāya patiyasīty avagamyate //

Translation. – All things (bhāva) have two natures (rūpa): one (erroneously attributed) superimposed nature and one non-superimposed nature. The superimposed nature, carried by ignorance, is (a mistake) common to all humanity; and it is not by perceiving this nature that the destruction of the defilements is made possible. In the opposite case, the obvious result would be that all fools are tathāgatas. Thus only the non-superimposed absolute (tattva), attained by a method of non-perception, would seem to be capable of destroying the impurities of non-knowledge. And this absolute, discerned by wisdom, leads to the non-perception of any dharma: it is, purely and simply, the emptiness of all dharmas, and it is clear that it is perfectly capable of destroying all obstacles and mental problems.

- Now we must see how it is accessed.

4. Progression to silence

As we have seen above (p. 1796F), the career of the bodhisattva essentially involves four stages (avasthā) distributed over two levels (bhūmi), but it is already at the fourth stage and the eighth bhūmi when the bodhisattva has attained anupattikadharmakṣānti that he accedes to the silence which is the philosophy of the sages (āryāṇām tūṣṇīmbhāva). Without going into these systematizations, the present note will attempt to show how the bodhisattva (or the Mahāyānist) arrives at the desired goal by textual studies, negation of the apparently real and spontaneous elimination of this negation.

1. STUDY OF THE TEXTS. –

In order to enter into the great concentrations (samādhi) on emptiness, it is necessary to pass through the lesser ‘gate of means’ (upāyamukha): to learn, recite, memorize, study and apply the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras (Traité, p. 2047F). Study of this voluminous literature is the condition for success.⁴⁰¹ And besides, the other Mahāyānasūtras invariably end with the same demand and promise their readers invaluable spiritual and material benefits.

2. NEGATION OF THE APPARENTLY REAL. –

It must be understood that things (dharma) as they appear to the deluded minds of worldly people (prthagjana) and to the saints (ārya) exist only in relative provisional truth (saṃvṛtisaṭya) and that, in real truth (paramārthasaṭya), they are: i) impermanent (anitya), ii) empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ (śūnyā ātmanā

⁴⁰¹ This voluminous literature is now within the reach of everyone thanks to the all-consuming activity of E. Conze over the last 35 years. The medium, great and small Prajñās have now been spread across the world by the editions, translations, glossaries and analyses he has devoted to them, without being disheartened by the texts which are made tiresome by the long lists and the endless repetitions..

cātmīyena ca), iii) empty of existence itself and of real characteristics and, consequently, without production (utpāda) or destruction (nirodha).

The starting point of this radical criticism is the observation of the impermanence of all phenomena. The canonical sūtras repeat incessantly that what is impermanent is not a self and does not belong to a self. And as the Traité will comment (p. 2138F), the emptiness of dharmas is the logical outcome of the teaching of non-self. In the same way, the sick baby is cured when the mother takes a remedy, for the baby forms a continuous series with her.

Like the pudgalaśūnyatā, the dharmaśūnyatā affects all dharmas without exception; it encompasses all the dharmas of the path of nirvāṇa, loved and practiced by the saints (ārya). Seen from this angle, the four noble truths preached in the sermon of Benares take on a new coloration.

The Buddha revealed suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha) and the path (mārga) of its cessation. He said:

a. Sarvaṃ duḥkham. Everything, namely, the skandhas, āyatanas and dhātus are suffering, and this suffering should be known completely.

b. Duḥkhasamudayas tṛṣṇā. The origin of the suffering is desire. According to the immutable process of pratīyasamutpāda, birth (janman) is conditioned by action (karman), and action itself is conditioned by passion (kleśa). The desire which is the origin of this suffering must be abandoned (prahātavya).

c. Duḥkhanirodho nirvāṇam. The cessation of the suffering marking the stopping of pratīyasamutpāda is nirvāṇa. This cessation must be realized (sākṣātkartavya).

d. Duḥkhanirodhagāminī pratipannā mārgaḥ. The path that leads to the cessation of suffering is the path of nirvāṇa, and this path must be cultivated (bhāvayitavya).

There is nothing to be changed in this formula, good in meaning as well as in letter; as the emperor Aśoka said: “Everything that the Buddha Bhagavat said is well said.”

Nevertheless, influenced by the teaching of non-self, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have modified the formula and, as expressed by the tongue of Buddhaghosa (Visuddhimagga, p. 436), they interpreted it in the following way:

a. Dukkham eva hi, na koci dukkhito. Yes, there is suffering, but nothing has been made to be painful.

b. Kārako na, kiriyaṃ va vijjati. There is no agent, but activity exists. In other words, conditioned origination exists, but in the absence of any personal agent.

c. Atthi nibbuti, na nibbuta pumā. There is extinction, but nobody is extinct. Nirvāṇa exists, but the nirvanized one does not exist.

d. Maggam atthi, gamako na vijjati. There is a Path, but nobody to travel on it.

Finally, impressed by the twofold emptiness of beings and things, the bodhisattvas embarked on the Mahāyāna give their interpretation in turn (Dhyāyitasamuṣṭisūtra, cited in Mad. vṛtti, p. 517, 13-15):

a. Yenānutpannāḥ sarvadharmā dṛṣṭās tena duḥkhaṃ parijñātam. He who sees that no dharma is produced knows suffering completely.

b. Yenāsamutthitāḥ sarvadharmā dṛṣṭās tasya samudayaḥ prahīṇaḥ. He who sees that no dharma arises, for him the origin is destroyed.

c. Yenātyantaparinirvṛtāḥ sarvadharmā dṛṣṭās tena nirodhaḥ sākṣātkṛtaḥ. He who has seen that all dharmas without exception are parinirvanized has realized cessation.

d. Yenātyantaśūnyāḥ sarvadharmā dṛṣṭās tena mārgo bhāvitaḥ. He who sees that all dharmas are completely empty has cultivated the Path.

In other words, saṃsāra, or the world of suffering, has never existed (truth of suffering); the pratīyasamutpāda supposed to control its production and its destruction has never functioned (truth of the origin); nirvāṇa marking the end of suffering has always been acquired (truth of cessation) without the path leading to it having been traveled (truth of the path).

Therefore, of the three seals of the Dharma imprinted on the Buddhadharma – sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, sarvadharmā anātmanaḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam (references in Traité, p. 1369F) – only the Śāntaṃ nirvāṇam is valid, but the latter leads to a pure and simple absence of natures: “Thus, although it is said in the Mahāyāna that dharmas are not born, do not perish and have but one single nature, namely the absence of nature (ekalakṣaṇā yadutālakṣaṇāḥ), this absence of nature is precisely śāntaṃ nirvāṇam. It is the object of the concentration recollecting the Dharma (dharmānusmṛtisamādhi), the object of the knowledge (jñānālambana) that exhausts all the qualities of the bodhisattvas and pratyekabuddhas” (Traité, p. 1382F).

3. SPONTANEOUS ELIMINATION OF NEGATION. –

If the Mādhyamika were limited to destroying the idea of existence by the idea of non-existence, it would not be different from the fatal nihilism. But the idea of non-existence is not posed in opposition to the idea of existence and, when the latter has disappeared, the idea of non-existence, not being applied to anything, would disappear by itself without any need to combat it. All the Mādhyamika scholars agree on this reasoning.

In his Madh. kār., XVIII, 7 (cited by the Traité, p. 45F and 323F), Nāgārjuna says:

Nivṛttam abhidhātavyaṃ nivṛtte cittagocare / anutpannāniruddhā hi nirvāṇam iva dharmatā //

Translation. – When the object of the mind has been destroyed, all preaching is put to an end. Actually, the nature of things is unborn, non-destroyed, like nirvāṇa.

Another stanza, but with a different import, is cited by the Traité, p. 1610F: “Eliminate the views of existence and of non-existence and the mind itself will be inwardly extinguished.”

Candrakīrti expanded at length on this topic (cf. L.de La Vallée Poussin, Madhyamaka, p. 53-54), but as has already been noted (p. 1229F), the final word is left incontestably to that of Śāntideva in his Bodhicaryāvatāra, IX, § 33-35:

*Śūnyatāvāsānādhānād dhīyate bhāvavānā / kiṃcin nāstīti cābhyāsāt sāpi paścāt prahīyate //
Yadā na labhyate bhāvo yo nāstīti prakalpyate /
tadā nirāśrayo ‘bhāvaḥ kathaṃ tiṣṭhen mateḥ puraḥ //
Yadā na bhāvo nābhāvo mateḥ saṃtiṣṭhate puraḥ /
tadānyagatyabhāvena nirālambā praśamyati //*

Transl. L. de La Vallée Poussin. – When one assumes the idea of the void, when one is impregnated by it, the idea of existence disappears; and later, by the habit of this thought that “nothing exists”, the idea of the void itself is eliminated.

Actually, when one no longer perceives [as a result of the elimination of the idea of existence] an existence that one is able to deny, how then would non-existence, already deprived of support, present itself to the mind?

And when neither existence nor non-existence present themselves to the mind, then, not having any more material [to affirm or deny], the two modes of action, the mind is pacified.

Thus this reality (tattva) imagined by worldly people (prthagjana), seen by the saints (ārya) and which the Buddha himself, out of pity for beings and not wanting to alarm them, sometimes pretended to accept (see, e.g., Udāna, p. 80-81; Itivuttaka, p. 37-38), vanishes into smoke. By having repudiated it and by using śūnyatā, the Mahāyānist inevitably ends up by no longer conceiving of it and still less talking about it. There is nothing to say about it, for that which is not an object of mind cannot be spoken of.

The wise see reality by not seeing it (adarśanayogena) and, not seeing it, they say nothing. This philosophical silence observed so completely by Vimalakīrti (cf. Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 317-318) is the prerogative of the omniscient buddhas as well as the great bodhisattvas who, starting from the eighth bhūmi, have acceded to the full complete conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣāntipratilabdha); rather than the most eloquent discourses, silence is ‘buddha activity’ and converts beings (ibid., p. 342F). Evidently, this is true only in apparent truth, open to all the fantasies; in absolute truth, nothing comes and nothing has gone. Candrakīrti opportunely recalls it in his Madh. avatāra, p. 111, by citing an extract of the Āryasathadvayāvatāra: “O devaputra, the paramārthasatya cannot be taught. Why? He who teaches it, what is taught, and the person to whom it is taught, all these things do not truly arise (paramārthato na prabhavanti). Non-arisen things cannot be taught by non-arisen things, etc.” (Lhaḥi bu don dam paḥi bden pa ni bstan par mi nusa so // de ciḥi phyir Ēe na / gaṇ gi ston pa daṇ ci ston pa daṇ / gañ la ston pañi chos de dag thams cad ni don dam par rab tu ma skyes pañho// rab tu ma skyes pañi chos rnams bśad par mi nus rgya cher gsuñs pa /).

In his Madh, vr̥tti, p. 537-538, Candrakīrti uses the same reasoning in regard to nirvāṇa. It could have been taught if some dharma existed as existence in itself (yadi kaścīd dharmo nāma svabhāvarūpataḥ syāt), if there were some beings to hear it (yadi kecit sttvās tasya dharmasya śrotāraḥ syuḥ) and if there were some Buddha to teach it (kaścīd vā deśiṇā Buddhāḥ syāt). As this is not the case, nirvāṇa leads to the non-functioning of speech and mind (vācām cittasyāpravṛttiḥ); and the absence of the object of cognition (jñeya) and of the cognition itself (jñāna) is bliss (śiva).

Philosophical wisdom is not a simple silence; it is closely joined to the abstention of practice, and the Mahāyāna is easily defined as the cutting off of all speech and all practice (cf. Vimlamakīrti, transl. p. 358, n. 5: sarvavādacaryoccheda). It is true that a good part of the career of the bodhisattva is dedicated to the practice of the six pāramitās and nobody will think of blaming them. Nevertheless, if the bad practices are reprehensible, the good ones are hardly any better, for in the long run they appear to be fatal. But if they are poisoned at all, foods, disgusting or appetizing, are to be avoided. And so the Buddha described abstention from practices as the noble practice (āryacarya), for it is the most in accord with the true nature of dharmas (Traité, p. 111F-1113F).

‘Non-speaking’ and ‘non-acting’, when all is said and done, rests on pacification of the mind.

4. MENTAL PEACE AND BLISS. –

If any concept has played a major rôle in Buddhism, it is indeed that of the mind (citta), the mind (manas) or consciousness (vijñāna), a temporary phenomenon among all but one of prodigious dynamism.

The canonical sūtras and the early scholasticism have the vijñāna as the fifth skandha and the last six dhātus. The mind (citta) is a saṃskṛta, a conditioned dharma, since it too arises in dependence on dharmas as object and on the manas as organ (S. II, p. 72; IV, p. 87: Manañ ca pañicca dhamme ca upajjati manoviññāṇaṃ). It is fleeting since, in the time of a finger-snap (acchaṭāmātreṇa) there are sixty moments (kṣaṇa) and, in each of these moments, the mind is born and perishes. Worldly people think it is eternal, but that is a fatal mistake (viparyāsa) that must be overcome by fixing the attention (smṛtyupasthāna) on the mind (Traité, p. 1162-1167F).

Nevertheless, and according to the same texts, the mind has immense power, for it is that which controls the destinies of beings. Saṃsāra is due to actions (karman) thought about and voluntary. Action is thinking (cetanā), for it is by ‘thinking’ that one acts by body, speech and mind; action ripens as feelings in the five destinies, in the course of the present existence, in the future existence or even later (A. III, p. 415). The fortunate or unfortunate lifetimes that accumulate in the course of the long night of saṃsāra are the fruits of ripening (vipākaphala) of thoughts of actions, good or bad. The result is that “the world is led by the mind, is controlled by the mind: everything obeys this one dharma, the mind” (S. I, p. 39: Cittena nīyati loko cittena parikkissati, cittassa ekadhammassa sabbeva vasaṃ anvagu). Nirvāṇa, the asaṃskṛta situated opposite to saṃsāra, is in no way a fruit of ripening, but presupposes the neutralization of actions and the pacification of the mind by means of destruction of lust (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha); rather, it is this destruction (S. IV, p. 251: Rāgakkhayaṃ dosakkhayaṃ mohakkhayaṃ idaṃ vuccati nibbāṇaṃ).

All of that is well and good, replies the Mādhyamika, but it holds only in relative truth and, furthermore, you are searching for midday at 2 in the afternoon. When you devote yourself daily to the smṛtyupasthānas, you acknowledge that the mind is a saṃskṛtadharma due to causes and conditions, that it is impermanent and, as such, far from being a self in itself, eternal and immutable, is empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’. For my part, I would have you note that a dharma empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ is devoid of intrinsic nature and of dharma characteristics and that, in real truth, it is without birth or destruction. The mind does not escape this verdict. The Prajñāpāramitāsūtras (P., p. 121, 12-122, 12; Ś., p. 495, 3-21) do indeed speak of a luminosity of the mind (cittasya prabhāsvaratā), but they tell us immediately that it is a ‘non-mind mind’ (cittam acittam) and that, in this absence of mind (acittatā), the existence or non-existence of the mind does not occur, is not perceived (astitā vā na vidyate nopalabhyate). When we as Mahāyānists practice the cittasmṛtyupasthāna, we will discover that the mind is only the fruit of mistakes (viparyāsa) and errors (bhrānti), and we will subscribe to this passage of the Traité (p. 1192F) that says: “The mind is empty (śūnya), without self (anātman), without ‘mine’ (anātmīya), impermanent (anitya) and non-existent (asaṭ)... To know that the nature of the mind is without birth is to enter into the dharmas that do not arise. Why? Because this mind is without birth, without intrinsic nature and without characteristics. The wise person can know it, and, although he considers the characteristics of arising (utpāda) and destruction (nirodha) of this mind, he finds in it no real arising and no destruction. Not distinguishing in it any defilement (saṃkleśa) or purification (vyavadāna), he discovers this luminosity of the mind (cittasya prabhāsvaratā), a luminosity by virtue of which the mind is not defiled by the adventitious passions (na khalv āgantukair upakleśair upakliṣyate).”

You śrāvakas have long before us practiced the saṃjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti, the absorption of the cessation of concept and feeling, a cessation that you realize bodily; you yourselves have dived into the śūnyatānimittaprañihitasamādhi (cf. above, p. 1213F-1215F) and have thus crossed over what you yourselves call the doors of deliverance (vimokṣasamukha) or nirvāṇa. We meet each other on this point, with the difference that the result to which you lean we ourselves consider as having been acquired from the very beginning. For us, nirvāṇa resides in the pacification of the mind (cittasopaśama) or, to express it more bluntly, in the fact that the mind does not think (acittatā). What is true for the mind is valid also for all dharmas: “The true nature of dharmas is the absence of nature”. Thus rid of this absolute, which is not so, we keep ourselves, sick as we are, from hypostatizing anew. But perhaps we are incurable (acikitsya).

We can only conclude this lengthy explanation by citing a passage from Candrakīrti (Vṛtti, p. 351, 4-11) in which L. de La Vallée Poussin (Madhyamaka, p. 53) has aroused interest and has translated as a summary:

Evaṃ yogino 'pi śūnyatādarśanāvasthā niravaśeṣaskandhadhātvaṃyatanāni svarūpato nopalabhante / na cānupalabhamānā vastusvarūpaṃ tadviśayaṃ prapañcam avatārayanti / na cānavatārya tadvoṣayaṃ prapañcam vikalpaṃ avatārayanti / na cānavatārya vikalpaṃ ahaṃ mamety abhiniveśāt satkāyadr̥ṣṭimūlakaṃ kleśagaṇaṃ utpādayanti / na cānutpādyā satkāyadr̥ṣṭyādikaṃ kleśagaṇaṃ karmāṇi kurvanti / na cākurvāṇāḥ jātjīvarāmaṇāḥkhyāṃ saṃsāraṃ anubhavanti // tad aśeṣaprapañcośamaśivalakṣaṇaṃ śūnyatām āgamiya yasmād aśeṣakalpanājālaprapañcavigamo bhavati / prapañcavigamāc ca vikalpanivṛttiḥ / vikalpanivṛtṭyā cāśeṣakarmakleśanivṛttiḥ / karmakleśanivṛtṭyā ca janmanivṛttiḥ / tasmāc śūnyataiva sarvaprapañcanivṛttīlakṣaṇatvān nirvāṇam ity ucyate /

Transl. – Thus, established in the vision of emptiness, the yogins no longer perceive the skandhas, dhātus and āyatanas as being things. Not perceiving them as things, they do not fall into futile proliferation about them. Not falling into futile proliferation about them, they do not fall into thought-constructions [fantasies]. Not falling into thought-constructions, they do not produce this jumble of passions having as root the belief in the individual resulting from a [blind] attachment to ‘me’ and ‘mine’. Not producing this jumble of passions beginning with the belief in the individual, they no longer perform actions. No longer performing actions, they do not experience the transmigrations called ‘birth, old age and death’. Thus, when they have reached emptiness the beneficial nature of which is the pacification of all futile chatter, there is for them the total disappearance of the string of thought-constructions or (and) futile proliferation; by the disappearance of futile proliferation, the abolition of thought-constructions, by the abolition of thought-construction, the abolition of all actions and passions; by the abolition of actions and passions, abolition of birth; thus emptiness itself, having as characteristic the abolition of all futile chatter, is called nirvāṇa.

Because it abolishes all prapañca – hi louen in Chinese, spros pa in Tibetan – emptiness is nirvāṇa. It is indeed this Middle Way which the Buddha taught to his disciples in the Sermon of Benares: “This Middle Way discovered by the Tathāgata, a path that opens one’s eyes, produces knowledge and leads to pacification, to enlightenment, to nirvāṇa” (Vin. I, p.10; Catuspariśad, p. 140: Majjhimā paṭipadā tathāgatenā abhisambuddhā cakkhukaraṇī ñānakaraṇī upasamāya abhiññāya sambodhāya nibbānāya saṃvattati). Of weak faculties, the śrāvakas believed that this Middle Way was still to be traveled; the bodhisattvas, deeply penetrating the profound meaning of the Buddha, know that it is already traveled, that nirvāṇa is acquired by all, forever, because there has never been a saṃsāra. Nirvāṇa is none other than the pacification of the mind in the seeing of emptiness. When this vision itself has vanished, pacification is complete.

IV. THE EMPTINESSES IN THE GREAT PRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀSŪTRAS

Dharmas do not truly exist (na vastutsat, na dravyasat); they are but names (nāmamātra) or designations (prajñapti). They are without self (anātman), without ‘mine’ (anātmīya), without self nature (niḥsvabhāva), without mark (animitta), without arising (anutpāda) and without cessation (anirodha). As thought-constructions, they are infinite in number, but the definitions given to them are just wrong views (mithyadrṣṭi). Emptiness, the outlet for all wrong views (sarvadṛṣṭināṃ niḥsaraṇam), is the means (upāya) to destroy them, but it has no reality either: it is, if you like, a predicate, but a predicate that does not apply to anything, an attribute without a subject.

There are as many emptinesses as there are dharmas to be destroyed. To speak of the emptiness of all dharmas (sarvadharmaśūnyatā) is too general an assertion and is not too convincing; to enumerate all the emptinesses would be impossible and frightening to the mind: therefore a choice must be made. Borrowing a middle way here again, the great Wisdom Sūtras – Aṣṭaśāḥ-, Pañcaviṃśati- and Śatasāhasrikā - set their hearts on the eighteen emptinesses to which they dedicate an entire section, but without ever subjecting themselves to listing them fully in any connection whatsoever. According to the subject to be treated, they present partial lists of two, seven, fourteen or sixteen emptinesses. Here I [Lamotte] will limit myself to mentioning briefly some partial lists and later will study the list of eighteen emptinesses in more detail.

1. Some partial lists

1. Lists of two emptinesses

The twofold emptiness of beings (sattva) and of things (dharma), the showpiece of the Mahāyāna, is the one most frequently mentioned.

Sometimes presented together: 1. anavarāgra-ś., 2. atyanta-ś.

Sources: Aṣṭaśāḥ, II, p. 35, 23; T 220, VII, k. 530, p. 720b13-14. – Pañcaviṃśati, T 221, k. 18, p. 125c13-14; T 223, k. 24, p. 392b19-20; T 220, VII, k. 468, p. 369c10.

2. List of seven emptinesses

- | | | |
|--------------------------|--------------------------|---------------------|
| 1. prakṛti-ś. | 4. anupalambha-ś. | 7. abhāva-ś. |
| 2. svalakṣaṇa-ś. | 5. abhāva-ś. | |
| 3. sarvadharma-ś. | 6. svabhāva-ś. | |

Sources: Pañcaviṃśati, T 222, k. 1, p. 153b21; k. 8, p. 199b25; T 223, k. 1, p. 222c29 (complete list); T 220, VII, k. 480, p. 435b16. - Śata, p. 138, 1-3.

3. List of fourteen emptinesses

- | | | |
|------------------------------|--------------------------|---------------------------|
| 1. adhyātma-ś. | 6. paramartha-ś. | 11. anavakāra-ś. |
| 2. bahirdā-ś. | 7. saṃskṛta-ś. | 12. prakṛti-ś. |
| 3. adyātmabahirdhā-ś. | 8. saṃskṛta-ś. | 13. lakṣaṇa-ś. |
| 4. mahā-ś. | 9. atyanta-ś. | 14. sarvadharma-ś. |
| 5. śūnyatā-ś. | 10. anavarāgra-ś. | |

Sources: Aṣṭaśāḥ, I, p. 132, 14; T 220, VII, k. 523, p. 682b6-16. – Pañcaviṃśati, T 221, k. 15, p. 108b9-14; T 223, k. 20, p. 367b24-27; k. 25, p. 403c25; T 220, VII, k. 459, p. 320b21-c1.

4. List of sixteen emptinesses

1. adhyātma-ś.	7. saṃskṛta-ś.	13. lakṣaṇa-ś.
2. bahirdhā-ś.	8. asaṃskṛta-ś.	14. sarvadharma-ś.
3. adhyātmabahirdhā-ś.	9. atyanta-ś.	15. abhāva-ś.
4. mahā-ś.	10. anavarāga-ś.	16. abhāvasvabhāva-ś.
5. śūnyatā-ś.	11. anavakāra-ś.
6. paramārtha-ś.	12. prakṛti-ś.

Sources: Aṣṭadaśa, T 220, VII, k. 510, p. 604a17; k. 512, p. 616a23. - Madhyāntavibhāgabhāṣya., ed. Nagao, p. 24, 15-21 (complete listing); Madhyāntavibhāgatīkā, ed. Yamaguchi, p. 52 seq.. This list is perhaps the prototype of the following in which it is often incorporated, but without being confused with it.

2. Related lists of eighteen and four emptinesses

Like the other great Wisdom Sūtras, the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā proposes a developed list of eighteen śūnyatās, followed by a condensed list of four śūnyatās.

To bring a measure of order to such a tangled subject, I [Lamotte] will give a few lexicographical indications, establish a synopsis of the Sanskrit and the Tibetan text, present a translation and finally give a comparative table of the various versions.

A. Lexicographical indications

These are taken from the original Sanskrit text, the Tibetan version and the Chinese translations made by Dh (Dharmarakṣa: T 222); Mo (Mokṣala: T 221); Ku (Kumārajīva: T 223) and Ht (Hiuan-tsang: T 220, VII).

1. Emptiness of internal [dharma]: adhyātmaśūnyatā, nañ stoṇ pa ñid, nei k'ong.
2. Emptiness of external [dharma]: bahirdhāśūnyatā, phyi stoṇ pa ñid, wai k'ong.
3. Emptiness of internal-external [dharma]: adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā, phyi nañ stoṇ pa ñid, nei wai k'ong.
4. Emptiness of emptinesses: śūnyatāśūnyatā, stoṇpa ñid stoṇ pa ñid, k'ong k'ong.
5. Great emptiness: mahāśūnyatā, chen po stoṇ pa ñid, ta k'ong.
6. Emptiness of the absolute: paramārthaśūnyatā, don dam pa stoṇ pa ñid, tchen miao k'ong (Dh), tsouei k'ong (Mo), Ti yi yi k'ong (Ku), cheng yi k'ong (Ht).
7. Emptiness of the conditioned: saṃskṛtaśūnyatā, ḥdus byas stoṇ pa ñid, yeou wei k'ong.

8. Emptiness of the unconditioned: asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā, ḥdus ma byas stoṇ pa ñid, wou wie k'ong.

9. Absolute emptiness: atyantaśūnyatā, mthaḥ las ḥdas pa stoṇ pa ñid, kieou king k'ong (Dh), tche king k'ong (Mo), pi king k'ong (Ku, Ht).

10. Emptiness [of dharmas] without end or beginning: anavarāgraśūnyatā, thog ma dan tha ma med pa stoṇ pa ñid, wou tsi k'ong (Ht).

Variant – Emptiness [of dharmas] without beginning: anagraśūnyatā, wou che k'ong (Ku).

11. Emptiness of non-dispersed [dharmas]: anavakāraśūnyatā, dor ba med pa stoṇ pa ñid.

Variants – 1) Emptiness of dispersed [dharmas] (avakāraśūnyatā): san k'ong (Ku). – 2) Emptiness of dispersed and non-dispersed dharmas (avakārānavakāraśūnyatā): san wou san k'ong, sometimes subdivided into sa k'ong and wou pien yi k'ong (Ht).

12. Emptiness of essences: prakṛtiśūnyatā, rañ bCin stoṇ pa ñid, pen tsing k'ong (Dh), sing k'ong (Mo, Ku), pen sing k'ong (Ht).

13. Emptiness of all dharmas: sarvadharmaśūnyatā, chos thams cad stoṇ pa ñid, yi ts'ie fa k'ong or tchou fa k'ong.

14. Emptiness of specific characteristics: svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā, rañ gi mtshan ñid stoṇ pa ñid, tseu jan siang k'ong (Dh), tseu sinag k'ong (Mo, Ku).

Variants – Emptiness of specific and general characteristics (svasāmānyalakṣaṇaśūnyatā): tseu kong k'ong, sometimes subdivided into tseu siang k'ong and tseu kong siang k'ong (Ht).

15. Emptiness consisting of non-perception: anupalambhaśūnyatā, mi dmigs pa stoṇ pa ñid, pou k'o tō k'ong.

16. Emptiness of non-existence (abhāvaśūnyatā, dños po med pa stoṇ pa ñid, wou so weou k'ong (Dh), wou k'ong (Mo), wou fa k'ong (Ku), wou sing k'ong (Ht).

17. Emptiness of existence: svabhāvaśūnyatā, ño bo ñid stoṇ pa ñid, tseu jan k'ong (Dh), yeou k'ong (Mo), yeou fa k'ong (Ku), tseu sing k'ong (Ht).

18. Emptiness of non-existence and of existence: abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā, dños po med paḥi ño bo ñid stoṇ pa ñid, wou so yeou tseu jan k'ong (Dh), wou fa yeou fa k'ong (Ku), wou sing tseu sing k'ong (Ht).

1a. Existence is empty of existence: bhāvo bhāvena śūnyaḥ, dños po ni dños pos stoṇ ño, fa fa siang k'ong (Ku), yeou sing yeou yeou sing k'ong (Ht).

2a. Non-existence is empty of non-existence: abhāvo 'bhāvena śūnyaḥ, dños po med pa ni dños po med pas stoṇ ño, wou fa wou fa siang k'ong (Ku), wou sing yeou wou sing k'ong (Ht).

3a. Existence in itself is empty of existence in itself: svabhāvaḥ svabhāvena śūnyaḥ, rañ bCin ni rañ bCin gyis stoṇ ño, tseu fa tseu fa k'ong (Ku), tseu sing yeou tseu sing k'ong (Ht).

4a. Other existence is empty of other existence: parabhāvaḥ parabhāvena śūnyaḥ, gĕan gyi dños po ni gśan gyi dños pos stoṇ ño, t'a fa t'a fa siang k'ong (Ku), t'a sing yeou t'a sing k'ong (Ht).

The order adopted here is not always respected and it may be that some emptinesses are omitted and others adopted. The oldest Chinese translations, those of Dharmarakṣa and Mokṣala, are still tentative and lack consequence in the choice of equivalences.

B. Tibetan-Sanskrit synopsis

The section of the Pañcaviṃśati dedicated to the emptinesses gives two lists: one developed list of eighteen emptinesses and one condensed list of only four. The section consists of four parts:

- the wording of the eighteen emptinesses of the developed list,
- the definition of the first sixteen emptinesses on the list,
- the wording of the four emptinesses of the condensed list,
- the definition of the four emptinesses.

To state eighteen emptinesses and to define only sixteen is an inconsistency which some Chinese translations, particularly those of Kumārajīva and Hiuan-tsang, have tried to remedy (see table below, p. 2041F). The Sanskrit editions at our disposal are not very satisfactory and so I [Lamotte] present here a synopsis of the Tibetan version (Tib. Trip., no, 731, vol. 18, p. 130, fol. 224b1-227a1) and of a Sanskrit text restored according to the Tibetan version with the aid of the editions of the Pañcaviṃśati by N. Dutt (p. 195, 10-198, 10) and the Śatasāhasrikā by P. Ghosa, p. 1407, 4-1412, 6.

a. Wording of the eighteen emptinesses

rab ḥbyor gĕan nyan chub sems	punar aparaṃ subhūte bodhisattvasya
dpaḥ sems dpaḥ chen poḥl theg pa chen	mahāsattvasya mahāyānam. yad uta
po ni / ḥdi lta ste /
1. naṇ stoṇ pa ñid dan/	1. adhyātmaśūnyatā,
2. phyi stoṇ pa ñid dan /	2. bahirdhāśūnyatā,
3. phyi naṇstoṇ pa ñid dan /	3. adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā,
4. stoṇ pa ñid stoṇpañid dan/	4. śūnyatāśūnyatā,
5. chen po sto^a pa ñid dan /	5. mahāśūnyatā,
6. don dam pa stoṇ pa ñid dan /	6. paramārthaśūnyatā,
7. ḥdus byas stoṇ pa ñid dan /	7. saṃskṛtaśūnyatā,
8. ḥdus ma byas stoṇ pa ñid dan /	8. asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā,

9. mathḥ las ḥdas pa stoṇ pa ñid dan /	9. atyantaśūnyatā,
10. thog ma dan tha ma med pa sto^a pa	10. atyantaśūnyatā,
ñid dan /
11. dor ba med pa stoṇ pa ñid dan /	11. anavakāraśūnyatā,
12. raṇ bĕin stoṇ pa ñid dan	12. prakṛtiśūntā,
13. chos thams cad stoṇ pa ñid dan	13. sarvadharmasūnyatā,
14. raṇ gi mtshan ñid stoṇ pa ñid dan /	14. svalakṣaṇasūnyatā,
15. mi dmigs pa stoṇ pa ñid dan /	15. anupalambhasūnyatā,
16. dños pa med pa stoṇ pa ñid dan /	16. abhāvaśūnyatā,
17. ño bo ñid stoṇ pa ñid dan /	17. svabhāvaśūnyatā,
18. dños pa med paḥl ño bo ñid stoṇ	18. abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā.
pa ñid de /

b. Definition of the first sixteen emptinesses

(pp. 2031-2034F)

1. de la naṇ stoṇ pa ñid gaṇ...stoṇ pa ñid do /	1. tatra katamādhyātmaśūnyatā....ucyate 'dhyātma-
	śūnyatā.
2. de la phyi stoṇ pa ñid gaṇ ze na...	2. tatra katamā bahirdhāśūnyatā....īyam ucyate
	bahirdhāśūnyatā.
etc.	etc.

c. Wording of the four emptinesses

/ rab ḥbyor gĕan yaṇ	punar aparaṃ subhūte
1. dños pa ni sños pos stoṇ ño /	1. bhāvo bhāvena śūnyaḥ,
2. / dños po med pa ni dños po med	2. abhāvo 'bhāvena śūnyaḥ, pas stoṇ no /
3. / raṇ bĕin ni raṇ bĕin gyis stoṇ ño /	3. svabhāvaḥ svabhāvena śūnyaḥ,
4. / gĕan gyi dños po ni gĕan gyi	4. parabhāvaḥ parabhāvena śūnyaḥ.
dños pos stoṇ ño /

d. Definition of the four emptinesses

(p. 2036F, Tibetan and Sanskrit)

C. Translation from the French

a. Wording of the eighteen emptinesses

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the Great Vehicle of the bodhisattva-mahāsattva is:

1. the emptiness of internal dharmas,
2. the emptiness of external dharmas,
3. the emptiness of external and internal dharmas,
4. the emptiness of emptiness,
5. great emptiness,
6. the emptiness of the absolute,
7. the emptiness of the conditioned,
8. the emptiness of the unconditioned,
9. absolute emptiness,
10. the emptiness of dharmas without end or beginning,
11. the emptiness of non-dispersion,
12. the emptiness of essence,
13. the emptiness of all dharmas,
14. the emptiness of specific characteristics,
15. the emptiness of non-perception,
16. the emptiness of non-existence,
17. the emptiness of existence,
18. the emptiness of non-existence and of existence.

b. Definition of the first sixteen emptinesses

1. What is the emptiness of internal dharmas? Internal dharmas are the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind. Now the eye is empty of eye because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. The ear, nose, tongue, body and mind are empty of ear, nose, tongue, body and mind respectively because they are neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is their essence. That is called: emptiness of internal dharmas.

2. What is the emptiness of external dharmas? External dharmas are color, sound, smell, taste, tangible and dharmas. And yet color is empty of color because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. Likewise, sound, smell, taste, tangible and dharma. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of external dharmas.

3. What is the emptiness of internal and external dharmas? The six inner bases and the six outer bases of consciousness are called internal and external dharmas. And yet the internal dharmas are empty of external dharmas because they are neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is their essence. The external dharmas are empty of internal dharmas. Why? Because such is their essence. That is called: emptiness of internal and external dharmas.

4. What is the emptiness of emptiness? This emptiness of dharmas is empty of emptiness [itself] because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of emptiness.

5. What is great emptiness? The region of the east is empty of the region of the east, the region of the south is empty of the region of the south, the region of the west is empty of the region of the west, the region of the north is empty of the region of the north, the region of the nadir is empty of the region of the nadir, the region of the zenith is empty of the region of the zenith, the intermediary regions are empty of the intermediary regions because the regions are neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is their nature. That is called: great emptiness.

6. What is the emptiness of the absolute? Here the absolute is nirvāṇa, and this nirvāṇa is empty of nirvāṇa because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of the absolute.

7. What is the emptiness of the conditioned? The conditioned is the world of desire, the world of form and the formless world. And yet the world of desire is empty of the world of desire, the world of form is empty of the world of form, the formless world is empty of the formless world because they are neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is their essence. That is called: emptiness of the conditioned.

8. What is the emptiness of the unconditioned? The unconditioned is that which has neither production nor destruction, neither modification nor duration: That is the unconditioned. Now the unconditioned is empty of the unconditioned because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of the unconditioned.

9. What is absolute emptiness? That which has no limit is absolute. The absolute is empty of the absolute because it is neither eternal, nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: absolute emptiness.

10. What is the emptiness [of dharmas] without end or beginning? [The Dharma] whose beginning or end are not perceived has neither going nor coming. And yet a dharma without end or beginning is empty of this absence of end and beginning because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of dharmas without end or beginning.

11. What is the emptiness of non-dispersal? That where there is no dispersion. Now non-dispersal is empty of non-dispersal because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of non-dispersal.

12. What is the emptiness of essence? The essence of all conditioned or non-conditioned dharmas is not created by the hearers, is not created by the pratyekabuddhas, is not created by the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas, is not created by the holy, completely and perfectly enlightened Buddhas. The essence is empty of essence because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of essence.

13. What is the emptiness of all dharmas? All dharmas are form, sensation, concept, formations and consciousness; eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind; color, sound, smell, taste, contact and dharmas; eye consciousness, ear consciousness, nose consciousness, tongue consciousness, body consciousness and mental consciousness; eye contact, ear contact, nose contact, tongue contact, body contact and mind contact; sensation due to eye contact, sensation due to ear contact, sensation due to nose contact, sensation due to tongue contact, sensation due to body contact, sensation due to mind contact; form dharmas and formless dharmas; conditioned dharmas and unconditioned dharmas: those are called ‘all dharmas’. Now all dharmas are empty of all dharmas because they are neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is their essence. That is called: emptiness of all dharmas.

14. What is the emptiness of specific characteristic? Form has, as its characteristics, to be broken up; sensation, to be experienced; concept, the grasping [of characteristics]; formations, the fact of conditioning; consciousness, the fact of apprehending. Whether it is a matter of the characteristic of conditioned dharmas or unconditioned dharmas, all these dharmas are each empty of their own characteristic because they are neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is their essence. That is called: emptiness of specific characteristics.

15. What is the emptiness of non-perception? It is that where neither the past nor the future nor the duration of the present are perceived. Non-perception is empty of non-perception because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of non-perception.

16. What is the emptiness of non-existence and of existence? There is no nature that is a combination [of existence and non-existence] since all dharmas are produced in dependence [on causes and conditions]. This [alleged] combination is empty of combination because it is neither eternal nor transitory. Why? Because such is its essence. That is called: emptiness of non-existence and self existence.

c. Wording of the four emptinesses

Furthermore, O Subhūti:

1. existence is empty of existence;
2. non-existence is empty of non-existence;

3. existence in itself (or self existence) is empty of existence in itself (or self existence);

4. other existence is empty of other existence.

d. Definition of the four emptinesses

1. What is existence? By existence is meant the five aggregates. But the five aggregates are empty of the five aggregates. Therefore existence is empty of existence.

2. Why is non-existence empty of non-existence? By non-existence is meant the non-conditioned. But this non-conditioned is empty of non-conditioned. Therefore non-existence is empty of non-existence.

3. Why is self existence empty of self existence? By self existence is meant the true essence. But the emptiness [of this true essence] is not created by the knowledge nor by the vision [of the saints]. That is called emptiness of self existence.

4. What is the emptiness of other existence? Whether the Tathāgatas appear or the Tathāgatas do not appear, this stability of dharmas, the fundamental element, the certainty of dharmas (read: dharmāṇīyāmātā in place of dharmāṇīyāmātā), the way of existing, the true manner of being, the unchanged manner of being, the utmost point of truth, remains stable. As a result, the fact that these dharmas are empty [of intervention] of another is called emptiness of other existence. Such, O Subhūti, is the great Vehicle of the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas.

Comments of the Traité (T 1509, k. 46, p. 396a)

Question. – After each of the eighteen emptinesses, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra repeats itself and says: Akūṭasthāvināśitām upādāya “because they are neither eternal nor transitory”. What does this phrase mean?

Answer. – The person who does not practice these emptinesses inevitably falls into one of the following two extremes (antadvaya), i.e., eternalism (śāśvata) or nihilism (uccheda)... The yogin tormented by existence resorts to the emptinesses (śūnyatā) in order to destroy existence. Next, he venerates emptiness, but whoever clings (abhinivṛtate) to emptiness falls into nihilism (uccheda). This is why practicing emptiness so as to destroy existence but not clinging to emptiness is to avoid the two extremes and follow the middle way (madhyamā pratipad). The eighteen emptinesses, inspired by a mind of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta), serve to save beings. This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra, after each of them, repeats: Akūṭasthāvināśitām upādāya. That is the Mahāyāna, and those who stray from it are madmen who talk too much...

Question. – The eighteen emptinesses already contain all the emptinesses. Why then does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra add four more?

Answer. – It is true that all the emptinesses are contained in the eighteen emptinesses, but the Buddhas have two ways of preaching the Dharma: either they first condense and later develop, or else they first develop and then condense. In the first case, it is to explain the meaning; in the second case, it is to facilitate memorization. Here the Buddha begins by speaking at length (vistareṇa) about the eighteen emptinesses; then he summarizes them (saṃkṣepena) into the four emptinesses.

D. Comparative table of recensions (p. 2040F)

The combined lists of the eighteen and the four emptinesses, lists published in the great Prajñāpāramitāsūtras, has come down to us in various Sanskrit, Tibetan and Chinese recensions. There are numerous divergences among them as the following comparative table shows. Hiuan-tsang has tried to eliminate them. His translation of the Aṣṭādaśa states and defines sixteen emptinesses; that of the Pañcaviṃśatī, eighteen, and that of the Śata, twenty.

•• Table is omitted from this English translation ••

Thus, according to the Traité in its section dedicated to emptiness, the Pañcaviṃśatī sets up two lists of śūnyatā having exactly the same import: one developed list of eighteen and one condensed list of four.

Using the same material, the Yogācāra-Mādhyamika-Svātantrika school established a list of twenty śūnyatās forming a gradation amongst themselves and each occurring in turn in the career of the bodhisattva. These new insights appear for the first time in the Abhisamayālaṃkāra (I, v. 47) said to be 'by Maitreya-nātha' (about 350 A.D.), commented on at length by Haribhadra (about 750 A.D.) in his Abhisamayālaṃkāraloka (ed. U. Wogihara, p. 95, 5-96, 29) and are taken up again in the great Vijñānavādin śāstras such as the Mahāyānasamgraha, the Madhyāntavibhāga and the Vijñaptimātratāsiddhi.

The twenty śūnyatās are put into relationship with the tenfold dharmadhātu or tathatā, sarvatraga, etc., serving as antidote to as many ignorances (prthagjanatva), etc. – Cf. Mahāyānasamgraha, tr. É. Lamotte, p. 196-199; *Madhyāntavibhāga*hāṣya, ed. G. M. Nagao, p. 34-36; *Madhyāntavibhāga*tīkā, ed. Yamaguchi, p. 87-107; Siddhi, p. 639-657; 658-660 (where the vocabulary should be corrected).

Cultivation of the twenty śūnyatās and the tenfold dharmadhātu occurs in all the stages of the bodhisattva career: cf. Āloka, p. 95, 5-96, 29; tr. E. Obermiller, Analysis of the Abhisamayālaṃkāra, p. 126-143; notes of E. Conze, The Large Sūtra on Perfect Wisdom, p. 144-148:

1. In the adhimukticyābhūmi, level of the practice of adhesion: adhyātma, bahirdhā and adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā.
2. In the prayogamārga, preparatory path: śūnyatāśūnyatā.
3. On the first bhūmi: mahāśūnyatā.
4. On the second bhūmi: paramārthaśūnyatā.
5. On the third bhūmi: saṃskṛtaśūnyatā.

6. On the fourth bhūmi: asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā.
7. On the fifth bhūmi: atyantaśūnyatā.
8. On the sixth bhūmi: anavarāgraśūnyatā.
9. On the seventh bhūmi: anavakāraśūnyatā.
10. On the eighth bhūmi: prakṛti and sarvadharmāśūnyatā.
11. On the ninth bhūmi: lakṣaṇa and anupalambhaśūnyatā.
12. On the tenth bhūmi: abhāva (1) and bhāvaśūnyatā.
13. On the Buddhabhūmi: abhāva (2), svabhāva and parabhāvaśūnyatā.

Aṣṭādaśaśūnyatā

[285a] Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśatī, p. 24, l. 10-17; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 77, l. 6-80, l. 4). – Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to become established (sthātukāma) in:

1. the emptiness of inner dharmas (adhyātmaśūnyatā),
2. the emptiness of outer dharmas (bahirdhāśūnyatā),
3. the emptiness of inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā),
4. the emptiness of emptiness (śūnyatāśūnyatā),
5. great emptiness (mahāśūnyatā),
6. the emptiness of the absolute (paramārthaśūnyatā),
7. the emptiness of the conditioned (saṃskṛtaśūnyatā),
8. the emptiness of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā),
9. absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā),
10. the emptiness of beginningless dharmas (anagraśūnyatā),
11. the emptiness of dispersed dharmas (avakāraśūnyatā),
12. the emptiness of essences (prakṛtiśūnyatā),
13. the emptiness of specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā),
14. the emptiness of all dharmas (sarvadharmāśūnyatā),
15. the emptiness consisting of non-preception (anupalambhaśūnyatā),
16. the emptiness of non-existence (abhāvaśūnyatā),
17. the emptiness of existence (svabhāvaśūnyatā),

18. the emptiness of non-existence and existence (abhāvasvabhāvasūnyatā), this bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the Perfection of Wisdom.

Adhyātmaśūnyatā

Second Section EMPTINESSES 1-3: EMPTINESSES OF INNER, OUTER AND BOTH INNER AND OUTER DHARMAS

I. SUMMARY DEFINITION OF THE THREE EMPTINESSES⁴⁰²

[285b] 1. Inner emptiness (adhyātmaśūnyatā). – Inner dharmas (adhyātmadharma) are empty of inner dharmas. Inner dharmas are the six internal bases of consciousness (ṣaḍ adhyātmāyatana): eye (cakṣus), ear (śrotra), nose (ghraṇa), tongue (jihvā), body (kāya) and mind (manas).

The eye is empty (śūnya): in it there is no ‘me’ (ātman) or ‘mine’ (ātmīya), and there is no dharma ‘eye’. It is the same for the ear, nose, tongue, body and mind.

2. Outer emptiness (bahirdhāśūnyatā). – Outer dharmas (bahirdhādharma) are empty of outer dharmas. The outer dharmas are the six external bases of consciousness (ṣaḍ bahirdhāyatana): color (rūpa), sound (śabda), smell (gandha), taste (rasa), tangible (spraṣṭavya) and dharma.

Color is empty: in it there is no ‘me’ or ‘mine’, and there is no dharma ‘color’. It is the same for sound, smell, taste, tangible and dharma.

3. Inner and outer emptiness (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā). – Inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhādharma) are empty of inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhādharma). Inner and outer dharmas are the twelve internal and external bases of consciousness (dvādaśāyatana). In these twelve bases, there is no ‘me’ or ‘mine’ and there is no ‘inner and outer dharma’.

II. WHY DISTINGUISH EIGHTEEN EMPTINESSES

⁴⁰² These three emptinesses were already grouped together in the Mahāsuññātsutta of Majjhima, III, p. 112 (cf. T 26, k. 49, p. 738c). They concern the twelve āyatanas, i.e., all things together since “the twelve āyatanas are called everything” (sabbam vuccati dvādasāyatāni). For the śrāvakas, they are empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ (śūnyāny ātmanā vātmīyena vā); for the Mahāyānists for whom the Traité is the spokesman here, they are not only empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ but empty of intrinsic nature (svabhāva) and the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of āyatana. In a word, the śrāvakas teach the emptiness of beings (satvaśūnyatā) or anātman whereas the Mahāyāna teaches both the emptiness of beings and the emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā): cf. p. 239F, 1090F-1091F.

Question. – Dharmas are innumerable (apramāṇa) and the emptinesses (śūnyatā) corresponding to these dharmas are also innumerable. Why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra pose only eighteen? Summarily speaking (saṃkṣepeṇa), only one single emptiness, namely, ‘emptiness of all dharmas’ (sarvadharmaśūnyatā, no. 14 in the list) is needed. Speaking at length (vistareṇa), one emptiness should be posed for each dharma: emptiness of the eye (cakṣuḥśūnyatā), emptiness of color (rūpaśūnyatā), etc.: in brief, a very considerable number. Why then does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra pose only eighteen emptinesses?

Answer. – If one speaks in summary, the subject is not fully treated; if one speaks at length, it becomes overloaded. Thus, when one takes a medicine (bhaiṣajya), if one takes too little, the sickness (vyādhi) is not removed; if one takes too much, the symptoms (upadrava) are aggravated. It is by measuring out the medicine according to the sickness and by not taking too much or too little (anūnāndhikam) that the sickness can be cured. It is the same with emptiness. If the Buddha were to speak of only one single emptiness, the many wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi) and passions (kleśa) could not be destroyed; if he assumed one emptiness in regard to each wrong view, the emptinesses would be too numerous. People who cling to the nature of emptiness (śūnyatālakṣaṇābhiniviṣṭa) fall into [the extreme] of nihilism (ucchedānta); to speak of the eighteen emptinesses is to hit the target (lakṣya) right on. To speak of ten or fifteen emptinesses would likewise provoke doubts (saṃśaya), but this is not at issue.

Moreover, good (kuśala) and bad (akuśala) dharmas exist in definite (niyata) numbers. There are four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), four right efforts (samyakpradhāna), thirty-seven auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipāṅśika), ten powers (bala), four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), four unhindered knowledges [285c] (pratisaṃvid), eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā),⁴⁰³ five aggregates (skandha), twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana), eighteen elements (dhātu), twelve causes (nidāna), three poisons (viṣa), three bonds (bandhana),⁴⁰⁴ four torrents (ogha),⁴⁰⁵ five obstacles (nīvaraṇa),⁴⁰⁶ etc. Therefore dharmas exist in definite numbers. It is by means of eighteen sorts of dharmas that one destroys the tendencies (abhiniveśa) towards them: this is why eighteen emptinesses are posed.

III. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE PERFECTION OF WISDOM AND THE EIGHTEEN EMPTINESSES

Question. – Prajñāpāramitā and the eighteen emptinesses are either different or the same. If they are different, then what is this Prajñāpāramitā distinct from the eighteen emptinesses? See what the Buddha said: “What is this Prajñāpāramitā? It is the emptiness of form (rūpaśūnyatā), the emptiness of feelings, ⁴⁰³ These dharmas of the Path and attributes of the Buddhas have been discussed in chapters XXXI to XLII.

⁴⁰⁴ The three bandhanas, like the three poisons, are rāga, dveṣa and moha: cf. Samyutta, IV, p. 292, l. 20; Kośa, V, p. 87.

⁴⁰⁵ The oghas (or yogas) are the torrents of kāma, bhava, drṣṭi, and avidyā; cf. Dīgha, III, p. 230, 276; Samyutta, IV, p. 175; Vibhāṅga, p. 375; Kośa, V, p. 75.

⁴⁰⁶ Cf. p. 1013F.

concepts, volitions, consciousnesses (vednāsamijñāsamskṛtavijñānaśūnyatā) and so on up to the emptiness of the cognition of all the aspects (sarvakārajñātāśūnyatā).⁴⁰⁷ – If they are not different, why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] say here that “the bodhisattva who wishes to become established in the eighteen emptinesses should exert himself in the prajñāpāramitā”?

Answer. – There are reasons to say they are different and there are reasons to say they are the same.

1) They are different. – The prajñāpāramitā called the true nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa) stops all consideration about dharmas (dharmanidhyāna).⁴⁰⁸ The eighteen emptinesses are eighteen ways of considering dharmas as empty. By exerting himself in the true nature of dharmas, the bodhisattva produces these eighteen kinds of emptiness. Therefore [prajñāpāramitā and the eighteen emptinesses] are different.

2) They are the same. – The eighteen emptinesses are empty (śūnya) and unreal (asadbhūtalakṣaṇa); Prajñāpāramitā also is empty and unreal. – The eighteen emptinesses are the rejection of characteristics (nimittaparityāga); Prajñāpāramitā also is the rejection of characteristics. – The eighteen emptinesses are not attached to any characteristic; prajñāpāramitā also is not attached to any characteristic. Consequently, to exert oneself in the prajñāpāramitā is to exert oneself in the eighteen emptinesses: there is no difference.

Prajñāpāramitā has two parts (bhāga, aṃśa), the lesser and the greater.⁴⁰⁹ The person who wants to attain the greater should first exert himself in the lesser, namely the ‘gate of means’ (upāyamukha). To attain the greater prajñā, it is necessary to practice the eighteen emptinesses, and it is by first staying in the lesser prajñā, namely the ‘gate of means’, that the eighteen emptinesses are acquired.

What is this ‘gate of means’ (upayamukha)? It is learning (udgrahītum), reciting (vācayitum), retaining (dhārayitum), studying (paryavāptum) and textually applying (bhāvanākāreṇa prayoktum)⁴¹⁰ the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra.

Just as a man who wants to find all kinds of fine jewels (ratna) must go to the great ocean (mahāsamudra), so the person who wants to acquire these jewels of the prajñā which are the concentrations (samādhi) on inner emptiness (adhyātmaśūnyatā), etc., must go to the great ocean of the prajñāpāramitā [by reading the texts dedicated to it].

IV. THE FIRST THREE EMPTINESSES AND THE FOUR FOUNDATIONS OF MINDFULNESS⁴¹¹

⁴⁰⁷ San houeī p’in in Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 21, p. 373b22 seq. Subhūti had asked the Buddha: At the time when he is practicing the prajñāpāramitā, how should the bodhisattva-mahāsattva exert himself in rūpa, how should he exert himself in vedanā, saṃjñā, samskāra and vijñāna, and finally how should he exert himself in sarvakārajñātā?

⁴⁰⁸ On the equivalence of Prajñāpāramitā = Dharmatā of true nature of dharmas, see above, p. 655-656F, 1059F

⁴⁰⁹ The greater Prajñāpāramitā is identical with the true nature of dharmas; the lesser Prajñāpāramitā is the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras where the eighteen emptinesses constituting the gate of entry into the true nature of dharmas are taught.

⁴¹⁰ For this phrase, cf. Vimalakīrtinirdeśa transl., p. 368, 370-371, 372, 373, 388, 390.

Question. – Why does the yogin who is exerting himself in the prajñāpāramitā first stay in the emptiness of inner dharmas (adhyātmaśūnyatā), the emptiness of outer dharmas (bahirdhāśūnyatā) and the emptiness of inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā)?

Answer. – There are four mistakes (viparyāsa) in the world: i) the mistake of taking that which is impure to be pure (aśucau śucir iti viparyāsa); ii) the mistake of taking that which is suffering to be happy (duḥkhe sukham iti viparyāsa); iii) the mistake of taking that which is impermanent to be permanent (anitye nityam iti viparyāsa); iv) the mistake of taking that which is not a ‘self’ to be a ‘self’ (anātmany āmeti viparyāsa).⁴¹²

In order to destroy the four mistakes, the yogin cultivates the twelve considerations (samanuपाśyanā) inherent in the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna).⁴¹³

[1. Consideration 1-3 coming under Kāyasmṛtyupasthāna]

a. First he considers [his own body], the inner body (adhyātmakāya): consisting of thirty-six elements (dhātu),⁴¹⁴ full of impurities (aśuci) that flow out of the nine holes (navacchidra),⁴¹⁵ it is very disgusting and void of any pure [286a] character. This absence of pure character (śucilakṣaṇānupalabdhi) is called emptiness of inner dharmas (adhyātmaśūnyatā).

b. Knowing the impurity of the inner body, the yogin next considers [another’s body], the outer body (bahirdhākāya), which is, for him, an object of attachment. But here it is the same thing; the two bodies are really impure. “Foolish worldly people (bālaprthagjana), fanatical and disturbed, in whom desire (rāga) has covered their minds, claim that this body is pure; but when I consider the beauty that I love, it is exactly the same as my own body.” This absence of pure nature [in another’s body] is the emptiness of outer dharmas (bahirdhāśūnyatā).

⁴¹¹ The author returns to this subject which he has already treated at length, p. 1150-1176F, 1187-1194F. Here he establishes a parallel between the four smṛtyupasthānas and the first three emptinesses. The smṛtyupasthānas and the emptinesses concern inner, outer, both inner and outer dharmas, but the former lead to the conclusion that they are empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’; the latter, that they are devoid of self nature and characteristics and, as a result, without production or destruction.

For the Anguttara, I, p. 196, 10-16, the four satipaṭṭhānas (kāye kāyānupassī viharati, etc.) constitute the majjhimā paṭipadā; for the Madh. kārikā, XXIV, 18, śūnyatā, the designation by virtue of (prajñaptir upādāya), is the pratipad madhyamā. Two entities equal to a third entity...

⁴¹² Cf. p. 925F, 1076F, 1151F.

⁴¹³ During the four smṛtyupasthānas, the practitioner turns his attention to the body (kāya), feelings (vedanā), mind (citta) and dharmas. He examines each of these objects first within himself (adhyātmam), then outside himself (bahirdhā) and finally inside and outside himself (adhyātmabahirdhā): thus making a total of twelve considerations.

⁴¹⁴ Cf. p. 1297F, n. 2.

⁴¹⁵ Cf. p. 1154-1155F, n.

c. When the yogin was considering the impurity of his own body, it happened that he said that another's body (bahirdhārūpa) is beautiful, and when he was considering the body of another, it happened that he said that his own body was pure. Now he considers both the inner [body] and the outer [body], and he notices: "My own body is impure and that of another is impure also; the body of another and mine are quite alike: they are no different." This absence of pure characteristic [characterizing both one's own body and that of another] is the emptiness of inner and outer dharma (adhyātmabāhirdhāśūnyatā).

[2. Considerations 4-6 coming under Vedānasmṛtyupasthāna]

a. The yogin knows by reflection (manasikāra) that the inner body and the outer body are both impure, but indecisive people cling to it because of a group of feelings (vedanākāya), [namely, pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā)]. This group is a lot of suffering (duḥkha), but fools (mūḍha) consider it to be happiness (sukha).⁴¹⁶

Question. – But the three kinds of feeling, [sukhavedanā, duḥkhavedanā, aduḥkhāsukhavedanā] are all included (saṃgrhīta) in the external bases of consciousness (bahirdhāyatana); why is it said then that the yogin "considers the internal feeling" (adhyātmavedanāṃ samanupaśyati)?⁴¹⁷

Answer. – First, the meeting between the six objects (viśaya) and the six organs (indriya) gives rise to a happiness called external happiness (bahirdhāsukha); then, extreme desire (prarigredha), penetrating deeply, gives rise to a happiness called internal happiness (adhyātmāsukha).

In addition, the happiness that has internal dharma as condition (adhyātmadharmā-pratyayaṃ sukham) is called internal happiness, and the happiness that has external dharma as condition (bahirdhādharmā-pratyayaṃ sukham) is called external happiness. In addition, the happiness associated with the [first] five consciousnesses (pañcavijñāna-saṃprayukta) is called external happiness, and the happiness associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñāna-saṃprayukta) is called internal happiness. The coarse (audārika) happiness is called external happiness, and the subtle (sūkṣma) happiness is called internal happiness.

These are the distinctions between internal and external happiness, and they are also valid in regard to unpleasant feeling (duḥkhavedanā) and neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling (aduḥkhāsukhavedanā).

Moreover, the yogin reflects and wonders whether this internal happiness (adhyātmāsukha) really exists or if it is imaginary (vikalpita). He recognizes that it is just suffering (duḥkha) to which the name of happiness (sukha) is applied.

Furthermore, the yogin reflects and wonders whether this internal happiness (adhyātmāsukha) really exists (na tattvenopalabhyate) or whether it is imaginary (vikalpita). He recognizes that it is merely suffering (duḥkha) to which the name of happiness (sukha) is given out of habit. Why? Because this happiness, coming from unfortunate causes and conditions (duḥkha-hetuprayaya), itself arouses a painful fruit of retribution (duḥkhavipākaphala). The happiness of which one is never satiated is suffering.

⁴¹⁶ Cf. p. 1159F.

⁴¹⁷ This problem has already been treated above, p. 1173-1175F.

Furthermore, when a person suffering from scabies (kacchū)⁴¹⁸ scratches himself or approaches a fire, the slight suffering [that he momentarily experienced] is followed by a physical suffering and becomes a great suffering. What the fool (mūḍha) calls happiness, the wise man (jñānin) sees in it only suffering. In the same way, people (loka), victims of the error consisting of taking [what is suffering] to be happiness (duḥkhe sukham iti viparyāsa), cling to the happiness resulting from the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāma-guṇa) and their passions (kleśa) increase. For this reason, the yogin does not see happiness and "considers only suffering, like a sickness, a boil, an ulcer, a thorn" (duḥkaṃ rogato śalyataḥ samupaśyati).⁴¹⁹

Furthermore, since happiness is rare and suffering frequent, the small amount of happiness does not appear and is therefore called suffering. It is like a ko of salt (lavaṇa) thrown into a big river: it loses its salty characteristic and is no longer called salty.⁴²⁰

Finally, happiness is so poorly established (anīyata) that there is doubt (śaṅkā)⁴²¹ about it: what one person considers as happiness, another person considers as suffering; and what the other person considers as happiness, the first person considers as suffering. That which one gains is happiness, that which [286b] one loses is suffering. That which the fool takes to be happiness, the wise man takes to be suffering. Seeing the torments of happiness is suffering; not seeing the defects of happiness is happiness. Not seeing the impermanent nature of happiness (anityalakṣaṇa) is happiness; seeing the impermanent nature of happiness is suffering. What the person not detached from desire (avītarāga) takes to be happiness, the person detached from desire (vītarāga) takes to be suffering.

Therefore the yogin considers happiness (sukha) as suffering; he considers suffering to be an arrow (śalya) piercing the body; he considers the impermanent and changing characteristics (anityavipariṇāmalakṣaṇa) of that which is neither suffering nor happiness (aduḥkhāsukha). Considering the threefold feeling [pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant] in this way, he mentally rejects it, and this is called the emptiness of internal feelings (adhyātmavedanāśūnyatā).

b-c. His considerations on external feelings (bahirdhāvedanā) and on both internal and external feelings (adhyātmabāhirdhāvedanā) are similar.

[3. Considerations 7-9 coming under cittasmṛtyupasthāna]

The yogin has this thought: If happiness is suffering, then who experiences (prativedayati) suffering? Having reflected, he knows that it is the mind (citta) that experiences it. Next, he considers the mind in ⁴¹⁸ Example already used above, p. 1157F.

⁴¹⁹ Cf. p. 1222F, note.

⁴²⁰ Classical comparison: cf. Anguttara, I, p. 250: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave puriso loṇaphalaṃ Gaṅgāya nadiyā pakkipeyya. Taṃ kiṃ maññatha bhikkhave. Api nu sā Gaṅgā nadī amunā loṇaphalena loṇa assa apeyyā ti. – No h'etaṃ bhante. – Taṃ kissa hetu. – Asu hi bhante Gaṅgāya nadiyā mahā udakkhandho. So amunā loṇaphalena na loṇa assa apeyyo ti.

⁴²¹ Adopting the variant houo.

order to know if it is true or false. He notices that the mind is impermanent (anitya) and has production (utpāda), duration (sthiti) and disappearance (vyaya) as characteristics.⁴²² The mind of unpleasant feeling (duḥkhavedanā), the mind of pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā) and the mind of neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling each constitutes a different moment (bhinnalakṣaṇa): when the pleasant mind disappears, the unpleasant mind arises; the unpleasant mind lasts for the space of an instant and, having lasted, it disappears; next, there arises a neither unpleasant nor pleasant mind. This neither unpleasant nor pleasant mind lasts for the space of an instant and, having lasted, it disappears; when it has disappeared, there arises again a pleasant mind. The three feelings (vedanā) being impermanent, the mind (citta) also is impermanent.

Furthermore, the ascetic knows that there are minds of lust (rāga) or non-lust, of hatred (dveṣa) or non-hatred, of delusion (moha) or non-delusion, distracted (vikṣipta) or concentrated (saṃgrhīta), fettered (baddha) or liberated (vimukta), and he knows that these minds each have a different characteristic. Thus he knows that the mind is impermanent (anitya), that there is no fixed (niyata) mind lasting for eternity. Minds experiencing suffering, minds experiencing happiness, etc., arise from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamāgrī), and when these causes and conditions disperse, the minds disappear as well.

This is how the yogin considers the impermanent nature (anityalakṣaṇa) of the inner minds (adhyātmacitta), the outer minds (bahirdhācitta) and the both internal and external minds (adhyātmabahirdhācitta).

Question. – Since the mind consists of the inner bases of consciousness (adhyātmāyatana), how can there be external minds (bahirdhācitta)?⁴²³

Answer. – When the inner body [i.e., one’s own body] is being considered, there is ‘inner mind’ (adhyātmacitta); but when the outer body [i.e., another’s body] is being considered, there is ‘outer mind’.

Moreover, if it concerns (ālambate) inner dharmas, the mind is inner; but if it concerns external dharmas, the mind is external.

Moreover, the [first] five consciousnesses (pañcavijñāna) always concern outer dharmas and, being unable to make distinctions, are outer minds; but the mental consciousness (manovijñāna), being concerned with inner dharmas and distinguishing beauty from ugliness, is an inner mind.

Finally, the mental consciousness which, on its arising, is incapable of distinguishing and specifying, is an external mind; but the developed and deepened mental consciousness which can make distinctions and grasp characteristics (nimitta) is an inner mind. Such are the distinctions between inner and outer minds.

[4. Considerations 10-12 coming under dharmasmṛtyupasthāna]

⁴²² Conditioned by causes, the mind inevitably has the three or four conditioned characteristics (saṃskṛtalakṣaṇa):

cf. p. 36-37F, 992F, 1163F.

⁴²³ This subject has already been treated above, p. 1175F.

The yogin whose mind (citta and manas) has been cultivated knows that the body (kāya) is of impure nature (aśucilakṣaṇa), that feeling (vedanā) is suffering in nature (duḥkhalakṣaṇa) and that the mind (citta) has no duration and is impermanent in nature (anityalakṣaṇa). Nevertheless, not having yet broken through the fetters (samucchinnaśaṃyojana), he still happens to be aware of self (ahaṃkāra).

Then he has the following thought: “If the mind is impermanent, who is cognizing the mind and on whom does the mind depend? Who is the master (svāmin) of the mind that is experiencing suffering and happiness? To whom does everything belong?” Then he analyzes and recognizes that there is no master as [286c] a separate entity (bhinna).

One grasps characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇāti) in the five aggregates (skandha) and, just for this single reason, one imagines the existence of ‘a man’ (puruṣa) and one produces the idea of ‘me’ (ātman). From the idea of ‘me’ comes the idea of ‘mine’ (ātmīya), and from the idea of ‘mine’ comes that of existence (bhāva). Toward those who benefit (hita) us, we feel love (rāga); toward those who thwart us, we feel hatred (dveṣa); these two fetters (saṃyojana) do not come from knowledge (jñāna) but from error: this is what is called delusion (moha). The triple poison (triviṣa), love, hatred and delusion, is the root (mūla) of all the passions (kleśa).

By means of egotism (ahaṃkāra), one accomplishes meritorious actions (puṇya) “in order,” one says, “that I may then be able to cultivate the auxiliary dharmas of the Path and may be able to attain deliverance (mokṣa).”

The grasping of characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇa) that occurred at the beginning is called the ‘concept aggregate’ (saṃjñāskandha). Then out of egotism (ahaṃkāra), one produces the fetters and the good formations called the ‘formation aggregate’ (saṃskāraskandha). These two aggregates are [the object] of mindfulness of dharmas (dharmasmṛtyupasthāna).⁴²⁴ The yogin, who is seeking the ātman in these dharmas that are the saṃjñāskandha and the saṃskāraskandha, does not find it there. Why? Because dharmas are the result of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamutpanna), are all of them conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) and have no solidity (sāra): there is no true ātman.⁴²⁵

“The formations are like the trunk of a banana tree“ (saṃskmarāḥ kadalīnibhāḥ).⁴²⁶ leaf by leaf it is examined, but no pith (sāra) is found. – “Concept is like a mirage (marīcisadṛśī saṃjñā) seen from afar:” without there being any water there, one gets the notion that there is water, one has the concept of water but it is nothing but an illusion.

Such are the considerations on inner, outer and both inner and outer dharmas.

⁴²⁴ Among the five skandhas, rūpa is the object belonging to kāyasmṛtyupasthāna; vedanā, that of vedanāsmṛtyupasthāna; saṃjñā, the saṃskāras and vijñāna, those of cittasmṛtyupasthāna. As for dharmasmṛtyupasthāna, it can bear upon any skandha whatsoever, since it includes the totality of dharmas.

⁴²⁵ The punctuation of the TaishB is defective: the final period should be placed between fa and hing.

⁴²⁶ Allusion to a verse of the Phenasaṭṭa of Saṃyutta, III, p. 142. See references, p. 370, as note; Vimalakīrti, transl. p. 132, n. 23.

Question. – Dharmas being included in the outer bases of consciousness (bahirdhāyatana), how can there be inner dharmas (adhyātmadharmas)?⁴²⁷

Answer. – By inner dharmas (adhyātmadharmas) we mean the skandha of concept (saṃjñāskandha) and the skandha of formations (saṃkāra-skandha) associated with the inner mind (adhyātmacittasamprayukta). – By outer dharmas (bahirdhādharmas) we mean: i) the skandha of concept (saṃjñāskandha) and the skandha of formations (saṃkāra-skandha) associated with the outer mind (bahirdhācittasamprayukta); ii) the formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayukta-saṃskāra); iii) the unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtadharmas). – Taken simultaneously and together [these internal and external dharmas] are called ‘both inner and outer dharmas’ (adhyātmabahirdhādharmas).

Furthermore, the inner dharmas are the six organs (ṣaḍindriya); the outer dharmas are the six objects (ṣaḍviṣaya).

Finally, the general considerations (samanuṣāyanā) on i) the body (kāya), ii) the sensations (vedanā), iii) the mind (citta), iv) the aggregate of concept (saṃjñāskandha) and v) the aggregate of formations (saṃkāra-skandha) are the mindfulness of dharmas (dharmasmṛtyupasthāna) Why is that?

Actually, the yogin first looks for the ātman in the aggregate of concept (saṃjñāskandha) but does not find it there. He then turns his search to the body (kāya), sensations (vedanā) and mind (citta), but does not find it there either. In no matter what dharma, be it material (rūpin) or non-material (arūpin), visible (sanidarśana) or invisible (anidarśana), resistant (sapratigha) or non-resistant (apratigha), impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), conditioned (saṃskṛta) or unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), distant (dūre) or near (sāntike), coarse (audārika) or subtle (sūkṣma), the yogin seeks in vain for the ātman but does not find it. It is only to the complex of the five aggregates (pañcaskandasāmagrī) that the name of being (sattva) is given out of habit, and ‘being’ is synonymous with ātman. The self (ātman) being non-existent (anupalabdha), neither is there any ‘mine’ (ātmīya) and, the ‘mine’ being non-existent, all the passions (kleśa) are eliminated.

[5. Summary]

A. The foundation of mindfulness of the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna) concerns all material dharmas (rūpadharma).

[As a first approach], the yogin considers the inner material things (adhyātmārūpa) as being impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and without self (anātman).

[As a second and third approach], he considers outer material things (bahirdhārūpa), then inner and outer material things (adhyātmabahirdhārūpa) likewise as being [impermanent, painful, empty and without self].

[The other three foundations of mindfulness consider] sensations (vedanā), mind (citta) and dharmas as being likewise [impermanent, painful, empty and without self, respectively].

⁴²⁷ This question has already been discussed above, p. 1175-1176F.

B. The concentration of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi) associated with the inner considerations (adhyātmanuṣāyanā) of the four foundations of mindfulness is called inner emptiness (adhyātmāśūnyatā). [287a]

The concentration of emptiness associated with the outer considerations (bahirdhānuṣāyanā) of the four foundations of mindfulness is called outer emptiness (bahirdhāśūnyatā).

The concentration of emptiness associated with inner and outer considerations (adhyātmabahirdhānuṣāyanā) of the four foundations of mindfulness is called inner and outer emptiness (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā).

V. THE THREE EMPTINESSES RESULT FROM CONCENTRATION

Question. – Are the emptinesses in question empty by the power of concentration (samādhibala) or are they empty in themselves?

Answer. – They are empty by the power of concentration,⁴²⁸ as is said in a sūtra: “The three concentrations (samādhi) or the three doors to deliverance (vimokṣamukha) are emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita). The concentration of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi) concerns ⁴²⁸ There are close connections between the three concentrations (p. 1213F-1232F) and the four foundations of mindfulness (p. 1150F-1176F; 1187F-1194F on the one hand and the three emptinesses on the other hand. They are not substantial entities, but rather cittasya sthitiḥ, situations of mind (p. 1213F-1214F), concentrations (samādhi) of the mind centered on emptiness, empty of individuals (sattvaśūnya) for the śrāvaka, empty of things (dharmāśūnyatā) for the bodhisattva. These mental practices closely tied to the comprehension of the four noble truths converge on the same result: the rejection of the world and entry into nirvāṇa. The three concentrations are the vimokṣamukhas or doors of deliverance (p. 1213F); the three emptinesses, by radically removing the imaginary seeing of the inner, outer or mixed world, assure the mind of this supreme pacification that is nirvāṇa.

The three mental practices, concentrations, foundations of mindfulness and emptinesses are shared by the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, with the difference, essential it is true, that the former penetrate only the emptiness of beings whereas the latter penetrate both the emptiness of beings and the emptiness of things. The śrāvakas still cling to characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇanti) within and outside themselves; the bodhisattvas see them no longer and everything ends in a total absence of vision for them. It would be absurd to hypostatize an emptiness that is something other than an absence of vision and fruit of a certain situation of mind.

J. May comments: “This absence of vision in the great bodhisattvas starting with the eighth bhūmi is not something negative: it constitutes the result of a long effort by the mind; it is the very vision par excellence: the bodhisattvas see by not seeing.” We may add Nāgārjuna, Madh. kārikā, III, §6: “With or without seeing, the agent of seeing does not exist” (tiraskṛtya draṣṭā nāsty atiraskṛtya ca darśanam).

(ālambate) the body (kāya), the sensations (vedanā), the mind (citta) and dharmas, and since no self (ātman) or ‘mine’ (āmiya) is found therein, it is called [the concentration] of emptiness.”⁴²⁹

VI. RELATIONSHIPS OF THE FOUR GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF CONDITIONED DHARMAS AND THE FOUR VIEW-POINTS OF THE FOUNDATIONS OF MINDFULNESS

Question. – The four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) should all consider empty dharmas as being impermanent (anīya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and without self (anātman). Why then do they consider [respectively] the body (kāya) as impure (aśuci), the sensations (vedanā) as suffering (duḥkha), the mind (citta) as impermanent (anīya) and the dharmas as empty of self (anātman)?

Answer. – All consider the four things as impermanent, suffering, empty and without self. However, in regard to the body, beings cling especially to the mistake of taking [what is impure] to be pure (aśucau śucir iti viparyāsa); in regard to the sensations, they cling especially to the mistake of taking [what is suffering] to be happy (duḥkhe sukham iti viparyāsa); in regard to the mind, they cling especially to the mistake of taking [what is impermanent] to be permanent (anīye nityam iti viparyāsa), and in regard to dharmas, they cling especially to the mistake of taking [what is not a self] to be a self (anātmāny ātmeti viparyāsa). This is why, [in the course of the four foundations of mindfulness], the yogin considers the body as impure, the sensations as painful, the mind as impermanent, and the dharmas as being deprived of self.

Furthermore, in regard to inner emptiness (adhyātmaśūnyatā) and outer emptiness (bahirdhāśūnyata), there is no dharma that is definitively inner or definitively outer for, depending [on one another] as mutual cause (sahabhūhetu), they can be said to be [sometimes] inner and [sometimes] outer. In fact, what my neighbor considers as outer (bahirdhā), I consider to be inner (adhyātma), and what I hold to be outer, my neighbor considers to be inner. It depends on the subject [and not on the object] that the inner dharma is inner, and it depends on the subject [and not on the object] that the outer dharma is outer. Thus for a given individual, his own house is inner, but the house of another is outer. For the yogin who is considering inner and outer dharmas, they have no fixed nature (niyatalakṣaṇa); therefore they are empty (śūnya).

Finally, inner and outer dharmas have no intrinsic nature (svabhāva). Why? Because they arise from an assemblage (sāmagrī) [of causes and conditions].⁴³⁰ These dharmas are not found in the assembled causes ⁴²⁹ This unidentified sūtra establishes a close relationship among the śūnyatā-samādhis and the smṛtyupasthānas bearing on the body, the sensations, the mind and dharmas leading to the conclusion that they are empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’.

⁴³⁰ Cf. Madh. kārikā, VII, §16 (p. 159-160):

Pratītya yad yad bhavati tat tac śāntaṃ svabhāvataḥ / tasmād utpādyamāṇaṃ ca śāntam utpattir eva ca //

and conditions and, since they do not exist in their causes and conditions, they are not found elsewhere either.”⁴³¹ The causes and conditions of inner and outer dharmas do not exist either. Thus as the cause (kāraṇa) and the effect (kārya) are absent, inner and outer dharmas are empty.

VII. THE PROBLEM OF THE WHOLE AND THE PART⁴³²

Question. –From all evidence (niyatam) inner and outer dharmas exist; why do you say that they do not exist? Thus, when the hands (pāṇi), feet (pāda), etc., come together, there is birth of the body-dharma (kāyadharmā): it is an inner dharma (adhyātmadharmā). When the beams (gosāraka), walls (bhitti), etc., are brought together, there is the arising of the house-dharma (gṛhadharmā): it is an outer dharma (bahirdhādharma). Although the body-dharma has a different name than its parts (avayava), it is not different from the foot, etc. Why? Because in the absence of the foot, etc., the body would not exist. It is the same for the house.

Answer. – If the foot were no different than the body, the head (śiras) would be the foot, since, [in your hypothesis], the foot is not different from the body. But if the head were the foot, that is perfectly ridiculous.

Question. – If the foot were not different from than the body, your objection would be valid. But in the present case, it is necessary that the foot, etc., be brought together in order that there be the arising of the dharma called body. Although the body is different from the foot, etc., it must depend on the foot in order to [287b] subsist. In the same way, the threads (tantu) must be brought together in order to produce a cloth (paṭa): this cloth depends on the threads to exist.

Answer. – [Two things, first]: either this body-dharma occurs at the same time in all its parts (avayavin), the foot, etc., or else it occurs separately.

Everything that is the result of something is pacified as to its intrinsic nature. [The vyṛtti explains śāntaṃ svabhāvataḥ as svabhāvavirahitaṃ “without intrinsic nature”.] Thus what is produced is pacified, and the production also.

⁴³¹ Cf. Madh. kārikā, XX, §1-2 (p. 391-392):

Hetoś ca pratyayānāṃ ca sāmāgryā yadi / phalaṃ asti ca sāmāgryāṃ sāmāgryā jāyate katham // hetoś ca pratyayānāṃ ca sāmāgryā jāyate yadi / phalaṃ nāsti sāmāgryāṃ sāmāgryā jāyate katham //

If the fruit arises from an assemblage of causes and conditions and [according to you] the fruit is within this assemblage, how then would it arise from the assemblage [since it is already therein]?

If the fruit arises from an assemblage of causes and conditions and [according to you] the fruit is not within this assemblage, how then would it arise from the assemblage [since it does not occur within it]?

⁴³² This problem has already been discussed above, p. 1217F-1218F.

a. If the body occurs at once in all its parts, the foot (pāda) would be also in the head (śiras). Why? Because [by the hypothesis] the body-dharma occurs [in all the parts] at once.

b. If the body existed separately, it would not be different from the other parts, foot, etc., [in the sense that it would cease being a whole to become a part].

Furthermore, the body, [as a whole (avayavin)], is a single thing whereas its causes, [as ‘parts’ (avayava)], are many. But singularity (ekatva) is not plurality (nānātva), and plurality is not singularity.

Finally, to claim that a special dharma called ‘body’ exists outside of its parts is to be in contradiction with the whole world.

Thus one cannot say that the body is identical with its parts or that it is different from its parts. This is why there is no body and, the body not existing, the foot, etc., does not exist either. That is what should be understood by inner emptiness (adhyātmaśūnyatā).

Outer dharmas, houses, etc., also are empty in the same way. That is what is meant by outer emptiness (bahirdhāśūnyatā).

Question. – Destroying the body (kāya), the house (grha), etc., is to destroy singularity (ekatva) and multiplicity (prthaktva). Destroying singularity and multiplicity is the work of the heretical sūtras.⁴³³ In Buddhist sūtras, inner and outer dharmas really exist (adhyātmabahirdhā-dharma), namely, the six inner organs (adhyātmendriya) and the six outer objects (bahirdhāviśaya). Why do you say they do not exist?

Answer. – These inner and outer dharmas are assemblages existing metaphorically (prajñaptisat) as simple names (nāmamātra) as was the case for the body or the house.

VIII. EMPTINESS ACCORDING TO THE TWO VEHICLES

Furthermore, in brief (saṃkṣepeṇa), there are two kinds of emptiness: the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā) and the emptiness of dharmas (dharmāśūnyatā).⁴³⁴ For the disciples of the Hīnayāna ‘Lesser Vehicle’ who are of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), the emptiness of beings is taught so that, freed [from notions] of ‘me’ (ātman) and ‘mine’ (ātmīya), they do not become attached to any others. – For the disciples of the Mahāyāna ‘Greater Vehicle’ who are of keen faculties (tīkṣṇendriya), the emptiness of dharmas is taught, and immediately they know that saṃsāra is eternally empty (nityaśūnya) and the same as nirvāṇa.

The śrāvakas and their scholars (upadeśācārya) teach inner emptiness (adhyātmaśūnyatā): “In inner dharmas (adhyātmadharma) there is neither ‘me’ (ātman) nor ‘mine’ (ātmīya), neither eternal entity nor agent (kāraṇa), neither a knower nor an experiencer (vedaka): this is called inner emptiness, and it is the same for outer emptiness.” However, they do not teach that inner and outer dharmas are empty [of their respective characteristics]. – The Mahāyānists, on the other hand, say that, in inner dharmas, the nature of inner dharma is absent and that in outer dharmas the nature of outer dharma is absent.

This is what is said in the Prajñāpāramitā: “Form is empty of the nature of form (rūpaṃ rūpatvena śūnyam); feeling (vedanā), concept (saṃjñā), volition (saṃskāra) and consciousness (viññāna) are empty of the nature [of feeling, concept, volition and] consciousness. The eye is empty of the nature of eye (caṅṅsuś caṅṅsustvena śūnyam); the ear (śrotra), nose (ghrāṇa), tongue (jihvā), body (kāya) and mind organ (manas) are empty of the natures [of ear, nose, tongue, body] and mind. Color is empty of the nature of color (rūpaṃ rūpatvena śūnyam); sound (śabda), smell (gandha), taste (rasa), tangible (spraṣṭavya) and dharmas are empty of the natures [of sound, smell, taste, tangible and] dharma. All these dharmas are empty of self nature.”⁴³⁵

Question. – [Emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā) and emptiness of dharmas] are two ways of teaching inner and outer emptiness. Which one is true?

Answer. – Both are true. For disciples of little knowledge (alpajñāna) and weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), only the emptiness of beings is first taught, and for beings of great knowledge (mahājñāna) and keen faculties (tīkṣṇendriya), the emptiness of dharmas is taught. [The Hīnayānist śrāvaka] is like a prisoner (kārāsthā) who breaks his bonds (bandhana), kills the prison guard (kārādhyakṣa) and can leave at will; [the Mahāyānist is like this other one] who, out of fear of brigands (caura), makes a hole in the wall and escapes (niḥsaraṇa).

Destroying only the causes and conditions of his egotism (ahaṃkāra), the śrāvaka no longer produces⁴³⁶ passions (kleśa) and eliminates the thirst for dharmas (dharmatrṣṇā), but fearing the suffering of old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī), death (maraṇa) and the evil destinies (durgatī), he does not investigate [287c] the beginning of desire (kāma) and does not destroy dharmas at the root: for him, only deliverance (vimukti) is important. – The Mahāyānist, on the other hand, destroys the prison of the triple world (traiḍhātuka), subdues the armies of Māra (mārasenā), breaks the fetters (saṃyojana) and eliminates the traces of the passions (vāsanā); he knows clearly the beginning and end of all dharmas; his penetrations (pravedha) are unhindered (nivaraṇa);⁴³⁷ he destroys and scatters all dharmas so well [that to his eyes] saṃsāra is the same as nirvāṇa⁴³⁸ and is merged with calm (upaśama), cessation (nirodha). The Mahāyānist attains supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi), guides all beings and makes them come out of the triple world.

⁴³⁵ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 128 (T 223, k. 3, p. 235a11; k. 9, p. 288b10; k. 16, p. 337b4, k. 21, p. 372c11; 373c3: tathā hi rūpaṃ rūpatvena śūnyam... yā ca rūpasya śūnyatā na tad rūpaṃ. na cānyatra śūnyatāya rūpaṃ. rūpaṃ eva śūnyatā śūnyatāiva rūpaṃ. And so on for all dharmas of which the complete list is given by the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 554, 6-559, 22.

⁴³⁶ Adopting the variant pou cheng.

⁴³⁷ Cf. p. 1013F, n. 1; Anguttara, V, p. 113, 116.

⁴³⁸ See p. 1142F.

⁴³³ The character p’o appearing in the fourth place in line 287b11 should probably be removed.

⁴³⁴ Cf. p. 239F, 1079F, 1685F.

IX. METHOD OF TEACHING EMPTINESS

Question. – By what method (upāya) does the Mahāyāna destroy the dharmas?

Answer. – [In the Phenasutta] the Buddha said: “Form (rūpa) born from many causes and conditions has no solidity (sāratā). Waves (taraṅga) on the water produce a ball of foam (phenapiṇḍa) which, as soon as it is seen, disappears; it is the same for form.”⁴³⁹

When the four great elements (mahābhūta) of the present existence (ihajanman) are brought together, they produce a form, but as soon as these causes and conditions disappear, the form disappears along with them.

The practitioner who follows the path of impermanence (anityatāmārga) penetrates gradually into the door of emptiness (śūnyatāmukha). How is that? The dharmas that perish as soon as they are born have not even a moment of duration (sthitī) and, not having a moment of duration, are not grasped.

Furthermore, by virtue of the characteristics of conditioned [dharmas] (saṃskṛtalakṣaṇa), at the moment of production (utpāda) there is disappearance (vyaya) and at the moment of disappearance there is production. If dharmas are already produced, production is useless; if they are not produced, production produces nothing.⁴⁴⁰ Between dharma and production there can be no difference. Why? If production had the nature of production (utpādalakṣaṇa), there would have to be ‘production of production’ (utpādotpāda), and this in turn would need a production: hence an infinite regression (anavasthā).⁴⁴¹ If the ‘production of production’ did not in its turn have a production, the [initial] production would not have a production either. If the [initial] production did not have production, the dharma itself would not have it either. Thus, production does not exist (nopalabhyate), neither does disappearance (vyaya). Therefore dharmas are empty (śūnya), without production (anutpāda), without destruction (anirodha): that is the truth.

Finally, if dharmas exist, they end up in non-existence finally. But that which is subsequently non-existent should also be previously non-existent. Thus, when a man wears wooden shoes (kāṣūthapāḍaukā) for the first time, they already possess [this non-existence], but as it is subtle, it is not noticed.⁴⁴² If the shoes did not possess this non-existence from the beginning, they would always be new. If they possess it afterwards, it is because they already possessed it previously. It is the same for dharmas: if they possess non-existence afterwards, it is because they already possess it before.

This is why all dharmas are necessarily empty. But as the result of a mistake consisting of taking to be a being that which is not a being (sattva sattva iti viparyāsa), one becomes attached to the six inner organs (adhyātmendriya). The yogin, however, destroys this error and this is what is called inner emptiness (adhyātmāśūnyatā). It is the same for the outer emptiness (bahirdhāśūnyatā) and the both inner and outer emptiness (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā).

Śūnyatāśūnyatā

Third Section EMPTINESS 4: EMPTINESS OF EMPTINESS

I. DEFINITION OF THE EMPTINESS OF EMPTINESSES⁴⁴³

“If production, duration and destruction in turn possessed another round of conditioned characteristics, there would be an infinite regression (of these rounds); but if they do not possess it, they are not conditioned.”

The Sarvāstivādin theory of secondary characteristics (anulakṣaṇa) affecting the characteristics of the conditioned, namely, production of production, etc., will be refuted by the Kośa, II, p. 224-225. See above, p. 1164F.

⁴⁴² The author has already used the example of the new garment, already used before even being worn. See above, p. 1163F.

⁴⁴³ Apart from the three samādhis of śūnyatā, ānimitta and apraṇihita constituting the doors of deliverance (p. 1213F seq.), the Abhidharma authors assume a śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi, an apraṇihitāpraṇihitasamādhi and an ānimittānimittasamādhi, signalling an advance over the three preceding ones.

Śūnyatāsamādhi, concerning the last two aspects (ākāra) of the truth of suffering, considers dharmas as empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātman): cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 104, p. 538b; Kośabhāṣya, p. 449, 15. And by empty dharmas, these authors mean dharmas contradictory to the view of self (ātmyādr̥ṣṭivipakṣa), without inner activity, without individuality (antarvyāpārapuruṣarahita), without self (ātmarahita): cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 400, 3, 9, 14.

Śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi considers the śūnyatāsamādhi of the arhats solely as empty and not as non-self, because śūnyatā is more distasteful than anātman: cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 105, p. 543c16-27; Kośa, VIII, p. 188; Kośabhāṣya, p. 450, 13-14; Kośavyākhyā, p. 683, 12-21.

⁴³⁹ Phenasutta in Saṃyutta, III, p. 140-141: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave ayaṃ Gaṅgā nādi mahantaṃ phenapiṇḍam āvaheyya. tam enaṃ cakkhumā puriso passeyya nijjhāyeyya yoniso upaparikkheyya. tassa taṃ passato nijjhāyato yoniso upaparikkhato rittakaññeva khāyeyya tucchakaññeva khāyeyya asārakaññeva khāyeyya. kiñhi sīyā bhikkhave phenapiṇḍe sāro. Evaṃ eva kho bhikkhave yaṃ kiñci rūpaṃ aritānāgataṃ paccuppannaṃ. pe. yaṃ dūre santike vā. taṃ bhikkhu passati nijjhāhataṃ yoniso upaparikkhati. tassa taṃ passato nijjhāyato yoniso upaparikkhato rittakaññeva khāyati tucchakaññeva khāyati asārakaññeva khāyati. kiñhi bhikkhave rūpe sāro. – It is as if the river Ganges was carrying a great ball of foam and a perceptive man saw it, contemplated it, examined it deeply and doing that, found it empty, hollow and worthless. What value, O monks would there be in a ball of foam? It is the same for no matter what form, past, future or present, distant or close, that a bhikkhu sees, contemplates and examines deeply. Doing that, he finds it empty, hollow and without value. What value, O monks, is there in form?

⁴⁴⁰ Cf. Madh. kārikā, VII, 2 (p. 146):

Utpādāyās trayo vyastā nālaṃ lakṣaṇakarmanī / saṃskṛtasya samastāḥ syur ekatra katham ekadā //

“The three characteristics, production, etc., if they are separated, are not enough to characterize the conditioned; if they are brought together, how would they exist in the same place and at the same time?” Argument already used above, p. 922F.

⁴⁴¹ Cf. Madh. kārikā, VII, 3 (p. 147):

*Utpādasthitibhaṅgānām anyat saṃskṛtalakṣaṇam /
asti ced anavasthaviṃ nāsti cet te na saṃskṛtāḥ //*

In the Pāli scholasticism as well, there is a question of the emptiness of emptiness (suññasuññam). For the Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 178, it is the fact that the six inner organs, eye, etc., are empty of self (atta), of ‘mine’ (attaniya), of permanence (nicca), of solidity (dhuvā), of perpetuity (sassata), and of unchangeability (avipariṇāmadhamma). According to the Commentary of the Paṭisambhidā, III, p. 632, emptiness as emptiness is called the emptiness of emptiness, not determined by any other incidental word (suññasankhātāṃ suññaṃ, na aññena upapadenavissesseitan ’ti suññaṃ suññaṃ).

Thus, the early masters of the Abhidharma considered emptiness as such as the lack of ‘me’ and ‘mine’, and professed simply the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā). But they did not deny the reality of things or dharmas. For them, dharmas, although transitory and suffering, really existed with their self nature (svabhāva) and their characteristics (lakṣaṇa), and non-self was one of their shared characteristics. In dharmas they grasped the mark (nimitta) of non-self (anātman) which they qualified as empty (śūnya), but this emptiness had the dharma itself as substratum (āśraya). Realists and pluralists by affirming the existence of everything, viz., the five aggregates (skandha) the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) or the eighteen elements (dhātu), they were nihilists insofar as they denied any substantial reality whatsoever, eternal and immutable, to this ‘everything’.

The position of the Mahāyānists is quite different. The Traité, which is their spokesman, endlessly criticizes the Sarvāstivādins for their nimittodgrahaṇa, their grasping at the characteristics in things and, in particular, their grasping at emptiness (p. 1093F, 2082F, 2130F). Seeing emptiness in dharmas is acknowledging a certain existence to the latter and hypostatizing the emptiness of self which characterizes them. To tell the truth, dharmas are not only empty of self and of ‘mine’ (sattvaśūnya), they are also empty of dharmas (dharma), empty of self nature and of the characteristics of dharma. Not existing in any manner, they do not lend themselves to any grasping. The emptiness that one thinks to find in them is nothing at all because it does not apply to anything. There is, therefore, not only the emptiness of beings and of things, but also the emptiness of emptiness (śūnyatāśūnyatā). To hypostatize it would be the height of foolishness.

This is explained very well by Nāgārjuna and his commentator Candrakīrti in Madhyamakāśāstra, kārīkā XIII, 7 (p. 245-246):

Yac cokatam asvabhāvo bhāvo naivāsti śūnyatā ca bhāvanām iṣyate / tasmād asti śūnyatāśrayo bhāvasvabhāva iti / etad api na yujyate ity āha /

Yadāśūnyaṃ bhavet kiṃ cit syāc śūnyam iti kiṃ can / na kiṃ cid asty āśūnyaṃ ca kutah śūnyaṃ bhaviṣyati //

Yadī śūnyatā nāma kā cit syāt tadāśrayo bhāvasvabhāvaḥ syāt / na tv evam / iha hi śūnyatā nāmeti sarvadharmānāṃ sāmānyalakṣaṇaṃ ity abhyupagamād āśūnyadharmābhāvad āśūnyataiva nāsti / yadā cāśūnyaḥ padārtha na santi / āśūnyatā ca nāsti / tadā pratīpakṣanirapekṣatvāc śūnyatāpi khaṇusamāhāvan nāstīty avasīyatām / yadā ca śūnyatā nāsti tadā tadāśrayā api padārthā na santīti sthitam avikalam /.

Transl. - We are told: “An essence without existence in itself does not exist. Now the emptiness of essences is postulated. Therefore there is a substratum of emptiness, namely, the existence in itself of the essences.” This objection also is absurd and, to refute it, Nāgārjuna says:

If something were non-empty, there could be a certain emptiness in it.

But there is nothing that is not non-empty; then how could there be emptiness?

If there were some ‘emptiness’, its support, namely, the existence in itself of essences, would exist. But that is not so. Here actually a thesis is postulated that ‘emptiness’ is a characteristic shared by all dharmas, but as there is no dharma that is not non-empty, non-emptiness itself does not exist either. Since there are neither non-

By means of [this fourth] emptiness, the emptiness of inner dharmas (adhyātmaśūnyatā), the emptiness of outer dharmas (bahirdhāśūnyatā) and the emptiness of both inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā) is eliminated. Since [this fourth] emptiness destroys the [first] three emptinesses, it is called the emptiness of emptinesses (śūnyatāśūnyatā).

First, one uses [the three] emptinesses of dharmas to destroy inner and outer dharmas, and then one uses this [fourth] emptiness to destroy the [first] three emptinesses. This [fourth emptiness] is called the emptiness of emptinesses.

Furthermore, by means of the three concentrations of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi), the yogin considers (anupaśyati) the emptiness of the five aggregates (skandha), obtains the eightfold noble path (āryāṣṭāṅgamārga), destroys the passions (kleśa) and obtains nirvāṇa with residue of conditioning (sopadhiṣṇanirvāṇa). Then, as a result of the karmic causes and conditions of his previous lifetimes (pūrvajanman), the yogin, at the dissolution of the body after [288a] death (kāyasya bhedāt param maraṇāt) abandons the eightfold path⁴⁴⁴ and produces a concentration of emptiness of emptinesses (śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi) called emptiness of emptinesses.

II. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN EMPTINESSES AND EMPTINESS OF EMPTINESSES

Question. – What difference is there between emptinesses and the emptiness of emptinesses?

Answer. – 1) The emptinesses destroy the five aggregates of attachment (pañcopādānaskandha); the emptiness of emptinesses destroys the emptinesses.

Question. – If the emptinesses are dharmas, as empty, they are already destroyed; if they are not dharmas, of what destruction of emptinesses is it a question here?

empty entities nor non-emptiness, it must be accepted that in the absence of the contrary on which emptiness relies, it too exists no more than does a garland of sky-flowers. And since emptiness does not exist, the entities that would serve as its substratum do not exist; that is certain and sure.

- This is why the Mādhyamika Mahāyānists keep from grasping the mark of emptiness and hypostatizing an emptiness that they do not see (cf. p. 925F, 1091F, 1226-29F). Carefully following the Middle Way, they are neither realists nor nihilists, whereas by grasping a certain emptiness in things, the Sarvāstivādins, realists as they would like to be, are not free of some negativity.

⁴⁴⁴ Śūnyatāsamādhi provokes disgust for saṃsāra; śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi which follows it involves disgust for the dharmas of the Path. By means of the knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana), the ascetic knows that the path of cessation of suffering practiced by him no longer need be practiced (mārgo me bhāvito na punar bhavitavyaḥ): cf. p. 1359F.

Answer. – When the emptinesses have destroyed all the dharmas, there remain only the emptinesses, but these emptinesses must in their turn be rejected after they have destroyed all the dharmas. This is why an emptiness of emptinesses is needed.

2) Furthermore, the emptinesses concern (ā lambhante) all the dharmas, whereas the emptiness of emptinesses concerns only the emptinesses.

Thus, when a strong man (balavat puruṣa) has destroyed all the brigands (caura), yet another individual is necessary in order to destroy this first strong man. The emptiness of emptinesses plays that role.

Thus, when one swallows a remedy (bhaiṣajya), the remedy suppresses the illness (vyādhī), but once the illness has been destroyed, the remedy in turn must be rejected. If the remedy were not rejected, there would be sickness again.⁴⁴⁵ In the same way, when one has destroyed the sicknesses of the passions (kleśavyādhī) by means of the emptinesses, it is to be feared lest these emptinesses themselves present drawbacks (upadrava) in turn. This is why recourse is made to another emptiness to destroy the previous ones: it is called emptiness of emptinesses.

3) Finally, as this last emptiness destroys the other seventeen emptinesses, it is called emptiness of emptinesses (śūnyatāśūnyatā).

Mahāśūnyatā

Fourth Section EMPTINESS 5: GREAT EMPTINESS OR EMPTINESS OF THE TEN DIRECTIONS

I. GREAT EMPTINESS IN THE TWO VEHICLES

This is about the great emptiness (mahāśūnyatā).

1) In the śrāvaka system, it is the emptiness of dharmas (dharmāśūnyatā) that is the great emptiness (mahāśūnyatā).

[Mahāśūnyatāsūtra.] – Thus it is said in the Ta-k'ong king (Mahāśūnyatāsūtra) of the Tsa-a han (Samyuktāgama): It is said that old age and death has birth (jātipratyayaṃ jarāmaraṇam) as condition. In this regard, if somebody said: ‘This is old age and death’ or ‘Old age and death belong to this man’ (asya vā jarāmaraṇam), the two statements together would be wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi). Actually, the man to whom old age and death belongs is empty of being (sattvaśūnyatā) and old age and death is empty of dharma (dharmāśūnyatā).⁴⁴⁶

2) On the other hand, the Mahāyānasūtras say that the ten directions (diś) are empty of characteristics of the ten directions (daśadiglakṣaṇaśūnyā)⁴⁴⁷ and that that is the great emptiness (mahāśūnyatā).

II. SIZE OF THE DIRECTIONS

Question. – Why is the emptiness of the ten directions (daśadikśūnyatā) called great emptiness (mahāśūnyatā)?

Answer. – The directions, the east (pūrvā diś), etc., being limitless (ananta), are called great. They are called great because they are omnipresent (sarvatraga), because they include all forms (rūpa), because they ⁴⁴⁶ By mahāśūnyatā, the śrāvakas mean the twofold emptiness of beings and things (sattva- and dharmāśūnyatā), while the Mahāyānists see in it the emptiness of the ten spatial directions (dikśūnyatā).

The twofold emptiness of beings and things is taught in a canonical sūtra mentioned three times by the Traité: k. 18, p. 192c26-27, see above, p. 1079F); k. 31, p. 288a12 (the present passage); k. 31, p. 295b27 (see below, p. 2143F).

This sūtra is entitled Mahāśūnyatāsūtra (or Mahāśūnyatā nāma dharmaparyāya) in the Sanskrit Samyuktāgama (Nidānasamyukta, ed. C. Tripathi, p.152-157), Ta k'ong fa in the Chinese version (T 99, no. 297, p. 84c11-85a10). It has as correspondent in the Pāli Samyutta (II, 60-63) a suttanta entitled Avijjāpaccayā. Here is the translation of the Sanskrit:

The scene takes place among the Kuru. Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "I will teach you the Dharma that is good at the beginning, good in the middle and good at the end", up to: "I will reveal it to you", namely, the religious teaching called Great Vehicle. Listen then, reflect well as is appropriate. I will speak."

What are the religious teachings of great emptiness? They are: "If this is, then that is; from the production of this, that is produced, namely, the formations have as condition ignorance", up to "such is the origin..."

It is said that "old age-death has as condition birth", and some people may ask what is old age-death and to whom does it belong? Somebody might answer: "This is old age-death", or "Old age death belongs to this person". Somebody else might answer: "The vital principle is identical with the body", or "The vital principle is different from the body". These two answers would be identical (in error) and different (only) in the letter.

As long as the wrong view that consists of saying that the vital principle is the same as the body persists, the religious life is impossible. As long, O monks, as the wrong view that consists of saying that the vital principle is different from the body persists, the religious life is impossible.

There is a middle path that avoids these two extremes: it is the right view, noble, supramundane, correct and free of error, affirming (simply) that old age and death has birth as condition.

- Below (p. 2143F), the Traité will place the Mahāśūnyatāsūtra among the rare texts of the Tripitaka where dharmāśūnyatā is taught.

⁴⁴⁷ See above (p. 2143F) the definition of mahāśūnyatā proposed by all the great Prajñāpāramitāsūtras.

⁴⁴⁵ Example borrowed from Kāśyapaparivarta, §63-65; see above, p. 1227, n.

exist eternally, because they benefit people (loka) and because they prevent people from becoming disoriented.⁴⁴⁸ This is why the emptiness that can destroy these ten directions is called great emptiness.

The other emptinesses that destroy the dharmas coming from causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpanna), conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛta), coarse (audārika) dharmas that are easy to destroy, are not called great. By contrast, the directions are not dharmas coming from causes and conditions or conditioned dharmas: they are subtle (sūkṣma) dharmas and difficult to destroy. This is why [the emptiness that destroys them] is called great emptiness.

III. THE DIRECTIONS EXIST ONLY IN RELATIVE TRUTH

Question. – However, in the Buddhist system, there is no question of the directions: they are not included (saṃgrhīta) among the three unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), namely, space (ākāśa), cessation due to knowledge (pratisaṃkhyanirodha) and the cessation not due to knowledge (aprasaṃkhyanirodha).⁴⁴⁹ Then why do you claim that there are directions that you define as eternal (nitya) entities, unconditioned dharmas (anabhisamskṛtadharmā), dharmas not coming from causes and conditions (apratītyasamutpanna), dharmas without formation (asaṃskāradharma), subtle (sūkṣma) dharmas?

Answer. – It is true that in the treatises of the śrāvakas the directions do not occur, but according to the Mahāyāna system, they exist in relative truth (saṃvṛtisatya). From the absolute point of view (paramārtha), all dharmas are non-existent (anupalabdha) and the directions in particular.

Just as the complex of the five aggregates is metaphorically (prajñāpyate) called ‘being’, in the same way the complex of forms derived from the four great elements (caturmahābhūtopādāyārūpasāmagrī), where ⁴⁴⁸ Above (p. 76F, 595-597F, 922-923F0, the Traité has already alluded to one or another category of the heretical system of the Vaiśeṣikas. Here it adopts, but only provisionally, the Vaiśeṣika concept of diś, the spatial orientation or direction of things, a concept which the Buddhists have always rejected. According to the Vaiśeṣika Ōutra of Kaṇāda (I, I, 5), the universe is composed of nine substances (dravya): earth (prthivī), water (āpas), fire (tejas), air (vāyu), the ether (ākāśa), time (kāla), spatial direction (diś), the soul (ātman) and mind (manas). Five of these substances, earth, water, fire, air and mind, are called active; the other four, ether, time, direction and the soul are inactive. Besides, five of them, ether, time, spatial direction, the soul and mind are eternal; the other four, earth, water, fire and air are each considered to be eternal or non-eternal as the case may be. The atoms of earth, water, fire and air are bathed in the ether (ākāśa) and are arranged according to two principles: time (kāla) and spatial direction (diś). – See the summary of the system in Inde Classique, II, p. 65-74; R. Grousset, Philosophies indiennes, I, p. 69-84; J. Filliozat, Les Philosophies de l’Inde, Paris, 1970, p. 91-95.

⁴⁴⁹ It is often a question of the ten directions in Buddhist texts (cf. p. 445F, n. 3), but they do not appear in the list of 75 dharmas (72 saṃskṛtas and 3 asaṃskṛtas) prepared by the Sarvāstivādin-Vaiśeṣikas, or in the list of 100 dharmas of the Vijñānavādins (cf. R. Kimura, The original and developed Doctrines of Indian Buddhism in Charts, Calcutta, 1920, p. 14, 55). The Buddhists have undoubtedly thought that diś made ākāśa redundant. Besides, the Traité (p. 923F) condemned the nine dravyas of the Vaiśeṣikas.

such and such localization is distinguished, is called ‘direction’ metaphorically. The place where the sun rises is [288b] the eastern direction (pūrvā diś); the place where the sun sets is the western direction (paścimā diś): those are the directions. These directions spontaneously (svarasena) exist eternally; therefore they do not come from causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpanna). Neither is it about actual existences preceded by an earlier non-existence, nor of later non-existences preceded by an present existence; they are not formations (saṃskāra) and they are not known by direct perception (pratyakṣa); therefore they are subtle (sūkṣma) dharmas.

Question. – If the directions are truly real, how can they be destroyed?

Answer. – Did you not understand what I just said? These directions exist in relative truth (saṃvṛtisatya) but, from the absolute point of view (paramārtha), they are [fundamentally] destroyed. By saying that they exist in relative truth, I do not fall into the [wrong view] of nihilism (uccheda-drṣṭi); by saying that, from the absolute viewpoint, they are destroyed, I do not fall into the [wrong view] of eternalism (śāśvata-drṣṭi). In summary (saṃkṣepeṇa), that is what great emptiness means.

Question. – But emptiness of the absolute (paramārthaśūnyatā, no. 6) also destroys the unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) dharmas, the dharmas not coming from causes and conditions (apratītyasamutpanna), the subtle (sūkṣma) dharmas. Why then is it not called ‘great’?

Answer. – Since the adjective ‘great’ is being applied here to ‘great emptiness (mahāśūnyatā, no. 5), the emptiness of the absolute (paramārthaśūnyatā, no. 6) will not be qualified as ‘great’. But even though absolute emptiness is qualified differently, it really is great: the supramundane (lokottara) in its quality of nirvāṇa is great; and the universe (loka), in its quality of directions (diś), is great. This is why the emptiness of the absolute, it too, is great.

IV. WRONG VIEWS DESTROYED BY GREAT EMPTINESS

Finally, because it destroys the major wrong views (mithyā-drṣṭi), [the emptiness of the directions] is called great.

Let us suppose that a yogin⁴⁵⁰ wants to make his loving-kindness (maitrī) spread to the beings of a certain kingdom (rāṣṭra) of the eastern direction, then to the beings of another kingdom [of the east], and so on. If he says: “My loving-kindness applies completely to all the kingdoms of the east”, he falls into the wrong view of a finite world (antavānlokaḥ); and if he says: “My loving-kindness does not completely apply to all these kingdoms”, he falls into the wrong view of an infinite world (anantavān lokaḥ).⁴⁵¹ By thus producing these two wrong views, he loses his mind of loving-kindness.

⁴⁵⁰ This is a yogin practicing the meditation on loving-kindness (maitrī), the first of the four apramāṇas or brahmavihāras (cf. p. 1239F seq.).

⁴⁵¹ The theories of a finite or infinite world have been put among the fourteen difficult questions to which the Buddha refused to reply: cf. P. 154-158F, 421F, 423F, 529F, 1589F, 1682F, etc.

If the yogin uses the emptiness of the directions (dikṣūnyatā) to destroy this direction of the east, he destroys the wrong views of a finite world and an infinite world. – If he does not use the emptiness of the directions to destroy the direction of the east, he prolongs in himself the thought of the eastern direction and this prolongation being endless, his mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) vanishes and wrong thoughts arise.

Thus, when the great sea (mahāsamudra), has reached its usual limits (mayādā) at the time of the tide (pariṣyanda), the water recedes and the fish⁴⁵² (matsya) that do not withdraw with it are left wriggling on the shore, suffering horrible torments. If the fish are wise, they withdraw with the water and find definitive safety. In the same way, the yogin who does not withdraw following the mind [of loving-kindness] is left wriggling in wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭi), but if he withdraws following the mind, he does not lose the mind of loving-kindness.

Therefore, because it destroys the major wrong views, [the emptiness of the directions] is called great emptiness.

Paramārthaśūnyatā

Fifth Section EMPTINESS 6: EMPTINESS OF THE ABSOLUTE OR OF NIRVĀṆA

I. DEFINITION AND SYNONYMS OF THE ABSOLUTE⁴⁵³

⁴⁵² The image of the fish that dries up in the absence of water (macho appodake) is canonical: Suttanipāta, v. 777 (p. 152), 936 (p. 183); Theragāthā, v. 362 (p. 40), 387 (p. 43); Mahāniddesa, II, p. 408.

⁴⁵³ Here paramārthaśūnyatā is not taken in the sense of emptiness in the true sense of the word, but of emptiness of the paramārtha, i.e., of nirvāṇa. The two terms are often synonymous: paramattho vuccati amataṃ nibbanam (Cullaniddesa, p. 197).

The Traité intercedes here in the controversy between the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika and the Sautrāntika concerning the asaṃskṛta of which nirvāṇa is a part. It has been discussed in detail by L. de La Vallée Poussin, Documents d'Abhidharma, BEFEO, XXX, 1930, p. 1-28, 247-298, but it should be summarized briefly.

According to scripture, unlike conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛta), form, etc., the asaṃskṛta has neither production (utpāda), disappearance (vyaya) nor duration-modification (sthitanyathātva): cf. Āṅguttara, I, p. 192; Kathāvatthu, p. 61; Nidānasamyukta, p. 139; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 168; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1262.

1) The Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas posit three asaṃskṛtas: space (ākāśa) and the two cessations (nirodha), the cessation due to knowledge (pratisaṃkhyānirodha) and the cessation not due to knowledge (apratisaṃkhyānirodha): cf. Kośa, I, p. 8.

Ākāśa has as its nature the non-hindering of form (rūpānāvaraṇasvabhāva) and giving way to it: Kośa, I, p. 8.

Pratisaṃkhyānirodha, or nirvāṇa properly called, is disjunction from the impure dharmas (sāsravair dharmair viśamyogah), a disjunction of which one takes possession by means of a certain knowledge (prajñāviśeṣa):

1) The absolute (paramārtha) is the true nature of dharmas (dharmānām bhūtalakṣaṇam or dharmatā) because it is indestructible and inalterable. This true nature of dharmas itself is empty (śūnya). Why? Because there is no grasping (upādāna) or attachment (abhiniveśa) [in regard to it]. If the true nature of dharmas existed, one would be able to take it and become attached to it, but as it does not really exist, one does not take it and one does not become attached to it. If one does take it and becomes attached to it, that is a mistake.

the pratisaṃkhyāna, the understanding of the four Buddhist truths (āryasatyānām pratisaṃkhyānam): cf. Kośa, I, p. 9.

Apratisaṃkhyānirodha is also a cessation, but is different from the preceding disjunction (viśamyogād anyah). It is an absolute obstacle to the production of future dharmas (anāgatānām dharmānām utpādasyātyantavighnabhūta). It is obtained, not by understanding of the Buddhist truths, but by the insufficiency of causes for birth (pratayayaivaikaḥ): cf. Kośa, I, p. 10.

The Sarvāstivādins consider the three asaṃskṛtas to be real and claim that there really (asti) exists a dharma to be inwardly realized by the saints (āryaiḥ pratyātmavedyaḥ), a real and distinct entity, good and eternal (nityam kuśalam dravyāntaram) called pratisaṃkhyānirodha or nirvāṇa: cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 92, 2-3.

2) The Sautrāntikas and, in particular, Vasubandhu define the asaṃskṛtas in quite another way:

Ākāśa is merely the absence of the tangible (spraṣṭavyābhāvamātra). Thus people who do not come across any obstacle in the dark say that there is space: cf. Kośa, II, p. 279.

Pratisaṃkhyānirodha or nirvāṇa is the cessation of the passions and already produced births (utpannānuśayañmanirodha) and the absence of production of any other passions and other births (anyasyānutpāda), and this by the power of understanding the truths (pratisaṃkhyābalena): cf. Kośa, II, p. 279; Kośabhāṣya, p. 92, 5-6.

Apratisaṃkhyānirodha, independently of the understanding of the truths and by virtue of the insufficiency of the causes of birth, is the absence of production of any dharma (vinaiva pratisaṃkhyayā pratayayaivaikaḥ anutpādah): cf. Kośa, II, p. 279; Kośabhāṣya, p. 92, 7.

Having thus defined the asaṃskṛtas in terms of absence, the Sautrāntikas deny any reality to them: Sarva evāsaṃskṛtam adṛavyam: Kośabhāṣya, p. 92, 3-4.

3) For the Prajñāpāramitā, all dharmas, conditioned or unconditioned, are empty of their respective characteristics and consequently escape any predication; they are thus neither to be grasped (parigraha) nor to be abandoned (utsarga): Yac ca saṃskṛtānām dharmānām lakṣaṇam yac cāsaṃskṛtānām dharmānām lakṣaṇam evenā lakṣaṇena sarva ete dharmāḥ śūnyāḥ (above, p. 2035F)

According to the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 234, 21-236, 7, ākāśa does not lend itself to any qualification; it is not grasped (na labhyate nopalabhyate); it is neither object nor non-object of speech (na pravayāhāro nāpravayāhārāḥ).

The Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 50-51, the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 134-135 and the Śatasāh., p. 615 seq., praise the wandering ascetic Śreṇika who, taught by the Buddha and trusting in his word, neither welcomed nor rejected any dharma: “He did not even think of nirvāṇa, basing himself on the fact that no dharma can be either taken nor abandoned. Why? Because the non-taking, the non-rejecting of dharmas is the perfection of wisdom” (sa nirvāṇenāpi na manyate sarvadharmāparigrahānūtsargatām upādāyam tat kasya hetoḥ? yaḥ sarvadharmānām aparigraho 'nūtsargaḥ sā prajñāpāramitā).

2) Furthermore, the dharma supreme among all dharmas (paramadharmā) is called nirvāṇa. Thus it is said in the Abhidharma:⁴⁵⁴ “What are the dharmas surpassed by others (sottara)? These are: a) all conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmā); b) space (ākāśa); c) cessation not due to knowledge (apratisaṃkhyānirodha). – What is the unsurpassed (anuttara) dharma? It is cessation due to knowledge (pratisaṃkhyānirodha).”⁴⁵⁵ But cessation due to knowledge is nirvāṇa.

II. EMPTINESS OF NIRVĀṆA

[288c] In nirvāṇa, there is no nature of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇalakṣaṇa), and the emptiness of nirvāṇa is the emptiness of the absolute (paramārthaśūnyatā).

Question. – If nirvāṇa is empty and without nature, why do the saints enter into the three Vehicles (yāna) and enter into nirvāṇa? Furthermore, it is said that “all the teachings of the Buddha lead to nirvāṇa” (nirvāṇaparyavasānāḥ sarve buddhadharmāḥ)⁴⁵⁶ like waves all enter into the sea.

⁴⁵⁴ Prakaraṇapāda, T 1541, k. 4, p. 64829-c1; T 1542, k. 6, p. 716a5-6. This passage appears in chap. VI, the Samgrahavibhāga (?), counting among the last four chapters of the Prakaraṇapāda attributed by the Traité (p. 11F, n. 1) to the Kāśmīrian arhats.

⁴⁵⁵ Cf. Kośavyākhyā, p. 440, 20-24: Anāsravā api saṃskṛtā asaṃskṛtaiḥ sottarāḥ. asaṃskṛtānāṃ nityavāt. asaṃskṛtāv apy ākāśāpratisaṃkhyānirodhau pratisaṃkhyānirodhena sottarau. pratisaṃkhyānirodhasya kuśalanītyavāt. mokṣas te anuttaraḥ na hi nirvāṇād viśiṣṭatamam asti. – Even though they are pure, the saṃskṛta are surpassed (sottarā iti sātīṣayāḥ) by the asaṃskṛta, for the latter are eternal. Two asaṃskṛta also, ākāśa and apratisaṃkhyānirodha, are surpassed by the pratisaṃkhyānirodha because the latter is good and eternal. But deliverance (mokṣa = pratisaṃkhyānirodha) itself is not surpassed, for there is nothing superior to nirvāṇa.

The distinction between surpassed (sottara) dharmas and unsurpassed (anuttara) dharmas appears frequently in the Abhidharma treatises: cf. Dhammasaṅgani, p. 225, 263-264; Atthasālinī, p. 50; Vibhāṅga, p. 19, etc.

⁴⁵⁶ Mūlasutta in Aṅguttara, V, p. 107, 11(Madhyama, T 26, k. 28, p. 602c16): nibbānapariyosānā sabbe dhammā. – Cf. the expression nibbāninna, nibbānapoṇa, nibbānapabbhāra: Majjhima, I, p. 493; Saṃyutta, V, p. 28-40, etc.

Answer. – There ‘is’ (asti) a nirvāṇa:⁴⁵⁷ it is the supreme jewel (paramaratna), the dharma without superior (anuttaradharmā),⁴⁵⁸ and it is of two kinds: i) nirvāṇa with residue of conditioning (sopadhiśeṣanirvāṇa);

⁴⁵⁷ To deny nirvāṇa is equivalent to denying Buddhism. This is why all the scholars, whatever their school, say that nirvāṇa ‘is’ (asti), but the meaning of the verb should be understood.

1) For the Sarvāstivādins, no difficulty, for they consider the asaṃskṛta to be an existence (bhāva).

2) For the Sautrāntikas, the question is more delicate since they plead ‘non-existence’ (abhāva) for nirvāṇa: cf. p. 1012F. Here is their explanation: We do not say definitely that asaṃskṛta does not exist, but the latter is such as has been said by us (na vai nāsty evāsaṃskṛtam iti brūmaḥ, etat tu tadīdṛṣaṃ yathāsmābhir uktam). Thus there ‘is’ a prior non-existence of sound (before it has been emitted) and there ‘is’ a later non-existence of sound (after it has been emitted) and yet it is not established that this non-existence is an existence; it is the same as with the unconditioned (tadyathā asti śabdasya prāgabdhāvo ’sti paścadabhāva ity ucyate, atha ca punarābhāvo bhāvaḥ sīdhyati. evam asaṃskṛtam api draṣṭavyam). However, a certain non-existence, very worthy of praise, does ‘exist’: the absolute non-existence of any torment; it is superior to the others and consequently merits receiving praise (abhāvo ’pi ca kaścit prāśasyatamo bhavati yaḥ sakalasyopadravasyātyantābhāva ity anyeṣam so ’gra iti praśaṃsām labdhum arhati): cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 93, 5-9). – In a word, the verb ‘to be’ does not mean ‘to exist’.

3) In chap. XXV of his Mūlamadhyamaka, Nāgārjuna describes his concept of nirvāṇa and the summary in a few words in kārikā 9 (p. 529):

Ya ājāvaṃjavibhāva upādāya pratītya vā / so ’pratītyānupādāya nirvāṇam upadiśyate //

Literally: The presence of comings and goings in ‘relation to’ or ‘in dependence on’ is defined as nirvāṇa, setting aside this relation and this dependency.

Candrakīrti comments: Janmamaraṇaparamparāprabandhasyāpratītya vānupādāya vā yāpravṛttir nirvāṇam iti vyavasthāpyate. – The non-functioning of the continuity of births and deaths in the absence of all relationship and dependency (in respect to anything at all) is established as nirvāṇa.

The continuity of births and deaths, i.e., saṃsāra, has never functioned since everything is empty, and nirvāṇa should be understood as the non-functioning (apravṛtti) of a saṃsāra that has never started.

That being so, nirvāṇa cannot be either bhāva ‘being’ (st. 4-6) or abhāva ‘not being’ (st. 7-8) or a higher synthesis of being and not being (st. 11). Let us admit frankly that it escapes the metaphysical realm; it is only a being for argument’s sake, “if, by a being for argument’s sake, we mean something that is not at all” (Descartes). The Ratnāvalī (cited in Madh. vṛtti, p. 524) defines it: bhāvābhāvaaparārśakṣaya, the elimination of any mind of existence or of non-existence.

On the Nāgārjunian nirvāṇa, a good description in R. Grousset, Les Philosophies indiennes, I, Paris, 1931, p. 261-263.

⁴⁵⁸ Pasādasutta in Aṅguttara, II, p. 34 (Tseng-yi-a-han, T 125, k. 12, p. 602a11-13) often reproduced in other sūtras (Aṅguttara, II, p. 35; Itivuttaka, p. 88):

Yāvatā dhammā saṅkhatā vā asaṅkhatā vā virāgo tesam dhammānaṃ aggam akkhāyati yadidaṃ madanimmadano pipāsavinayo ālayasamugghāto vīṭṭupacchedo taṇhakkhayo virāgo nirodho nibbānaṃ. – Of all the conditioned or unconditioned dharmas, the best is detachment, namely, the disintoxication of pride, the regulating of thirst, the crushing of the supports, the breaking of the functioning, the exhaustion of thirst, detachment, cessation, nirvāṇa.

ii) nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa). The nirvāṇa with residue of conditioning is the cutting off of all the passions, thirst, etc. (sarveṣāṃ tṛṣṇādikleśānāṃ prahāṇam); the nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning is the exhaustion of the five aggregates assumed by the saint (āryopāttānāṃ pañcaskandhānāṃ kusayah) during the present life and the fact that they will not be taken up anew. Therefore it is impossible to say that there is no nirvāṇa.

But hearing the name of nirvāṇa pronounced, beings produce wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), become attached (abhiniviśante) to the sound (ghoṣa) of nirvāṇa and provoke futile discussions (prapañca) on its existence (bhāva) or its non-existence (abhāva). It is in order to destroy these prejudices (abhiniveśa) that the emptiness of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasūnyatā) is taught here.

If people are attached to existence (bhāva), they are attached to saṃsāra; if they are attached to non-existence (abhāva), they are attached to nirvāṇa. [For myself], I destroy the nirvāṇa, the one that is desired (abhiniviṣṭa) by worldly people (prthagjana); I do not destroy nirvāṇa, the one that is grasped (upalabdha) by the saints (ārya). Why? Because the saints do not grasp any characteristic (na nimittam udgrhṇanati) in any dharma.

Furthermore, the passions, thirst, etc. (tṛṣṇādikleśa) are metaphorically called (prajñāpyante) ‘bonds’ (bandhana). If the path (mārga) is cultivated, these bonds are untied and the deliverance (vimukti) called nirvāṇa is obtained: apart from that there is no dharma that is ‘nirvāṇa’.⁴⁵⁹

Imagine a man bound in chains who, once he is freed, engages in vain chatter, saying: ”Here are the chains, here are the feet, what then is deliverance?” This man is foolish to look for a dharma ‘deliverance’ outside the feet and chains. Beings do the same thing when they seek a dharma ‘deliverance’ elsewhere than the chains of the five aggregates (skandha).

Finally, dharmas are not separate from the absolute (paramārtha) and the absolute is not separate from the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. The result is that the emptiness of the true nature of dharmas is the ‘emptiness of the absolute’. These are the various names used to designate the emptiness of the absolute.

The Sanskrit formula, more concise, is in the Divyāvadāna, p. 154, 155: Avadānaśataka, I, p. 50, 330; Kośabhāṣya, p. 93, 4-5: Yo kecid dharmā saṃskṛtā vāsaṃskṛtā vā virāgas teṣāṃ agra ākhyāyate. – Very close to the Pāli, Mahāvastu, II, p. 285, 20-21; III, p. 200, 11-12.

The topic in question bears the name aggappasāda in Pāli, agraprajñapti in Sanskrit.

⁴⁵⁹ Cf. Tsa-a-han, T 99, no. 306, k. 13, p. 88a9-12, cited in Kośabhāṣya, p. 93, 23-94, 2: yat svalpasya duḥkhasyāśeṣaprahāṇaṃ pratinihsargo vyantibhāvaḥ kṣayo virāgo nirodho vyupasaṃso ‘staṃgamah anyasya ca duḥkhasyāpṛatisaṃdhir anutpādo ‘prādurbhāvaḥ, etat kāntam etat prañāṃ yaduta sarvopadhipratinihsargas tṛṣṇākṣayo virāgo nirodho nirvāṇam. – The complete destruction of the least suffering, its rejection, its purification, its exhaustion; the detachment, the suppression, the pacification, the disappearance of this suffering; the non-rebirth, the non-production, the non-appearance of another suffering, that is what is cherished by the saints), that is excellent, namely, the rejection of all upadhi (= skandha), the exhaustion of thirst, renunciation, suppression, nirvāṇa.

The Sautrāntikas use this sūtra to support their thesis of nirvāṇa as pure non-existence (abhāvamātra): cf. Kośa, II, p. 284.

Samkṛtāsaṃskṛtāsūnyatā

Sixth Section EMPTINESSES 7 AND 8: EMPTINESS OF THE CONDITIONED AND EMPTINESS OF THE UNCONDITIONED

Conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmas) are dharmas coming from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayaśāṃgryutpanna), namely, the five aggregates (pañcaskandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (dvādaśāyatana) and the eighteen elements (aṣṭādaśadhaātū). The unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtadharmas) are dharmas without causes or conditions, eternal (nitya), unborn (anutpanna), undestroyed (aniruddha) and like space (ākāśasama).⁴⁶⁰

I. THE TWOFOLD EMPTINESS OF THE CONDITIONED

Here, the saṃskṛtadharmas are empty for two reasons:

- 1) They are empty because they have neither ‘me’ (ātman) nor ‘mine’ (ātmīya) and because eternity (nitya), immutability (avipariṇāmadharma) are lacking in them.⁴⁶¹
- 2) The saṃskṛtadharmas are empty of saṃskṛtadharmas characteristics, are not born (notpadyante), do not perish (na nirudhyante), do not exist (nopalabhyante).⁴⁶²

⁴⁶⁰ Cf. the canonical definitions:

Anguttara, I, p. 152. – Tṭhī’ imāni bhikkhave saṅkhatassa saṅkhatallakkaṇāni / katamāni tīni? / uppādo paññāyati vayo paññāyati tṭhitaṃ aññathattaṃ paññāyati / ...tṭhī’ imāni bhikkhave saṅkhatassa asaṅkhatallakkaṇāni / karakamāni tīni? / na uppādo paññāyati na vayo paññāyati na tṭhitaṃ aññathattaṃ paññāyati...

Nidānaśāmyukta, p. 139. – Dvayam idaṃ saṃskṛtañ cāsaṃskṛtañ ca / tatra saṃskṛtasyotpādo ‘pi prajñāyate vyayo ‘pi sthityanyathātvam api / asaṃskṛtasya naivotpādaḥ prajñāyate na vyayo na sthityanyathātvam.

On this topic and its numerous variations, see above, p. 36F, n. 2; I 163F, n. 1.

⁴⁶¹ Here this is the emptiness of being (sattvaśūnyatā) or the doctrine of the anātman, already professed by the canonical scriptures and defined by the Abhidhamma (Cullavaddesa, p. 279; Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 109:

Visuddhimagga, p. 561) in the following way: Suññaṃ attena vā attaniyena vā niccena vā dhuvena vā sassatena vā avipariṇāmadhammena vā. – Empty of self, of ‘mine’, of eternity, of solidity, of permanency, of immutability.

⁴⁶² Here this is the emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā) added to the preceding by the Mahāyānists. The saṃskṛtas are, in addition, empty of characteristics of saṃskṛta in the sense that they are without production (utpāda), without destruction (vyaya) and without duration-alteration (sthityanyathātva). This is their purity (viśuddha).

Śatasāhasrikā, p. 842, 12-10 (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 146, 18-147, 7): Kin iti bhagavan viśuddhitā/- bhagavān āha/anutpādaḥ/ anirodhaḥ/ evam asaṃvidyamānā tenocyate ‘vidyeti/ Transl. – What, O Blessed One, is purity? – The Blessed One replied: Non-production, non-destruction, non-defilement, non-purification, non-appearance, non-grasping, non-functioning of all dharmas, that is purity. This is how, O Śāradvatīputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva Question. – Since the ‘me’, the ‘mine’ and eternity are absent in them, they are empty. Why do you say further that the *saṃskṛtadharma*s are empty of characteristics of saṃskṛtadharma?

Answer. – Since there is no being (sattva = ātman), these dharmas are without basis (apraṭiṣṭhāna). Since they have no eternity, they have no time of duration (sthitikāla), and not having any duration, they are non-existent (anupalabdha). From that, we know that these dharmas are empty. [289a]

Question. – In the *saṃskṛtadharma*s, eternity is absent. Is this lack [of eternity] an emptiness of being (sattvaśūnyatā) or an emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā)?

Answer. – 1) Some speak about an [eternal] ātman. But it is as a result of a mental error (viparyāsa) that they posit an eternal ātman: this emptiness of eternity (nityaśūnyatā) introduces the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā).⁴⁶³

2) Others claim to consider the mind (citta) as eternal. Thus Fan T'ien-wang (Brahmā devarāja) said that the four great elements (mahābhūta) and material derived (upādāyarūpa) from the four great elements are non-eternal, whereas the mind (citta, manas) or the consciousness (viññāna) is eternal.⁴⁶⁴ [Now the mind is not eternal]: this emptiness of eternity introduces the emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā).

does not train in any dharma. Why? Because dharmas do not exist as foolish lay-people would have them. - Śāradvatīputra asked: How, O Blessed One, do these dharmas exist? – The Blessed One answered: They exist by not existing. Not to know this is ‘ignorance’.

⁴⁶³ In the words of the incessantly repeated canonical saying: Yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ, yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā. But impermanence does not explain the emptiness of beings alone, i.e., their non-individuality, it explains also the emptiness of dharmas called ‘conditioned’. Actually entities without ‘me’ and ‘mine’ do not exist in themselves, do not exist by themselves, and are empty of self nature and characteristics.

⁴⁶⁴ Kevaddhasutta of Dīgha, I, p. 211-223 (Tch’ang-a-han, T 1, k. 16, p. 101b-102c): The gṛhapatiputra Kevaddha, wishing to know where the great elements, earth, water, fire and wind definitively perish, uses his magical powers to go to the heavens and questions all the deities of the desire realm and the form realm successively. The gods confess their ignorance except for Mahābrahmā, the great god of the fourth dhyāna who, unable to answer, avoids the question by boasting: “I am Brahmā, the great Brahmā, the conqueror, never vanquished, the witness of everything, the sovereign, the lord, the agent, the creator, the best, the instigator, the mother, the father of beings present and future” (aham asmi brahmā mahābrahmā abhibhū anabhibhūto aññatthudaso vasavattī issaro kattā nimmātā seṭṭho saññitā vasī piṭā bhūtabhavyānaṃ). Then taking Kevaddha aside, he acknowledged himself to be unable to answer the question and advised him to go to consult the Buddha. The latter told Kevaddha that the four great elements endlessly disappear into the invisible Consciousness, infinite, brilliant in every way (viññāṇaṃ anidassanaṃ anantaṃ sabbato pahaṃ) and that, by the elimination from the consciousness of all the great elements, all nāma rūpa, are destroyed (viññāṇassa nirodhena eth’ etaṃ uparujjhati).

The expression sabbato pahaṃ is difficult. Rhys Davids (Dialogues, I, p. 283) gives it as “accessible from every side”, but proposes, in the Pāli Dictionary, s.v. paha, the translation “giving up entirely”. The Chinese translation of the Dīgha (T 1, p. 102c17) understands: tseu yeou kouang “shining by itself”.

The Kevaddhasutta is often mentioned by the Abhidharma authors to prove that dissimulation (māyā) and hypocrisy (śāthya) exist up to the realm of Brahmā. But these writers make the bhikṣu Āsvajit the hero of the story

3) Finally, others say: “The five aggregates (skandha) are eternal. Thus the aggregate of form (rūpaskandha), although it suffers transformations (pariṇāma), does not perish, nor do the other [four], such as the mind.”⁴⁶⁵ We, however, proclaim the emptiness of the five aggregates, i.e., the emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā).

Therefore the emptiness of eternity introduces the emptiness of things.

II. CONDITIONED AND UNCONDITIONED ARE INTERDEPENDENT IN EMPTINESS⁴⁶⁶

Furthermore, the yogin considers the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of the *saṃskṛtadharma*s and the *asaṃskṛtadharma*s: they have no agent (kāraka); since they exist as a result of a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasmagrī), they are all false and deceptive; they arise from memories and thought-constructions (anusmaraṇavikalpa); they occur neither on the inside nor on the outside nor in between the two (nādhātmaṃ nabahirdhā nobhayam antareṇopalabhyante);⁴⁶⁷ they are the result of the mistaken visions of worldly people (prthagjana). The wise man finds no self natures (svalakṣaṇa) in these and introduce some modifications into Brahmā’s boasts: aham asmi brahmā īśvaraḥ kartā nirmātā sraṣṭā srjaḥ piṭṛbhūto bhūtānām: cf. Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 12, p. 399a7; Kārikāvibhāṣā, T 1563, k. 6, p. 804c3.

On Brahmā’s pride, see also H8b8girin, p. 115.

⁴⁶⁵ Those who affirm that everything exists, past, future and present, are the Sarvāstivādins (Kosābhāṣya, p. 296, 4: ye hi sarvaṃ astīti vadanti, aītaṃ anāgataṃ pratyutpannaṃ ca te sarvātivādāḥ). Their opponents, the Sautrāntikas and Mādhyamikas, do not fail to underline the lack of logic in their position. It is arbitrary to claim that the self nature (svabhāva) of dharmas is eternal when their being (bhāva) is transitory and undergoes variations with time. Hence this stanza (Kosābhāṣya, p. 298, 21-22; Pañjikā, p. 581, 11-12):

Svabhāvaḥ sarvadā cāsti bhāvo nityaś ca neṣyate / na ca svabhāvād bhāvo ‘nyo vyaktam īśvaraceṣṭitam //

“The self nature always exists, but you deny that the being is eternal and that the being is different from the self nature. That is indeed the gesture of a dictator!”

⁴⁶⁶ By virtue of the law of the interdependence of opposites (pratidvandvisādharmya), “there where a given thing is not, its opposite is not” (Madh. vṛtti, p. 287, 15: iha yo nāsti na tasya pratidvandvī vidyate). Now the saṃskṛtas, lacking production, disappearance and duration-modification do not exist. Therefore their opposite, the asāṃskṛtas, do not exist either. See Madh. kārikā, VII, st. 33 (p. 176):

*Utpādashitibhaṅgānām asiddher nāsti saṃskṛtam /
saṃskṛtasyāprasiddhau ca kathaṃ setsyaty asaṃskṛtam //*

“The production, duration and destruction not being proved, there is no conditioned. And the conditioned not having been demonstrated, how could there be the unconditioned?”

On this stanza, see J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 140.

⁴⁶⁷ An expression dedicated to excluding any modality of existence. It occurs in Kāśyapaparivarta, §143, cited in Madh. vṛtti, p. 48, 2-3.

*saṃskṛtadharma*s; he sees in them only simple metaphors (prajñaptimātr) serving to guide worldly people; he recognizes their falsity, unreality, non-birth, inactivity and his mind does not become attached to them.

Furthermore, the saints (ārya) who do not grasp these *saṃskṛtadharma*s attain the fruits of the Path (mārgaphala). Considering the emptiness of the *saṃskṛtadharma*s, their minds do not become attached to them.

Finally, outside of the saṃskṛtas, there is no asaṃskṛta. Why? Because the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of the *saṃskṛtadharma*s is unconditioned and this unconditioned nature itself is not conditioned: it is but an imaginary expression created by the mistake (viparyāsa) of beings.

The natures (lakṣaṇa) of the saṃskṛtas are production (utpāda), disappearance (vyaya) and duration-alteration (śhityanyathāva); the natures of the asaṃskṛtas are non-production, non-disappearance, non-duration and non-change: this is the first gateway of entry into the Buddhadharma. But if the *asaṃskṛtadharma*s had such natures, they would be conditioned (saṃskṛta).

The nature of production (utpādalakṣaṇa) of the *saṃskṛtadharma*s constitutes the truth of the origin of suffering (samudayasatya), and their nature of disappearance (vyayalakṣaṇa) constitutes the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodhasatya).⁴⁶⁸ But if really these *saṃskṛtadharma*s are not produced, they do not act, and if they do not act, they are not destroyed. Therefore they are *asaṃskṛtadharma*s, just like the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa).

He who finds this true nature of dharmas no longer falls [into the error] concerning the natures of production, disappearance, duration or changeability. From this time on, he no longer sees relationship between conditioned and unconditioned dharmas or between unconditioned and conditioned dharmas. Not grasping any specific mark (nimitta) in conditioned and unconditioned dharmas is what the unconditioned consists of.⁴⁶⁹ Why? If one imagines conditioned and unconditioned dharmas, one comes up against ⁴⁶⁸ For the Mahāyānists, there is a close parallelism between seeing the emptiness of the saṃskṛtas and the penetration of the four noble truths involving three revolutions (parivarta) and twelve aspects (ākāra) due to four aspects for each of three revolutions (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 11, 1-32; Catuspariśatsūtra, p. 142-152 or 445-446; Mahāvastu, III, p. 332, 13-333, 17; Lalitavistara, p. 417, 15-418, 21. Seeing the emptiness of the saṃskṛtas corresponds to aspects 9 to 12 of the noble truths. This is what is explained in the Dhyāyitamūṣṭisūtra cited in Madh. vṛtti, p. 298: Yena mañjuśrīr anuṣṭannāḥ sarvasaṃskārā dṛṣṭās tena duḥkhaṃ parijñātaṃ / yenāsamutthitāḥ sarvadharmā dṛṣṭās tasya samudayaḥ prahīṇaḥ / yenāntaparinirvṛtāḥ sarvadharmā dṛṣṭās tena nirodhaḥ sāṃskṛtāḥ / yenāntaśūnyāḥ sarvadharmā dṛṣṭāstena mārgo bhāvitaḥ /

Transl. - Mañjuśrī, he who has seen that all the formations are unborn has recognized suffering. He who has seen that all things are non-produced has destroyed the origin (of suffering). He who has seen that all things are absolutely extinct has realized the cessation (of suffering). He who has seen that all things are absolutely empty has practiced the Path.

⁴⁶⁹ “After having gone to a lot of trouble to refute the conditioned and unconditioned as interdependent, here the author, in passing, suggests the unconditioned as a nirvāṇa universally and eternally acquired, incapable of being the object of any attachment. This method of denying and affirming an absolute reality at the same time is a characteristic step of the Madhyamaka.” (J. May) obstacles. If one cuts through memories and thought-constructions (anusmaraṇavikalpa), one destroys all objects (ālambana) and, by the true knowledge free of object (anālambanabhūtañjāna), one no longer falls into the series of rebirths (janman) but one attains salvation (yogaḥśema), the nirvāṇa of eternal bliss (nityasukhanirvāṇa).

Question. – The first six emptinesses have each been treated separately. Why are the emptiness of the conditioned (saṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 7) and the [289b] emptiness of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 8) treated together here?

Answer. – Samṛkṛta and asaṃskṛta dharmas exist interdependently (anyonyāpekṣa): outside of the saṃskṛtas, there are no asaṃskṛtas, and outside of the asaṃskṛtas, there are no saṃskṛtas. These two categories include all dharmas. The yogin who considers the faults (doṣa) of the *saṃskṛtadharma*s, impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) etc., knows ipso facto the great benefits of the *asaṃskṛtadharma*s. That is why the two emptinesses are treated together here.

III. EMPTINESS OF THE UNCONDITIONED

Question. - It is quite possible that the *saṃskṛtadharma*s, coming from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmāgrī), are without intrinsic nature (nīḥsvabhāva) and therefore empty (śūnya). But the *asaṃskṛtadharma*s, which are themselves not dharmas coming from causes and conditions, are indestructible (akṣaya), inalterable (abheda), eternal (nitya) and like space (ākāśasama). How would they be empty?

Answer. – As I have just said, outside of the saṃskṛtas, there are no asaṃskṛtas, and the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of the saṃskṛtas is exactly asaṃskṛta. The saṃskṛtas being empty, etc., the asaṃskṛtas themselves also are empty, for the two things are not different.

Besides, some people, hearing about the defects of the *saṃskṛtadharma*s, become attached (abhiniveśante) to the *asaṃskṛtadharma*s and, as a result of this attachment, develop fetters.

Thus it is said in the Abhidharma:⁴⁷⁰ “Of the 98 anuśayas ‘pernicious tendencies’, 89 have the *saṃskṛtadharma*s as object (ālambana), six have the *asaṃskṛtadharma*s as object, and for the other three, we must distinguish: the anuśayas of ignorance (avidyā) belonging to the domain of the desire realm (kāmadhātuvavacara) and to be destroyed by the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodhasatyaheya) have as object sometimes the saṃskṛtas and sometimes the asaṃskṛtas.

“Which are the anuśayas having the saṃskṛtas as object? They are the anuśayas of ignorance (avidyā) to be destroyed by the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodhasatyaheya) and associated with the anuśayas having as object the conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmāḥ ālambanāṇuśayasamprayukta).

⁴⁷⁰ Prakaraṇapāda, chap. V, Anuśayavibhaṅga, T 1541, k. 3, p. 638b7-11; T 1542, k. 3, p. 703b5-9. – This chapter is part of the last four chapters of the Prakaraṇapāda attributed by the Traité (p. 112F) to the Kashmirian arhats.

For the 98 anuśayas, see also Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 46, p. 237c, 238a; Kośa, V, p. 13, 71.

“Which are the anuśayas having the asaṃkṛtas as object? They are the anuśayas of ignorance (avidyā) to be destroyed by the truth of the cessation of suffering (nīrodhasatyaheya) and dissociated from the anuśayas having as object the conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmāmbanaviṣayakṛta).

“It is the same for the ignorances concerning the form realm (rūpadhātu) and the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).”

Following these fetters (saṃyojana), one commits evil actions (akuśalakarma) and because of these bad actions, one falls into the three unfortunate destinies (durgati). This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra proclaims the emptiness of the unconditioned here.

The anuśayas having the asaṃskṛtadharmas as object are doubt (vicikitsā), wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi) and ignorance (avidyā).

a. Doubt (vicikitsā) is to question whether nirvāṇa exists or does not exist.

b. Wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi) is to form a judgment and declare that there definitely is no nirvāṇa.

c. Ignorance associated with this wrong view and this doubt (mithyādrṣṭivicikitsā-saṃprayuktāvidyā) and independent ignorance (āveṇikavidyā)⁴⁷¹ as well join together to form the anuśaya of ignorance.

IV. THE EMPTINESS OF THE UNCONDITIONED IS NOT WRONG VIEW⁴⁷²

Question. – If that is so, how is the emptiness of unconditioned dharmas (asaṃkṛtaśūnyatā) different from wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi)?

⁴⁷¹ Āveṇikavidyā, simply non-knowledge, not associated with the other anuśayas: cf. Kośa, III, p. 84, 88; V, p. 31.

⁴⁷² The objection boils down to this: to profess the emptiness of the asaṃskṛtas is to deny nirvāṇa. But denying nirvāṇa is wrong view. Therefore to profess the emptiness of the asaṃskṛtas is wrong view.

The subject has already been treated in Madh. vṛtti, p. 537-538:

Objection. - If that is so, you are denying even nirvāṇa. In that case, this doctrine (or this thing) preached by the Blessed One in order that humanity might accede to nirvāṇa, is that not useless (or absurd)?

Answer. – That would be so if some ‘dharma’ existed in the form of existence itself, if there were some beings to hear it and if, in order to preach it, there was a being in itself named “Buddha, the Blessed One.” But how could the fault with which you blame us touch us since:

Quiescence of every grasping (of an object), quiescence of every discursive thought, [nirvāṇa] is blessedness;

Nowhere, to no one has any dharma whatsoever been preached by the Buddha.

- Commenting on this stanza, Candrakīrti explains that nirvāṇa thus conceived is the non-functioning of speech and of mind (vācām citasyāpravṛttiḥ) and that the absence of the object of knowledge (jñeya) and of the knowledge is happiness (śīva).

Answer. – The person with wrong view does not believe in nirvāṇa; then he formulates a judgment and declares that there definitely is no dharma ‘nirvāṇa’. The emptiness of the unconditioned does not grasp the characteristic of nirvāṇa (na nirvāṇasya nimittam udgrhṇāti): that is the difference.

Moreover, the person who rejects the saṃskṛtas is attached (abhinivṛtate) to the asaṃskṛtas [by attributing to them the characteristics of non-production (anutpāda), etc.] and by the fact of this attachment transforming them into saṃskṛtas. This is why destroying the asaṃskṛtas [by not grasping their characteristics] is not wrong view.

That is what is meant by the emptiness of the conditioned and the unconditioned.

Atyanyaśūnyatā

Seventh Section EMPTINESS 9: ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS

I. EVERYTHING IS COMPLETELY EMPTY

Absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā). –The emptiness of the conditioned (saṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 7) and the emptiness of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 8) destroy all the dharmas to the point where there is nothing left over (niravaśeṣam): that is absolute emptiness.

The arhat whose impurities are destroyed (kṣīṇāsrava) is absolutely pure (atyantaviśuddha), whereas the anāgamin who, however, has drawn back to the desires (rāga) of the sphere of nothing at all (ākīṃcanyāyatana) is not absolutely pure.⁴⁷³ It is the same here. There is the emptiness of inner dharmas (adhyātmaśūnyatā, no. 1), emptiness of outer dharmas (bahirdhāśūnyatā, no. 2), emptiness of inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā, no. 3), [289c] emptiness of the ten directions (daśadikśūnyatā, no. 5), emptiness of the absolute (paramārthaśūnyatā, no. 6), emptiness of the conditioned (saṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 7), emptiness of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 8) and in addition, the fact that there is no dharma that is not empty: this is what is called ‘absolute emptiness’ (atyantaśūnyatā, no. 9).

The person who, for seven lifetimes or for a hundred, a thousand, ten thousand, a hundred thousand or incalculable lifetimes, belongs to a noble clan, is ‘absolutely noble’ and does not consider as really noble the fact of belonging to a noble clan for one, two or three lifetimes [only]. It is the same for absolute emptiness: since the very beginning (mūlata eva), there has never been anything that is not truly empty.

⁴⁷³ The anāgamin still remains attached to some categories of passion of bhavāgra or naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana: cf. Kośa, VI, p. 227.

Some say: “Although this is presently emptiness, it was not so originally: there was, for example, God as origin of creation (sarga),⁴⁷⁴ Darkness (tamas),⁴⁷⁵ subtle atoms (paramāṇu).⁴⁷⁶ No! All that is empty. Why? If the result (kārya) is empty, the cause (kāraṇa) was empty as well. Space itself is neither effect nor cause, and it is the same for God and the subtle atoms, etc. If they were eternal (nitya), they would not produce the transitory (anitya). If the past (atīta) has no defined nature (niyata lakṣaṇa), neither do the future (anāgata) and the present (pratyutpanna); in the three times (tryadhvan) there is not a single dharma that is truly non-empty (aśūnya). That is absolute emptiness.

II. ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS DOES NOT LEAD TO RENOUNCING NIRVĀṆA

Question. - If everything in the three times is empty, including the subtle atoms (paramāṇu), if nothing has ever existed for the least moment, that is indeed very frightening (bhayasthāna). In view of the bliss of the trances (dhyāna) and the absorptions (samāpatti), the sages (prajñā) renounce mundane bliss (laukikasukha), and in view of the bliss of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasukha), they renounce the bliss of the trances and absorptions. If in this absolute emptiness there is not even the bliss of nirvāṇa, on what dharma would they then rely to renounce nirvāṇa?

Answer. – Some people attached to egotism (ahaṃkāra bhiniṣṭa) distinguish the characteristics of unity (ekatva) and multiplicity (nānātva) in dharmas: it is these people who experience fear. Thus the Buddha said: “In foolish worldly people (bālaprthagjana) the big subject of fear is the non-existence of the self (ātman) and the non-existence of the ‘mine’ (ātmya).”

Furthermore, it is the conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) dependent on the three times which, by the fact of their impurities (sāsravadharma) constitute subjects (sthāna) that bring about attachment (abhiniveśa). Nirvāṇa itself is ‘the cessation of thirst’ (trṣṇāyāḥ prahāṇam).⁴⁷⁷ Why would one seek to renounce nirvāṇa?

Finally, the bhikṣu who violates the four grave offenses⁴⁷⁸ is ‘immoral absolutely’ (atyantaduḥśīla) and is incapable of attaining bodhi; the person who commits the five sins of immediate retribution (pañcānantarya) is closed ‘absolutely’ (atyantas) to the three good destinies (sugati); the person who takes ⁴⁷⁴ Theist doctrines of the Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava: cf. p. 137-143F and notes.

⁴⁷⁵ Tamas, darkness, the third guṇa of the Sāṃkhya, which at the beginning of time, constituted the world by itself: see P. Deussen, Sechzig Upanishad's des Veda, Leipzig, 1938, p. 329.

⁴⁷⁶ Paramāṇu, subtle atoms which, for the Vaiśeṣika, were eternal: cf. p. 728-730F, 923F.

⁴⁷⁷ Taṇhakkhāyo virāgo nirodho nibbānaṃ: Dīgha, II, p. 36, 37; Mahhijima, I, p. 167; Saṃyutta, I, p. 136; V, p. 226; Aṅguttara, I, p. 133; II, p. 34, 118; III, p. 35; IV, p. 423; V, p. 110, 320.

⁴⁷⁸ The four catasro mūlapattato gurvyaḥ of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 777, 27 or maulī āpatti (or adhyāpatti) of the Kośabhāṣya, p. 223, 7 and 21, which are none other than the four patanīya of the Vinaya: abrahmacarya, adattādāna, manuṣyavadha and uttarimanuṣyadharmamṛśāvāda.

the commitment of the śrāvakas cannot become Buddha ‘absolutely’. It is the same for absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā): this absolute emptiness shows no exception (avaśeṣa) in all the dharmas.

III. ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS DOES NOT LEAD TO ANY REALITY

1. Falsity does not create truth

Question.⁴⁷⁹ – It is not correct that all dharmas are absolutely empty (atyantaśūnya). Why? The dharmas of the three times (tryadhvan) and the ten directions (daśaśiḥ) lead to ‘a nature of things’ (dharmatā), a subsistence of things (dharmasthititā)⁴⁸⁰ that necessarily must be true. It is because there is an emptiness of dharmas that the other dharmas are false. If there were no emptiness of dharmas, there would not be any false dharmas either. This [truth] is absolute emptiness.

Answer. – Nothing does not lead to a truth of dharmas. Why?

1) If such an emptiness existed, one of two things: it would either be i) conditioned (saṃskṛta) or ii) unconditioned (asaṃskṛta). – Suppose it were conditioned, this hypothesis has already been refuted in regard to the emptiness [290a] of the conditioned (saṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 7). – Suppose it were unconditioned, this hypothesis also has been refuted in regard to the emptiness of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 8).

This reality would be either i) mundane (laukika) or ii) supramundane (lokottara). – Suppose it were mundane, this hypothesis has already been refuted by the emptiness of inner dharmas (adhyātmaśūnyatā, no. 1), the emptiness of outer dharmas (bahirdhāśūnyatā, no. 2), the emptiness of inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā, no. 3) and great emptiness (mahāśūnyatā, no. 4). – Suppose it were supramundane, this has been refuted by the emptiness of the absolute (paramārthaśūnyatā, no. 6). And ⁴⁷⁹ The objector is appealing to the law of interdependence of opposites (pratīdvandvisādharmya) dear to the Mādhyamika but he has it backwards. The Mādhyamikas say: Without falsehood, no truth. The objector replies: Without truth, no falsehood.

⁴⁸⁰ The objector is claiming here to follow a canonical saying often cited by the adepts of both Vehicles (see references, p. 157F bottom of page):

Saṃyutta, II, p. 25. – Uppādā vā tathāgatānaṃ anuppāda vā tathāgatānaṃ phitā va sā dhātu dhammaṭṭhitatā dhammaniyāmatā idappaccayatā.

Nidānasamyukta, p. 148, 164. – Utpādād vā tathāgatānāṃ anutpādād vā sthitā eveyaṃ dharmatā dharmasthitaye dhātūḥ.

The passage unquestionably depicts a reality but not necessarily a subsistent reality. In the canonical texts, it is none other than the co-dependent arising, pratītyasamutpāda (Saṃyutta, II, p. 25) or, which almost amounts to the same, the suffering of the saṃskāras and the non-personality of dharmas (Aṅguttara, I, p. 286). For the Prajñāpāramitā, it is the true nature of dharmas including the absence of nature, emptiness.

dharma of form (rūpin) or formless dharma (arūpin), impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava) are likewise empty.

2) Moreover, dharmas being absolutely empty, this absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā) itself is empty. Emptiness being nothing whatsoever, there is no interdependence (anyonyāpekṣatā) between falsity and truth.

3) Finally, absolute emptiness destroys all dharmas to the point where there is nothing left over (avaśeṣa); that is why it is called absolute emptiness. If the least bit remained, it would not be called ‘absolute’. To claim [as you do] that something must exist because of interdependence [between falsity and truth] does not hold.

2. Dharmas are empty even in their causes and conditions.

Question. – Dharmas are not completely empty. Why? Dharmas coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamutpanna) are empty, but their causes and conditions are not themselves empty. Thus, it is as a result of a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), namely, the beams (phalaka), that there is a house (grha): the house is empty but the beams are not.

Answer. – 1) The causes and conditions also are empty because they are indeterminate (anīyata). Take, for example, the son of a father: insofar as he is born from a father, he is called ‘son’ (putra); insofar as he engenders a son, he is called ‘father’ (pitṛ).

2) Furthermore, the ultimate (paścima) causes and conditions are without support (apratīṣṭhita). Thus the mountains, rivers, trees and categories of beings rest upon the earth (prthivī), the earth rests upon the water (ap), the water rests upon the wind (āyu) and the wind rests upon space (ākāśa), but space does not rest on anything.⁴⁸¹ If there is no point of support at the beginning, there is none at the end either. This is why we know that all dharmas are absolutely empty.

3. Magician and magical object likewise are empty

Question. – That is not so: dharmas must have a root. Thus in magical (ṛddhi) transformations (nirmāṇa), the fictitious object (nirmita) is false but the magician (nirmātr) is not empty.

Answer. – Foolish worldly people (bālaprthagjana), seeing that the fictitious object does not last for long, say that it is false, but as the magician lasts for a long time, they say that he is real. Saintly individuals

⁴⁸¹ Cf. Dīgha, II, p. 107 (= Sanskrit Mahāpārṇirvāṇa, p. 212): Ayaṃ Ānanda mahāpaṭhavī udake patitthitā, udakam vāte patitthitam, vāto ākāsaṭṭho hoti. – Majjhima, I, p. 424: ākāso na katthaci patittho. – Sūtra cited in Koṣavyākhyā, p. 15: Prthivī brāhmaṇa ap-maṇḍale pratiṣṭhitā... ap-maṇḍalam vāyau pratiṣṭhitam... vāyur ākāśe pratiṣṭhitah... ākāśam brāhmaṇāpratiṣṭhitam anālambanam.

(āryapudgala) themselves see that indeed the magician is born from a complex of the karmic causes and conditions of his previous lives and by accumulating good dharmas in his present life, he has obtained a magical power (ṛddhibala) by means of which he makes fictitious creations.

In a later chapter of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra, it is said: “There are three kinds of fictitious creation (nirmāṇa): fictitious creation of passion (kleśa), fictitious creation of action (karman) and fictitious creation of dharma.”⁴⁸² This is why we know that the magician himself is empty as well.

4. Nothing is taken away from emptiness

Question. – 1) Things without solidity (asāra, adhruva) not being true, they are necessarily empty; but solid things and real dharmas cannot be empty. Thus the great earth (mahāprthivī) and Mount Sumeru, the water of the great ocean (mahāsamudraka), the sun and the moon (candrasūrya), the lightning bolt (vajra) and other substances are real solid dharmas and therefore cannot be empty. Why? a) The earth and Mount Sumeru last until the end of the kalpa. b) Whereas the rivers dry up, the ocean is always full. c) The sun and the moon revolve in the sky without ceasing.

2) The things seen by worldly people (prthagjana), being false and unreal, are certainly empty, but the things grasped by the saints (ārya), namely, suchness (tathatā), the fundamental element (dharmadhātu), the limit of reality (bhūtakoti) [290b] and nirvāṇa are certainly true dharmas. Why do you say they are absolutely empty? Besides, if conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma), as coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamutpanna), are not true, unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtadharma) which themselves do not come from causes and conditions must be true. Why do you say they are absolutely empty?

Answer. – Being indeterminate (anīyata) [notions], solidity (sāratā, dhruvatva) and non-solidity, are both completely empty. How is that? What one person considers to be solid, another person considers to be non-solid.

a) People consider lightning (vajra) to be solid, but Śakra Devendra who holds it in his hand like a man holding a stick (daṇḍa) does not consider it to be solid. Moreover, it is because we do not know how to break lightning that we think it is solid. But if we know that it is enough set it down on the shell of a tortoise (kūmaprṣṭha) and strike it with the horn of a wild sheep (hariṇaśṛṅga) to break it, then we know that it is not solid.

b) A man, whose height is only seven feet, thinks that the great ocean is deep (gambhīra), but when Rāhu Asurarāja stands up in the great ocean, his knees come up out of the surface of the water.⁴⁸³ With his two ⁴⁸² Pañcaviṃśati, chap. LXXXVII, entitled Jou houa (Nirmāṇopama?), T 223, k. 26, p. 415c26-27.

⁴⁸³ See the description of Rāhu in the Commentary of the Dīgha, II, p. 487-488. There it is said: Tassa mahāsamuddam otiṇṇassa yojanasahasamatte ṭhāne gambhīrodakam jānuppamāṇam hoti. So evaṃ vadeyya: Ayaṃ mahāsamuddo gambhīro gambhīro ti vadanti, kutr’ assa gambhīratā?

hands he hides the summit of Sumeru, and he looks down on Sudarśana, the city of the Trāyastriṃśa gods. Rāhu clearly does not consider the sea as being deep.

c) A man, whose lifespan is short (alpāyuṣa), thinks that the earth (prthivī) lasts for a long time and is solid, but beings of long life (dīrghāyuṣa), [such as Sunetra], know well that it is neither eternal nor solid.

[Saptasūryodayasūtra].⁴⁸⁴ – See the Ts'i-je-yu king (Saptasūryopamāsūtra) preached by the Buddha:

The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: All conditioned dharmas are impermanent, changing, and end up in destruction. When the kalpa reaches its end after a long period of aridity, the medicinal herbs and trees completely dry up. – With the appearance of the second sun, the water of the streams dries up. – With the appearance of the third sun, the water of the big rivers is completely exhausted. – With the appearance of the fourth sun, the four great rivers of Jambudvīpa and lake Anavatapta become empty. – With the appearance of the fifth sun, the great ocean dries up. – With the appearance of the sixth sun, the great earth, Mount Sumeru, etc., begin to smoke like a potter's furnace. – With the appearance of the seventh sun, everything bursts into flames and there is no more smoke: the earth, Mount Sumeru and everything up to the palace of the Brahmā gods is burned up by the fire.

Then, seeing this fire, the gods who have recently been born into the Abhāsvara heaven, become frightened and say: “After they have burned the pace of the Brahmās, these flames will reach here.” But the gods who were born [in the Ābhāsrava heaven] a long time ago reassure the gods born subsequent to them and say: “Previously already, after having burned the palace of the Brahmās, this fire disappeared and has not yet come this far.”⁴⁸⁵

When the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu has been burned up by the fire, there remain no ashes or charcoal.

The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: Who could believe such an enormous thing? Only a man who has seen it with his own eyes could believe that. O bhikṣus, in the past, there was a heretic teacher named Siu-nie-to-lo ⁴⁸⁴ Saptasūryodayasūtra: Anguttara, IV, p. 100-106; Madhyama, T 26 (no. 28), k. 2, p. 428c-429c; Ekottara, T 125, K. 34, p. 735b-738a; Saptasūryodaya, T 30, p. 811c-812c. – For the jāta of Sunetra that forms the second part of the sūtra, see also the Dhammikassutta of Anguttara, III, p. 371-372 (cf. Magyama, T 26, k. 30, p. 619b-c), the Sunettassutta of Anguttara, IV, p. 135-136, and the references given above, p. 520F, note.

The sūtra of the seven suns is often cited by the authors of sūtras and sāstras: Dīgha, T 1, k. 21, p. 137c-138b; Ta-leou-t'an king, T 23, k. 5, p. 302c-303b; K'i che king, T 24, k. 9, p. 355; Piṭrputrasamāgama cited in Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 247, 5-18; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 75, p. 386b5; k. 82, p. 424c-425a (passage translated above, p. 520F); k. 133, p. 690a14-24; Kośabhāṣya, p. 116, 17-22; Kośavyākhyā, p. 710; Nyāyanusāra, T 1562, k. 32, p. 526c12; Kārikāvibhāṣā, T 1563, k. 17, p. 859a1-2; Yogācārabhūmi, T 1579, k. 34, p. 471a7.

⁴⁸⁵ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 116, 17-22: Tatra ye satvā ābhāvare devanikāye 'ciropapannā bhavanti naiva saṃvartanīkuśala na vivartanīkuśalā asya lokasya te tām arcīṣaṃ dṛṣṭvā bhūtāḥ santa udvijante saṃvegān āpadyante / sahaivaiṣārcīḥ śūnyāṃ bhāhmaṇ vimānaṃ dagdgvārvag āgamiṣyatīti / tatra ye satvā ābhāvare debanikāye ciropapannāḥ saṃvartanīkuśalā vivartanīkuśalāś cāsyā lokasya te tām satvān bhūtān āśvāsyanti / mābhaṣṭa marṣāḥ mā bhaṣṭa marṣāḥ / pūrvam apy eṣā 'rcīḥ śūnyāṃ brāhmaṇ vimānaṃ dagdhvātraivāntahiteti.

(Sunetra) who had renounced desire and practiced the four four abodes of Brahma (brahmavihāra).⁴⁸⁶ His innumerable disciples also had renounced desire. Sunetra thought: “It is not fitting that I should be reborn in the same place as my disciples. Today I must therefore develop a mind of loving-kindness deeper [than theirs].”⁴⁸⁷ Having meditated profoundly on loving-kindness, this man took rebirth in the heaven of the Ābhāsvaras. [290c]

The Buddha added: Sunetra was myself.⁴⁸⁸ At that time, I saw this great event [i.e., the burning of the palace of the Brahmās] with my own eyes. This is why we must know that even solid and real things all end up in destruction.

5. Difference between impermanence and absolute emptiness

Question. – But here you are dealing with absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā); why then do you talk about impermanent things (anityavastu)? Absolute emptiness is empty right now whereas impermanence is existent now and empty later.

Answer. – Impermanence is the first doorway to emptiness. If one understands impermanence well, all dharmas are empty. This is why the saint (āryapudgala) first considers the impermanence of the world (lokānityatā) under four aspects:

- 1) He sees that the things (vastu) to which he is attached are impermanent (anitya).
- 2) Impermanence gives rise to suffering (duḥkha): as a result of this suffering, the saint mentally experiences disgust (nirveda).
- 3) Having emptiness as nature (śūnyālakṣaṇa), impermanence cannot be grasped: it is like a magic show (māyopama), like a metamorphosis (nirmāṇopama); this is what is called emptiness (śūnya).
- 4) Outer things (bahirdhāvastu) being empty, their inner master (antarsvāmin) is also empty: this is what is called non-self (anātman).

Furthermore, absolute emptiness is the true emptiness. There are two kinds of beings (sattva): i) the one who is mainly sensual (trṣṇācarita); ii) the one who is mainly rationalist (dṛṣṭicarita).⁴⁸⁹

i) The sensualist experiences attachment (āsaṅga) easily but, as the things to which he becomes attached are impermanent, he feels sorrow (daurmansaya) and suffering (duḥkha). To him, it is said: “The things to which you are attached are impermanent and precarious; it is on their account that you experience

⁴⁸⁶ Cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 103: Bhūtapubbam bhikkhave Sunetto nāma satthā ahoṣi tiṭṭhako kāmesu vūtarāgo.

⁴⁸⁷ Ibid., p. 104: Atha kho bhokkhav Sunettassa satthuno etad ahoṣi: na kho pan' etaṃ paṭirūpaṃ yo 'haṃ sāvakanāṃ samasamgatiyo assaṃ abhisamparāyaṃ, yaṃ nūnāhaṃ uttariṃ mettaṃ bhāveyyan ti.

⁴⁸⁸ The Saptasūryasūtra of Anguttara, IV, p. 105, does not identify Sunetra with the Bhagavat; on the other hand, the Kośa (l.c.) agrees with the Traité in making the comparison.

⁴⁸⁹ See Kośa, IV, p. 174, 208, and n.

suffering. If the things to which you are attached give rise to suffering, you should not become attached to them”; this is to preach the gate of liberation called wishlessness (apraṇihitavimokṣamukha).

ii) The rationalist seeks to analyze dharmas but, as he does not recognize the truth, he becomes attached to wrong views (mithyadr̥ṣṭi). It is to him that the absolute emptiness is preached directly.

Furthermore, all affirmations (vāda) are capable of being refuted and, being able to be refuted, they are empty. Visions are empty and the master of the vision is himself empty. This is what is called absolute emptiness.

You just said (p. 2090F) that “the things grasped by the saints are necessarily true dharmas”, but what is specific to the saints is to destroy the three poisons (triviṣa). It is not by means of mistakes (viparyāsa) and lies (mṛṣāvācana) that they are able to bring beings to escape from the sufferings of old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa) and to lead them to nirvāṇa. The dharmas that you are calling true come from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamagrī); not existing previously, they exist now and, existing now, they will no longer exist in the future; they can be neither grasped nor adopted. Therefore they too are empty and without truth.

[Kolopamasūtra.]⁴⁹⁰ – This is what the Buddha said in the Fa-yu king (Kolopamasūtra): “Good dharmas should be destroyed and, a fortiori, the bad ones.”

Finally, for the saints, conditioned (samskṛta) and pure (anāsrava) dharmas arise from impure dharmas. These impure dharmas are false and arise from false conditions. How could they be true? Outside of conditioned dharmas, there are no unconditioned (asamskṛta) dharmas, as I have said above (p. 2081F). The true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of conditioned dharmas is to be unconditioned. Since all dharmas are non-existent (anupalabdha), this is why there is absolute emptiness.

Anaṅgaśūnyatā

Eight Section EMPTINESS 10: EMPTINESS OF DHARMAS WITHOUT BEGINNING⁴⁹¹

⁴⁹⁰ See references above, p. 64F, n. 1. The Kolopamasūtra will also be invoked later, k. 31, p. 295b29; k. 85, p. 657a2. In this saying, dharma is taken in the sense of ‘good teaching’, and adharma in that of ‘bad teaching’. The Buddha is not attached to the sublime teaching of the Prajñāpāramitā and does not want his disciples to love the Dharma or be attached to the Dharma. They seek only the cessation of suffering (duḥkhaḥaya), deliverance (vimukti), the true nature of dharmas beyond any vain discussion: cf. p. 65F.

⁴⁹¹ Whereas other Mahāyānists speak of an emptiness of dharma without beginning or end (anavaraṅgrasūnyatā, thog ma dan tha ma med pa stoṅ pa ṅid), the Pañcaviṃśati, in its Chinese version executed by Kumārajīva, speaks here of an emptiness of dharmas without beginning (anaṅgaśūnyatā). This is an intentional modification which the Traité will explain.

I. DHARMAS ARE WITHOUT BEGINNING

Emptiness of dharmas without beginning (anaṅgaśūnyatā). – The world (loka, samsāra), whether it is beings (sattva) or things (dharma), has no beginning (agra).

The present birth (ihajanma) exists as a result of a previous existence (pūrvajanman); the previous existence, in turn, exists as a result of a preceding existence, and so on. Therefore there is no beginning for beings; and it is the same for dharmas. Why?

1. [Madhyamakāśāstra.] -

[291a] If birth preceded

And death followed,

Birth would not come from death

And one would be reborn without having died.

If death preceded

And birth followed

Death would be without cause

And without being born, one would die.⁴⁹²

This is why all dharmas are without beginning.

2. [Anamataggasutta.] – As is said in the sūtras, the Buddha said to the bhikṣus: “Beings have no beginning; in these beings obsessed by ignorance, fettered by thirst and wandering in transmigration, no beginning can be discerned.”⁴⁹³

⁴⁹² Madh, kārīkā, XI, v. 3-4; madh. vṛtti, p. 221-222; T 1564, k. 2, p. 16a21-24.

Pūrvam jātir yadi bhaved jarāmaraṇam uttaram /

nirjarāmaraṇā jātir bhaved jāyeta cāmurtaḥ //

Paścāj jātir bhaved jarāmaraṇam āditaḥ /

ahetukam ajātasya syāj jarāmaraṇam katham //

“If birth preceded and old age and death followed, birth would exist without old age and death, and one would be born without being dead.

If birth followed and if old age and death came first, how could old age and death, without cause, affect someone who has not been born?” – Cf. J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 173-174.

The Madh. vṛtti, p. 221, explains: Samsāra has no beginning (ādi), no middle (madhya) and no end (avasāna), and since, therefore, it does not exist, there is, between birth and old age and death, etc., no relationship of anteriority (pūrva), posteriority (parama), or simultaneity (sahakrama).

II. THE CONCEPT OF DHARMA WITHOUT BEGINNING IS ABSURD

However, it is in order to destroy these dharmas without beginning that the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra sets forth here the emptiness of dharmas without beginning (anagraśūnyatā).

Question. – Dharmas without beginning are true and cannot be refuted. Why? To claim that beings (sattva) and things (dharmas) have a beginning is to fall into the wrong view of believing in extremes (antagrāhadṛṣṭi) and also to fall into the wrong view of absence of causality (ahetukatvadrṣṭi). To avoid ⁴⁹³ This well-known saying occurs in two forms: in the older form, it denies the initial term (pūrvakoṭi) of saṃsāra and of beings; in its more recent form, it denies both the initial and final term (pūrvāparakoṭi).

1) Negation of the initial term, in the Pāli sources and the Sanskrit Āgamas:

Samyutta, II, p. 178-193 (Anamataggasamyutta); III, p. 149, 151; V, p. 226, 41; Cullavaddesa, p. 273;

Kathāvatthu, p. 29: Anamataggāyaṃ bhikkhave saṃsāro pubā koṭi na paññāyati avijjānīvaraṇānaṃ sattānaṃ taṇhāsaṃyojanānaṃ sandhāvatāṃ saṃsaratāṃ. – Of unknown beginning, O monks, is saṃsāra; the initial term starting from which, loaded down by ignorance and fettered by thirst, beings wander by chance, is unknown.

Anamatāgga is analyzed as ana, double negation; mata, known; agga, beginning; and the commentators explain it as aviditāgga ‘of unknown beginning’. From that the translations Unbekannten Anfangs ist Umlauf der Geburten (W. Geiger) or Incalculable is the beginning of this faring on (Mrs. Rhys Davids and F. H. Woodward).

Chinese translation of the Samyukta, T 99, k. 34, p. 241b13-14, and following pages: Beings, in the long night of saṃsāra without beginning (Wou che cheng sseu) wander by chance: the initial term (pen tsī) of suffering is unknown.

2) Negation of the initial term and the final term in most of the Sanskrit texts. The expression anavarāgra saṃsāra ‘saṃsāra without end or beginning’ is frequent in the Mahāvastu and the Lalitavistara (see Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 21), and the canonical saying is modified in the following way:

Divyāvadāna, p. 197: Anavarāgro bhikṣavaḥ saṃsāro ‘vidyānīvaraṇānāṃ sattvānāṃ tṛṣṇāsaṃyojanānāṃ tṛṣṇārgolabaddhānāṃ dīrgham adhvānaṃ saṃdhāvatāṃ saṃsaratāṃ purvā koṭir prajñāyate dukkhasya. – Without end or beginning, O monks, is saṃsāra. Impossible to discover the initial term of suffering for the beings fettered by thirst, bound by the snares of thirst, travelling the long road and wandering by chance.

Madh, vṛtti, p. 218: Anavarāgro hi bhikṣavo jātijātāmaraṇasaṃsāra iti. avidyānīvaraṇānāṃ sattvānāṃ tṛṣṇāsaṃyojanānāṃ tṛṣṇāgaṇḍurabaddhānāṃ saṃsaratāṃ saṃdhāvatāṃ pūrvā koṭir na prajñāyata iti. – Without end or beginning, O monks, is saṃsāra, birth and old age and death. Impossible to discover the initial term of beings loaded down by ignorance, fettered by thirst, tied by the snares of thirst and wandering in saṃsāra.

The differences between the canonical sources perhaps explains the contrast between the anagraśūnyatā of the Chinese Pañcaviṃśati and most of the Sanskrit texts. The general meaning of the expression is not affected, for beings and things without beginning would not have an end or a middle and “to weigh the real, saṃsāra does not exist” (vastukacintāyāṃ tu saṃsāra eva nāsti). But perhaps it is a question of method. As the Traité is going to explain, the wrong and pernicious notion of ‘dharma with beginning’ must be destroyed by means of the beneficial notion of ‘dharma without beginning’ but, when the latter tends to be taken as conveying a reality in itself, it itself becomes a wrong view and must be uprooted by the emptiness of things without beginning (emptiness no. 10).

these mistakes (dośa), we must say that beings and things are without beginning.⁴⁹⁴ Here, in refuting dharmas without beginning by means of anagraśūnyatā, you are falling again into the wrong view that acknowledges the existence of a beginning.

Answer. – It is true that by means of anagraśūnyatā I destroy the wrong view of dharmas without beginning, but, nevertheless, I do not fall into the wrong view of acknowledging the existence of a beginning. In order to save a man from fire, it is not necessary to throw him into deep water. Here I am rejecting the dharmas without beginning but I do not, however, accept any dharma with beginning: by doing this, I am following the Middle Way (madhyamā pratipad).

Question. – Why do you reject dharmas with beginning (an-agra)?

Answer. – 1) Because they would be non-delimited (anavastha). Being non-delimited, they would not have an end (avara); non-delimited and without end, they would not have a middle (madhya).⁴⁹⁵

2) The absence of a beginning would end up by eliminating the Omniscient one (sarvajñā). Why? If saṃsāra were non-delimited, one would not know the beginning and, if no one knew the beginning, there would not be any Omniscient one. If there really is an Omniscient one, there cannot be any question of dharma without beginning.

3) Moreover, some grasp the characteristics of a being (sattvanimittam udgrhṇanti) and grasp singularities (ekatva, prthaktva) and differences (anyatva) in dharmas.⁴⁹⁶ As a result of these singularities and differences, they deduce an earlier existence from the present existence and, from the earlier existence, they deduce a still earlier existence and so on. Unable to find a beginning either in beings or in things, they produce the view of dharmas without beginning; but that is a wrong view having singularities and differences as root, which consequently should be rejected.

The emptiness of conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 7) crushes conditioned dharmas. As this emptiness of conditioned dharmas still presents disadvantages, recourse is made to the emptiness of non-conditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā, no. 8) to crush non-conditioned dharmas. Here I have used dharmas without beginning (anagra) to crush dharmas with beginning but, as these dharmas without beginning still present disadvantages, I have again used the emptiness of dharmas without beginning (anagraśūnyatā, no. 10) to crush these dharmas without beginning: this is what is called ‘emptiness of dharmas without beginning’.

III. FALSE IN ABSOLUTE TRUTH, THE NOTION OF DHARMA WITHOUT BEGINNING IS USED FOR SALVIFIC PURPOSES

⁴⁹⁴ A being or a thing having itself a beginning would possess a limit (antavān lokaś cātmā ca) – which is a question to be denied (cf. 155F) – and could not be caused by another: it would arise at random, without cause.

⁴⁹⁵ Cf. Madh. kārikā, XI, v. 2 (p. 220): Naivāgraṃ nāvaraṃ yasya tasya madhyaṃ kuto bhavet.

⁴⁹⁶ For this problem, see J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 100, n. 242-243.

Question. – If that is so, why did the Buddha say that “the starting point of beings wandering in transmigration is unknown (sattvānāṃ saṃsaratāṃ pūrvā koṭir na prajñāyate)”?

Answer. – The Buddha wants beings to know that the transmigration in which we have wandered for so long a time is great suffering (mahādukkha) and he wants us to feel a mind of disgust (nirvedacitta) towards it.

1. Sūtras mentioning dharmas without beginning

See what is said in the sūtras:⁴⁹⁷

[1. Lohitasūtra = Tiṃsamattāsuttanta.] – One single man, transmigrating during one single kalpa, as long as he is taking on existences (ātmabhāva) and suffering torment (upadrava), has collected more blood (lohita) than there is water in the sea.⁴⁹⁸

[2. Aśrusūtra = Assusuttanta.] – Similarly, while he was weeping, he has wept more tears (aśru) [than there is water in the sea].⁴⁹⁹

[3. Kṣīrasūtra = Khīrasuttanta.] – Similarly, he has drunk more mother’s milk (kṣīra) [than there is water in the sea].⁵⁰⁰

⁴⁹⁷ Sūtras all borrowed from the Anamataggasaṃyutta.

⁴⁹⁸ Tiṃsamattā: Saṃyutta, II, p. 187-188; T 99, no. 937, k. 33, p. 240b12-240c24; T 100, no. 330, k. 16, p. 485c3-486a17.

Taṃ kiṃ maññatha bhikkhave, katamaṃ nu kho bahutaraṃ. yaṃ vā vo iminā dīghena addhunā sandhāvataṃ saṃsaratāṃ sisacchinnānaṃ lohitaṃ pasannaṃ paggharitaṃ. yaṃ vā catūsu mahāsamuddesu udakan ti / ... etad eva bhante bahutaraṃ yaṃ no ... lohitaṃ pasannaṃ paggharitaṃ.

What do you think, O monks? Which is greater: would it be the blood that you have spilled and spread when you cut off heads whilst you were wandering in saṃsāra on this long road, or would it be the water contained in the four oceans? – Greater, O Lord, is the blood that we have spilled and spread.

⁴⁹⁹ Assu: Saṃyutta, II, p. 179-180; T 99, no. 938, k. 33, p. 240c25-241a17; T 100, no. 331, k. 16, p. 486a18-486b23:

Taṃ kiṃ maññatha bhikkhave, katamaṃ nu kho bahutaraṃ. yaṃ vā vo iminā dīghena addhunā sandhāvataṃ saṃsaratāṃ amanāpasampayogā manāpavippayogā kandantānaṃ rodantānaṃ assu pasannaṃ paggharitaṃ. yaṃ vā catūsu mahāsamuddesu udakan ti / ... etad eva bhante, bahutaraṃ yaṃ no ... assu pasannaṃ paggharitaṃ.

What do you think, O monks? Which is greater: would it be the tears that you have spilled and spread since you have been weeping in saṃsāra on this long road, crying and weeping at unpleasant things or at being separated from pleasant things, or would it be the water contained in the four oceans? – Greater, O Lord, are the tears we have wept and spread.

⁵⁰⁰ Khīra: Saṃyutta, II, p. 180-181; T 99, no. 939, k. 33, p. 241a18-241b8; T 100, no. 332, k. 16, p. 486b24-486c6:

Taṃ kiṃ maññatha bhikkhave, katamaṃ nu kho bahutaraṃ. yaṃ vā vo iminā dīghena addhunā sadhāvataṃ

[4. Asthiraśisūtra = Puggalasuttanta.] – The bones are piled up surpassing [291b] Mount Vaipulya in height.⁵⁰¹

[5. Tiṇakaṭṭhasauttanta.] – If he has cut into two-inch pieces (dvyaiṅgulā ghaṭikā) all the shrubs (ṛṇa) and trees (kāṣṭhā) of this continent (dvīpaka) and used them to count [his predecessors], his father, grandfather, great grandfather, etc., his forebears would be far from completely inventoried [at the time when the slips were completely used up].⁵⁰²

[6. Mṛdgulikāsūtra = Paṭhavīsuttanta.] – If he completely formed the earth (prthivī) into balls of clay (mṛdgulikā) and used them to count [his ancestors], his mothers, grandmothers, great grandmothers would be far from completely counted [at the time when the clay balls were completely used up].⁵⁰³

2. These sūtras pursue a salvific goal

saṃsaratāṃ mātuthaññaṃ pītaṃ. yaṃ vā catūsu mahāsamuddesu udakan ti / ... etad eva bhante abhutarāṃ yaṃ no ... mātuthaññaṃ pītaṃ.

What do you think, O monks? Which is greater: would it be the mother’s milk that you have drunk while you were crying in saṃsāra on this long road, or would it be the water contained in the four oceans? – Much greater, O Lord, is the mother’s milk that we have drunk.

⁵⁰¹ Puggala: Saṃyutta, II, p. 185; T 99, no. 947, k. 34, p. 242a28-242b15; T 100, no. 340, k. 16, p. 487b17-487c3: Ekapuggalassa bhikkhave kappam sandhāvato saṃsarato siyā evam mahā aṭṭhikaṇikalo aṭṭhipuñño aṭṭhirāsi, yathāyaṃ Vepullo pabbato sace saṃhārako assa saṃbhatañca na vinasseyya.

O monks, from one single individual who has wandered in saṃsāra for a kalpa there would come a structure of bones as high as Mount Vaipulya, assuming that these bones could be brought together and the structure not perish.

⁵⁰² Tiṇakaṭṭha: Saṃyutta, II, p. 178; T 99, no. 940, k. 34, p. 241b12-20; T 100, no. 333, k. 16, p. 486c7-18:

Seyyatāpi bhikkhave puriso yaṃ imasmiṃ jambudīpe tiṇakaṭṭhasākhāpalāsaṃ tacchetvā ekajjhaṃ saṃharitvā caturaṅgulaṃ caturaṅgulaṃ ghaṭikaṃ karitvā nikkhippeyya. ayaṃ me mātā tassa me pitu ayaṃ pitā ti. aparīyādinnā ca bhikkhave tassa purisassa mātu mātaro assu imasmiṃ jambudīpe tiṇakaṭṭhasakhāpalāsaṃ parikkhayaṃ pariyādānaṃ gaccheyya.

O monks, it is as if a man were to cut all the shrubs, trees, branches, leaves of this Jambudvīpa, pile them into a heap, make them into pieces four inches square, then count them down, saying: “This slip is my mother, this next slip is my mother’s mother.” The grandmothers of this man would not be fully counted when the shrubs, trees, branches, and leaves of this Jambudvīpa would be [long] used up.

⁵⁰³ Paṭhavī: Saṃyutta, II, p. 179; T 99, no. 941, k. 34, p. 241b21-c3; T 100, no. 334, k. 16, p. 486c19-28: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave puriso iamaṃ mahāpaṭhaviṃ kolaṭṭhimattaṃ kolaṭṭhimattaṃ mattikāgukikaṃ kativā nikkhippeyya. ayaṃ kho me pitā tassa me pitu ayaṃ piyā ti. aparīyādinnā bhikkhave tassa purisassa pitu pitaro assu. athāyaṃ mahāpaṭhavī parikkhayaṃ pariyādānaṃ gaccheyya.

O monks, it is as if a man changed this great earth into balls of clay the size of a jujube nut, then counted them down, saying: “This clay ball is my father, this next one is my father’s father.” The grandfathers of this man, O monks, would not be completely counted when the great earth would be [long] used up.

The starting point (pūrvā koṭi) of beings who, for innumerable kalpas of this kind, have been suffering the torments of saṃsāra is indiscernible (na prajñayate): this is why the mind feels frightened (bhasya) and cuts through the fetters (saṃyojana).

Although [the view] of impermanence (anityatādr̥ṣṭi) is an extremist view (antagrāhadr̥ṣṭi), the Buddha utilizes impermanence in order to save beings.⁵⁰⁴ It is the same with the theory of a beginningless (anagratā) saṃsāra; even though it may be an extremist [view], the Buddha uses it to save beings. In order to save beings and inspire disgust (nirvedacitta) [for saṃsāra] in them, the Buddha posits [a saṃsāra] ‘without beginning’ (anagra) but it isn’t true. Why? Because if there were a saṃsāra without beginning, [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] would not be talking here about an ‘emptiness of things without beginning’ (anagraśūnyatā).⁵⁰⁵

⁵⁰⁴ The eternalist point of view (śāśvataḍṛṣṭi) and the nihilist point of view (ucchedaḍṛṣṭi) are extreme views (antaḍṛṣṭi) opposed to the Middle Way (madhyamā pratipad) followed by the Buddha.

Among the fourteen difficult questions (cf. p. 154F seq.) which he did not answer (avyākṛtavastu), the Buddha put the question of knowing whether the world and the self are eternal (śāśvato lokaś cātma ca) or non-eternal (aśāśvato lokaś cātma ca), and he explained his silence by the uselessness of any reply from the viewpoint of salvation (Dīgha, I, p. 188-189; III, p. 136; Majjhima, I, p. 431; Saṃyutta, II, p. 223).

However, most people are fearful of nothingness and hope for an eternal world. In order to detach them from this world, the Buddha taught them the impermanence (anityatā) of the world (see the Aniccavagga of the Saṃyutta, III, p. 21-25) and showed them how the formations coming from causes (saṅkhāra), untrustworthy (anassāsika): cf. Saṃyutta, II, p. 191.

That is a wrong view, or rather - as the Buddhas say nothing false – a provisional doctrine foreseeing the spiritual needs of beings to be converted. If the latter had been attached to a transitory and painful world, the Buddha would have taught them the eternity of the world!

In the Prajñāpāramitā and the other Mahāyāna sūtras, the Buddha, who is addressing emancipated listeners this time, sets these things aside: [according to the Mahāyāna] there is neither eternity nor non-eternity (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 240, l. 18; Śāstāharikā, p. 1618, l. 22: naivātra nityan upalabhyate nānityam). The world is empty of the characteristics of permanence or impermanence.

We have here, in the absence of other qualities, a conclusive and authoritative solution to a problem that for a long time has bothered western exegetists (cf. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Nirvāṇa, p. 92-101).

⁵⁰⁵ Reasoning parallel to that just developed in regard to eternity and non-eternity. The Buddha declined to answer those who were questioning him on the ‘limits’ of the world and asking him if the world and the self do or do not have limits (antavān lokaś cātma ca, anantavān lokaś cātma ca).

However, noting the blindness and frenzy with which people go from migration to migration, he inspires in them a healthy fear for this saṃsāra by presenting it as not having any beginning (see Anamataggavagga of Saṃyutta, II, 178-193).

But here also in the Mahāyāna the necessary correction will be presented by teaching the emptiness of dharmas without beginning (anagraśūnyatā) and by rejecting as absurd the notions of beginning, middle and end (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 240, l. 4-5; Śāstāhasrikā, p. 1618, l. 5-6: nāsyā yānasya pūrvānta upalabhyate nāparānta uplabhyate na madhya upalabhyate).

3. If it is useful, a false doctrine is justified

Question. – If things without beginning are not real dharmas, how can they be used to save people?

Answer. – In the real truth, there are no dharmas to be preached in order to save people: sermons and people to be saved are conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛta) and false. It is by the use of his power of skillful means (upāyabala) that the Buddha speaks of dharmas without beginning, but he speaks of them with detachment (nirāsaṅgacitta). Those who hear him also obtain detachment and, by means of detachment, feel distaste (nirveda) [for saṃsāra].

Moreover, if we use the knowledge of previous existences (pūrvanivāsajñāna), we see that the series of births and deaths (cyutupapādaprabandha) is limitless (anavastha) and at that moment it is true. But if we use the eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus), we see the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā, no. 9) of beings (satva) and things (dharma). This is why [the Prajñāpāramitā-sūtra] is preaching the emptiness of dharmas without beginning (anagraśūnyatā, no. 10) here.

It is said in the Prajñāpāramitā: “The vision of the eternal (nitya) is not true and the vision of the impermanent (anitya) is not true either: the vision of suffering (duḥkha) is not true and the vision of happiness (sukha) is not true either.”⁵⁰⁶ However, the Buddha said that “the eternal and happiness are errors (viparyāsa) whereas the impermanent and suffering are true (satya)”⁵⁰⁷ because beings are particularly attached to the eternal and to happiness whereas they are not attached to the impermanent and to suffering. Therefore the Buddha is using the truth of impermanence and suffering to destroy the error about the eternal and happiness: this is why he says that impermanence and suffering are true. But if beings were attached to impermanence and suffering, he would say that impermanence and suffering are empty.

It is the same here for dharmas with or without beginning. [The idea] of non-beginning destroys the error about beginning. But as beings are attached to things without beginning, [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] adds that these things without beginning are empty. This is what is called ‘emptiness of dharmas without beginning’ (anagraśūnyatā).

4. Why are dharmas with beginning not expressly refuted?

Question. – Dharmas with beginning also are wrong view (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) and should be refuted. Why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra refute only dharmas without beginning here?

The Buddha who so skillfully combines the cares of his apostolate with the exigencies of the truth cannot be accused of contradiction.

⁵⁰⁶ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 240, l. 18 (T 223, k. 6, p. 265a25-26); Śāstāhasrikā, p. 1618, l. 22-1619, l. 1: Nāpy atra [mahāyāne] nityam upalabhyate nānityam / na sukham upalabhyate na duḥkham /

⁵⁰⁷ The second error consists of taking what is painful to be happy (duḥkhe sukham iti viparyāsa) and the third is taking what is impermanent to be permanent (anitye nityam iti viparyāsa): see p. 1150F.

Answer. – Because dharmas with beginning are obvious errors (mahābhrānti). Why is that?

If saṃsāra had a beginning, from the very first existence (prathamabhāva), one would be born in good places or in bad places in the absence of any demeritorious or meritorious causes or conditions (āpattipunya hetupratyaya). - If the birth depended on demeritorious or meritorious cause and conditions, this birth could not be considered as an 'initial birth'. Why? Because it is necessary to commit wrongdoings (āpatti) or gain merits (puṇya) in order to go from an earlier existence (pūrvanivāsa) to a later existence (aparabhāva). – But as saṃsāra has no beginning, these faults (doṣa) are avoided.

This is why the bodhisattva, removing at the start a view as coarse and as false [as that of saṃsāra with beginning], often cultivates that of saṃsāra without [291c] beginning and, in view of beings, declares saṃsāra without beginning. Meditating constantly on causes and conditions, he proclaims the non-beginning of these dharmas but, not having yet attained omniscience, it sometimes happens that he erroneously hypostatizes this absence of beginning. It is in order to [combat this error] that the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speaks here of the 'emptiness of dharmas without beginning' (anagrasūnyatā).

Moreover, when the theory of 'dharma with beginning' has been refuted by means of that of 'dharma without beginning', there is no longer any need for an emptiness to destroy the 'dharmas with beginning'. And so, the Prajñāpāramitā, now wanting to destroy the theory of 'dharma without beginning', speaks here only of an emptiness of dharmas without beginning (anagrasūnyatā).

Question. – But if dharmas without beginning destroy the dharmas with beginning, the dharmas with beginning themselves destroy the dharmas without beginning. Then why do you resort here only to emptiness (sūnyatā no. 10) to destroy the dharmas without beginning?

Answer. – Although the two theories [affirming the beginning and the non-beginning of things respectively] are both wrong views (mithyadrṣṭi), there are differences (viśeṣa) between them.

Dharmas with beginning are causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) giving rise to passions (kleśa) and wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), whereas dharmas without beginning are causes and conditions giving rise to loving-kindness (maitrī), compassion (karuṇā) and right views (samyakdrṣṭi). Why is that?

In thinking that beings undergo the torments of suffering throughout a beginningless saṃsāra, one experiences a mind of compassion. In knowing that a future lifetime will follow the present lifetime (ihajanman) and that the series (saṃtāna) of lifetimes will not be interrupted, by knowing that these lifetimes are the fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) of wrongdoing (āpatti) and merits (puṇya), one produces a right view (samyakdrṣṭi).

If a person does not hypostatize this absence of beginning (yaḥ kaścit tām anagratām nābhivīśate), it is a good dharma auxiliary to enlightenment (bodhipāṅśika kuśaladharmā) for him; but if he grasps the characteristic sign (nimittam udgrhṇāti) and becomes attached to it, it becomes a wrong view.

It is like the view of eternity (śāśvatadrṣṭi) and the view of non-eternity (aśāśvatadrṣṭi): although the view of dharma with beginning destroys the view of dharma without beginning, it does not destroy absolutely (atyantam) the dharmas without beginning, whereas the dharmas without beginning destroy absolutely the dharmas with beginning. That is why these dharmas without beginning are superior.

Similarly, the good (kuśala) destroys the bad (akuśala), and the bad destroys the good, but although they destroy one another mutually, the good alone destroys the bad absolutely (atyantam). Thus, the person who has attained the state of ārya is no longer subject to bad destinies (āpāyika).⁵⁰⁸ – It is not the case for the bad dharmas (akuśaladharmā), [i.e., they do not destroy the good absolutely], for their power (anubhāva) is slight (tanu). Thus the man who has committed the five sins of immediate retribution (pañcānantarya) and who has broken the roots of good (kuśalamūla), falls into hell (niraya), but does not stay there longer than one kalpa,⁵⁰⁹ after which he escapes from hell and finally realizes the fruits of the path (mārgaphala).

Dharmas without beginning and dharmas with beginning do not have the same strength. The strength of dharmas without beginning is so great that it is able to destroy the dharmas with beginning. That is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra does not speak of an 'emptiness of dharmas with beginning' [for, in order to destroy them, it is not necessary to have recourse to any emptiness whatsoever].

Avakāraśūnyatā

Ninth Section EMPTINESS 11: EMPTINESS OF DISPERSED DHARMAS⁵¹⁰

⁵⁰⁸ At the first moment of the darśanamārga, with the duḥkhe dharmajāññāṅkṣānti, the ascetic abandons the state of worldly person (prthagjana), penetrates into a position of salvation (samyakvānīyāma) and becomes an ārya, candidate for the first fruit, thus escaping from the bad destinies.

⁵⁰⁹ The person guilty of the five ānantaryas, and especially the fomenter of a schism, like Devadatta, is called to a miserable destiny (āpāyika), condemned to hell (nerayika), imprisoned there for a kalpa (kaṭṭha) and incurable (atekiccha): Vinaya, II, p. 202, 205; Majjhima, I, p. 393; Anguttara, III, p. 402-403; Itivuttaka, p. 11, 85. See above, p. 407F, 868-878F.

⁵¹⁰ For the majority of the sources, the eleventh emptiness is anavakāraśūnyatā (dor ba med pa ston pa ñid, wou san k'ong), "relativity of the points that are not to be rejected" (E. Obermiller, Analysis of the Abhisamayālaṃkāra, p. 134) from which "emptiness of non-repudiation" (E. Conze, Large Sūtra on Perfect Wisdom, ed. 1961, p. 130; ed. 1975, p. 145). This would be the anupadhiṣṣanīrvaṇa.

But in the Chinese version of the Pañcaviṃśati by Kumārajīva, it is just a question of a san k'ong, an avakāraśūnyatā, avakāra having the sense of 'dispersal' or more precisely, 'dispersed' (avakīrṇa), taken in the passive sense, in the same way that the word samskāra is often taken in the sense of samskṛta dharma.

It seems indeed that the avakāraśūnyatā is the emptiness of dispersed, divided, dharmas, in the sense that the avakīrṇa dharmas are empty of avakīrṇa dharmas. According to the Traité, these avakīrṇas would not be anything other than dharmas existing as an entity (dravyatas) in contrast to dharmas existing only as designation (prajñaptitas).

The chariot is a good example of prajñaptidharma (cf. Samyutta, I, p. 135; Milindapañha, p. 27): when the spokes, wheels, shaft, and axles are put together, one 'speaks of the chariot'; when they are scattered (avakīrṇa), one does not speak of the chariot: the chariot has only nominal existence; only its components are real.

Emptiness of dispersion (avakāraśūnyatā). – Dispersion (avakāra) means division (viśamyoga).

I. EMPTINESS OF ASSEMBLED DHARMAS

Some dharmas exist by virtue of an assemblage (saṃyoga), such as the chariot (ratha): when the spokes (ara), wheels (nemi), shaft (iṣā), axles (nābhi) are assembled, there is a chariot; but if they are scattered each in a different place, it loses its name of chariot. When the five aggregates (skandha) are brought together, we speak of a ‘man’ (pudgala), but if the five aggregates are dispersed, the man no longer exists.

II. EMPTINESS OF DISPERSED DHARMAS

Question. – By speaking in this way, you are destroying only the name (prajñapti) of man, but you are not destroying the form (rūpa).⁵¹¹ By scattering the spokes and wheels, you are destroying the name of chariot but you are not destroying the spokes and wheels. It is the same with your emptiness of the dispersed (avakāraśūnyatā): by dispersing the five aggregates, you are destroying only the man, but you are not destroying the five aggregates, form (rūpa) etc.

Answer. – [The aggregates], form (rūpa) etc., they too are pure denominations (prajñapti) and destroyed. Why? Because these are subtle agglomerated atoms (saṃghāta-paramāṇu) that are named ‘form’.⁵¹²

Except for the Vātsīputrīya-Sāṃmitīyas who adopt an ambiguous position, all Buddhists accept that the individual (the pudgala), as in the example of the chariot, exists as designation when its components, namely the five skandhas (form, sensation, notion, volition and consciousness), are brought together, but it is not the same question when the latter are separated. These skandhas, on the other hand, even in the scattered state, cannot be reduced and exist as entities (dravyatas) with an intrinsic nature and specific characteristics.

It is precisely against this irreducibility and this stability of the skandhas that the Prajñāpāramitā and the Treatise rise up. Whether they are material like rūpa, or immaterial like vedanā, saṃjñā, the saṃskāras or viññāna, the skandhas are decomposable and ruled by the process of causes and conditions. Quite like the pudgala which they are wrongly supposed to constitute, they are pure denominations (prajñapti) and, taken in isolation, these avakīrṇa dharmas are empty of avakīrṇa nature. This is what is called the emptiness of dispersal (avakīrṇaśūnyatā). Moreover, canonical passages which deny them any reality are not lacking.

⁵¹¹ Form and the other four skandhas designated under the name of man (pudgala).

⁵¹² The Vaibhāṣikas distinguish two kinds of atoms: i) the monad in the strict sense, the dravyaparamāṇu, not capable of being broken (rūpana) and never existing in the isolated state; ii) the molecule, the saṃghātaparamāṇu, the most subtle among the aggregates of form which, itself, is susceptible of deterioration and of resistance: see Kośa, I, p. 25; II, p. 144.

Question. – As for myself, I do not accept these subtle atoms: I consider [292a] what is visible to be matter. This matter is true and really exists. Why would it be dispersed (avakīrṇa) and empty (śūnya)?

Answer. – Even forgetting about (sthāpayitvā) subtle atoms, visible form (sanidarśanam rūpam), coming from the assembling of the four great elements (mahābhūta), is itself but a simple name (prajñapti). Just as when the winds (vāyu) of the four directions, having come together, fan the water and produce balls of foam (phenapiṇḍa), so the four great elements, once they have come together, produce matter (rūpa). But if these four great elements are dispersed (avakīrṇa), there is no matter.

Moreover, this matter (rūpa) must be joined with smell (gandha), taste (rasa), touchable (spraṣṭavya) and the four great elements (mahābhūta) for there to be visible form (rūpaṃ sanidarśanam). Outside of this smell, taste, touchable, etc., there is no isolated matter.⁵¹³ By means of cognition (jñāna), we distinguish these different constituents but, separately, in isolation, matter does not exist. If matter really existed, there would be, separate from these [constitutive] dharmas, a matter that existed separately; but there is no separate matter.⁵¹⁴

[Puṇṇamāsutta.] – This is why a sūtra says: “All form exists by the union of the four great elements.”⁵¹⁵

As it exists by virtue of a union, it is pure denomination (prajñapti); being only denomination, it is dispersible.

Question. – Form (rūpa), as denomination (prajñapti) is dispersible, but how would the other four aggregates (skandha) – [feeling (vedanā), concept (saṃjñā), volition (saṃskāra) and consciousness (viññāna)] – which are non-material, be dispersible?

Answer. – These four aggregates are pure denomination (prajñapti) as well. In regard to their birth (jāti), their ageing (jarā), their duration (sthiti) and their impermanence (anityatā), they are dispersed and empty. Why? Because the moment of birth is one, the moment of old age is different, the moment of duration is different and the moment of impermanence is different.

⁵¹³ In Kāmadhātu, the molecule involves at least eight substances: the four great elements (mahābhūta) and the four kinds of derived matter (bhautika), the visible, odor, taste and tangible: see Kośa, II, p. 145.

⁵¹⁴ Cf. Madh. kārīkā, IV, v. 1-2 (p. 123):

*Rūpakāraṇananirmuktaṃ na rūpam upalabhyate / rūpeṇāpi na nirmuktaṃ drśyate rūpakāraṇam //
Rūpakāraṇanirmukte rūpe rūpaṃ prasajyate /
āhetukaṃ na cāsty athaḥ kaścid āhetukaḥ kvacit //*

“Form is not perceived free from the cause of form; the cause of form does not appear free from form. – If form is free from the cause of form, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that it is without cause. But nothing exists anywhere without cause” (transl. J. May).

⁵¹⁵ Puṇṇamāsutta of Samyutta, III, p. 101 (tsa-a-han T 99, no. 58, k. 2, p. 14c11-12); Mahāpuṇṇamāsutta of Majjhima, III, p. 17: Cattāro kho bhikkhu mahābhūtā hetu cattāro mahābhūtā paccayo rūpakkhandhassa paññāpanāya.

Moreover, in the course of the three times (tryadvan), we notice that these four aggregates are dispersed and perish as well.

Moreover, the mind (citta) follows its object (ālambana): when the object perishes, it perishes; when the object is destroyed, it is destroyed.

Moreover, these four aggregates are indeterminate (aniyata) because they arise as a result of conditions (pratyaaya). Just as fire comes into question where there is fuel but does not appear where there is no fuel, so it is because of the eye (caṣus) and color (rūpa) that visual consciousness (caṣurviññāna) arises; but if it is separated from its object (ālambana), this consciousness does not exist. It is the same for the consciousnesses relevant to the other organs (indriya).

[Sattvasūtra.] – Thus, in a sūtra, the Buddha said to Lo-t'o (Rādha): “This form aggregate (rūpaskandha), O Rādha, break, destroy, disperse, eliminate it so that it exists no longer. Do the same with the other [four] aggregates. That is the emptiness of dispersion (avakāraṇaśūnyatā). For example, look at these children (kumāraka) who are piling up earth and building castles, ramparts, villages, houses. They say that it is rice or wheat flour; they like it, they are attached to it, they keep it and they protect it. But when evening comes, they are no longer interested in them, they tread them underfoot, they break them, destroy them, disperse them and eliminate them. Foolish worldly people (bhālaprthagjana) do the same: as long as they do not renounce desire (avītarāga), they have feelings of love (trṣṇā) and attachment (saṅga) for dharmas; but as soon as they have renounced desire and see the dharmas, they disperse them (vikiranti), destroy them and reject them.”⁵¹⁶

[Kātyāyanāvavāda.]⁵¹⁷ – This is what the Kia-tchen-yen king (Kātyāyanasūtra) says: “In the person who sees the truth of the origin (samudayasatya), there is no view of non-existence (nāstitādṛṣṭi); in the person who sees the truth of cessation (nirodhasatya), there is no view of existence (astitādṛṣṭi).”⁵¹⁸

⁵¹⁶ Sattvasūtra (Tchong-cheng king) of Saṃyutta, T 99, no. 122, k. 6, p. 40a4-18, having as correspondent in Pāli the Sattasutta (from the root sañj?) of the Saṃyutta, III, p. 189-190. As usual, the Traité uses the Sanskrit version which differs slightly in detail from the Pāli version.

Transl. – Similarly, O Rādha, scatter the rūpa, break it, smash it, stop playing with it, and apply yourself to eliminating thirst. [And do the same with vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra and viññāna]. It is like little boys or girls playing with sand castles. As long as they have not lost their passion, desire, fondness, attraction, fever, thirst for these little sand castles, they love them, play with them, save them and claim ownership of them. But, O Rādha, as soon as these little boys and girls have lost their passion, desire, fondness, attraction, fever and thirst for these sandcastles, they immediately break them up with their hands and feet, they smash them and no longer play with them.

- The Traité often calls upon the Rādhasūtra to demonstrate the precariousness and unreality of dharmas: see above, p. 343-345F, and below, p. 2143F.

⁵¹⁷ Kaccāyanagotta of Saṃyutta, II, p. 16-17; Kātyāyana of Nidānasamyukta, p. 167-170 (T 99, no. 301, k. 12, p. 85c17-86a3). Sūtra also called Kātyāyanāvavāda (Madh. vṛtti, p. 43, 269).

⁵¹⁸ Saṃyutta, II, p. 17: Lokasamudayaṃ kho Kaccāyana yathābhūtaṃ sammappaññāya passato yā loke natthitā sā na hoti / lokanirodhaṃ kho Kaccāyana yathābhūtaṃ sammappaññāya passato yā loke atthitā sā na hoti /

For these various reasons, we speak of the ‘emptiness of dispersion’.

Prakṛtiśūnyatā

Tenth Section EMPTINESS 12: EMPTINESS OF ESSENCES

I. THE CONCEPT OF PRAKṚTI⁵¹⁹

Nidānasamyukta, p. 169: Lokasamudayaṃ Kātyāyana yathābhūtaṃ samyakprajñayā paśyato yā loke nāstitā sā na bhavati / lokanirodhaṃ yathābhūtaṃ samyakprajñayā paśyato yā loke 'stitā sā na bhavati /

⁵¹⁹ Taken in the philosophical sense of essence, the word prakṛti, in Pāli, pakati, appears rather rarely in the canonical scriptures of Buddhism. On the other hand, it appears frequently in the Mahāyāna sūtras and above all in the Prajñāpāramitā: Aṣṭasāh., p. 38, 420, 443, 542, 601, 723, 897-898; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 38, 2; 195, 10; 198, 10; 239. 12-240, 3; 253. 18-22; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 118, 17; 1407, 4-1412, 7; 1586 seq. The Chinese and the Tibetans render prakṛti by sing (sometimes pen sing) and raiñ bēin, terms usually used to translate svabhāva, intrinsic nature or being in itself.

The expressions dharmāṇāṃ dharmatā (dharma nature of the dharmas), svarūpa (own form), svabhāva (intrinsic nature), prakṛti (essence), are usually used to designate a non-artificial way of beings (akṛtrima), independent of other (paranirapekṣa), immutable (avyabhicārin).

Victims of an optical illusion which is none other than ignorance (avidyātimira), worldly people (prthagjana) perceive in things the prakṛti thus conceived, and they speak of shared essences, specific essences, etc. The āryas, on the other hand, in this case Buddhists, cured of this optical illusion, cognize them by not seeing them (adarśanayogena). It is actually clear that the assembly of things of becoming, the sarvaṃ, circumscribed by the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana), organs and objects, come from causes and conditions, and neither constitute nor possess at any level any ‘non-artificial essences, independent of other and immutable’. How then to characterize them?

The śrāvakas saw that dharmas coming from causes and conditions (praṭisamsutpanna) are non-eternal (anitya) and, consequently, painful (duḥkha) and without self (anātman). They declare that conditioned dharmas are ‘empty of me and mine’ (śūnyā ātmanā vātmīyena vā): this is the emptiness of the living being (sattvaśūnyatā) which, although refusing any personality to things, recognizes some reality in them.

Following the critique to its ultimate limits, the Madhyamika adds that dharmas, being empty of me and mine, do not exist in themselves, do not exist by themselves and are “empty of essence, of the intrinsic nature of dharma”: this is the emptiness of things (dharmāśūnyatā).

This is what makes Candrakīrti say (Madh. vṛtti, p. 265: Sa caiṣa bhāvānām anutpādātmakaḥ svabhāvo 'kiṃcittvenābhāvamātrativād asvabhāva eveti kṛtvā nāsti bhāvasvabhāv itī vijñeyam:: “This intrinsic nature of things consists of their non-production; not being anything at all, being only non-being, it is an intrinsic non-nature; therefore the intrinsic nature of things is not” (transl. by L. de La Vallée Poussin, Madhyamaka, MCB, II, 1932, p. 41).

Emptiness of essences (prakṛtiśūnyatā). – The prakṛti of dharmas is eternally empty (śūnya) but, borrowing the karmic series (karmaprabandha), it seems not to be empty.

Thus the prakṛti of water (udaka) by itself is cold (śīla); if one brings it close to fire (agni), it becomes hot (uṣṇa); if one puts out the fire, it becomes cold again. [292b] It is the same with the prakṛti of dharmas: as long as the [karmic] conditions are not present, it is empty (śūnya), non-existent (anupalabdha), like the prakṛti of water, eternally cold; when the conditions come together, the dharmas exist like the water that becomes hot near the fire; if the conditions become rare or disappear, there are no more dharmas, like the boiling water that becomes cold again when the fire is extinguished.

According to the Madh. vṛtti (l.c.), svabhāva, prakṛti and śūnyatā are synonymous terms signifying a continuous non-production (sarvadānupādā). The concept – for it is in no way a reality – is ‘inexpressible’ (anākṣara, yi ge med), and not ‘Unwandelbar’ as S. Schayer understands it (Ausgewählte Kapitel aus der Prasannapadā, p. 63). It can be neither learned nor taught; it supports neither affirmation nor negation and escapes any expression:

Śūnyam iti na vaktavyam aśūnyam iti vā bhavet / ubhayaṃ nobhayaṃ ceti prajñaptiyartham tu kathyate //

“One cannot say that it is empty, or non-empty, or both empty and non-empty, or neither empty nor non-empty. But one is speaking of it in a manner of speaking.” (Madh. vṛtti, p. 264, 444).

The relative truth (saṃvṛtisatya) which sees essences (prakṛti) or intrinsic natures (svabhāva) in things and which multiplies the spurious attributions (adhyāropa) is unable to extinguish the passions. The real truth (paramārthasatya) which sees nothing and which has as definition the non-perception of any dharma (sarvadharmānupalambhalaṅkāra) is the only one that can cause the passions to be abandoned and that assures detachment from the world (virāga), serenity of mind, ultimate aspiration of all Buddhists whatever Vehicle they belong to.

Here we are touching upon the central point of the Madhyamaka over which the philologists, philosophers and historians of religion clash: a polemic all the more inopportune in that it concerns a realm where there is nothing to be seen or to be conceived. The bibliography of the subject may be found in the list of works cited by J. May, Candrakīrti, Paris, 1959, p. 23-45. For the following years, a mass of information may be found in the recent bibliographic collections where the enormous Japanese production is taken into account: P. Beatrix, Bibliographie du bouddhisme, vol. I: Éditions de Textes, Bruxelles, 1970; Bibliographie de la Littérature Prajñāpāramitā, Bruxelles, 1971; R. A. Gard, Buddhist Text Information (BTI), New York, six sections between Nov. 1974 and March 1976.

The important results to which the research of E. Conze has led are found in a collection of articles published by the author himself: Thirty Years of Buddhist Studies, Oxford, 1967.

In regard to the Madhyamaka point of view, we read with interest the following works and articles: J. May, La philosophie bouddhique de la vacuité, in Studia Philosophica, XVIII, 1958, p. 123-137; Kant et le madhyamaka, in Indo-Iranian Journal, III/1959, p. 103-111; K. V. Ramanan, Nāgārjuna's Philosophy as presented in the Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra, Harvard, 1966; F. J. Streng, Emptiness, A Study in religious Meaning, New York, 1967; G. Bugault, La notion de “Prajñā” ou de Sapience selon les perspectives du Mahāyāna, Paris, 1968.

[Samṛddhisūtra.] – It is said in a sūtra: “The eye (cakṣus) is empty (śūnya), without ‘me’ (anātman) or ‘mine’ (anātmīya). Why? Because that is its essence (prakṛtir asyaīśā). The ear (śrotra), nose (ghrāṇa), tongue (jihvā), body (kāya) and mind (manas), color (rūpa), [sound (śabda), smell (gandha), taste (rasa), touch (spraṣṭavya)] and dharmas are also like that.”⁵²⁰

⁵²⁰ Samṛddhisūtra of Saṃyukta (T 99, no. 232, k. 9, p. 56b21-c1), to be compared, as C. Akanuma, Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas and Pāli Nikāyas, p. 223, would have it, with the Suññasutta of Saṃyutta, IV, p. 54. Consisting of well-known stock phrases, the Sanskrit Samṛddhisūtra is easily restored to the original on the basis of the Chinese translation.

Translation of the Sanskrit: Here is what I have heard. Once the Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta forest, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Then a monk named Samṛddhi went to find the Blessed One and having approached him, he bowed to the feet of the Blessed One and sat down at one side. Having seated himself, he said to the Blessed One: It is said, O Lord: “The world is empty.” In what way, O Lord, is it said that the world is empty? Thus questioned, the Blessed One said to Samṛddhi: The eye is empty, it is empty of permanence and unchangeability; it is empty of ‘mine’. Why? Because that is its essence. The visible, the eye consciousness and also this sensation, unpleasant, pleasant or neither unpleasant nor pleasant, which arises from the contact of the eye as condition, that also is empty, empty of permanence and unchangeability, is empty of ‘mine’. Why? Because that is its essence. It is the same for the ear, nose, tongue, body and mind. This is why it is said that the world is empty. Thus spoke the Blessed One; the monk Samṛddhi rejoiced at the words of the Blessed One and went away.

– The Samṛddhisūtra is cited in the Catuhśatakaṭikā by Candrakīrti, chap. IX, Nityārthapratīṣedho nāma navamaṃ prakaraṇam (note provided by J. May). Sanskrit: Catuhśatikā by Ārya Deva, ed. by H. Shastri. Memoirs of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, vol. III, no. 8.

Tibetan: Tib. Trip, 98, 5266, 235.3.7.

J. May comments: Three citations without references. The first is related to Samṛddhi by the Sanskrit text, to Subhūti (= rab ḥbyor) by the Tibetan version. The second is exactly Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, p. 195, 13-14; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1410, 11-12. The third is a phrase current of common usage.

– Comparison between the Sanskrit Samṛddhisūtra (S) and the Pāli Suññasutta (P).

In S, the interlocutor of the Buddha is Samṛddhi; in P, it is Ānanda.

The Pāli sources, in P, look for the proof of the non-existence of the ātman (cf. Mahāniddeśa, II, p. 439; Cullaniddeśa, p. 279; Kathāvatthu, p. 67; Visuddhimagga, ed. H. C. Warren, p. 561). In contrast, the Traité and Candrakīrti resort to S to prove prakṛtiśūnyatā. The textual differences between P and S explain this twofold interpretation.

The short formula suññaṃ attena vā attaniyena vā which appears in P is very frequent: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 297; II, p. 263; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 296; Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 36; Kathāvatthu, p. 579. – S substitutes for it a longer phrase, in three points: śāśvatenāviparīṇāmadharmēṇa śūnyam ātmīyena śūnyam, in the Chinese translation of the Saṃyukta, but in six points according to the ṭīkā of Candrakīrti: śūnyam ātmanā ātmīyena ca nityena dhruveṇa śāśvatenāviparīṇāmadharmēṇa ‘empty of me, empty of mine, eternity, solidity, perpetuity and unchangeability.’ This formula of six points is not unknown to the Pāli sources (Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 109; II, p. 178; Mahāniddeśa, I, p. 222; Cullaniddeśa, p. 279; Visuddhimagga, p. 561) which word it as follows: suññaṃ attena vā attaniyena vā niccena vā dhruveṇa vā sasstena vā aviparīṇāmadhammena vā.

According to the Cullaniddeśa, p. 278-280, and the Visuddhimagga, p. 561-562, emptiness may be taken under two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve or forty-two aspects. The Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 178, adds that suññasuññaṃ

Question. – This sūtra says that [the twelve āyatanas] are empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ (śūnyāny ātmanā vātmīyena vā), i.e., it speaks of the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā) and not of the emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā). Why do you see in it a proof of the emptiness of the prakṛti?

Answer. – In the sūtra, it is merely a question of the emptiness of the prakṛti; it does not speak of the emptiness of beings or of the emptiness of things.⁵²¹

Prakṛtiśūnyatā is of two kinds:

1) In the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana), there is no ‘me’ (ātman) and no ‘mine’ (ātmīya). The emptiness belonging to the twelve bases of consciousness consists of the absence of ‘me’ (anātman) and the absence of ‘mine’ (anātmīya). This is what is said in the system of the śrāvakas.

2) The Mahāyāna system, however, says: i) the twelve bases of consciousness having neither ‘me’ nor ‘mine’ are empty (śūnya); ii) the prakṛti ‘essence’ of the twelve bases of consciousness, being non-existent, is itself empty [of prakṛti].

Moreover, if there is neither ‘me’ nor ‘mine’, one automatically (svarasena) ends up in the emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā). Because people are specially attached to their ‘me’ and ‘mine’, the Buddha says only that there is no ‘me’ or ‘mine’. From that we necessarily will know the emptiness of all the dharmas (sarvadharmaśūnyatā, no. 14). To be detached from the dharmas of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ is to be detached from other dharmas a fortiori. This is why the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā) and the emptiness of things (dharmaśūnyatā) finally end up in the same sense (ekārtha) called emptiness of essence (prakṛtiśūnyatā, no. 12) here.

Finally, what is called prakṛti is to exist by itself (svayaṃbhū), independent of causes and conditions (hetupratyayanirapekṣam). That which depends on causes and conditions is a ‘formation’ (saṃskāra) and not a ‘prakṛti’, and in no dharma is there a prakṛti. Why? Because all conditioned dharmas arise from causes and conditions and, since they arise from causes and conditions, they are formations (saṃskāra). If they did not arise from causes and conditions, they would not be ‘dharma’. Therefore it is the absence (anupalabdhitā) of prakṛti in every dharma which is called ‘emptiness of prakṛti’.

‘the emptiness of emptiness’ is precisely the emptiness in six points just discussed. According to the Commentary of the Patisambhidi, III, p. 632, the emptiness formed by emptiness which is stated by another accessory word is suññasuññaṃ (suññasankhātāṃ suññaṃ, na aññena upapadena visesitaṃ ti suññaṃ suññaṃ).

The phrase tat kasya hetoḥ, prakṛtir asya iṣā which appears in the Samṛddhisūtra does not occur in the correspondent Suññasutta, but appears frequently in the Mahāyāna sūtras. It plays the role of refrain in the definitions of the sixteen, eighteen or twenty śūnyatā proposed by the long Prajñāpāramitā sūtras: cf. Aṣṭādaśasāhasrikā (Tib. Trip., XIX, no. 732, p. 260, fol. 135a8-137b5; T 220, vol. VII, k. 488, p. 480b6-481a1); Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, p. 195, 12-197, 20; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1407, 10-1411, 14. I [Lamotte] would like to think that the phrase in question has been introduced into the Samṛddhisūtra of the Saṃyuktāgama by a Mahāyānist interpolator. The canonical Tripitaka was often the victim of similar manipulations.

⁵²¹ Evidently the writer of the response is not reading the same text as that of the objector; see the preceding note.

II. EMPTINESS OF PRAKṚTI AND ABSOLUTE EMPTINESS

Question. – But absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā, no. 9), being nothing at all, is identical with the emptiness of prakṛti. Why do you repeat yourself?

Answer. – Absolute emptiness is [the destruction of dharmas] without any residue (cf. p. 2086F), whereas emptiness of prakṛti consists of being originally and eternally [empty]. The latter is like water which, cold by essence, becomes hot when it is brought to the fire and becomes cold again when the fire is extinguished. Absolute emptiness, however, is like space (ākāśasama), ever without production (anutpāda), without destruction (anirodha), without taints (asaṃkleśa) and without purification (avyavādāna). Why do you claim that they are identical?

Furthermore, dharmas are absolutely empty (atyantaśūnya). Why? Because their prakṛti is non-existent (anupalabdha). – Dharmas are empty of essence (prakṛtiśūnya). Why? Because they are absolutely empty.

Finally, the emptiness of prakṛti is particularly cultivated by the bodhisattvas whereas absolute emptiness is particularly cultivated by the Buddhas. Why? In the emptiness of prakṛti there is only a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) but there is no real essence (bhūtaprakṛti); absolute emptiness itself is pure in the three times (tryadhvapariśuddha): those are the differences.

III. SHARED PRAKṚTIS AND SPECIFIC PRAKṚTIS

The essences (prakṛti) of all dharmas are of two kinds (dvividha), i) shared [292c] essences (sāmānyaparakṛti) and ii) specific essences (svaparakṛti).

i) Shared prakṛtis are impermanence (anityatā), suffering (duḥkha), emptiness (śūnya), non-self (anātman), non-production (anutpāda), non-destruction (anirodha), non-coming (anāgama), non-going (anirgama), non-entering (apraveśa), non-leaving (aniḥsaraṇa), etc.

ii) Specific prakṛtis are, e.g., the hot essence (uṣṇatva) of fire (tejas), the moist essence (dravatva) of water (ap), the intelligent essence (vijñānatva) of the mind (citta). The man who rejoices in doing evil is said to be ‘of bad essence’; the one who loves to accumulate good things is said to be ‘of good essence’.

As it is said in the Che-li king (Daśabalasūtra), “the Buddha knows the world with its many essential dispositions”.⁵²²

As these prakṛtis are empty, we speak here of the ‘emptiness of the prakṛtis’.

IV. ABSURDITY OF THE SHARED PRAKṚTIS⁵²³

⁵²² See above, p. 1507F, the sixth tathāgatabala: Tathāgato anekadhātunānādhātulokaṃ yathābhūtaṃ prajānāti.

[1. Absurdity of an impermanent prakṛti (anityapraṛti)]. – If an impermanent prakṛti really existed, it would ruin the retribution of actions (karmavipāka). Why? Because productions (utpāda), destructions (vyaya) and the past (atīta) would be without duration (sthiti), the six organs (indriya) would not seize their objects (viṣaya) and there would not be any accumulated causes and conditions (saṃcitahetupratyaya).⁵²⁴ This accumulation being absent, recitation of the sūtras (sūtroddeśa), meditation (pratisaṃlayana), etc., would be impossible. This is how we know that an impermanent prakṛti does not exist.

[2. Absurdity of a permanent prakṛti (nityapraṛti)]. – If an impermanent prakṛti does not exist, what could be said then (kaḥ punarvādaḥ) about a permanent prakṛti?

[3. Absurdity of a painful prakṛti (duḥkhapraṛti)]. – Furthermore, a painful prakṛti does not itself exist either. If it were really painful, one would never experience a feeling of attachment (saṅgacitta). The person filled with distaste for and fear of suffering would feel the same distaste and the same fear towards happiness (sukha).

[If everything were essentially painful], the Buddha would not have mentioned three kinds of sensations, unpleasant sensation (duḥkhhavedanā), pleasant sensation (sukhhavedanā) and neither unpleasant nor pleasant sensation (adhuḥkhsukhhavedanā).

[If everything were essentially painful, there would not be the occasion to feel hatred (dveṣa) for suffering, love (rāga) for happiness, worry (moha) towards what is neither painful nor happy. If everything boiled down to a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa) – [that of suffering] – one would feel hatred for happiness and love for suffering, which is absurd.

[4. Absurdity of a happy prakṛti (sukhapraṛti)]. – If this painful prakṛti is non-existent, what can be said of a happy prakṛti except again that it is false?

[5-6. – Absurdity of an empty prakṛti (śūnyapraṛti) and a real prakṛti (bhūtapraṛti)]. – Moreover, an empty prakṛti does not itself exist either. Why? If there were emptiness (śūnyalakṣaṇa), there would be neither sin (āpatti) nor merit (puṇya) and, in the absence of sin and merit, there would be no previous existence (pūrvajanman) and no later existence (aparajanman).

Moreover, dharmas exist in interdependence (āpekṣika). Why is that? If there were emptiness, there must be reality, and if there is reality, there must be emptiness. Since the empty prakṛti does not exist, how could there be a reality?

⁵²³ To expose the realist conceptions of his adversaries, the author resorts here to a series of ad hominem arguments: he evokes the process of retribution of actions, establishes distinctions between suffering and happiness, between sin and merit, and goes so far as to cite an existent and transmigrating ātman. For all that, he does not accept the pertinence of his argument for non-arising (anutpāda) and non-destruction (anirodha), otherwise called absence of any nature, which for him constitute the true nature of things.

⁵²⁴ See Kośa, IV, p. 242.

[7-8. Absurdity of an impersonal prakṛti (anātmakapraṛti) and of a personal prakṛti.] – If there were no ātman, there would be neither bondage (bandhana) nor deliverance (mokṣa), one would not go from the present lifetime (ihajanman) to the future lifetime (aparajanman) to gather [the fruit] of sin (āpatti) and merit (puṇya), and there would be no fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) caused by actions (karman).

For these reasons we know that an impersonal prakṛti does not exist nor, a fortiori, a personal prakṛti.

[9-10. Absurdity of a prakṛti without arising (utpāda) or destruction (nirodha) and a prakṛti with arising and destruction.] – A prakṛti without arising or destruction is not real either. Why? If it really existed, one would fall into the view of eternalism (śāśvata-drṣṭi). If all dharmas were eternal, there would be no sin (āpatti) and no merit (puṇya); that which is would exist eternally, and that which is not would never exist; that which is not would not arise, and that which is would not disappear.

If a prakṛti without rising or destruction does not exist, what then can be said of a prakṛti with arising and destruction?

It is the same for the prakṛtis without coming (anāgama) or going (anirgama), without entering (apraveśa) or leaving (anīḥsaraṇa), and other shared prakṛtis.

V. ABSURDITY OF SPECIFIC PRAKṚTIS⁵²⁵

Furthermore, the specific prakṛtis (svapraṛti) are also absurd. How is that?

Take, for example, fire (agni): it burns its material of appropriation (upādāyārūpa) and it illuminates. When two dharmas are brought together, we [293a] say there is fire. If outside of these two dharmas there existed a ‘fire’, it would possess separately (prthak) a distinct function (vyāpāra); but actually there is no distinct function. This is how we know that fire is just a designation (prajñapti) and has no reality.⁵²⁶ If truly there is no fire-dharma, why do you say that heat (uṣṇatva) is the essence (prakṛti) of fire?

⁵²⁵ The author here is dealing with sūtras and śāstras that attribute to things a well determined mode of being (bhāva) or a specific nature (lakṣaṇa) which, for example, allocate solidity (khakkhaṭarva) to the element earth (prthivīdhātu), moistness (dravatva) to the element water (abdhātu), heat (uṣṇatva) to the element fire (tejodhātu), lightness-mobility (laghusamudīranatva) to the element wind, etc. (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 185-189; 421-424; III, p. 240-241; Vibhāṅga, p. 82-84; Visuddhimagga, p. 290-293; Prakaraṇapāda, T 1542, k. 1, p. 692c11-12; k. 2, p. 699c4-5; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 75, p. 387c-388a; Kośa, I, p. 22). Actually, the specific natures attributed to these elements come from causes and are modified according to circumstances. Consequently the elements are without a true prakṛti ‘existing in itself, independently of other’: they are empty of this unchangeable prakṛti.

⁵²⁶ The Traité summarizes chap. X of Madh, kārīkā (Madh. vṛtti, p. 202-217) in a few lines: there is no element fire having heat (uṣṇatva) as its eternal and immutable essence. Every combustion results from a coming together of a fuel (indhana), the wood to be burned (dāhyaṃ kṣāṭham), and a combustive agent (dagdhā karṭṛ), the fire (agni). But the fire cannot be identical with the fuel nor different from it, as kārīkāś, x, st. 1-3, explain:

Yad indhanam sa ced agnir ekatvaṃ karṭṛkarmanoh/

Moreover, the 'heat' essence (uṣṇatvapraṁkṛti) arises from conditions (prataya): inwardly (adhyātmam) there is the body organ (kāyendriya) and outwardly (bahirdhā) there is tangible form (spraṣṭavya): together they give rise to a tactile consciousness (kāyavijñāna) that perceives the presence of warmth. If [the organ and the tangible] are not brought together, there is no 'heat' essence. This is why we know that there is no fixed heat constituting the essence (prakṛti) of fire.

Moreover,⁵²⁷ if fire really had a 'heat' essence, how do you explain: first, that some people on entering fire are not burned; secondly, that the fire present in the human body⁵²⁸ does not burn the body; thirdly, that water cannot destroy the fire present in space (variant: in the clouds)? It is because fire does not have as essence (prakṛti) a fixed heat (niyataṣṇatva): i) by the power of the superknowledges (abhijñā), fire does not burn the body [of some ascetics]; ii) as a result of actions (karman), fire does not burn the five internal organs⁵²⁹ of the human body; iii) by the power of the celestial dragon (nāga), water does not destroy the fire [of space].

Finally, if the 'heat' essence (uṣṇatvapraṁkṛti) were different from fire, fire would not be hot; and if heat were the same as fire, why claim that this heat is the essence of fire?

It is the same with the other prakṛtis. As the shared prakṛtis (sāmānyapraṁkṛti) and the specific prakṛtis (svapraṁkṛti) do not exist, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra proclaims the 'emptiness of the prakṛtis' here.

anyaś ced indhanād agnir indhanād apy ṛte bhavet // nityapradīpta eva syād apradīpanahetukaḥ / punar ārambhavaiyartham evaṁ cākarmakaḥ sati // paratranirapekṣatvād apradīpanahetukaḥ / punar ārambhavaiyarthyam nityadīptāḥ prasajyate //

Paraphrase – If fire were the fuel, the agent (the fire) and the object (the fuel) would be the same:

unacceptable, for the potter (kumbhakāra) is not confused with the pot (ghaṭa) nor the woodcutter (chettr) with the log (chettavya). – On the other hand, if the fire were something other than the fuel, there would be fire in the absence of fuel; another absurdity, for it has never been seen that a piece of cloth (paṭa) 'other than the pot' (ghaṭād anyah) should be completely independent (nirapekṣa) of it. Therefore there is no fire independent of the fuel.

Moreover, if fire existed apart and separately from the fuel, it would always be burning and there would be no fuel as cause; any effort to extinguish it or to feed it would be unnecessary since this fire is always burning; the fire would be ineffective (akarmaka) in respect to the fuel since it does not have it as cause: it would be an agent that does not act (akarmakaḥ kartṛ); to speak of an agent that does not act or of the son of a barren woman (bandhyāsuta) is a contradiction in terms.

- Thus the fire which is neither identical with the fuel nor different from it is empty of a caloric (uṣṇatva) prakṛti existing in itself (svayambhū) independently of causes.

⁵²⁷ Here the author is setting forth arguments that do not appear in the Madh. kārīkā. He shows that in some circumstances fire, external (bāhira) as well as internal (ajjhattika) - i.e., present in the human body – does not burn and consequently does not have fixed nature (nityatalakṣaṇa).

⁵²⁸ Fire is one of the six elements (dhātu) entering into the composition of a human being ⁵²⁹ See p. 1302F, n. 2.

VI. LONG DURATION IS NOT ETERNITY

Moreover, the emptiness of the prakṛtis is empty from the very beginning (ādita eva śūnya). But worldly people tell us: "That which is false and does not last for a long time is empty (śūnya); by contrast, Sumeru and diamond (vajra) [which last for a long time], the things known by the saints (āryapudgala) [which are not false], we hold them to be real (bhūta) and not empty." – In order to cut through this error, the Buddha said: "Even solid things (dhruva) forming series (saṁtāna, prabandha) and lasting for a long time are empty of essence (prakṛtiśūnya) and, although the wisdom (prajñā) of the saints saves beings and destroys the passions, the prakṛtis [of which they speak] are non-existent (anupalabdha) and consequently empty."

People still say: "The five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) and the eighteen elements (dhātu) are all empty. Only suchness (tathatā), the fundamental element (dharmadhātu), the highest culminating point of the truth (bhūtaakoṭi) are true essences (bhūtapraṁkṛti)." – In order to cut through this error, the Buddha simply said: "The five aggregates (skandha), but also suchness, the fundamental element and the culminating point of the truth are empty." This is called the emptiness of the essences (prakṛtiśūnyatā).

Finally the prakṛtis of conditioned dharmas (saṁkṛta) have three characteristics (lakṣaṇa): production (utpāda), duration (sthiti) and disappearance (vyaya).⁵³⁰ The prakṛtis of unconditioned dharmas (asaṁskṛta) also have three characteristics: non-arising, non-duration and non-disappearance. If the conditioned prakṛtis are empty, what can be said then (kaḥ punarvādaḥ) about the conditioned dharmas? And if the non-conditioned prakṛtis are empty, what can be said then of the non-conditioned dharmas?

For these many reasons, the prakṛtis are non-existent (anupalabdha), and this is what is called 'emptiness of the prakṛtis'.

Svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā

Eleventh Section EMPTINESS 13: EMPTINESS OF SPECIFIC CHARACTERISTICS

I. THE TWO TYPES OF CHARACTERISTICS

Emptiness of specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā). – All dharmas have two kinds of characteristics (lakṣaṇa), i) shared characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and ii) specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa). These two kinds of characteristics being empty, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speaks here of the ‘emptiness of characteristics’ (lakṣaṇaśūnyatā).

⁵³⁰ Cf. p. 36-37F, 1163F.

Question. – What are the shared characteristics and what are the specific characteristics?

Answer. – The shared characteristics are impermanence (anityatā), etc., for example.

The specific characteristics, in the sense that dharmas, although they are impermanent, each possess their own specific characteristic. Thus, for the earth (prthivī), it is solidity (khakkhaṭatva), for fire, it is heat (uṣṇatva).

II. CONNECTIONS BETWEEN CHARACTERISTICS AND ESSENCES

Question. – Above you have already spoken about essences (prakṛti) and here you are speaking about characteristics (lakṣaṇa). Are essences and [293b] characteristics the same or different?

Answer. – 1) Some say that their reality (tattva) is not different but that their names (nāman) show differences (viśeṣa). To talk about essence (prakṛti) is to talk about characteristic, and to talk about characteristic is to talk about essence. For example, we say that the essence of fire (tejahprakṛti) is the characteristic of heat (uṣṇatvalakṣaṇa) and that the characteristic of heat is the essence of fire.

2) Others say that between essence (prakṛti) and characteristic (lakṣaṇa) there are slight differences: the essence concerns the very nature (kāya) of the thing, whereas the characteristic is its indication or sign (vijñeya).

Thus, in the follower of the Buddha (Śākyaputrīya), the taking of the precepts (śīlamādāna) constitutes the essence whereas the shaving of the head (muṇḍana) and the wearing of the yellow robe (kāṣāyavastra) constitute the characteristics. In a brahmacārin, the religious vows (dharmasamādāna) constitute the essence whereas the tuft of hair at the top of the head (cūḍā) and the carrying of the staff (tridaṇḍa)⁵³¹ constitute the characteristics. Fire (tejas) has heat as its essence and smoke (dhūma) as its characteristic. Proximity is essence while distance is characteristic.

The characteristics are not fixed (anīyata) and leave the body; the essence expresses the reality (tattva) of the thing. Thus when one sees a yellow (pīṭa) substance, one thinks it is gold (suvarṇa), but in itself it is copper (tāmra): in melting it or rubbing it with a stone, one recognizes that it does not have gold as its essence. The person who shows respect (gurukāra) and veneration (satkāra) seems to be an honest man, but that is only a superficial characteristic: abuse, criticism, anger and rage are his true essence.

⁵³¹ Adopting the variant san k'i tchang, utensil belonging to the tridaṇḍin parivrājaka, in Pāli tedaṇḍika. Jātaka, II, p. 317, defines the tedaṇḍika: kuṇḍikaṃ thapanatthāya tidaṇḍaṃ gahetvā caranto “who walks carrying a triple rod to fasten his water-pot onto” (ref. A. Foucher, AgbG, II, p. 262, n. 1). Illustrations of this staff, ibid, I, fig. 277, 279, 281, 282; II, fig. 437.

These are the differences (viśeṣa) between essence and characteristic, interior and exterior, distance and proximity, anteriority and posteriority. All these characteristics beings empty, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speaks here about ‘emptiness of characteristics’ (lakṣaṇaśūnyatā).

III. SHARED CHARACTERISTICS

1. Impermanence

As it is said, “all conditioned dharmas have an impermanent characteristic (anityalakṣaṇa).” Why?

- 1) Because they arise, perish and do not last.
- 2) Because, not existing previously, they exist now and, after having existed, they will return to non-existence.
- 3) Because they depend on causes and conditions (hetupratyayāpekṣa).
- 4) Because they are deceptive and dishonest.
- 5) Because they arise from impermanent causes and conditions.
- 6) Because they come from associated causes and conditions.

For these reasons, all conditioned dharmas have an impermanent characteristic.

2. Suffering

Arousing bodily and mental torments, they are a mass of suffering (duḥkhasakandha).

- 1) Because the four postures (īryāpatha) are never without suffering.⁵³²
- 2) Because the holy truth of suffering (duḥkhāryasatya) [proclaims them to be suffering].
- 3) Because the saints (āryapudgala) reject them and do not accept them.
- 4) Because they never stop tormenting.
- 5) Because they are impermanent (anitya).

For these reasons, they have the characteristic of suffering (duḥkhalakṣaṇa).

3. Empty

⁵³² Every position, when it is prolonged, because painful: see p. 584F.

- 1) Not belonging to the ‘me’ (anātmīya), they are empty (śūnya).
 - 2) Coming from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), they are empty.
 - 3) Being impermanent (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and impersonal (anātman), they are empty.
 - 4) Because there is neither beginning nor end in them, they are empty.
 - 5) Because they deceive the mind, they are empty.
 - 6) Because the saints are not attached to any of them, they are empty.
 - 7) By virtue of the two gates of deliverance (vimokṣasamukha), namely, signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita), they are empty.
 - 8) Because the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas is immense (apramāṇa) and incalculable (asaṃkhyeya), they are empty.
 - 9) Because [this true nature] cuts all the paths of speech (sarvavādamārga), they are empty.
 - 10) Because [this true nature] destroys all functioning of the mind (sarvacittapravṛtti), they are empty.
 - 11) Because the Buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and arhats who penetrate [into this true nature] do not come out of it, they are empty.
- For these reasons, they have the empty characteristic (śūnyalakṣaṇa).

4. Without self

Being impermanent (anitya) suffering (duḥkha) and empty (śūnya), these dharmas are without self (anātman).

- 1) Not being autonomous (asvatantra), they are without self.
 - 2) Without master (asvāmika), they are without self.
 - 3) None of them is born without causes and conditions but they all come from causes and conditions; therefore they are without self.
 - 4) By virtue [of the two gates of deliverance], namely, signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita), they are without self.
 - 5) Being only simple designations (prajñapti), they are without self.
- [293c] 6) Belief in the person (satkāyadrṣṭi) being an error (viparyāsa), they are without self.
- 7) Because bodhi is found by destroying the idea of self (ātmacitta), they are without self.

For these many reasons, conditioned dharmas are without self. All this has dealt with the shared characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa).

IV. SPECIFIC CHARACTERISTICS

Earth (prthivī) has as characteristic solidity (khakkhaṭva); fire (tejas) has as characteristic heat (uṣṇatva); water has as characteristic moistness (dravatva); wind (vāyu) has as characteristic motion (īraṇa).

The eye (cakṣus) has as characteristic being the support of the visual consciousness (cakusurvijñāna); and [mutates mutandis] it is the same for the ear (śrotra), nose (ghrāṇa), tongue (jihva) and body (kāya).

Consciousness (vijñāna) has as characteristic investigation (vitarka); knowledge (jñāna) has as characteristic wisdom (prajñā); generosity (dāna) has as characteristic renunciation (parityāga); morality (śīla) has as characteristic absence of regret (akauṛtya) and absence of violence (avihiṃsā); patience (kṣānti) has as characteristic absence of irritation (akopana); exertion (vīrya) has as characteristic effort (abhyutsāha); trance (dhyāna) has as characteristic concentration of the mind (cittasaṃgraha); wisdom (prajñā) has as characteristic mental detachment (asaṅga), skillful means (upāya) has as characteristic the creation of objects (vastusampādana); saṃsāra has as characteristic the weaving of births and deaths (cyutyupapāda); nirvāṇa has as characteristic non-weaving.⁵³³

Such dharmas each has its own specific characteristic and we should know that these characteristics are empty: this is what is called ‘emptiness of specific characteristics’ (svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā). For other meanings, refer to what has been said about the emptiness of essences (prakṛtiśūnyatā, no. 12) since essence (prakṛti) and characteristic (lakṣaṇa) are synonyms.

V. WHY INSIST ON THE EMPTINESS OF ‘SPECIFIC’ CHARACTERISTICS?

Question. – Why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] not simply say ‘emptiness of characteristics’ (lakṣaṇaśūnyatā) but says ‘emptiness of specific characteristics’ (svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā)?

Answer. – To say just emptiness of characteristics is to pass over in silence the fundamental emptiness of dharmas; to speak of the emptiness of specific characteristics is to deal with the fundamental emptiness of dharmas.

⁵³³ In these two lines, adopt the variant tche ‘to weave’ (in Sanskrit, vā) in place of che ‘to cognize’. It is one of the very imaginative etymologies for the word nir-vāṇa, ‘the non-weaving of births and deaths’ in opposition to saṃsāra which weaves them. It has already appeared in the Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 32, p. 163b4-6: Vāna means ‘weaving’, nir is negative: the threads of the passions and actions are absolutely absent in it; one does not weave the cloth that has births and deaths as fruit of retribution.

For other etymologies, see references in L. de La Vallée Poussin, Nirvāṇa, p. 54, n. 4.

Moreover, every dharma, arising from a group of causes and conditions, is an empty dharma and thus each dharma taken individually is empty. The grouped causes and conditions forming a succession of dharmas (dharmaparaṃparā) is itself empty as well. Thus all dharmas are each empty of specific characteristic. This is why the emptiness of specific characteristics is spoken of here.⁵³⁴

VI. WHY CARRY ON ABOUT EMPTY DHARMAS?

Question. – If all dharmas are each empty of intrinsic characteristics, why talk about it again?

Answer. – As a result of mistakes (viparyāsa), beings become attached (abhinivāṣante) to these dharmas by finding in them characteristics of identity (ekatva) or difference (anyatva), shared characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) or specific characteristics (svālakṣaṇa). It is in order to destroy them that we speak of them here. For all these reasons, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra asserts an emptiness of specific characteristics.

Sarvadharmaśūnyatā

Twelfth Section EMPTINESS 14: EMPTINESS OF ALL DHARMAS

Emptiness of all dharmas (sarvadharmaśūnyatā). – By ‘all dharmas’ we mean the five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) and the eighteen elements (dhātu).

I. UNITARY CATEGORIES IN EVERY DHARMA

Throughout, these dharmas belong to many categories (mukha),⁵³⁵ in the sense that all dharmas have: 1) a characteristic of existence (bhāvalakṣaṇa); 2) a characteristic of knowledge (jñānalakṣaṇa); 3) a characteristic of consciousness (viññānalakṣaṇa); 4) a characteristic of object (ālambanalakṣaṇa); 5) a characteristic of dominance (adhipatilakṣaṇa); 6) a characteristic of cause (hetulakṣaṇa) and a characteristic of effect (phalalakṣaṇa); 7) a shared characteristic (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and a specific characteristic (svālakṣaṇa); 8) a characteristic of support (āśrayalakṣaṇa).

⁵³⁴ Obscure passage; the general sense seems to be as follows. Taken in isolation, every dharma to which scholasticism attributes a specific characteristic is empty of this characteristic for it is the result of a complex of causes and conditions. The latter, which contribute to its formation, are empty themselves as well, for in their turn they are dependent on other (paratantra).

⁵³⁵ Conditioned dharmas (samkṛta) constituting the ‘All’ are capable of diverse classifications that have been detailed several times already: see above, p. 642-646F, 1095-1104F, 1748-1751F.

1) How do all dharmas have a characteristic of existence (bhāvalakṣaṇa)? Among all these dharmas, there are some beautiful (suvarṇa) and some ugly (durvarṇa), there are some internal (ādhyātmika) and some external (bāhya). All dharmas, being [a place] of arising for the mind, are said to be existent.⁵³⁶

Question. – How could a characteristic of existence be attributed to an adharma?

Answer. – The adharma is not a ‘dharma’: only because it is counter to existence (bhāva) is it called adharma. If it were really an adharma, it would be ‘existent’. This is why it is said that all dharmas have a characteristic of existence.

2) They have a characteristic of knowledge (jñānalakṣaṇa).

a. The knowledge of suffering (duḥkhe dharmajñāna) and the subsequent knowledge of suffering (duḥkhe ‘navayajñāna) cognize the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya).

b. The knowledge of the origin (samudaye dharmajñāna) and the subsequent knowledge of the origin (samudaye ‘nvayajñāna) cognize the truth of the origin (samudayasatya).

c. The knowledge of the destruction (nirodhe dharmajñāna) and the subsequent knowledge of the destruction (nirodhe ‘nvayajñāna) cognize the truth of the destruction (nirodhasatya).

d. The knowledge of the Path (mārga dharmajñāna) and the subsequent knowledge of the Path (mārga ‘nvayadharmajñāna) cognize the truth of the Path (mārgasatya).⁵³⁷ [294a]

e. The good conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtījñāna) cognizes suffering (duḥkha), the origin (samudaya), the destruction (nirodha), the Path (mārga), and also cognizes space (ākāśa) and cessation not due to wisdom (apratisaṃkhyānirodha).

Therefore it is said that all dharmas have a characteristic of knowledge and, by means of this characteristic of knowledge, embrace (saṃgrhṇanti) all dharmas.

3) They have a characteristic of consciousness (viññānalakṣaṇa):

a. The eye consciousness (cakṣurvijñāna) perceives color (rūpa).

b. The ear consciousness (śrotravijñāna) perceives sound (śabda).

c. The nose consciousness (ghrāṇavijñāna) perceives odor (gandha).

d. The tongue consciousness (jihvāvijñāna) perceives taste (rasa).

e. The body consciousness (kāyavijñāna) perceives the tangible (spraṣṭavya).

f. The mental consciousness (manovijñāna) perceives dharmas and [consequently] the eye, color and the eye consciousness; the ear, sound and the ear consciousness; the nose, smell and the nose consciousness;

⁵³⁶ For the Sarvāstivādins, only existing dharmas can be objects of consciousness; on the other hand, the Sautrāntikas think that the existing and the non-existing (bhāva, abhāva) can both be object of the consciousness: see Kośa, V, p. 60-62.

⁵³⁷ In all, eight knowledges (jñāna), preceded by kṣānti, and acquired during the Darśanamārga.

the tongue, taste and the tongue consciousness; the body, touch and the body consciousness; the mind (manas), dharmas and the mental consciousness.⁵³⁸

Therefore it is said that all dharmas have a characteristic of consciousness.

4) They have a characteristic of object (āmbanalakṣaṇa).

a. The eye consciousness (caṅsurvijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the eye consciousness (caṅsurvijñānasamprayuktadharmā) seize (āmbante) color (rūpa).

b. The ear consciousness (śrotravijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the ear consciousness seize sound (śabda).

c. The nose consciousness (ghrāṇavijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the nose consciousness seize smell (gandha).

d. The tongue consciousness (jihvāvijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the tongue consciousness seize taste (rasa).

e. The body consciousness (kāyavijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the body consciousness seize the tangible (spraṣṭavya).

f. The mental consciousness (manovijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the mental consciousness seize dharmas, and [consequently] the eye, color and the eye consciousness; the ear, sound and the ear consciousness; the nose, smell and the nose consciousness; the tongue, taste and the tongue consciousness; the body, touch and the body consciousness; the mind (manas), dharmas and the mental consciousness.

Therefore it is said that all dharmas have a characteristic of object.

5) They have a characteristic of dominance (adhipatilakṣaṇa).

a. All conditioned dharmas (samskṛta) are, each separately, dominant.⁵³⁹

b. Unconditioned dharmas (asamskṛta) also are dominant in respect to conditioned dharmas.

Therefore it is said that all dharmas have a characteristic of dominance.

6) They have characteristics of cause and effect (hetuphalalakṣaṇa): all dharmas are each both cause and effect.

Therefore it is said that all dharmas have the characteristics of cause and effect.

7) They have a shared characteristic (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and a specific characteristic (svalakṣaṇa).

In every dharma, there is a shared and a specific characteristic for each. For example, the horse is a shared characteristic, but its whiteness is a specific characteristic. The man is a shared characteristic, but the fact that he has lost an ear is a specific characteristic. Thus for each series (paramparā) there is a generic and a specific characteristic.

⁵³⁸ Whereas the first five consciousnesses are strictly limited to their own object, the mental consciousness applies, in addition, to the objects of the other five consciousnesses: see above, p. 643F and note.

⁵³⁹ All dharmas are dominant (adhipati) as raison d'être (kāraṇahetu) in regard to all, themselves excepted (svato 'nye kāraṇahetuḥ): cf. Kośa, II, p. 246.

Therefore it is said that all dharmas have a shared and a specific characteristic.

8) They have a characteristic of support (āśrayalakṣaṇa).

Taken separately and together, dharmas rely upon one another (anyo 'nyāśrita). For example, the plants, the trees, the mountains and the rivers rest on the earth (pṛthivī) and the earth rests on the water (ap). Thus, as all things rest one upon the other, it is said that all dharmas have a characteristic of support, and that this characteristic of support embraces (samgrhṇati) all dharmas.

These unitary categories of dharma are applicable to every dharma.

II. GROUPS OF SEVERAL DHARMAS⁵⁴⁰

Moreover, groups of two dharmas include all dharmas: material (rūpin) dharmas and immaterial (arūpin) dharmas; visible (saṃdarśana) and invisible (anidarśana), resistant (sapratigha) and non-resistant (apratigha), impure [294b] (sāsrava) and pure (anasrava), conditioned (samskṛta) and unconditioned (asamskṛta), inner (adhyātma) and outer (bahirdhā), vision-dharma and object-object, existence-dharma and nonexistence-dharma, and many other binary groups of this kind.

Groups of three, four, five, six and even an infinity of dharmas include all dharmas.

These dharmas are all empty (śūnya) as I have said above (p. 2086F): this is what is called the 'emptiness of all dharmas' (sarvadharmasūnyatā).

III. WHAT IS THE USE OF MAKING LISTS OF EMPTY DHARMAS?⁵⁴¹

Question. – If dharmas are all empty, why give them different names (nānāvadhanāman)?

Answer. – Out of ignorance (avidyā) or error (viparyāsa), worldly people seize characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇanti) in empty dharmas and thus give rise to the conflicting emotions, such as desire (tṛṣṇādikleśa). As a result of these passions, they carry out all kinds of actions (karman). Carrying out all kinds of actions, they enter into all sorts of destinies (gati). Entering into all sorts of destinies, they take up all kinds of existences (gati). Taking up all kinds of existences, they suffer all kinds of suffering (duḥkha) and happiness (sukha). They are like the silk-worm (kośakāra) that, emitting silk (kausēya) without any reason, ⁵⁴⁰ For a more detailed explanation, see above, p. 644-645F, 1101-1104F and 1750-1752F.

⁵⁴¹ Objection already made above, p. 1104-1105F.

becomes rolled up (pariveṣṭayati) within this silk that came out of itself and undergoes the torments of cooking (pacana) or boiling water.⁵⁴²

By the power of his pure wisdom (viśuddhaprajñā), the saint analyzed all these dharmas which, from beginning to end, are empty, Wanting to save beings, he speaks to them of these places of attachment (abhinivāśasthāna) that are the five skandhas, the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) and the eighteen elements (dhātu) and says to them: “You others, it is only out of ignorance (avidyā) that you give rise to the five aggregates, etc.; and you become attached to what you yourselves have made.”

If the saint spoke only about emptiness, beings would not find bodhi, for this emptiness, being caused by nothing, would not call forth disgust (nirveda).

IV. NEW CONTROVERSY IN REGARD TO EMPTINESS

1. The specific characteristics of conditioned dharmas are empty and indeterminate

⁵⁴² Cf. H. Lamasse, Sin kouo wen or New manual of the written Chinese language, 2nd ed., Hong Kong, 1922, p. 212-213: The eggs of the silk-worm (ts'an) begin to hatch between spring and summer; they crawl about like black ants; after having grown somewhat, they moult their skin, four times in all; after 30 to 40 days, they spin a cocoon (kien) by emitting silk (sseu) from their mouths. When their thread is ended, they change into a chrysalis (yong), nestled in the center of the cocoon, without eating and motionless; ten days later, having transformed into a butterfly (ngo), they break their cocoon and escape...Once the silk-worm has finished its cocoon, the silk (sao sseu) may be unwound. Here is the method: the cocoons are boiled in a pot in order to dissolve the viscous substance with which they are covered; then someone searches for the end (siu) to unwind it (tch'eu) and it is unrolled onto the skein winder (sseu kiu). If the cocoons are too numerous, they cannot be unwound, so first of all they are dried near a fire (hong) in order to kill the chrysalis so that it will no longer change into a butterfly; in these conditions, it is possible to keep them for a long time without spoiling.

- In the words of the Vinayas, the bhikṣus cannot ask the silk manufacturer to cook or to boil the cocoons so as to make mats mixed with silk (koṣiyamissaka santhata), for such a measure involves the destruction of numberless small creatures (khuddaka pāṇa). Violating this precept constitutes a naiḥsargikapāṭayantika, a fault involving confiscation: cf. Pāli Vinaya, III, p. 224; Mahāśāsa Vin., T 1421, k. 5, p. 35a; Mahāśāṃghika Vin., T 1425, k. 9, p. 307c (cf. Prātimokṣasūtra of the Mahāśāṃghika, ed. W. Pachow, 1956, p. 17, 25-26); Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, k. 7, p. 613c; Sarvāstivādin Vin., T 1435, k. 7, p. 47c (cf. V. Rosen, Der Vinayavibhaṅga der Sarvāstivādin, p. 90); Mūlasarvāstivādin Vin., T 1442, k. 20, p. 735c.

In the Buddhist texts, the foolish worldly folk who get entangled in their imaginations and their wrong views are often compared to the silkworms that surround themselves with their own thread (Laṅkāvatāra, p. 162, 2-4: kauṣeyakrimaya iva sūtrenātmānaṃ parāṃś ca pariveṣṭayanti). See also Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 48, p. 247c13-14; Abhidharmavātaṛa, T 1554, k. 2, p. 985a6-7; Nairātmypariṣecchā, T 1643, p. 172b29 (but the original Sanskrit says only veṣṭita); Catuṣṣatyāśāstra, T 1647, k. 1, p. 376b5; Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 83, p. 482c11; k. 109, p. 612a27-28; k. 110, p. 617a8, 622b17; k. 120, p. 680c11; Northern Mahāparinirvāṇ, T 374, k. 2, p. 373b10; k. 9, p. 419b6; Traité, k. 90, p. 697a16-17.a

Question. – You say that all dharmas are empty, but that is not correct. Why? Because all dharmas are integrated (saṃgrhita) each within their own specific characteristic (svālakṣaṇa). Earth (prthivī) has as characteristic solidity (khakkhaṭatva), water (ap) has as characteristic moistness (dravatva), fire (tejas) has as characteristic heat (uṣṇatva); wind has as characteristic motion (īraṇa), the mind (citta) has as characteristic discernment (prativijñapti), wisdom (prajñā) has as characteristic knowledge (jñāna). All these dharmas reside each in its own characteristic. Why do you say they are empty?

Answer. – I have already refuted that in connection with the emptiness of essences (prakṛtiśūnyatā, no. 12) and the emptiness of specific characteristics (svālakṣaṇaśūnyatā, no. 13), but I must repeat myself here.

1) Since the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) are not determinate (aniyata), they are not real characteristics. Thus, cheese (sarpis), honey (madhu), glue (gavyadr̥ḍha), wax (lākṣā), etc., have the characteristic of earth (prthivīlakṣaṇa), [namely, solidity]; but if they are brought near fire (agni), they lose their own characteristic and take on the characteristic of moistness (dravatva) [which is that of water]. If gold (suvarṇa), silver (rajata), copper (tāmra) and iron (ayas) are brought to the fire, they also lose their own characteristic and take on that of water [namely, moistness]. Water (ap) in cold weather, becomes ice (hima) and takes on the characteristic of earth, [namely solidity]. A man who is drunk (unmada), or asleep (supta) or a man who is in the absorption without mind (asamjñīsamāpatti), a frozen fish (matsya), have neither mind (citta) nor consciousness (vijñāna); they lose their characteristic of thinking and no longer have any discernment (prativijñapti). Wisdom (prajñā), which has knowledge (jñāna) as characteristic, as soon as it penetrates the empty nature (bhūtalkakṣaṇa) of dharmas, no longer has discernment and loses its characteristic of knowledge.⁵⁴³ This is why the dharmas have no determined characteristic.

2) Moreover, it is not correct that dharmas have a determined characteristic (niyatalakṣaṇa). Why? The characteristic of future (anāgata) dharma cannot come into the present (pratyutpanna) for, if it did come into the present, it would lose its character of future. If it came into the present without losing its characteristic of future, the future would be the present, and there would no longer be any fruit of retribution (vipakaphala) in the future. – If the present (pratyutpanna) entered {294c} into the past (atīta), it would lose its character of present. If it entered into the past without losing its characteristic of present, the past would be the present.⁵⁴⁴ From all these faults (doṣa), we know that dharmas have no fixed characteristic.

2. Unconditioned dharmas are without characteristics

⁵⁴³ The author touches the very depths of the autocritique. His perfection of wisdom is the absence of any knowledge.

⁵⁴⁴ From the non-existence of the three times follows not only the subjective nature of dharmas but also their non-production: cf. above, p. 76-79F, 377F, 1690-1696F, 1086F.

Moreover, if as you assert, unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) dharmas exist in a definite way, they would each separately have a specific characteristic (svālakṣaṇa), in the same way that fire (tejas) has the characteristic of heat (uṣṇatvalakṣaṇa). But [by definition], it is the fact of not depending on a foreign cause (aparāhetukatva) that constitutes their nature. This is why we know that unconditioned dharmas, having no characteristic, are really non-existent.

If you say that the cessation not due to knowledge (apratisaṃkhyānirodha) takes place in the future existence (anāgatajanmani), it would be a conditioned dharma (saṃskṛta) whereas, [by definition], there is no conditioned dharma there.

If you say that the cessation not due to knowledge (apratisaṃkhyānirodha) has ‘cessation’ (nirodha) as characteristic, that also is not correct. Why? Because here it is a matter of the characteristic of cessation due to impermanence (anityatā) and not the characteristic of the cessation not due to knowledge (apratisaṃkhyā).⁵⁴⁵

For these many reasons, there is no determinate characteristic. If dharmas had a determinate characteristic, they would be real (aśūnya). Outside of determinate characteristic, there can be no real dharma.

3. Even the dharmas known by the saints are empty

Question. – There really must be some non-empty (aśūnya) dharmas. Why? Because there are differences between the things known by worldly people (prthagjana) and the things known by the saints (āryapudgala): the things known by worldly people are false, those known by the saints are true. One depends on the true knowledge of the saints to reject false dharmas; one cannot rely on lies to destroy lies.

Answer. – Destroying the things known by worldly people, that is the knowledge of the saints. But in the absence of worldly people, there are no dharmas of the saints, just as in the absence of illness (vṛādhi), there is no medicine (bhaṣajya). This is why a sūtra says: “Without the dharmas of worldly people, there ⁵⁴⁵ Apart from the ākāṣa, the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas, along with some other schools, assert two unconditioned or asaṃskṛtas: 1) The cessation of desire is acquired by a pure knowledge, the comprehension of the truths, to which the name of pratisaṃkhyā ‘discriminative consciousness’ is given: it is therefore called pratisaṃkhyānirodha (= pratisaṃkhyānirodha): cessation obtained by knowledge; 2) At the death of the saint, the future lifetime or rebirth is destroyed. This cessation which presupposes knowledge is not its result: it consists of the absolute prevention of arising (utpādāyāntavighna: Kośa, I, p. 20): it is therefore called apratisaṃkhyānirodha, cessation not due to knowledge.

In the words of the Traité, the Sarvāstivādins are wrong to place the efficacy of what they consider to be a cessation ‘in itself’ in the future. An entity undergoing the process of time and impermanence (anityatā) presents characteristics directly opposite to those of an asaṃskṛta which, by definition, is without production, without cessation and without duration-change. Thus the asaṃskṛtas as well have no fixed characteristic.

are no dharmas of the saints. The true nature of the dharmas of worldly people, that is the dharmas of the saints.”⁵⁴⁶

Moreover, saints do not seize any characteristic (nimitta) in dharmas and do not become attached to them (nābhiniṣante); that is why the dharmas of the saints are really true. By contrast, worldly people seize characteristics in dharmas and are attached to them: that is why the dharmas of worldly people are false.

Although the saints use [empty dharmas], they do not seize any characteristics in them and, if they do not seize any characteristics, it is because these dharmas are without determinate characteristics (niyatalakṣaṇa). Thus there is no objection to be removed.

In the stages of the worldly people (prthagjanabhūmi), one is attached to the dharmas and makes distinctions between what is worldly dharma and what is saintly dharma. In the stages of the saints (āryabhūmi), one does not make any distinctions (vibhaṅga) and it is only in order to destroy the sicknesses of beings that one says that such and such a thing is false and such and such another thing is true. Thus it is said: “The word of the Buddha (buddhavacana) is neither false nor true, neither bondage (bandhana) nor deliverance (mokṣa), neither sameness (ekatva) nor difference (anyatva); this is why it is free of imagination (nirvikalpa) and pure like space (ākāśasama).”

Finally, if dharmas were not entirely empty, it could not be said: “Absence of idle chatter (niḥprapañca) is appropriate for the saints.” Neither could one say: “Indifference (anadhyavasāna), detachment (asaṅga) and groundlessness (apratisthāna), emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita) are the true teaching.”

4. Emptiness itself is empty

Question. – If the emptiness of all dharmas (sarvadharmasūnyatā) is true, why do you say that it is not?

Answer. – Supposing there were dharmas into which it could penetrate, this emptiness of all dharmas would destroy them, but since there is no dharma, the problem does not exist.

5. In the Tripiṭaka, the Buddha taught the emptiness of beings and the emptiness of dharmas

Question. – If the emptiness of all dharmas (sarvadharmasūnyatā) is really [295a] true, why did the Buddha, in the Tripiṭaka, speak especially of impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) dharmas without self (anātman)?⁵⁴⁷

⁵⁴⁶ On the identity of worldly people and saints, see Vimalakīrti., transl., p. 143-144 and note, 156-57, 235; HBbḅgīrin, p. 135, s.v. Bonshḅ.

[Paramārthaśūnyatāsūtra.]⁵⁴⁸ – See the sūtra where the Buddha says to the bhikṣus: “I will explain to you the discourse of the Dharma (dharmaprayāya) called Ti-yi-yi-k’ong (Paramārthaśūnyatā). What is this ⁵⁴⁷ Anityaṃ dukkhaṃ śūnyam anātman is the formula most frequent in the Sanskrit Āgamas: cf. Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 1, p. 1a11; k. 5, p. 35a6; K. 10, p. 65b28, 68c16; k. 12, p. 82c13; k. 21, p. 153a8. – In the corresponding passages of the Pāli Nikāyas, śūnyam does not appear:

Aniccaṃ ...dukkhaṃ ... yaṃ paṇāniccaṃ dukkhaṃ vipariṇāmadhammaṃ kallaṃ nu taṃ samanupassitum: etaṃ mama eso ham asmi eso me attā ti: Vinaya, I, p. 14; Majjhima, III, p. 19-20, 271-273; Saṃyutta, II, p. 124-125, 244-245; III, p. 88-89, 94.

Aniccaṃ ... yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā yad anattā taṃ netaṃ mama neso ham asmi na meso attā ti: Saṃyutta, III, p. 22, 23.

When suññaṃ is mentioned in the Pāli suttas, it is most often given by two complements suññaṃ attena vā attaniyena vā expressing that it is an emptiness of being and not of thing: Majjhima, I, p. 297; II, p. 263; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 54, 296-297.

⁵⁴⁸ Entitled Ti-yi-yi-k’ong king in the Chinese version of the Saṃyuktāgama made between 436 and 443 by Guṇabhadra, T 99, no. 335, k. 13, p. 92c12-26, and reproduced, not without some variants, at the beginning of a sūtra appearing in the Chinese version of the Ekottarāgama, T 125, k. 30, p. 713c12-714a3. There is no correspondent in the Pāli Nikāyas but the Abhidharma masters, who see in it an affirmation of anātman or sattvaśūnyatā, have transmitted some extracts to us in the original Sanskrit text: Kośabhaṣya, p. 129, 9-11; 299, 12-14; 468, 20-22; Kośavyākhyā, p. 707, 13-16; Abhidharmaṭīpa, p. 267, 1-2 and 12; Bodhicaryāvatāraṇāṭhikā, p. 474, 15-17; 582, 1-3; Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, p. 158, 21-22. The remainder of the sūtra is limited to repeating stock scriptural phrases, all identified in my [Lamotte] article, Trois Sūtra du Saṃyukta sur la Vacuité, BSOAS, XXXVI, 1973, p. 314-317. Under these conditions, the complete original text can readily be restored:

1. evaṃ mayā śrutam / ekasmin samaya bhagavān kuruṣu viharati kalmāśadamyē nigame /
2. tatra bhagavān bhikṣūn āmantrayati.
3. dharmam vo deśayiṣye ādau ...
11. idam avocad bhagaṇ ātmanasas te bhikṣavo bhagavato bhāṣitam abhyanandan. /

Here is a translation of the restored text:

- 1) Thus have I heard. Once the Blessed One was dwelling among the Kurus in the village of Kalmāśadamyā.
- 2) Then the Blessed One addressed the monks.
- 3) I shall teach you the Dharma good at the beginning, good in the middle good at the end, whose meaning is good, whose letter is good, unique of its kind, complete; I shall explain to you the very pure and proper brahmic conduct, namely, the sūtra on emptiness in the supreme meaning of the word. Listen then; reflect well appropriately. I will speak.
- 4) What is the sūtra on emptiness in the supreme meaning of the word? The eye, O monks, when it is born, does not come from any place, and when it perishes, does not go anywhere.
- 5) [Translation modeled on the Chinese version, T 99, p. 92c17-18]: Thus, the eye is not real and nevertheless is born; being born, it perishes. – [Another translation]: Thus the eye exists after having been non-existent and, after having existed, it disappears.
- 6) There is action, there is retribution, but there is no agent who rejects these aggregates and assumes other aggregates, except that that is a metaphor to designate the law [of pratītyasamutpāda in direct order].

paramārthaśūnyatā, ‘absolute emptiness’? The eye (cakṣus), when it is born, does not come from anywhere; when it perishes, it does not go anywhere. There is only action (karman) and retribution of action (karmavipāka); the agent (kāraka) does not exist. It is the same for the ear (śrotra), the nose (ghrāṇa), the tongue (jihvā), the body (kāya) and the mind (manas).”⁵⁴⁹

Here, to affirm that by arising [the dharmas] come from nowhere and by perishing they go nowhere is to say that there are no eternal dharmas and that they are impermanent (anitya); there is only action and the retribution of action, but the agent does not exist. In the śrāvaka system, that is absolute emptiness (paramārthaśūnyatā). Why are you telling us about an ‘emptiness of all dharmas’ (sarvadharmaśūnyatā)?

Answer. – 1) The self (ātman) is the root (mūla) of all the passions (kleśa). First, one is attached to the five aggregates (skandha) as if they were the self (ātman); then, one is attached to outer things (bāhyavastu) as if they were ‘mine’ (ātmīya). Tied (baddha) by the ‘mine’, one produces love (rāga) and hatred (dveṣa) and as a result of this love and hatred, one carries out actions (karman). When the Buddha says [in the Paramārthaśūnyatāsūtra cited above] that “the agent does not exist” (kārakas tu nopalabhyate), he destroys the ātman in every dharma. When he says: “The eye, at the moment when it arises, does not come from anywhere and, at the moment when it perishes, it goes nowhere” he is affirming the impermanence of the eye, etc. But “that which is impermanent is suffering (yad anityaṃ tad dukkhaṃ) and that which is suffering is without ‘me’ (ātman) and ‘mine’ (ātmīya).”⁵⁵⁰ The ‘me’ and the ‘mine’ not existing, the mind is not attached to any dharma, and the mind, not being attached to any dharma, no longer gives rise to any fetter (saṃyojana). Since it does not give rise to any fetters, what is the good of preaching emptiness? This is why, in the Tripiṭaka, the Buddha above all speaks of impermanence (anitya), suffering (dukkha), emptiness (śūnya) and non-self (anātman), but speaks much less of the ‘emptiness of all dharmas’.

2) However, some beings, even though they hear the Buddha talking about impermanence, suffering, emptiness and non-self, continue to chatter uselessly about dharmas. To these people, the Buddha preaches the emptiness of things (dharmāśūnyatā). If there is no self, neither is there any ‘mine’ and this absence of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ leads into the doctrine of emptiness.

7) The same must be said of the ear, the nose, the tongue and the mind.

8) I said: “Except that that is a metaphor to designate the law.” Here this metaphor is about the law that is expressed thus: “This being, that is; from the production of this, that is produced, i.e., the formations have as condition ignorance, consciousness has for condition the formations; etc., up to: “Such is the origin of this whole mass of suffering.”

9) Moreover: “This not being, that is not; by the destruction of this, that is destroyed, i.e., from the destruction of ignorance the destruction of the formations results; from the destruction of the formations the destruction of consciousness results”, etc., up to: “Such is the destruction of this entire mass of suffering.”

10) That, O monks, is the sermon called ‘emptiness in the supreme sense of the word’.

11) Thus spoke the Blessed One; the monks’ minds were delighted and they rejoiced, praising the words of the Blessed One.

⁵⁴⁹ See paragraphs 4, 5, and 7 of the preceding note.

⁵⁵⁰ Saṃyutta, III, p. 22, 23: Yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā yad anattā taṃ netaṃ mama.

6. The non-self leads logically to emptiness of dharmas

Question. – Then why does the Buddha say [in the Paramārthaśūnyatāsūtra cited above]: “There is action and there is retribution of action (asti karma, asti karmavipākāḥ)”? This action and this retribution of action are not empty (śūnya).

Answer. – 1) The Buddha’s sermon (dharmadeśanā) is twofold: i) he is preaching the non-self (anātman); ii) he is preaching the non-dharma (adharma).

To those who believe in an eternal ātman, he says that “the agent does not exist (kārakas tu nopalabhyate); to those who are attached to the view of nihilism (ucchedadṛṣṭyabhiniṣṭa) he says that “there is action and the retribution of action (asti karmāsti karmavipākāḥ)”.

If a person hears it said that the agent does not exist, he ends up by falling into the view of nihilism (ucchedadṛṣṭi) and it is for him that the Buddha says that “there is action and retribution of action”. Actually, the five aggregates [of the present existence (aihiṣkandha)] carry out actions (karman) but do not go into the future lifetime (aparajman): as a result of the five skandhas [of the present lifetime], there arises a new series (saṃtāna, prabandha) of five skandhas which itself undergoes the retribution of actions (karmavipāka). This is why the Buddha says that one suffers the retribution of actions.

Thus, the mother and the baby, although their bodies are different, constitute a causal series; also, when the mother takes a medicine, her sick baby is cured. In the same way, although the five skandhas of the present lifetime and the five skandhas of the future lifetime are different, between them there is a continuity having as cause and condition the sinful or meritorious actions [of the present lifetime], although as a result of the five aggregates of the present lifetime, one takes on the five aggregates of the next lifetime as retribution.

2) Moreover, there are people who, looking for the nature of things (dharmatā), are attached to one single thing: existence (astitā), non-existence (nāstitā), the eternal (śāśvata), impermanence (anitya), etc. Attached to this one thing, they have love (trṣṇā) for their own system and hatred (dveṣa) for others’ systems; then they commit evil actions. It is for these people that the Buddha preaches the ‘emptiness of all dharmas’ (sarvadharmasūnyatā), for no system is possible when all dharmas are empty. Any system that one loves produces fetters (saṃyojana) and, producing fetters, it is cause and condition for ignorance (avidyā). If it produces ignorance, how could it be true? That is the emptiness of dharmas Moreover, there are two kinds of beings: i) those who are attached to the world (lokāsakta); ii) those who seek the supramundane (lokottaraparyeṣin). Among those who seek the supramundane, there are the superior (agra), the middling (madhya) and the inferior (avara).

7. The Buddha adapts his teaching to the preferences and capacities of beings

The superior beings are the beings with sharp faculties (tīkṣhendriya), who are of great mind and who seek the bodhi of the Buddhas. The middling beings are beings of medium faculties (madhyendriya) who seek the bodhi of the pratyekabuddhas. The inferior beings are beings of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) who seek the bodhi of the śrāvakas.⁵⁵¹

To those who seek the bodhi of the Buddhas, the Buddha preaches the six perfections (pāramitā) and the emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā).

To those who seek the bodhi of the pratyekabuddhas, he preaches the twelve causes (dvādaśanidāna) [of dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda)] and the conduct of the hermit (ekacārin).⁵⁵²

To those who seek the bodhi of the śrāvakas, he preached the emptiness of beings (sattvasūnyatā) and the four noble truths (āryasatya).

[Prosopopeia of the deer, the rhinoceros and the elephant.] – 1) The śrāvakas fear saṃsāra and, hearing about the emptiness of beings, the four noble truths, impermanence, suffering, emptiness and non-self, they abstain from proliferation (prapañca) about dharmas. Example: in a park, the deer (mṛga), struck by a poisoned arrow (viṣeṣu), seeks only its own safety without thinking about others.

2) Completely disgusted as they are by old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa), the pratyekabuddhas consider somewhat the profound dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda) and save a few beings. Example: the rhinoceros (khaḍgaviṣāṇa) in a park which, although struck by a poisoned arrow, still busies itself with its children.

3) Completely disgusted as they are with old age, sickness and death, the bodhisattvas completely sink into the twelve-membered dependent origination, penetrate the emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā) and enter into the immense fundamental element (dharmadhātu). Example: The king of the white elephants in rut (śvetagandhahastin) in a hunting park: although struck by a poisoned arrow, he cares about the hunter (vyādha), has no fear (bhaya) and, at the head of his troupe, walks away with slow steps.

This is why not much is said in the Tripiṭaka about the emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā).

8. Canonical sūtras teaching the emptiness of dharmas⁵⁵³

However, sometimes there are brahmacārins with keen faculties (tīkṣhendriya) who, while seeking the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, are not disgusted with old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death

⁵⁵¹ The bodhi or prajñā of the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas and the bodhisattva-buddhas has been fully studied above, p. 1066-1079F.

⁵⁵² On the two kinds of pratyekabuddhas, living in groups (vargacārin) or living alone (ekacārin) like the rhinoceros (khaḍgaviṣāṇakalpa), see above, p. 1069F, n. 1.

⁵⁵³ See above, p. 1079-1081F and n.

(maraṇa) and are attached to all kinds of dharmatā. It is for them that [in a few sūtras of the Tripiṭaka] the emptiness of dharmas (dharmasūnyatā) is preached:

[1. Śreṇikaparivṛājakasūtra.]⁵⁵⁴ – Thus the brahmacārin Sien-ni (Śreṇika) [who had faith in the Buddha's words], denied that the five aggregates (skandha) were a reality (tattva) and denied that there was a reality outside of the five aggregates.

⁵⁵⁴ Śreṇikaparivṛājakasūtra of the Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 105, k. 5, p. 31c15-32c1, related in some places to several suttas of the Saṃyutta: Kutūhalaśutta, IV, p. 398-400; Yamaka, III, p. 111-112, Anurādha, IV, p. 383-384. Later, the Traité (k. 42, p. 368b20-c25) will give a free version of this sūtra in the following words: - Śreṇika, uncle [of the brāhmaṇa Saṃjaya], old, wise and possessing great fame, went forth from home and studied vastly all the texts. He cultivated his mind, sat in meditation and practiced the Path. One day, in search of wisdom, he went to the Kutūhalaśāla. There the brahmacārins said to him: Six teachers claim omniscience (sarvajña). Pūraṇa Kāśyapa has great renown (yaśasvin) and commands a large group (gaṇacārya). When one of his disciples dies, great or small, Pūraṇa does not reveal the place where he will take rebirth. The other five teachers, when one of their disciples dies, great or small, do reveal the place where he has taken rebirth. The Buddha also is a great teacher and possesses great renown. When one of his disciples dies, if this disciple is minor, the Buddha reveals the place where he has taken rebirth; but if this disciple is great, the Buddha does not reveal the place where he has been reborn.

Another time, Śreṇika went to the Buddha and, having exchanged pleasantries, sat down at one side and asked the Buddha: Will the Buddha allow me to ask a question? The Buddha gave him permission, and Śreṇika said to him: Once I went to the Kutūhalaśālā where I talked to people. And Śreṇika reported to the Buddha what he had then heard. Then he continued: At this moment I had the following thought: It is a rule for the Buddha to affirm that if his disciple is minor, he will take rebirth, but if he is great, he does not take rebirth. Is that correct?

The Buddha said to Śreṇika: My Dharma is very profound, subtle and difficult to understand. During the long night, you have shared other views (dṛṣṭi), other desires (rāga), other systems (dharma). By yourself you cannot see my Dharma. The brahmacārin Śreṇika said to the Buddha: As for myself, I sincerely honor the Buddha and I would like him to teach me the Holy Dharma out of his great pity, so that right here I would find the 'Eye' (caṅkṣus).

The Buddha said to the brahmacārin: What do you think (tat kiṃ manyase)? Do you consider the rūpa to be tathāgata (rupam̐ tathāgatha iti samanupaśyasi)? – No! [Note that Kumārajīva here renders tathāgata by jou k'iu instead of the usual jou lai.]

Do you consider vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra and viññāna to be tathāgata? – No!

Do you consider that the tathāgata is in the rūpa (rūpe tathāgata iti samanupaśyasi)? – No!

Do you consider that the tathāgata is in the vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra or viññāna? – No!

Do you consider that the tathāgata is elsewhere than in the rūpa (anyatra rūpā)? – No!

Do you consider that the tathāgata is elsewhere than in the vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra and viññāna? – No!

Do you consider the tathāgata as free of rūpa, vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra and viññāna? – No!

Since you do not consider the tathāgata in any way, should you feel any doubt and ask yourself exactly what is the Buddha's Dharma about? – No!

The Buddha said to Śreṇika: To my disciples who have not understood my Dharma well, I say that there is a rebirth (punarbhava) for they retain traces (avaśeṣa) of the original egotism (asmimāna); to my disciples who have understood the meaning well, I deny that there is a place where they take rebirth, for they have eliminated the original egotism without a trace.

[2. Dīrghanakhasūtra.]⁵⁵⁵ – To a powerful brahmacārin scholar, the Buddha answered: "In my system, I accept neither existence (astitā) nor non-existence (nāstitā). Why do you take part in this idle chatter (prapañca)? Existence and non-existence are mere idle gossip and birth-places (upapattisthāna) for the fetters (saṃyojana)."

[3. Mahāsūnyatāsūtra.]⁵⁵⁶ – In the Tsa-a-han (Saṃyuktāgama), the Ta-k'ong king (Mahāsūnyatāsūtra) speaks of two kinds of emptiness: the emptiness of beings (sattvasūnyatā) and the emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā).

[4. Sattvasūtra.]⁵⁵⁷ – In the Lo-t'o king (Kolopamasūtras), it is said: "The aggregate of form (rūpaskandha), O Radha, destroy it, break it reduce it to nothing."

At these words, Śreṇika found the Way and, having found the Way, he arose from his seat and said to the Buddha: I would like to obtain the going-forth (pravrajyā) to follow the Path. At once, his beard and his hair fell off by themselves and he became a śramaṇa. Shortly afterwards, he obtained the fruit of arhat, for he had received from the Buddha the Dharma eye which is undeceived.

This sūtra mster, Śreṇika, was [at first] one convinced by faith (adhimukta): he was convinced that the Buddha could make him find the Way, but that was only a beginner's faith. Later when he had heard the Buddha, he destroyed egotism (ahaṃkāra) and understood that, from the beginning (ādita eva) there never was an ātman. The ātman being non-existent, there are no dharmas that depend on it: they are like a magic show (māyā), a dream (svapna), deceivers, false and non-existent. From then on, in possession of the power of faith (śraddhābāla), Śreṇika entered into the true nature of dharmas (dharmatā) and no longer grasped the rūpa as tathāgata, etc., nor the viññāna as tathāgata.

- From the earliest Prajñāpāramitāsūtras, the wandering mendicant Śreṇika appears as the prototype of the Mahāyānist saint. By letting himself be guided by faith and by taking as criterion the nature of things as it appeared in the knowledge of the Omniscient One, he no longer kept any dharma. He no longer seized any dharma that might be taken or let go, including nirvāṇa. Cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 51: So 'tra sarvatra śraddhānusārī sarvajñajñāne dharmatām pramāṇīkrṣyaivam adhimukta iti tena na kaścid dharmāḥ parigrhīto nāpi sa kaścid dharmo ya upalabdho yaṃ sa grhṇīyād muñced vā sa nirvāṇam api na manyate. – For more details, see also Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, p. 134-135 (T 223, K. 3, p. 236a; T 220, vol. VII, k. 409, p. 48b); Aṣṭadaśasāhasrikā, T 220, vol. VII, k. 485, p. 460b; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 633 (T 220, vol. V, k. 37, p. 209b).

In the Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 1, p. 3a8, Śreṇika is transcribed as Śi-ni-kia.

⁵⁵⁵ Dīrghanakhasūtra according to the version established above (p. 1688F) by the Traité. Cf. the Dīrghanakhasutta of Majjhima, I, p. 497-501 (Tsa-a-han, T 99, no. 969, k. 34, p. 249a-250a: Pie-yi-tsa-a-han, T 100, no. 203, k. 11, p. 449a-b) partly having its Sanskrit correspondent in the Avadānaśataka, II, p. 187 foll.

The brahmacārin Dīrghanakha, uncle of Śāriputra, is often mentioned in the Traité, (cf. P. 45-51F, 184F, 633F, 639F, 1576F, 1688F).

⁵⁵⁶ Mahāsūnyatāsūtra of the Nidānasamṃyukta, p. 152-157, already cited above in full (p. 1079F, 2067F).

⁵⁵⁷ Sattvasūtra of the Saṃyutta, III, p. 190: Evam eva kho Rādha tumhe rūpaṃ vikiratha vidhamata viddhamsetha vikiṭṭhanikaṃ karothe taṇhakkhaṇāya paṭipajjatha.

[5. Kolopamasūtra.]⁵⁵⁸ – In the Fa-yu king (Kolopamasūtra), it is said: “Good [295c] dharmas should be abandoned and a fortiori bad dharmas (adharma).”

[6. Pārāyaṇasūtra and Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi.] – In the Po-lo-yen king (Pārāyaṇasūtra)⁵⁵⁹ and the Li-tching king (Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi), it is said:

The sage does not accept or retain any dharma.

Accepting and retaining dharmas is to produce idle chatter.

If there is nothing on which to lean,

There is no idle chatter.

The saints who have attained bodhi

Neither take nor reject dharmas.

Free of taking or rejecting,

They eliminate all wrong views.⁵⁶⁰

Thus, in many places in the Tripiṭaka, the emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā) is spoken of.

That is the ‘emptiness of all dharmas’ (sarvadharmasūnyatā).

⁵⁵⁸ Short extract from Majjhima, I, p. 135: Kullāpamaṃ vo bhikkhave ājānantehi dhammā pi vo pahātabbā pag eva adhammā. Text already cited above, p. 64F, 2094F and later k. 85, p. 657a2. Here dhamma and adhamma are taken in the sense of good and bad teachings.

⁵⁵⁹ Pārāyaṇasūtra is just a simple title here not accompanied by any citation. But above (p. 237F), the Traité has referred to the Upasīvaparipṛcchā of Pārāyaṇa and gave two stanzas corresponding to verses 1075 and 1076 of the Suttanipāta.

Transl. – “When the saint has disappeared, must it be said that he is no longer, must it be said that he is forever free of pain? Explain that to me, O Sage, for you know this. – About the one who has disappeared, there is no measure; there is nothing of him that allows speaking about it; all the things that constituted him are abolished; do you so abolish all ways of speech.”

- The ‘abolition of all ways of speech’ is very close to ‘elimination of all speech and all practice’ (sarvavādacaryoccheda), the last word of the Mādhyamika philosophy: see p. 45F.

⁵⁶⁰ The two stanzas of the Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi cited here correspond in some places to a stanza of the Duṭṭhatṭhakasutta of the Pāli Aṭṭhakavagga: Suttanipāta, verse 787.

Transl. – “The committed person undergoes various criticisms, but what to say about an emancipated person? In him nothing is accepted or rejected. He has shaken off all philosophical views here below.”

- For the Prajñās, this ideal of emancipation is fulfilled by the parivrājaka Śreṇika who took dharma as his sole criterion by basing himself on the non-existence of all dharmas (sarvadharmānupalabdhitām upādāya), the non-taking and the non-rejection of all the teachings (sarvadharmāṇam aparigrahānūtsargam upādāya): cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 134-125.

Anupalambhaśūnyatā

Thirteenth Section EMPTINESS 15: EMPTINESS CONSISTING OF NON-PERCEPTION⁵⁶¹

I. VARIOUS DEFINITIONS OF NON-PERCEPTION⁵⁶²

Emptiness consisting of non-perception (anupalambhaśūnyatā). –

1. Some say: In the aggregates (skandha), the elements (dhātu) and the bases of consciousness (āyatana), no self (ātman), no eternal dharma (nityadharma) is to be perceived (nopalabhyate): that is emptiness of non-perception.

2. Others say: If one looks for some dharma in causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpāda), it is never perceived, just as the fist (muṣṭi) is not perceived in the five fingers (aṅguli),

3. Others say: All dharmas and their causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) are absolutely non-perceived (atyantānupalabdha): that is what emptiness of non-perception is.

II. IF DHARMAS ARE NOT PERCEIVED, IT IS BECAUSE THEY DO NOT EXIST

Question. – Why do you assert this emptiness of non-perception? If dharmas are not perceived, is this due to weakness of knowledge (jñānadaurbalya) or because they do not truly exist?

Answer. – It is because dharmas really do not exist that they are not perceived,⁵⁶³ and not due to weakness of knowledge.

⁵⁶¹ For the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras (above, p. 2035F) it is anupalambhaśūnyatā when neither past, present nor duration of the present are perceived. In other words, dharmas are situated outside of time and by that very fact are shielded from becoming. Here the Traité is proposing a series of other explanations and seems to end up with the following: Anupalambhaśūnyatā is an emptiness consisting of non-perception, in the sense that all dharmas, coarse (sthūla) or subtle (sūkṣma), up to and including nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning, elude perception (upalabdhī), gain (lābha), not that the knowledge is too weak to grasp them, but because ‘dharmas do not really exist’. As the objector will note, no. 15 is almost mixed up with absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā, no. 9). In practice, the real yogin does not perceive bad (akuśala) or impure (sāsrava) dharmas such as the three poisons and, if he still perceives the good qualities, such as the dharmas of the Path, it is only from the point of view of the absolute truth (paramārthasatya) for which the true nature of dharmas is the absence of characteristic.

⁵⁶² The first explanation cites the sattvaśūnyatā (emptiness of ‘me’ and ‘mine’) professed by the two Vehicles; the two other explanations refer to the dharmasūnyatā (emptiness of things even in their causes and conditions) put forth in the Greater Vehicle.

III. USEFULNESS OF THE EMPTINESS OF NON-PERCEPTION

Question. – If that is so, [the emptiness of non-perception, anupalambhaśūnyatā, no. 15] is not different from absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā, no. 13). Why add one more emptiness of non-perception?

Answer. – Hearing that emptinesses no. 9 and 13, which were discussed above, are nothing at all (akimcid), people are frightened (bhaya), hesitate and wonder: “If they tell us now about an emptiness of non-perception, it is because the search for a reality (dravyaparyeṣaṇa) has not succeeded.” In order to cut short this hesitation (kāṅkṣā) and fear (bhaya), the Buddha speaks about the emptiness of non-perception. How?

The Buddha said: “From my first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) to the moment when I became Buddha, a Buddha of the ten powers, I have looked for a reality in dharmas, but without ever finding it.”⁵⁶⁴ That is indeed the emptiness of non-perception.

IV. THE NON-PERCEPTION OF DHARMAS

Question. – What is the non-perception of things (vastvanupalambha)?

⁵⁶³ This is why, despite the criticisms addressed to me [Lamotte] from the other side of the Atlantic, I have often translated and will continue to translate nopalababhyate (pou k'o tñ) by ‘does not exist’. Here also I have had the pleasure of coming up against I. B. Horner, who in her Middle Length Sayings, I, p. 177, n. 3, explains anupalabhyamāne as either ‘not to be known’ or ‘not existing’.

⁵⁶⁴ Cf. Aṣṭādaśasāh., II, ed. E. Conze, p. 33: Na me Subhute pūrvam bodhisattvacārikāṃ caratā kasyacid dharmasya svabhāva upalabdhō rūpam iti vā vedaneti vā... yāvad bodhir iti vā. Evaṃ khalu Subhute bodhisattvo mahāsattvaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ carati prathamacittotpādam upādāya yāvad anuttarāṃ samyaksaṃbodhim abhisambhotsyate 'nupalambhayogena sarvadharmāṇāṃ ca svabhāvakuśalena bhavitāsyam. – Long ago when I was practicing the career of Bodhisattva, O Subhuti, I never perceived the intrinsic nature of any dharma, whether it was form, feeling... or even bodhi. Therefore, O Subhuti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva practices the perfection of wisdom by a method of non-perceiving from his first production of the mind of bodhi until the moment when he awakens into supreme perfect enlightenment; he should practice competency in self nature of all dharmas.”

The last phrase of the original text lacks clarity. The Chinese versions of the Pañcaviṃśati (T223, k. 23, p. 392a24-29; T 220, vol. VII, k. 468, p. 369a-s) and the Aṣṭādaśa (T 220, vol. VII, k. 530, p. 720a) seem to be based on the following reading: Evaṃ khalu Subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caratā prathamacittotpādam upādāya yāvad anuttarāṃ samyaksaṃbodhiṃ sarvadharmāṇāṃ svabhāvakuśalena bhavitāsyam. – “It is thus, O Subhūti, that the bodhisattva who practices the perfection of wisdom should practice expertise in the self nature of all dharmas, and this from his first production of the mind of bodhi until supreme complete enlightenment.”

Answer. – All dharmas up to and including nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiṣeṣanirvāṇa) being non-perceived, there is the emptiness consisting of non-perception (anupalambhaśūnyatā).

Moreover, the yogin who acquires this emptiness of non-perception does not perceive (nopalabhate)⁵⁶⁵ the three poisons (viṣa), the four torrents (ogha) or the four attachments (yoga),⁵⁶⁶ the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa),⁵⁶⁷ the six thirsts (tṛṣṇā),⁵⁶⁸ the seven perverse latent tendencies (anuśaya),⁵⁶⁹ the eight perditions (mithyāṭva),⁵⁷⁰ the nine fetters (saṃyojana),⁵⁷¹ the ten bad paths of action (akuśalakarmapatha).⁵⁷² All these bad vile bonds (bandhana) being non-perceived, the emptiness of non-perception is spoken of.

Question. – If that is so, what benefits are there in cultivating this emptiness of non-perception?

Answer. – [The yogin] perceives (upalabhate) morality (śīla), concentration (saṃādhi) and wisdom (prajñā),⁵⁷³ he perceives the four fruits of the religious life (śrāmaṇyaphala),⁵⁷⁴ the five spiritual faculties (indriya),⁵⁷⁵ the five elements constituting the saint (āśaikṣaskandha),⁵⁷⁶ the six discriminations of equanimity (upekṣopavicāra),⁵⁷⁷ the seven factors of enlightenment (saṃbodhyaṅga),⁵⁷⁸ the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvasamāpatti),⁵⁷⁹ the ten qualities of the saint (āśaikṣadharmā),⁵⁸⁰ and other ‘qualities of the śrāvaka’ of this type. If, in addition, he perceives the prajñāpāramitā, he fulfills completely ⁵⁶⁵ Upalabhate taken here in the sense of perceiving and acquiring.

⁵⁶⁶ The four ogha or yoga: kāma bhava, drṣṭi, avidyā: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 230. 176; Kośa, V, p. 75.

⁵⁶⁷ The five nīvaraṇa: kāmacchanda, vyāpāda, styānamiddha, auddhatyakaukrtya, vicikitsā: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 278; Kośa, V, p. 98.

⁵⁶⁸ Six tṛṣṇā related respectively to rūpa, śabda, gandha, rasa, spraṣṭavya, dharmā; cf. Dīgha, II, p. 58.

⁵⁶⁹ Seven anuśaya: kāmarāga, pratigha, bhavarāga, māna, avidyā, drṣṭi, vicikitsā; cf. Dīgha, III, p. 254, 282; Kośa, V, p. 3.

⁵⁷⁰ Eight mithyāṭva: mithyādrṣṭi, mithyāsaṃkalpa, mithyāvāc, mithyākarmānta, mithyājīva, mithyāvyaṃyama, mithyāsmṛti, mithyāsamādhi; cf. Dīgha, II, p. 353; III, p. 254; Anguttara, II, p. 221; I; IV, p. 237.

⁵⁷¹ Nine saṃyojana: anunaya, pratigha, māna avidyā, drṣṭi, parāmarśa, vicikitsā, īrṣyā, mātsarya; cf. Kośa, V, p. 81-82.

⁵⁷² Ten akuśalakarmapatha, prañātipāta, etc.; cf. Dīgha, III, p. 269; Kośa, IV, p. 137.

⁵⁷³ Śīla, samādhi and prajñā are the three elements constituting the Noble Path; cf. Dīgha, II, p. 81, 84; Itivuttaka, p. 51.

⁵⁷⁴ Srotāṇipatiphala, etc.

⁵⁷⁵ See p. 1125-1127F.

⁵⁷⁶ The five anāsravaskandha, morality, etc.; cf. p. 1233F, n.1; 1349-1359F.

⁵⁷⁷ The six upekṣopavicāra, discriminations of equanimity relative to rūpa, śabda, gandha, rasa, spraṣṭavya and dharmā; cf. Dīgha, p. 245; Majjhima, III, p. 239-240; Kośa, III, p. 108.

⁵⁷⁸ See p. 1128-1129F.

⁵⁷⁹ See p. 1308F.

⁵⁸⁰ The ten āśaikṣāṅga, namely, the eight factors of the Path described as ‘āśaikṣa’ plus the perfect deliverance belonging to the arhats (āśaikṣi samyagvimukti) and the knowledge of acquisition of this deliverance (āśaikṣa samyagjñāna); cf. the ten asekhiyā dhammā in Anguttara, V, p. 222; and Kośa, VI, p. 295.

(paripūrayati) the six perfections (pāramitā) and the qualities (guṇa) of the ten bhūmis [of the bodhisattva]. [296a]

Question. – But above you said that “all the dharmas up to and including nirvāṇa are not perceived”; why do you now say that the yogin “perceives morality, concentration, wisdom and up to the ten qualities of the saint?”⁵⁸¹

Answer. – Although these dharmas are ‘perceived’ (upalabdha), they all promote the emptiness of non-perception and to this extent, they are also said to be ‘non-perceived’ (anupalabdha). Moreover, as [the yogin] does not take them up (nādadāti) and is not attached (nābhiniśīate) to them, they are not perceived; as unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛta), they are not perceived; as noble truths (āryasatya), they are not perceived; as absolute truth (paramārthasatya), they are not perceived.

Although they have attained these qualities (guṇa), the saints who enter into nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiśaṇnirvāṇa) do not regard them as acquired (labdha); it is ordinary people (prthagjana) who regard them as great acquisitions (mahālābha). Thus the lion (siṃha), even when he has feats to his credit, does not consider them as marvelous (āścarya); it is the other beings who, on seeing them, consider them to be extraordinary (adbhuta).

It is in this sense that [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] asserts an ‘emptiness of non-perception’ [or of non-existence] here.

Abhāvadiśūnyatā

Fourteenth Section EMPTINESSES 16 TO 18: EMPTINESS OF NON-EXISTENCE, OF EXISTENCE ITSELF, OF BOTH NON-EXISTENCE AND EXISTENCE ITSELF⁵⁸²

I. FIRST EXPLANATION

⁵⁸¹ For these ‘ten qualities of the saint’ (p. 296a2), one variant substitutes the ‘qualities of the bhūmis’.

⁵⁸² These three emptinesses summarize, in a condensed form, the proof of universal emptiness. The Prajñāpāramitāsūtra which mentions them three times defines only the third, the abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā (see above, p. 1035F, §16). In the following explanations, the Traité establishes a parallel between these last three emptinesses and the preceding fifteen. Actually, as the author has pointed out at the start of this chapter, the emptinesses all concern one and the same absence of self nature and of characteristics and are unequivocal and interchangeable.

Here Kumārajīva resorts to some rather unusual expressions to render emptinesses 16 to 18: he translates abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā by wou fa k’ong, svabhāvaśūnyatā by yeou fa k’ong and abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā by wou fa yeou fa k’ong.

1. Emptiness of non-existence (abhāvaśūnyatā). – Some say that non-existence (abhāva) is the destruction (nirodha) of dharmas, but as this destruction does not exist, [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] speaks here of ‘emptiness of non-existence’.

2. Emptiness of existence itself (svabhāvaśūnyatā). – Dharmas arising from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagryutpanna), they have no self existence (svabhāva). As existence itself does not exist, [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] speaks here of ‘emptiness of existence itself’.

3. Emptiness of non-existence and of existence itself (abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā). – Since it is impossible to grasp the mark of non-existence (abhāvanimitta) and the mark of existence itself (svabhāvanimitta), there is ‘emptiness of non-existence and existence itself’. Moreover, the consideration of non-existence and existence itself as empty has the name ‘emptiness of non-existence and existence itself’. Finally, the yogin who considers (samanuṣāsyati) the arising (utpāda) and cessation (nirodha) of dharmas looks at it alternately from the viewpoint of existence itself (svabhāvamukha) and the viewpoint of non-existence (abhāvamukha). When he considers the arising (utpāda), he feels joy (saumanasya) and when he considers the cessation, he feels sad (daurmanasya). But if this yogin discovers the emptiness of arising (utpādaśūnyatā), he destroys the mind of joy (saumanasyacitta), and if he discovers the emptiness of cessation (nirodhaśūnyatā), he destroys the mind of sadness (daurmanasyacitta). Why? [Because he sees that, on the one hand], arising is not a gain (lābha) and on the other hand, cessation (nirodha) is not a loss (alābha). As he thus eliminates these mundane (laukika) thoughts of joy and sadness, there is ‘emptiness of non-existence and of existence itself’.

Of the eighteen emptinesses, the first three, [namely, adhyātmaśūnyatā, bahirdhāśūnyatā and adhyātmabahirdhāśūnyatā] destroy all the dharmas; the last three also destroy all the dharmas. Actually,

1. the emptiness of existence itself (svabhāvaśūnyatā, no. 17) destroys the time of production (utpāda) and the time of duration (sthiti) of all the dharmas.

2. the emptiness of non-existence (abhāvaśūnyatā, no. 16) destroys the time of disappearance (vyaya) of all the dharmas.

3. the emptiness of non-existence and of existence itself (abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā, no. 18) destroys production (utpāda) and disappearance (vyaya) at the same time and together.

II. SECOND EXPLANATION

Some say:

1-2. The emptiness of past (atīta) and future (anāgata) dharmas is called emptiness of non-existence (abhāvaśūnyatā, no. 16); the emptiness of present dharmas is called emptiness of existence itself (svabhāvaśūnyatā, no. 17). Why?

The disappearance (vyaya) and change (anyathātva) of past (atīta) dharmas leads to non-existence (abhāva); future (anāgata) dharmas, the causes and conditions for which have not come together, are without arising, without existence, without exit and without production; this is why they are ‘non-existence’ (abhāva). – As for present (pratyutpanna) dharmas and unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛta), by the very fact that they presently exist, they are called ‘existence itself’ (svabhāva).

3. The two, [namely, non-existence (abhāva) and existence itself (svabhāva)], together being empty, they are called ‘emptiness of non-existence and of existence itself’ (abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā, no. 18).

III. THIRD EXPLANATION

Finally, others say:

1. Unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛta), being without production (utpāda), without duration (sthiti) and without disappearance (vyaya), are called ‘non-existence’ (abhāva).

2. Conditioned dharmas, having production, duration and disappearance, are called ‘existence itself’ (svabhāva).

[196b] 3. These [two categories of dharmas] being likewise empty, there is ‘emptiness of non-existence and of existence itself’.

Therefore the bodhisattva who wishes to become established [in the eighteen emptinesses], from the emptiness of inner dharmas (adhyātmaśūnyatā) up to the emptiness of non-existence and of existence itself (abhāvasvabhāvaśūnyatā), should practice the Prajñāpāramitā.

THE TREATISE ON THE GREAT VIRTUE OF WISDOM OF NĀGĀRJUNA

(MAHĀPRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀŚĀSTRA)

ÉTIENNE LAMOTTE

VOLUME V

CHAPTERS XLIX – LII

and CHAPTER XX (2nd series)

Composed by the Bodhisattva Nāgārjuna and translated by the Tripiṭakadharmācārya Kumarārajīva

Translated from the French
by Gelongma Karma Migme Chodron
Gampo Abbey

INTRODUCTION.....	1772
SUPPLEMENT TO THE BIBLIOGRAPHY	1777
CHAPTER XLIX: THE FOUR CONDITIONS	1782
First Section UNDERSTANDING THE CONDITIONS	1782
PRELIMINARY NOTE	1782
1. The system in the canonical sūtras	1783
2. The system in the Abhidharma of the Sarvāstivādins	1786
3. The system in the Madhyamaka	1787
4. The system in the Great Prajñāpāramitāsūtras	1787
5. The system according to the Traité	1788
I. THE FOUR CONDITIONS (pratyaya) AND THE SIX CAUSES (hetu)	1789
II. OBJECTIONS AGAINST THE EFFICACY OF THE CONDITIONS	1791
III. THE OPINION OF THE TRAITÉ IN REGARD TO CAUSALITY	1792
1. Causality according to the Abhidharma	1793
2. Causality according to the Perfection of Wisdom	1797
Second Section UNDERSTANDING DHARMATĀ AND ITS SYNONYMS	1799
PRELIMINARY NOTE	1799
1. The Hīnayānist dharmatā	1800
2. The Mahāyānist dharmatā	1802
I. TATHATĀ, DHARMADHĀTU AND BHŪTAKOṬI	1804
II. SYNONYMITY OF THE THREE WORDS	1806
III. TATHATĀ, DHARMADHĀTU AND BHŪTAKOṬI IN THE CANONICAL SŪTRAS	1808
IV. SUPPLEMENTARY EXPLANATIONS	1812
Third Section MASTERING THE FOUR GREAT ELEMENTS	1816
I. MASTERING THE EARTH ELEMENT	1817
II. MASTERING THE WATER ELEMENT	1821
III. MASTERING THE FIRE ELEMENT	1822
IV. MASTERING THE WIND ELEMENT	1823
Fourth Section FILLING ALL OF SPACE	1823
Fifth Section CASTING THE MOUNT SUMERUS FAR AWAY	1824
Sixth Section HONORING ALL THE BUDDHAS BY MEANS OF A SINGLE OFFERING	1826
Seventh Section ESTABLISHING ALL BEINGS IN THE FRUITS OF THE PATH	1827
Eight Section PREDICTING THE FRUITS OF RIPENING OF VARIOUS KINDS OF GIFTS	1832
I. WHERE DOES THE EXCELLENCE OF THE GIFT COME FROM?	1833
II. DIVERSITY OF THE FRUITS OF GENEROSITY	1835
1. The seven rebirths in kāmadhātu	1836
2. Eight rebirths in rūpadhātu and ārūpyadhātu	1837
3. Four rebirths in the noble Path	1837
4. Attainment of the bodhis	1838
Ninth Section FULFILLING THE PERFECTIONS SKILLFULLY	1838
Tenth Section ATTAINING THE QUALITIES OF ALL THE BUDDHAS	1840
CHAPTER L: ARRIVING AT THE OTHER SHORE	1843
First Section ARRIVING AT THE OTHER SHORE	1843
Second Section UNDERSTANDING TATHATĀ, DHARMATĀ AND ANUTPĀDAKOṬI	1843
Third Section ACQUIRING PRECEDENCE, ETC.	1845
I. ACQUIRING PRECEDENCE OVER THE ŚRĀVAKAS AND PRATYĒKABUDDHAS	1845
II. BEING THE ASSISTANT OF THE BUDDHA	1847
III. ACQUIRING A GREAT ENTOURAGE	1849
IV. ACQUIRING A BODHISATTVA ENTOURAGE	1850
V. PURIFYING GREAT OFFERINGS	1851
Fourth Section AVOIDING EVIL MINDS	1852
I. MIND OF AVARICE	1852
II. THOUGHT OF IMMORALITY	1853
III. MIND OF MALICE	1853

IV. MIND OF LAZINESS	1854
V. DISTRACTED MIND	1854
VI. MIND OF FALSE WISDOM	1854
Fifth Section ESTABLISHING BEINGS IN THE PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTUS	1855
PRELIMINARY NOTE	1855
I. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF GENEROSITY	1857
1. Definition of generosity	1857
2. Pure and impure generosity	1858
3. Increase of merit	1860
4. Models of generosity	1860
a. Bodhisattva jātakas	1860
II. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF MORALITY	1863
III. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF MEDITATION	1864
IV. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF ENCOURAGEMENT	1866
V. MERITORIOUS ACTIONS CONSISTING OF MATERIAL GIFTS AND OF TEACHING	1866
Sixth Section OBTAINING THE FIVE ‘EYES’	1869
Seventh Section SEEING, HEARING AND UNDERSTANDING ALL THE BUDDHAS OF THE PRESENT	1872
PRELIMINARY NOTE	1872
I. SEEING AND HEARING ALL THE BUDDHAS	1881
II. PENETRATING THE MIND OF THE BUDDHAS	1883
Eight Section RETAINING THE TEACHINGS OF THE BUDDHAS OF THE PRESENT	1884
CHAPTER LI: SEEING ALL THE BUDDHA FIELDS.....	1886
First Section SEEING THE FIELDS OF THE BUDDHAS OF THE THREE TIMES	1886
Second Section HEARING THE TWELVE-MEMBERED SPEECH OF THE BUDDHA	1888
PRELIMINARY NOTE	1888
1. The Navāṅga	1889
2. The Dvāsaṅga	1890
3. Explanations of the Angas	1891
I. SŪTRA	1893
II. GEYA	1894
III. VYĀKARAṆA	1894
IV. GĀTHĀ	1896
V. UDĀNA	1896
VI. NIDĀNA	1898
VII. AVADĀNA	1899
VIII. ITYUKTAKA	1899
IX. JĀTAKA	1902
X. VAIPULYA	1906
XI. ADBHUTADHARMA	1906
XII. UPADĒṢA	1907
FINAL COMMENTS	1908
Third Section HEARING THE TEACHINGS OF THE BUDDHAS OF THE THREE TIMES	1910
Fourth Section ASSURING ONE’S OWN GOOD AND THAT OF OTHERS	1911
Fifth Section ILLUMINATING THE DARKNESS OF THE INTERMEDIARY WORLDS	1911
Sixth Section MAKING KNOWN THE NAMES OF THE THREE JEWELS	1913
Seventh Section HEALING THE SICK AND THE UNFORTUNATE	1914
Eight Section ASSURING A REBIRTH AMONG HUMANS	1915
Ninth Section ESTABLISHING BEINGS IN THE FIVE PURE ELEMENTS	1918
Tenth Section IMITATING THE BEARING OF THE BUDDHA	1918
Eleventh Section LOOKING IN THE MANNER OF THE ELEPHANT, ETC.	1920
I. GAZE LIKE THAT OF THE ELEPHANT <2318>	1921
II. LEVITATION	1922
III. THE PROCESSION TO BODHI	1922
Twelfth Section ATTAINING SAMBODHI ON A BED OF CELESTIAL ROBES	1923
Thirteenth Section CHANGING THE SURROUNDING GROUND INTO DIAMOND	1925

INTRODUCTION

The Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa (in short, Upadeśa) is an Indian commentary on the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikāprajñāpāramitā-sūtra (in short, PPS). The original text has not come down to us, but it is known by a partially abridged Chinese version, the Ta tche tou louen (T 1509), executed between 402 and 406 AD at Tch'ang-ngan by the Serindian master Kumārajīva. This version comprises two series of chapters:

1. A first series of fifty-two chapters (T 1509, p. 57c-314b), gathered into an initial chapter bearing the numeral I.
2. A second series of eighty-nine chapters (T 1509, p. 314b-756c), numbered from II to XC.

The first series appears to be an integral version of the Indian original, the second series as an abridged version.

My [Lamotte] work, the Traité de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse, which presently consists of five volumes, published at Louvain between 1944 and 1980, is a French translation of the fifty-two chapters of the first series and chapter XX of the second series.

In the course of chapters XLIX to LII of the present volume, volume V, the bodhisattva of the PPS continues to adorn his future buddha-field by formulating a series of vows, the success of which absolutely requires the practice of the Prajñāpāramitā. To the twenty-four vows already formulated in chapters XLII to XLVII of volume IV, thirty-eight further vows are about to be added here.

The great aspiration (adhyāśaya) of the bodhisattva knows no limits and, if all his wishes were realized, some least expected consequences would result. Thus, if a single sermon would suffice to establish all beings in Buddhahood, what would still be the need for innumerable Tathāgatas who follow one another in the world in order to put an end to universal suffering? To want to establish all beings in Buddhahood all at once would result in the interruption of the lineage of the Buddhas (buddhavaṃśasamuccheda), something no-one would want.

But such considerations are valid only in relative truth. From the point of view of absolute truth, the vows of the bodhisattva are fully justified and completely realizable. Even more so, they have already been realized. In the view of the Prajñā, beings are empty of 'me' and of 'mine', <vi>, dharmas are without intrinsic nature and specific characteristic. Their true nature is absence of characteristic. The Prajñāpāramitā alone penetrates it and penetrates it by not cognizing it, for it is free of any opinion. Since there is nothing to hope for, the wise man wishes for nothing and, in this sense, all his wishes are realized before being formulated. Furthermore, the wise man, having no substantial reality, is nothing but a name.

To these wishes the Upadeśa dedicates commentaries that have the precision and technique of an Abhidharma treatise; it multiplies references to the sūtras of the Lesser Vehicle as well as to those of the

Fourteenth Section CARRYING OUT ABHISAMBODHI, PREACHING AND CONVERSIONS ALL IN THE SAME DAY	1928
I. BECOMING BUDDHA AND PREACHING THE DHARMA THE SAME DAY	1929
II. SIMULTANEOUSLY PREACHING AND CONVERTING.....	1930
Fifteenth Section BRINGING INNUMERABLE BEINGS TO ARHATHOOD BY A SINGLE SERMON	1932
Sixteenth Section LEADING INNUMERABLE BODHISATTVAS TO THE STATE OF AVAIVARTIKA BY MEANS OF A SINGLE SERMON.....	1936
Seventeenth Section OBTAINING THE IMMENSE LONGEVITY AND IMMENSE RADIANCE OF THE BUDDHAS.....	1937
I. APPARENT LONGEVITY OF THE BUDDHAS	1937
II. REAL LONGEVITY OF THE BUDDHAS	1938
CHAPTER LII: ELIMINATION OF THE TRIPLE POISON	1943
First Section ELIMINATING THE THREE POISONS	1943
I. ELIMINATING THE THREE POISONS FROM THE KṢETRA	1943
II. ENDOWING THE KṢETRA WITH A SPECIAL WISDOM	1945
Second Section PREVENTING THE DISAPPEARANCE OF THE HOLY DHARMA	1946
Third Section BRINGING INNUMERABLE BEINGS TO ABHISAMBODHI BY HEARING THE NAME OF THE BUDDHAS	1948
PRELIMINARY NOTE	1948
I. THE TWO KINDS OF BUDDHA.....	1951
II. HEARING THE NAME OF THE BUDDHAS	1954
1. As a rule, Śākyamuni saves by his preaching.....	1954
2. The Buddhas do not save solely by the hearing of their name	1956
3. The hearing of the name alone is insufficient to produce abhisambodhi	1957
5. Causes other than the hearing of the name occurring in the obtaining of abhisambodhi	1960
6. How is the name of the Buddhas spread?.....	1961
Conclusion.....	1962
CHAPTER XX (2 nd series): SETTING OUT ON THE MAHĀYĀNA.....	1968
PRELIMINARY NOTE	1968
I. THE FOUR BODHISATTVA STAGES OR PRACTICES	1968
II. THE TEN BODHISATTVA GROUNDS OR ABODES	1970
III. THE TEN GROUNDS SHARED BY ADEPTS OF THE THREE VEHICLES	1973
Bhūmi I	1980
Bhūmi II	1989
Bhūmi III.....	1997
Bhūmi IV.....	2000
Bhūmi V.....	2003
Bhūmi VI.....	2007
Bhūmi VII	2009
Bhūmi VIII	2018
Bhūmi IX.....	2022
Bhūmi X.....	2028

Greater Vehicle. In its eyes, both the Tripiṭaka and the Mahāyānasūtras are the Words of the Buddha, but it is in the PPS that the Buddha spoke most clearly of the true nature of dharmas (p. 2189F).

The problem of causality is tackled in chapter XLIX where it is said that the bodhisattva wishes to understand the four conditions (p. 2170F). There the Upadeśa sees an allusion to a system of causality where four conditions (pratyaya) and six causes (hetu) play a part in the production and cessation of conditioned dharmas. The canonical sūtras had already placed the bases for them; the Abhidharmas and the Sarvāstivādin school had formulated them in their definitive form. Nāgārjuna was familiar with them and struggled with them energetically in the first chapter of his Mūlamadhyamakakārikas where he showed the absurdity of the four conditions. The author of the Upadeśa adopts a more balanced position: he refrains from any futile proliferation about causes and conditions, but determines that they produce nothing. Thus they are neither to be taken up nor rejected.

The Upadeśa will return twice (p. 2186F, 2232F) to the problem of dharmaṭā and its synonyms. For the śrāvakas, it was pratyasamutpāda, the conditioned production and cessation of the five skandhas. For the Mādhyamikas, it is exactly the opposite, the true nature of things excluding all production and all cessation. We will notice (p. 2198-99F) the distinction established between the lower, middling and higher tathatā, as the prthagjana, the śrāvaka and the bodhisattva, respectively, understood it.

A problem which was scarcely of any interest to the early masters but which subsequently gained importance is that of the vision of the Buddhas, treated in chapter L. Śākyamuni's contemporaries saw the Buddha with their fleshly eye (māmsacakṣus), the range of which is very limited. More ambitious, the bodhisattvas of the PPS wanted to see, with the divine eye (divyacakṣus), the innumerable Buddhas reigning in the ten directions (p. 2272F). The divyacakṣus obtained by practice of the superknowledges <vii> consists of a subtle matter derived from the ten great elements; it enjoys a perfect luminosity to the four directions of the horizon.

Other Mahāyānasūtras, contemporary with the PPS but seeming not to have been influenced by them, propose another process of seeing: the pratyutpannasamādhi, a technique of mental concentration by means of which an ascetic, even without using the divyacakṣus, is able to contemplate, as in a dream, the Buddhas of the present, mainly Amitābha, and to converse with them.

A controversy on the efficacy of these two processes arose in India, probably in Kaśmīr, at the time of the Upadeśa. Brought to expressing a position, its author does not hide his preferences for the divyacakṣus (p. 2273-2274F), the more traditional process fitting into the frame of the Abhijñānas. But the Buddhas are but names (nāmanātra) and it is by eliminating wrong views that one is able to see them in their "body of the doctrine" (p. 2265F).

The controversy which, in India, set the partisans of the divyacakṣus in opposition to those of the pratyutpannasamādhi was triggered off again in China in the first quarter of the 5th century. It provoked an interesting exchange of correspondence between Houei-yuan, the master of Mount Lou, and Kumārajīva, the translator of the Upadeśa (p. 2270-72F).

In the canonical sources, there is frequent mention of the kinds of literary composition borrowed by the Words of the Buddha – these are nine or twelve in number, sūtras, etc.; the early sources enumerate them without defining them. In chapter LI, the bodhisattvas of the PPS wish to hear and retain the twelve-membered Word of the Buddha (p. 2286F). Along with the Mahāvibhāṣa of the arhats of Kaśmīr, the Upadeśa is among the first exegetical treatises that attempt to give an explanation of them. It tries to introduce into it the entire group of Buddhist scriptures existing at its time (p. 2389F) in order to establish its canonicity. But Buddhist literature had expanded so much that it lent itself poorly to this kind of distribution. The explanations furnished in regard to certain aṅgas, such as the Udāna and especially the Itivṛttaka, must have perplexed the Chinese readers, and we do not pride ourselves in having dissipated all the obscurities here.

In early times, hearing the name of the Buddhas (buddhanāmadheyaśravaṇa) was not included among the auxiliary dharmas of bodhi (bodhipākṣikadharmas). Some disciples of Śākyamuni, such as the notable Sudatta or the brāhmaṇa Śaila, were overcome by joy on hearing the word 'Buddha' pronounced, but nevertheless did not progress <viii> along the path of salvation. In the centuries that followed, the Name unceasingly gained in importance. In chapter LII of the PPS, the bodhisattva formulates the following vow: "When I have attained supreme complete enlightenment, may innumerable beings, as soon as they hear my name, be established in abhisambodhi" (p. 2352F). At the same time, other Mahāyānasūtras, such as the Sukhāvatīvūha and the Lotus, say that merely hearing the name of buddha Amitābhā or bodhisattva Avalakiteśvara assured, ipso facto, rebirth in Sukhāvatī, or puts an end to suffering. In the Chinese and Japanese extensions of Amidism, the invocation to Amitābhā (the Nan wou pou k'o sseu yi kouang jou lai, Namo-amida-butsu) constitutes the easiest and most efficacious means of salvation for the devotee.

The author of the Upadeśa is not of this opinion. According to him, the hearing of the name is not the single means of realizing salvation, is not infallible, and does not immediately produce its effects like a cintamāni or a magical spell (p. 2358-63F). Without condemning the mystics, it rather sides with the rationalists, that category of disciples "who see the profound reality (arthapada) by penetrating it by means of prajñā, by means of the intellect" (Anguttara, III, p. 355).

Rationalism can go hand in hand with traditionalism. Concerned about dealing carefully with the old beliefs, the author on occasion rises up against the excessiveness of the Prajñā or rather against the erroneous interpretations that might be proposed of it. Thus the Mahāyānists believe in the transfer of merit (punya-pariṇāmanā): according to them, it would be possible to apply the merits that one has gained oneself to others (p. 1879-80F), and the bodhisattva of the PPS wishes, "by means of his own power", to assure good rebirths to beings (p. 2312F). But at first sight, the notion of transfer of merit seems to contradict the law of karma universally accepted by the Indians. How can the transfer of merit be accepted when, according to the earliest texts, actions are declared to be strictly personal and incommunicable? Good and bad actions ripen for their doer, and no one else can bear their consequences. That being so, how could beings benefit from an action carried out by the bodhisattva? The Upadeśa tries to reconcile the two opposing doctrines with the following reasoning: "By the power of his knowledge, wondrous deeds and sermons, the bodhisattva makes beings themselves carry out the good actions that will win them good rebirths” (p. 2312F). Thus, far from being useless, the intervention of the bodhisattva is eminently beneficial. <ix>

The Upadeśa ends the last chapter (LII) of the first series with a vibrant eulogy of the Prajñāpāramitā. The PPS’s, long before, had proclaimed her to be Mother of the Buddhas because she reveals the true nature of the loka (lokadharmatāsaṃdarśayaitrī). By loka we should understand the five skandhas or psycho-physical aggregates of existence. Why are they called loka? Because of the etymology. But two distinct etymologies have been proposed. The canonical sūtras (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 52) attaching loka to the root luji ‘to break’ say that the skandhas are loka insofar as they are broken or disaggregated (lujyante vā pralujyante vā) and their true nature (dharmatā) is their dependent production and cessation (pratītyasamutpāda). The PPS’s propose another etymology involving a diametrically opposite interpretation. Loka, according to them, is derived from the root loki ‘to shine’, and the skandhas are loka insofar as they do not break and do not disaggregate (na lujyante na pralujyante); consequently, their true nature is non-production (anutpāda) and non-cessation (anirodha), quite the contrary of pratītyasamutpāda. One would hardly know how better to mark the doctrinal rift separating the two Vehicles: the śrāvakas recognized the noble truths of the origin and cessation of suffering (samudaya- and nirodha-satya), whereas the bodhisattvas are established in the conviction that things do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti). But for both of them, “peace is nirvāṇa” (śāntam nirvāṇam).

To the metaphor of Mother of the Buddhas, frequent in the PPS’s, the Upadeśa adds that of Father of the Buddhas, the latter being inspired by other Mahāyānasūtras. The Father of the Buddhas would be the pratyutpannasamādhi, the visualization of the Buddhas of the present, which has already been mentioned above. In the fathering of infants, the mother has a more important rôle than the father; similarly, in regard to the formation of the Buddhas, the pratyutpannasamādhi is overshadowed by prajñā: “This samādhi can only concentrate the distracted mind in such a way that prajñā is produced, but it cannot see the true nature (dharmatā) of things. The Prajñāpāramitā alone is able to see all the dharmas completely and to discern their true nature: there is nothing it does not penetrate, nothing it does not realize; its qualities are so great that it is called Mother” (p. 2369F).

**** **

Chapter XX of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā (ed. N. Dutt, p. 214, l. 6 to 225, l. 19; T 223, k. 6, p. 256c-259c) entitled Mahāyānasamprasthāna ‘Setting out for the Mahāyāna’ deals with the ten bhūmis, <x> stages in the bodhisattva career. It consists of two parts: the first is a simple list enumerating the things the bodhisattva must do and avoid in order to pass from bhūmi to bhūmi; the second part is a gloss repeating each of the things and adding brief explanations. In the French translation that follows, these two parts are put together into a single one and the explanations are incorporated directly into the list, in order to give a more synthetic view of the materials and avoid tedious repetitions.

Although Kumārajīva translated it only as a summary, the commentary of the Upadeśa on this chapter is not lacking in interest. Its author interprets the doctrines of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra in the light of the Avataṃsaka and, more particularly, of the Daśabhūmikasūtra. The bodhisattva should fulfill his career in two ways, either by traveling the ten “bhūmis proper” reserved for him, Pramuditā, etc., or by borrowing the ten “shared bhūmis”, Śuklavidarśana, etc., shared by the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, the bodhisattvas and the Buddhas.

Finally, the Upadeśa was one of the first treatises to establish a parallel between the bhūmis of the bodhisattva and the conquest of the four fruits of religious life (śrāmaṇyaphala), srotaāpattiṭṭhala, etc., mentioned by the canonical sources.

*

The five volumes of the Traité represent only a third of the Upadeśa which Kumārajīva translated completely into Chinese. With the chapter on the bhūmis, they give a sufficiently complete idea of Buddhist gnosis at the beginning of the 4th century of our era.

It is my [Lamotte] pleasure to express publicly my deep appreciation to colleagues and friends who have helped me in the present work and without whose aid the latter could not have been brought to term. The interest which Japan has always held for the Daichidoron (Upadeśa) has been extended to the French translation of the Traité de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse: the encouragements to me, which have been lavish, from the East as well as from the West, sustained me in my work which was greatly facilitated by the progress in Buddhist studies in the course of the recent years. Volumes IV and V have benefited from working tools (editions of texts, dictionaries, concordances, indexes and encyclopedias) made specially for the use of researchers. But all the secrets of the Upadeśa, however, have not been elucidated <xi>, far from it; and the enrichment of our documentations only sets new problems.

The final editing of volume V has been sensibly eased thanks to the devotion and ability of many of my friends. Prof. Dr. Heinz Bechert (Göttingen) gave it attentive reading; Robert Shih (Louvain-la-Neuve), Hubert Durt (Kyoto) and Marcel Van Velthem (Brussels) assisted me efficiently in the correction of the proofs. I give them my deepest thanks.

My appreciation is also expressed to the Fondation Universitaire de Belgique and to the Institut Orientaliste de Louvain who generously helped with the expense of printing.

Brussels, December 8, 1979.

SUPPLEMENT TO THE BIBLIOGRAPHY

ed. = edition; rec. = reconstruction into Sanskrit; tr. = translation.

Abhidharmavatara = Le Traite de la Descente dans la Loi profonde by the Arhat Skandhila, Translated and annotated by M. VAN VELTHEM (Publications de l'Institut Orientaliste de Louvain No. 16). Louvain-la-Neuve, 1977.

Abhidharmahrdaya = Le Coeur de la Loi Supreme by Dharmasri, translated and annotated By I. ARMELIN. Paris, 1978.

Amrtarasa = La Saveur de l'Immortel by Ghosaka, translated and annotated by J. VAN DEN BROECK (Publications de l'Institut Orientaliste de Louvain N° 15), Louvain-la-Neuve, 1977.

Avadanakalpalata = Bodhisattvavadanakalpalata by Ksemendra, ed. with its Tibetan version by S. C. DAS, 2 vol. (Bibliotheca Indica), Calcutta 1888-1918.

Avadanakalpalata, ed. P. L. VAIDYA, 2 vol. (Buddhist Sanskrit Texts N° 22-23) Darbhanga, 1959.

BECHERT H., Mythologie der Singhalesischen Volksreligion, in Worterbuch der Mythologie I, 15, Wiesbaden, 1978.

IDEM, Buddha-Feld und Verdienstubertragung: Mahayana-Ideen in Theravada-Buddhismus Ceylons, Bulletin de la Classe des Lettres... Academic Royale de Belgique LXH (1976), p. 27-51.

BERNHARD F., Zum Titel des sogenannten Udanavarga, ZDMG Supplementa I (Deutscher Orientalistentag Juli 1968), Wiesbaden, 1968, p. 872-881.

BHATTACHARYA K., The Dialectical Method of Nagarjuna (Vigrahavyavartani) translated, Delhi, 1978.

Buddhism in Ceylon and Studies on Religious Syncretism in Buddhist Countries, Ed. by H. BECHERT, Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Gottingen, 1978.

BURLINGAME E. W., Buddhist Legends from the Dhammapada Commentary, 3 Parts (Harvard Oriental Series, N°- 28, 29, 30), Cambridge Mass, 1921.

DEMIEVILLE P., Penetration du Bouddhisme dans la tradition philosophique chinoise, Cahiers d'histoire mondiale. III (1956), p. 19-38.

IDEM, Le Bouddhisme chinois. Encyclopedie de la pleiade, Histoire des religions I, Paris, 1970, p. 1249-1319.

DRESDEN M.J., The Jatakastava or Praise of the Buddha's Former Births (Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, vol. 45) Philadelphia 1955, p. 395-508.

DURT H., Choso (Usnisasiraskata), Hobogirin V (1979), p. 421-430.

Einführung in die Indologie herausgegeben von H. BECHERT und G. VON SIMSON Darmstadt, 1979.

FUJITA K., Genshi Jodo Shiso no Kenkyu (Studies on Early Pure Land Buddhism), Tokyo, 1970.

IDEM, One Vehicle or Three, English translation by L. HURVITZ, Journal of the Indian Philosophy III (1975), p. 79-166.

GEIGER W., Samyutta-Nikaya ubertragen, 2 Bde, Munchen- 1925-30.

GNOLI R., Nagarjuna Madhyamaka Karika, Vighraha Vyavartani, Catuhstava. Introduzione, traduzione e note (Enciclopedia di autori classici, N° 61), Torino, 1961.

GOMBRICH F., A Sinhalese Cloth Painting of the Vessantara Jataka, in Buddhism in Ceylon..., Gottingen, 1978, p. 78-88.

HAHN M., Haribatta and Gopadatta, Two Authors in the succession of Aryasura and the rediscovery of parts of their Jatakamalas, Studia Philologica Buddhica I (1977), Tokyo : The Reiyukai Library.

HARA M., A Note on the Sanskrit phrase Devanam Priya, Indian Linguistics, vol. 30 (1969), Poona, p. 13-26.

HARRISON P.M., The Tibetan Text of the Pratyutpannabuddhasammukhavasthisamadhisutra (Studia Philologica Buddhica I), Tokyo: The Reiyukai Library, 1978.

HIKATA R., Honshokyorui no Shisoshiteki Kenkyu (A historical Study of the Thoughts in Jataka and similar Stories), Oriental Library Studies A, vol. 35, Tokyo, 1978.

HIRAKAWA A., The Rise of Mahayana Buddhism, Memoirs of the Research Department of the Toyo Bunko, N° 22, Tokyo, 1963.

IDEM, Shoki Daijo Bukkyo no Kenkyu (Studies on early Mahayana), Tokyo, 1968.

IDEM, Ritzuzo no Kenkyu (Studies on the Vinayapitaka), Tokyo, 1960. Hobogirin, Encyclopedic Dictionary of Buddhism according to the Chinese and Japanese sources: Part IV, Chi-Chootsusho, Paris and Tokyo, 1967. Part V, Chootsusho-Chuu, Paris and Tokyo, 1979. Annexed fascicule: Repertoire du Canon bouddhique sino-japonais, Taisho edition, compiled by P. DEMIEVILLE, H. DURT et A. SEIDEL, Paris and Tokyo, 1978.

IMANISHI J., Das Pancavastukam und die Pancavastukavibhasa, NGAW, 1969, p. 1-31.

Kosa = Abhidharmakosa of Vasubandhu, tr. L. DE LA VALLEE POUSSIN, 6 vol., Paris, 1923-31; reprinted Bruxelles, 1971.

Kosa Index = Index to the Abhidharmakosabhasya, 3 Parts, ed. by A. HIRAKAWA and others, Tokyo, 1973-78.

Kosabhasya = Abhidharmakosabhasyam of Vasubandhu, ed. by P. PRADHAN (Tibetan Sanskrit Works, vol. VIII), Patna, 1967; revised edition 1975.

Kosavyakhya = Sphutartha Abhidharmakosavyakhya, ed. by U. WOGIHARA, Tokyo, 1932-36.

LAMOTTE E., Alexandre et le Bouddhisme, BEFEO XLIV (1951), p. 147-162.

IDEM, La critique d'authenticite dans le Bouddhisme, India Antiqua, Leyden, 1947, p. 213-222.

IDEM, La critique d'interprétation dans le Bouddhisme, Annuaire de l'Institut de Philosophie et d'Histoire Orientales et Slaves IX (1949), p. 341-354.

Madhurattavilasini of Buddhadatta, tr. I. B. HORNER, The Clarifier of the Sweet Meaning (Sacred Books of the Buddhists, vol. XXXIII), London PTS, 1978.

MAY J., Chugan (Madhyamika), Hobogirin V (1979), p. 470-493.

MAYEDA E., Genshi-Bukkyo Seiten no Seiritsushi Kenkyu (A History of the Formation of Original Buddhist Texts), Tokyo, 1964.

MIMAKI K. et MAY J., Chudo (Madhyama pratipad), Hobogirin V (1979) p. 456-470.

NAGAO G.M., Index to the Mahayana Sutramkara, 2 Parts, Tokyo 1958-61

NAKAMURA H., Bukkyogo Daijiten, 3 vol., Tokyo, 1975.

IDEM, A Survey of Mahayana Buddhism with bibliographical Notes : Part I : Mahayana Sutras; Part II: The Philosophical Schools of Mahayana; Part III: Logicians; Part IV: Esoteric Buddhism. The Journal of Intercultural Studies, N° 3, 1976, p. 60-145; N° 4, 1977, p. 77-135; N° 5 1978 p. 89-138.

OBERMILLER E., The Doctrine of Prajna-Paramita as exposed in the Abhisamayalamkara of Maitreya, Acta Orientalia XI (1932) p 1-133

IDEM, Analysis of the Abhisamayalamkara, 3 fasc. (Calcutta Oriental Series N° 27), London, 1933-43.

Prajnaparamitaratnagunasamcayagatha, Sanskrit recension A, ed by A YUYAMA Cambridge, 1976.

RAHULA T., The Buddhist Arahant. Is his attainment of Nirvana as perfect as the Buddha's Enlightenment? Religious Traditions. A New Journal in the Study of Religion, Vol. I, N° 1 (1978), p. 33-42.

RAHULA W., Zen and the Taming of the Bull. Towards the definition of Buddhist Thought, London, 1978.

RENONDEAU G. et FRANK B., Le Bouddhisme japonais, Encyclopedie de la Pleiade, Histoire des religions I, Paris, 1970, p. 1320-50.

Saddharmapundarika:

Nepalese version edited by H. KERN et B. NANJIO (Bibliotheca Buddhica X), St.-Petersbourg, 1912.

Gilgit version edited by Sh. WATANABE, 2 Parts, Tokyo : The Reiyukai Library, 1972-75.

Kashgar version, 6 fascicules, edited by H. TODA, Tokushima Daigaku Kyoyobu Rinrigakka Kiyo, Tokushima, 1977-79

Marburg fragments: H. BECHERT, Über die "Marburger Fragments" der Saddharmapundarika, NAWG 1972, N° 1, p. 1-81.

SAIGUSA M., Daichidoron no Monogatari (Stories drawn from the Traite de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse), 2 vol., Tokyo, 1974-77.

Samghabheda = The Gilgit Manuscript of the Samghabhedavastu, Section of the Vinaya of the

Mulasarvastivadin, 2 Parts, ed. by R. GNOLI, Roma 1977-78

Sayanasana = The Gilgit Manuscript of the Sayanasanavastu and the Adhikaranavastu. Section of the Vinaya of the Mulasarvastivadin, ed by R GNOLI, Roma, 1978.

SCHLINGLOFF D., Das Sasa-Jataka, WZKSA XV (1971), p 57-67

IDEM, Die Jataka-Darstellungen in Hohle 16 von Ajanta, Beitrage zur Indienforschung. Ernst Waldschmidt gewidmet, Berlin, 1977, p. 451-478.

SCHMITHAUSEN L., Zu den Rezensionen des Udanavargah, WZKSA XIV (1970), Sde dge Tib. Trip. = Sde dge Tibetan Tripitaka, Bstan hgyur, preserved at the Faculty of Letters, University of Tokyo. - Section of Dbu ma 7 vol Tokyo, 1977-78.

Sukhavativyuha :

Ed. U. WOGIHARA, etc., Jodosambukyo (The three Pure Land Sutras) Tokyo, 1931.

Ed. A. ASHIKAGA, Sukhavativyuha, Kyoto, 1965.

Ed. P.L. VAIDYA, Sukhavativyuha, vistara- and samksiptamdrka, in Buddhist Sanskrit Texts, N° 17; Mahayanasutrasamgraha I, N° 16-17, p. 221-259, Darbhanga, 1961.

The Jataka or Stories of the Buddha's Former Births, 6 vol., ed. by E. B. COWELL. New Edition, London PTS, 1973.

TRIPATHI Ch., Ekottara-Fragmente der Gilgit-Handschrift (Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik, Band 2 der Beihefte A : Monographien), Reinbek, 1977.

TUCCI G., Preliminary Reports and Studies on the Italian Excavations in Swat Pakistan, East and West 9 (1958), p. 279-328.

IDEM, On Swat. The Dards and Connected Problems, East and West 27 (1977), p. 9-103.

WAGNER R.G., Die Fragen Hui-yuans an Kumarajiva, Berlin, Druck der Freien Universitat, 1973.

WALDSCHMIDT E., Über die Darstellungen und den Stil der Wandgemälde aus Qyzil bei Kutscha I, Buddhistische Spätantike VI, Berlin, 1926, p. 9-62.

IDEM, Identifizierung einer Handschrift des Udanasamyukta aus den Turfanfunden, ZDMG 107 (1957), p. 372-401.

IDEM, Von Ceylon bis Turfan, Göttingen, 1967.

IDEM, Zur Sronakotikarna-Legende, in Von Ceylon bis Turfan, p. 203-225.

IDEM, Ein Beitrag zur Überlieferung vom Sthavira Srona Kotivimsa, Melanges d'Indianisme a la memoire de Louis Renou, Paris, 1968.

IDEM, A Contribution to our knowledge of Sthavira Srona Kotivimsa, S.K. De Memorial Volume, Calcutta, 1972, p. 107-116.

- IDEM, “Teufeleien” in Turfan-Sanskrittexten, Folia rara W. Voigt dedicata, Wiesbaden, 1976, p. 140-147.
- IDEM, Sanskrit-Wörterbuch der buddhistischen Texte aus den Turfan-Funden I-II (Redaktor G. von Simson), Göttingen, 1973-76.
- WILLEMEN Ch., The Chinese Udanavarga translated and annotated, MCB, Vol. XIX, Bruxelles, 1978.
- YAMADA R., Daijō Bukkyō Seiritsuron Josetsu (An Introduction to the Development of Mahayana Buddhism), Kyoto, 1959.
- YUYAMA A., Vinaya-Texte, in Systematische Übersicht über die buddhistische Sanskrit-Literatur herausgegeben von H. Bechert, Wiesbaden, 1979.
- ZURCHER E., Het leven van de Boeddha vertaald uit de vroegste Chinese over-levering (De Oosterse Bibliotheek 10), Amsterdam, 1978.
- IDEM, Late Han Vernacular Elements in the earliest Buddhist Translations, Journal of the Chinese Language Teachers Association XII, 3 (1977), p. 177-203.

CHAPTER XLIX: THE FOUR CONDITIONS

First Section UNDERSTANDING THE CONDITIONS

(pratyaya and hetu)

PRELIMINARY NOTE.

This section, dedicated to questions of causality, deals with the four conditions (pratyaya) and the six causes (hetu). They are worded in the following way in Sanskrit and Tibetan, and in Chinese by Kumarārajīva (K) and in Chinese by Hsuan-tsang (H):

1. Causal condition, hetupratyaya, rguḥi rkyen, yin yuan (K), yin yuan (H).
2. Immediately preceding condition, samanantarapratyaya, mtshuṅs pa de ma thag paḥi, ts'eu ti yuan (K), teng wou kien yuan (H).
3. Object condition, ālambanapratyaya, dmigs paḥi rkyen, yuan yuan (K), so yuan yuan (H).
4. Dominant condition, adhipatipratyaya, bdag poḥi rkyen, tseng chang yuan (K), tseng chang yuan (H).
1. Associated cause, saṃprayuktahetu, mtshuṅs par ldan paḥi rgyu, siang ying yin (K), siang ying yin (H).
2. Simultaneous cause, sahabhūhetu, lhan cig ḥbyuṅ baḥi rgyu, kong cheng yin (K), kiu yeou yin (H).
3. Homogeneous cause, sabhāgaḥetu, skal ba mñam paḥi rgyu, tseu tchong yin (K), t'ong lei yin (H).
4. Universal or pervasive cause, sarvatragāḥetu, kun tu ḥgro baḥi rgyu, pien yin (K), pien hing yin (H).
5. Ripening cause or cause of maturation, vipākāḥetu, rnam par smin paḥi rgyu, pao yin (K), yi chou yin (H).
6. Enabling cause, kāraṇaḥetu, byed paḥi rgyu, wou tchang yin (K) (avighnakāraṇa), neng tso yin (H).

The Buddhist doctrine is primarily a doctrine of causality and the Buddha Śākyamuni, throughout his career, never stopped teaching his disciples the dependent origination of the phenomena of existence (pratītyasamutpāda), the production that conditions the appearance and disappearance of dharmas. His homily inevitably begins with the phrase: This being, that is; from the production of this, that is produced (asmin satidaṃ bhavaty asyotpādād idaṃ utpadyate), and: This not being, that is not; by the cessation of this, that ceases (asminn asatidaṃ na bhavaty asya nirodhād idaṃ nirudhyāte): cf. Catuspariśat, p. 102, 358-360; Śālistamba, ed. N. A. Sastri, p. 2; Avadānasataka, II, p. 105-106; Arthavinīścaya, ed. N. H. Samtani, p. 5; Mahāvastu, II, p. 285, III, p. 448; and for the Pāli sources, Vin. I, p. 1; Majjhima, III, p. 63; Saṃyutta, II, p. 1, 25, etc.

The Buddhist credo quite rightly continues with a single stanza infinitely reproduced on Indian, Serindian and Chinese monuments and images:

Ye dhammā hetuppabhavā tesaṃ hetuṃ tathāgato āha |

tesaṃ ca yo nirodho evaṃvādī mahāsamaṇo ||

“The Tathāgata, the great ascetic, has told the cause of phenomena coming from causes, and he has also told their abolition.”

But in the present section, it is more precisely a matter of the system of the four conditions and/or the six causes intervening in the functioning of causality. Does this system already occur in the canonical sūtras or, if not, which school elaborated it? Does the Madhyamaka accept or reject it? Do the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras mention it and, if so, in what sense? Finally, how did the Traité understand it?

1. The system in the canonical sūtras

In the early texts the words ‘condition’ (pratyaya) and ‘cause’ (hetu) seem to be equivalent. The Kośavyākhyā, p. 188, makes the following comment: “What is the difference between hetu and pratyaya? There is none. The Blessed One said: dvau hetū dvau pratyayau samyagdṛṣṭer utpādāy. katamau dvau. parataś ca ghoṣo ‘dhyātmaṃ ca yoniśo manaskāra iti. “There are two causes, two conditions for the arising of right view. What are these two? The speech of another and, inwardly, right reflection’ (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 294, l. 1-3; Anguttara, I, p.87, l. 32-34). The words hetu, pratyaya, nidāna, kāraṇa, nimitta, liṅga, upaniśad are synonymous.”

But, asks the Mahāvibhāṣā, why is it that the Jñānaprasthāna of Kātyāyanīputra, after having spoken of the four pratyayas, still lists six hetus? Here is its answer (T 1545, k. 16, p. 79a26-c5):

“The six hetus are not spoken of in the sūtras; the sūtras speak only of the existence of the four pratyayas, namely, hetupratyaya up to adhipatipratyaya. Here, in order to distinguish the hetus from the pratyayas, [the Jñānaprasthāna] speaks of six hetus.

“Question. – Do the hetus contain the pratyayas and do the pratyayas contain <2165> the hetus? – Answer: They are contained mutually according to their use. Some say that the first five hetus are the hetupratyaya and that the kāraṇahetu is the other three pratyayas. Others say that the pratyayas contain the hetus, but that the hetus do not contain [all] the pratyayas: thus the first five hetus are the hetupratyaya; the kāraṇahetu is the adhipatipratyaya, but the samanantarapratyaya and the ālambanapratyaya are not contained in the hetus.

“Others say that that it was also a question of the hetus in the sūtras and, particularly, in the Ekottarāgama, of the group of six (ṣaṭkanipāta), but in time, this text has disappeared (antarhita); however, the Sthāvira Kātyāyanīputra, by the power of his knowledge resulting from an aspiration (prañidhijñāna), saw this sūtra passage where it was a matter of the six hetus and [as a result] he compiled and wrote his Abhidharma. That is why, in this Abhidharma, he distinguishes the six hetus. Formerly the Ekottarāgamasūtra listed dharma from 1 to 100 (ekottarikāgama ā śatād dharmanirdeśa āsit); now it goes only from 1 to 10 (idāniṃ tv ā daśakād dṛśyanta iti), and the rest have disappeared. Moreover, in the groups 1 to 10, much has disappeared and not much remains. The Sthāvira Śānakavāsin, a great arhat, was a disciple contemporaneous with the Sthāvira Ānanda. At that time, this Venerable was a faithful transmitter of the Bhagavat’s teachings, but, by the time of the nirvāna of the arhat, 77,000 jātakas and sūtras, 10,000 śāstras had already disappeared. If so many sūtras and śāstras disappeared under one scholar, what has not happened from that day until today when hundreds, thousands, of scholars have followed one after the other? How can the number of sūtras and śāstras that have been lost be known? This is why, some say, the six hetus are mentioned in the sūtras.

“Other teachers (ācārya) say: Although there is no sūtra where the six hetus are treated in order (anukrameṇa) and fully (sampūrṇam), these hetus are mentioned separately (vikīrṇam) in various places in the sūtras:

1. A sūtra says: iyam ucyate darśanamūlikā śraddhā ‘vetyajñānasamprayuktā ‘It is what is called faith having seeing as root, ASSOCIATED with the knowledge [subsequent] to penetration’. Sūtras of this kind have dealt with the samprayuktakahetu.

2. A sūtra says: caḥṣuḥ pratitya rūpāṇi cotpadyate caḥsurvijnānam. trayāṇaṃ saṃgatiḥ sparśaḥ. taiḥ saha jatā vedanā saṃjñā cetanā ca ‘As a result of the eye and visibles, there arises the visual consciousness; the meeting of the three is contact; there ARISE WITH them sensation, concept and volition’ (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 111, l. 35037, p. 281, l. 18-29; Saṃyutta, II, p. 72, l. 4-5; IV, p. 32, l. 31-32; p. 86, l. 18-19; p. 90, l. 15-16). Sūtras of this kind have dealt with sahabhūhetu.

3. A sūtra says: samanvāgato ‘yaṃ pudgalaḥ kuśalair api dharmair akuśalair api. asya khalu pudgalasya kuśala dharmā antarhitā akuśalā dharmāḥ saṃmukhībhūtāḥ. asti cāsyamasahagataṃ kuśalamūlamasamucchinnaṃ yato ‘sya kuśalabhaviṣyati ‘This man is endowed with good and bad dharmas, but within him the good dharmas are disappearing and the bad dharmas are appearing. But there is still within him a persistent root of good which is not cut and, from this root of good, there will grow ANOTHER root of good: thus, in the future, this man will be pure’ (cf. Anguttara, III, p. 404, l. 12-20; Madhyama, T 26, k. 27, p. 601a22-27). Sūtras of this kind have dealt with the sabhāgahetu. <2166>

4. A sūtra asys: mithyāḍṛṣṭheḥ puruṣapudgalasya yac ca kāyākarma yac ca vākkarma yac ca manaskarma yaḥ prañidhiḥ ye ca taddṛṣṭeḥ anvayāḥ saṃskārāḥ sarve ‘py ete dharmā anīṣṭatvāya saṃvartante ‘kāntatvāyapriyatvāyāmanāpatvāya. [tat kasya hetoḥ. dṛṣṭir hy asya yad uta mithyāḍṛṣṭiḥ] ‘For the man who has a wrong view, every physical act, every vocal act, every mental act, every resolution and all the formations connected with this view: ALL these dharmas end up in delusion, unhappiness, affliction, disagreement. [Why? Because he has a guilty view, namely, wrong view]. – Cf. Anguttara, V, p. 212, l. 20-29; Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 28, p. 204a25-28. Sūtras of this kind have dealt with the sarvatragahetu.

5. A sūtra says: asthānam etad anavakaśo yat kāyaduṣcaritasya vāgduṣcaritasya manoduṣcaritasyeṣṭaḥ kānto manāpo vipāka nirvarteta. sthānam ca kaly etad vidyate yad anīṣṭo ‘kānto ‘manāpo vipāko nirvarteta ‘It is impossible, it is unrealizable that a physical, vocal or mental misdeed will result in an agreeable, nice, pleasant, RETRIBUTION, but it is certainly possible that there will result from it a disagreeable, lowly, unpleasant retribution’ (cf. Majjhima, III, p. 66, l. 9-28; Anguttara, I, p. 28, l. 23-24; madhyama, T 26, k. 47, p. 724b8-10). Sūtras of this kind have dealt with the vipākahetu.

6. A sūtra says: dvau hetū dvau pratayau samyagdr̥ṣṭer utpādāya: parataś ca ghoṣo ’dhyātmaṃ ca yoniśo manaskāraḥ ‘There are two causes, two conditions for the ARISING of right view: the speech of another and, inwardly, right reflection’ (cf. Majjhima, I, l. 1-3; Anguttara, I, p. 87, l. 32-34; Madhyama, T 26, k. 58, p. 791a1-2; Ekottara, T 125, k. 7, p. 578a5-6). Sūtras of this kind have dealt with the kāraṇahetu.

“Therefore the six HETUS have been spoken by the Buddha, and, by basing himself on these sūtras, the Sthāvira [Kātyāyanīputra] composed this [Jñānaprasthāna]-śāstra.”

*

The present passage of the Mahāvibhāṣā will in part be repeated by Saṃghabhadra in his Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 15, p. 416b5-417a9, and by Yaśomitra in his Kośavyākhyā, p. 188, l. 13-189, l. 13.

In Buddhism there are several systems of causality. The earliest and best known is that of the twelve-membered conditioned origination (dvādsāṅgapratītyasamutpāda) in which twelve conditions (pratayaya or nidāna) are involved. Taught by the Buddha at Benares and many other places, it is universally accepted by all Buddhists.

Here it is not a question of this system, but of another theory where at first four pratayayas (hetupratayaya, etc.) are involved, to which later six hetus (samprayuktakahetu, etc.) were added. According to some scholars, the field of action of the four pratayayas coincides exactly with that of the six hetus and the six hetus are equivalent to the four pratayayas; according to others, the action of the pratayayas greatly exceeds that of the hetus.

This system was not accepted by all the schools, and so its partisans tried to establish its canonicity by showing that the sūtras of the Tripitaka dealt with it.

They claim that the four pratayayas, taken as a group, were “spoken in the sūtras”: this is what is affirmed by the Mahāvibhāṣā in the passage I [Lamotte] have just translated, by the Kośa (II, p. 209) and even by the Traité in the pages that follow. Unfortunately, despite all the research carried out in the Sūtrapitaka, <2167> the passage in question has not been found and, until proof of the contrary, it must be accepted that the early scriptures were still unaware of these four pratayayas.

In regard to the six hetus, it is useful to establish a distinction among the hetus taken in isolation and the hetus as a group.

According to some scholars, the group of six hetus appeared early in some sūtras that today have disappeared. In vain would one look for them in the old texts, but the Sarvāstivādin teacher Kātyāyanīputra was aware of them by the magical power of his prañidhijñāna and he mentioned them in his Jñānaprasthāna which he compiled three hundred years after the Parinirvāṇa at Tāmasavanavihāra, a Sarvāstivādin monastery of the Cīnabhukti district in northwestern India (cf. Hiuan-tsang, Si-yu-ki, T 2087,

k. 4, p. 889c). – Without recourse to such a dangerous hypothesis, other scholars frankly recognized that there is no sūtra dealing with the six hetus “in order and complete”.

The problem is quite different if it is a matter of the six hetus taken in isolation. The sūtras that allude to such and such a hetu in particular are not missing. The Mahāvibhāṣā mentions a certain number of them for us. In this sense, the hetus as well as the pratayayas are canonical, but the system that groups together four pratayayas and six hetus is not: it is a theory of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika school. Proof of this is that other schools do not recognize it and in turn have proposed other systems: the Śāriputrābhidharma has drawn up a list of 10 pratayayas (T 1548, k. 25, p. 679b5-7); the Theravādin Abhidhamma lists 24 (cf. Nyanatiloka, Guide through the Abhidhammipitaka, 1938, p. 87-109); Buddhistisches Wörterbuch, 1952, p. 145-152).

2. The system in the Abhidharma of the Sarvāstivādins

The system of the four pratayayas coupled with or completed by that of the six hetus is described in most of the Abhidharmas and Śāstras of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika school:

Vijñānakāya, T 1539, k. 3, p. 547b22-c4 (cf. Kośa, II, p. 299 as note; Prakaraṇapāda, T 1541, k. 4, p. 645b6-7; T 1542, k. 5, p. 712b12-13; Jñānaprasthāna, T 1543, k. 1, p. 773a13-14: 774b22-775a9; T 1544, k. 1, p. 920c5-921a10.

Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 21, p. 109a20-28; k. 16, p. 80a17-22.

Abhidharmahṛdayaśāstra of Dharmasrī, T 1550, k. 1, p. 811c1-5, 812a19-25 Transl. I. Armelin, p. 68-69, 72); Samyuktābhidharmasāra of Dharmatrāta, T 1552, k. 2, p. 883a3-4; Abhidharmāmṛtarasa of Ghoṣaka, T 1553, k. 1, p. 970a16-b14 (transl. J. Van den Broeck, p. 123-126); Prakaraṇābhidharmāvatāra of Skandhila, T 1554, k. 2, p. 988a21-c24 (transl. M. van Velthem, p. 71-74.

Kośa, II, p. 244-331; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 15-20, p. 416b-456a.

The sources mentioned here outline the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika concepts on causality: Not only are the saṃskṛtadharma hetupratayayasamutpanna – which is a tautology – but they depend on a precise number of causes and conditions, namely, the 4 pratayayas and the 6 hetus. This does not mean that any dharma indiscriminately is the product of 4 pratayayas: some depend on 4 pratayayas, others on 3, others on 2, but none depend on one single pratayaya. And it is the same in regard to the 6 hetus: there is no single unique cause on which the totality of dharmas depends <2168> and this observation excludes the intervention of a Deity unique to the process of causality.

The play of the 6 hetus is pretty much confused with that of the 4 pratayayas and is only the doublet of them. This complicates the task of the exegetists when they treat them conjointly. The early masters often limited themselves to speaking of the 4 pratayayas.

3. The system in the Madhyamaka

Nāgārjuna, author of the Madhyamakaśāstra, was aware of this system and, in a stanza in his Kārikā, I, 2 (p. 76), he says to his objector:

Catvāraḥ pratyayā hetuś cāmbanam anantaram / tathaivādhipateyaṃ ca pratyayo nāsti pañcamah //

“There are four conditions: cause, object, antecedent and dominant. A fifth condition does not exist.”

From the beginning of his work, Nāgārjuna attacks a typically Sarvāstivādin position. Thus he was connected with this school which, in the first centuries of our era, was widespread in the northwest of India.

In his Kārikā, I, 5 (p. 81), Nāgārjuna rejected outright the four pratyayas:

Utpadyate pratītyemān itīme pratyayāḥ kila / yāvan notpadyata ime tāvan nāpratyayāḥ katham //

“These conditions are at issue when some thing arises in dependence on them; but if nothing arises, how would they not be non-conditions?” – In other words, if nothing is conditioned, there can be no question of conditions.

Going on this evidence, Nāgārjuna successively shows the absurdity of the hetupratyaya (Kārikā, I, 7, p. 83), the ālambanapratyaya (Kārikā, I, 8, p. 84), the samantarapratyaya (Kārikā, I, 9, p. 85) and the adhipatipratyaya (Kārikā, I, 10, p. 86).

We will return to these stanzas later, but already the attitude taken by Nāgārjuna in regard to the system of the four conditions is clear: it is a pure and simple rejection. If there is a pratītyasamutpāda, it is characterized by the eight negative characteristics (aṣṭaviśeṣaṇaviśiṣṭa), which are non-cessation (anirōdha), non-production (anutpāda, etc. (cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 3, l. 11) and are mingled with emptiness.

4. The system in the Great Prajñāpāramitāsūtras

If these sūtras were to mention the four pratyayas, that would prove their dependence on the Sarvāstivāda and would throw some light on the origin of an immense literature which, despite its prolixity, carefully conceals its sources.

On this point we come up against a serious problem of authenticity, for some versions of the Great Sūtras pass over the four conditions in silence whereas others that mention them fall into two groups, one group that rejects them and one that accepts them.

a. Versions silent about the four pratyayas.

The Sanskrit text of the ‘corrected’ Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā and the two earliest Chinese translations of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, that of Dharmarakṣa made in 286AD and that of Mokṣala made in 291AD, say <2169> nothing about the four pratyayas in the place where they should have spoken of them, i.e., after the statement of the eighteen śūnyatās.

Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, ed. N. Dutt, p. 24, l. 17.

Kouang tsan king, T 222, k. 1, p. 150a3.

Fang kouang pan jo king, T 221, k. 1, p. 3b1.

b. Versions rejecting the existence of the four pratyayas. They may be found in the collection of the Ta pan jo po lo mi to king, Chinese translation made by Hiuan-tsang between 660 and 663AD:

Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, T 220, book VII, k. 402, p. 8c11-13: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to understand (avabodddhum) that the hetupratyaya, the samanantarapratyaya, the ālambanapratyaya and the adhipatipratyaya do not exist (na vidyante) and are not perceived (nopalabhyante) in all dharmas should practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Aṣṭādaśasāhasrikā, T 220, book VII, k. 479, p. 430c7-8: [The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to understand the sixteen śūnyatās] and the ālambanaśūnyatā, the adhipatiśūnyatā, the samanantaraśūnyatā (read teng wou kien k’ong), etc., should practice the perfection of wisdom.

c. Versions that adopt the four pratyayas.

They simply say that the bodhisattva wishing to understand the four pratyayas should practice the perfection of wisdom.

Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, Chinese translation by Kumārajīva, T 223, k. 1, p. 219c12-14.

Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, Tibetan translation, Tib. Trip., vol. 18, no. 731, p. 53fol. 32b6-7: Śha ra dva tiḥi bu gEan yañ byañ chub sems dpaḥ sems dpaḥ chen po dmigs pa dañ / dbaṅ dañ / de ma thag pa dañ rgyuḥi rken khoñ du chud par.. ḥdod pas šes rab kyi pha rol tu phyin pa la bslab par byaḥo /

Sanskrit text of the Śatasāhasrikā, ed. P. Ghosa, p. 80, l. 4-6: Punar param Śaradvatīputrālambanāmateyasamantarahetupratyayatā avabodddhukāmena ...This wording obviously should be corrected as follows: Punaraparam Śaradvatīputra hetusamanantarālambanādhīpatipratyayān avabodddhukāmena Śatasāhasrikā, Chinese translation by Hiuan-tsang, T 220, book V, k. 3, p. 13c2-5.

- Perhaps the passage on the four pratyayas did not appear in the original version of the Pañcaviṃśati: the adversaries as well as the partisans of this theory could have introduced it into the text, the former in order to reject it, the latter in order to adopt it, at least from the saṃvṛti point of view.

5. The system according to the Traité

The passage of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā which the Traité is about to comment on is placed among the versions that adopt the four pratyayas and are against those that reject them. This puts our author in a delicate situation. To deny the four pratyayas, as Nāgārjuna did in his Madhyamakaśāstra, is to brush up against nihilism; to accept the four pratyayas, as do the Sarvāstivādin Ābhidharmikas, is to fall into realism. And yet realism and nihilism are the two extreme views condemned by the Buddha (see above, p. 2007F). The author of the Traité is going to adopt a middle path which is that of the Prajñāpāramitā which abstains from taking up (parigrāhana) or abandoning (utsarga) <2170> the pratyayas for the good reason that conditioned things are never produced and that, from the beginning, dharmas are parinirvānized (ādiparinivṛta).

Having briefly defined the four pratyayas and the six hetus, the author, worried about objectivity, begins by allowing a Madhyamika objector who considers the conditions to be non-conditions (nāpratyaya) to speak. This objector expresses himself in almost the same way as Nāgārjuna in Kārikās 7 to 14 of his Pratyayaparīkṣā which is none other than a refutation (niṣedha) of the system of the four conditions.

Then the author explains in detail this system such as the great Sarvāstivādin teachers of the Śātpādābhidharma and the Vibhāṣa had conceived it.

If Nāgārjuna pushed negation too far, the Sarvāstivādins sinned by excessive realism, and so the author of the Traité tries to bring things back to the point by taking his inspiration from the Prajñāpāramitā. The ordinary person sees the pratyayas and believes them; the wise man also sees the pratyayas but he does not believe them. The ordinary person is like the child who sees the moon reflected in the water and tries to grab it; the wise person also sees the moon reflected in the water but he does not seek to grab it because he knows it is not there. The dharmas that appear to us as conditioned are empty of reality and like a magical creation. The vision that we have of them comes from provisional truth (saṃvṛtisatya); their non-arising and non-cessation is their true nature, which is none other than absence of any nature.

Pratyaya and Hetu

[k. 32, p. 296b]

Sūtra (cf. Śātasāhasrikā, p. 8-0, l. 4-6). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to understand the causal condition, the immediately preceding condition, the object condition and the dominant condition of all dharmas should practice the perfection of wisdom (Sarvadharmāṇām hetusamanantarālambanādhipatyayān avaboddhukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyām śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. THE FOUR CONDITIONS (pratyaya) AND THE SIX CAUSES (hetu)

All conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) are the result of four conditions (pratyaya): 1) the causal condition (hetupratyaya); 2) the immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaya); 3) the object condition (ālambanapratyaya); 4) the dominant condition (adhipatipratyaya).

1) The causal condition (hetupratyaya), [is five causes (hetu)]:

- a. the associated cause (saṃprayuktakahetu),
- b. the simultaneous cause (sahabhūhetu),
- c. the homogeneous cause (sabhāgaheṭu), <2171>
- d. the universal cause (sarvatragahetu),
- e. the ripening cause (vipākahetu).¹

These five causes (hetu) are causal condition (hetupratyaya).²

Furthermore, all conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) are also called causal condition (hetupratyaya).

2) The immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaya). – If one accepts the last mind and the last mental events (caramāś cittacaitāḥ), past (atīta) as well as present (pratyutpanna), of the arhat [at the moment of nirvāṇa], all the other minds-and-mental-events, past or present, play the role of antecedent [with respect to the minds-and-mental-events that follow them] and are called immediately preceding condition.³

3-4) The object condition (ālambanapratyaya) is the dominant condition (adhipatipratyaya). – It is all the dharmas.⁴

The bodhisattva who wants to cognize the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) and the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) of the four conditions should practice the perfection of wisdom. <2172>

¹ By vipākahetu we should understand either the cause of ripening (vipākasya hetuḥ) or the cause which is ripening (vipāka eva hetuḥ): both interpretations are correct: cf. Kośa, II, p. 271-272.

² The sixth cause, the kāraṇahetu, which does not present an obstacle to the arising of other dharmas, is not part of the hetupratyaya: cf. Kośa II, p. 246.

³ The flow of the mind is never interrupted except in exceptional cases such as the unconscious absorption (asaṃjñīsamāpatti) and the absorption of cessation (nirodhasamāpatti). Usually the mind-and-mental-events that arise (utpanna) are the condition as equal (sama) and immediate (anantara) antecedent of the minds-and-mental-events that follow them. An exception is made for the last mind and the last mental events of the arhat at the moment of his nirvāṇa: these cannot constitute an immediately preceding condition “because no mind and no mental events arise after them” (anyacittāsaṃbandhanāt): cf. Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 10, p. 50a22-25; Kośa, II, p. 305.

⁴ All dharmas indiscriminately, even if they are not grasped by the consciousness, are capable of being object of this consciousness because its nature remains the same, just as fuel is fuel even when it is not burning.

– Insofar as it does not present an obstacle to the arising of other dharmas, any dharma is dominant condition of other dharmas, except for itself: cf. Kośa, II, p. 306-308.

II. OBJECTIONS AGAINST THE EFFICACY OF THE CONDITIONS

Objector.⁵ – According to the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā), the four conditions (pratyaya) do not exist (nopalabhyante). Why?

1) [Rejection of hetupratyaya]. – It is illogical (na yujyate) that the effect (phala) pre-exists in the cause (hetu) and it is also illogical that it does not pre-exist in it.⁶

If the effect pre-existed in the cause, there would not be any cause [since it already exists].

If it did not pre-exist in the cause, of what use would this cause be [since it does not occur there]?

If it did pre-exist without having pre-existed there, it would also result from a non-cause, by chance (ahetuka).

Furthermore, it is necessary to see the effect arise from the cause in order to be able to speak about cause; but if the effect is not there in advance, how can one speak of cause?

Furthermore, if the effect arises from a cause (hetor jāyate), this effect depends on a cause (hetum apekṣate). But this cause is not independent (asvatantra) and in turn, depends on other causes. If the cause is not independent, how could one say that the effect depends solely on that cause? <2173>

For these many reasons, we know that there is no causal condition (hetupratyaya).

⁵ This objector is a Mādhyamika who is going to reason in a manner very close to that of Nāgārjuna in his Madh. Kārikā.

⁶ The objector claims here to be following a version of the Prajñāpāramitā where the four pratyayas are rejected, whereas the Traité is referring to a version where they are accepted: see above, p. 2169F.

Compare Madh. Kārikā, XX, v. 1-4 (p. 391-393):

*Hetoś ca pratyayānām ca sāmāgryā jāyate yadi /
phalam asti ca sāmāgryām sāmāgryā jāyate katham //
hetoś ca pratyayānām ca sāmāgryā jāyate yadi / phalam nāsti ca sāmāgryām sāmāgryā jāyate katham // hetoś ca pratyayānām ca sāmāgryām asti cet phalam / grhyeta nanu sāmāgryām sāmāgryam ca na grhyate // hetoś ca pratyayānām ca sāmāgryām nāsti cet phalam /
hetavaḥ pratyayāś ca syur ahetupratyayaiḥ samāḥ //*

Transl. - If the fruit that arises from the complex of the cause and conditions already occurs in this complex, why would it need to arise from the complex?

If the fruit that arises from the complex of cause and conditions does not occur in this complex, how could it arise from this complex?

If the fruit occurred in the complex of cause and conditions, it should certainly be taken hold of in this complex. Now it is not held there.

If the fruit did not occur in the complex of cause and conditions, causes and fruits would be equivalent to non-causes, to non-conditions.

2) [Rejection of the samanantarapratyaya]. – Once gone (atīta), the minds-and-mental-events (cittacaitasikadharma) are all destroyed (niruddha) and have no further activity (kāritra); then how could they constitute an immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaya)? The mind presently existing (pratyutpanna) thus has no antecedent.⁷

Perhaps you would like to call upon the future (anāgata) to guarantee the [296c] continuity of the mind (cittakrama)? But as this future does not yet exist, how would it assure this continuity?

For such reasons, there is no immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaya).

3) [Rejection of the object condition]. – All [mental] dharmas are without specific characteristic (animitta) and without object (anālambana); why then speak of object condition (ālambanapratyaya)?⁸

4) [Rejection of the dominant condition]. – All dharmas are equal, being without dependence (anādhīna) or support (anāśraya); why then speak of dominant condition (adhipratyaya)?⁹

As these four conditions do not exist, how can the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra say here that “in order to understand the four conditions, it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom”? <2174>

III. THE OPINION OF THE TRAITÉ IN REGARD TO CAUSALITY

Answer. – You do not understand the nature (lakṣaṇa) of the Prajñāpāramitā; that is why you claim that, according to the Prajñāpāramitā, the four conditions (pratyaya) do not exist (nopalabhyante). In view of all dharmas, the Prajñāpāramitā abandons nothing and refutes nothing (na parityajati na pratiśedhayati):¹⁰ it is

⁷ Compare Madh. Kārikā, I, v. 9 (p. 85):

Anupanneṣu dharmeṣu nirodho nopapadyate / nānantaram ato yuktaṃ niruddhe pratyayaś ca kaḥ //

Paraphrase. – As long as the dharma-effects have not arisen, the prior cessation of the cause is impossible.

Assuming that this cessation had taken place, what could be the condition of the effect? Thus the immediately preceding condition is unacceptable.

⁸ Compare Madh. Kārikā, I, v. 8 (p. 84):

*Anālambana evāyaṃ san dharma uoadīṣyate /
athānālambane dharme kutā ālambanaṃ punaḥ //*

Paraphrase. – You are teaching that this dharma (= cittacaitta) exists previously without object. But if this dharma is fundamentally without object, how could it ever be comprised of one?

⁹ Madh. Kārikā, I, v. 10 (p. 86) is expressed differently:

*Bhāvānām niḥsvabhāvānām na sattā vidyate yataḥ /
satidam asmin bhavātīty etan naivopapadyate //*

Paraphrase. – Since there is no existence for essences without inherent nature, the sovereignty or predominance of one dharma over another, a dominance expressed by saying: “This being, that is”, is logically untenable.

¹⁰ See above, p. 2142F, n.

absolutely pure (atyantapariśuddha) and free of futile proliferation (niṣprapañca). According to the word of the Buddha, “there are four conditions”.¹¹ But people with little knowledge (alpavidā), being attached to these four conditions (catuṣpratyaṣābhiniṣṭa), have composed bad treatises (kuśāstra) on their subject. In order to destroy these wrong opinions (abhiniveśa), [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] teaches the emptiness (śūnyatā) and indestructibility of dharmas. Therefore, arising from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagryutpanna) – namely, the internal and external bases of consciousness (adhyātmabahirbhāyatana) – this mind-dharma (cittadharma) is like a magic show (māyopama), deceptive (mṛṣāvāda) and without definite nature (niyatavabhāva). And it is the same for the mental-events-dharmas (caitasikadharma).

1. Causality according to the Abhidharma

[a. The four conditions and the six causes]

[As we have just seen, the causal condition (hetupratyaya) is the five causes (hetu):

1) The mental events (caitta) coexist with the mind (cittasahabhū), - namely, feeling (vedanā), notion (saṃjñā), intention (cetanā), etc.¹²; they have the same aspect (ekākāra) and the same object (ekāḷambana) as the mind, being ‘associated’ (saṃprayukta) with it.¹³ The mind as associated with the mental events is cause, and the mental events as associated with the mind are cause. This is what is called associated causes (saṃprayuktakahetu). These associated causes are like friends and acquaintances who come together to do something. <2175>

2) The simultaneous cause (sahabhūhetu). – Conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) each have a simultaneous cause and, as simultaneous, these dharmas mutually help each another.¹⁴ They are like an older brother and a younger brother who, being of the same birth, help one another mutually.

3) The homogeneous cause (sabhāgaheṭu). – Dharmas of the good category (kuśalanikāya), when they are past (atīta), are [homogeneous] cause of present (pratyuṭpanna) and future (anāgata) dharmas; past (atīta) or present (pratyuṭpanna), dharmas of the good category are [homogeneous] cause of future (anāgata)

¹¹ The author of the Traité believes, along with the Sarvāstivādins, in the existence of a canonical sūtra enumerating and listing the four conditions. But this sūtra has not yet been found in the old scriptures.

¹² See Kośa, II, p. 153-156.

¹³ For Kośa, II, p. 267, only the mind and mental events (cittacaitta) that have the same aspect (ekākāra), the same object (ekāḷambana) and the same point of support (saṁśraya) are saṃprayuktakahetu.

¹⁴ Dharmas that are the result of one another (mithaḥphala) are sahabhūhetu, such as, for example, the great elements (bhūta), the mind (citta) and the accompaniments of the mind (cittānūvartin), that which characterizes (lakṣaṇa) and that which is characterized (lakṣya): cf. Kośa, II, p. 248.

good dharmas.¹⁵ [Mutatis mutandis], it is the same for bad (akuśala) dharmas and indeterminate (avyākṛta) dharmas. Thus all dharmas each have their homogeneous cause.

4) The universal cause (sarvatragahetu). – The perverse tendencies (anuśaya) to be abandoned by seeing the truth of suffering and the truth of the origin (duḥkhasamudayasatya-darśanaprahātavya) are cause of all defiled (kliṣṭa) dharmas and are called universal cause.¹⁶ <2176>

5) The ripening cause (vipākahetu). – As a result of the accomplishment of action (karman), a favorable (kuśala) or unfavorable (akuśala) fruit of ripening (vipākaphala) is obtained: this is the ripening cause.¹⁷

These five causes (hetu) constitute the causal condition (hetupratyaya).

¹⁵ Similar (sadrśa) dharmas belonging to one and the same category and to one and the same stage (svanikāyabhū) and arisen earlier (agraja), are sabhāgaheṭu. Dharmas arisen earlier are homogeneous cause of later dharmas, whether the latter are arisen or not yet arisen (pūrvotpannāḥ paścimānām utpannānutpannānām sabhāgaheṭuḥ); future dharmas are never homogeneous cause (anāgatā naiva sabhāgaheṭuḥ): cf. Kośa, II, p. 255-257. – Vasubandhu in his Kośabhāṣyā, p. 85, l. 24-86, l. 2, cites a passage of the Jñānaprasthāna, T 1544, k. 1, p. 920c15-18: Sabhāgaheṭuḥ katamaḥ. pūrvotpannāni kuśalamūlāni paścad utpannānām kuśalamūlānām tatsamprayuktānām ca dharmānām svadhātau abhāgaheṭunā hetuḥ. evam atītāny atītapratyuṭpannānām. atītapratyuṭpannāny anāgatānām iti vakyavyayam. – What is the homogeneous cause? The previously arisen roots of good are homogeneous cause of roots of good arisen later and of the dharmas associated with them that are of the same category. Similarly also, the past roots of good are homogeneous cause of past and present roots of good, and the past and present roots of good are homogeneous cause of future roots of good.

¹⁶ The anuśayas are the perverse tendencies by virtue of which actions are accumulated (upacayaṃ gacchantī) and are capable of producing a new existence (Kośa, V, p. 1). Scholasticism lists 98 of them. Among them, 11 are called universal (sarvatraga) because they take as object their entire dhātu (sakalasvadhātvāḷambanatvāt), in the sense that they are concerned with all categories of their dhātu in the sphere of existence in which the individual in whom they occur is born (Kośa, V, p. 32 at bottom). These 11 universals are: 1-7) the five dṛṣṭis, satkāyadṛṣṭi, etc., to be abandoned by the seeing of suffering (duḥkhadarśanaprahātavya), plus two dṛṣṭis, mithyāḍṛṣṭi and śīlavrataparāmarśadrṣṭi, to be abandoned by the seeing of the origin (samudayadarśana-prahātavya); 8-9) the two vicikitsās (doubts concerning the reality of suffering and of non-suffering), to be destroyed by the seeing of suffering and of the origin (duḥkhasamudaya-darśanaprahātavya); 10-11) the two kinds of avidyā, one associated with the other anuśayas, the other alone (āveṇiki), both of which are to be abandoned by the seeing of suffering and of the origin (cf. Kośa, V, p. 31; Kośavyākhyā, p. 458, l. 10-16).

These universals are sarvatragahetu. The Kośavyākhyā, p. 89, l. 3 states: Svabhūmikaḥ pūrvotpannāḥ sarvatragā dharmāḥ paścimānām kliṣṭānām dharmānām sarvatragahetuḥ. – The universal dharmas belonging to a certain stage and previously arisen [i.e., past or present] are the universal cause of later defiled dharmas.

¹⁷ According to the simplest interpretation, the vipākahetu is the cause involving ripening. Morally defined actions, whether bad (aśubha = akuśala) or good-impure, produce an unpleasant or a pleasant fruit of ripening respectively, but always morally indeterminate. Hence the definition of Kośa, II, p. 271: Vipākahetur aśubhāḥ kuśalāś sāsravāḥ.

[Immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaya)]. – When the minds-and-mental-events (cittacaitta) follow one another in order (kramaśas) without intermediary (anantaram), there is the immediately preceding condition.¹⁸

[Object condition (ālambanapratyaya)]. – When the minds-and-mental-events (cittacaitta) arise and take things as object (viśayān ālambya), there is the object condition.¹⁹

Dominant condition (adhipatipratyaya)]. – At the moment of their arising, the dharmas do not obstruct one another mutually: that is an absence of obstacle (avighna) [called dominant condition].²⁰ <2177>

[b. Number of conditions occurring in the different types of dharmas].²¹

1) The mind and mental events arise as a result of four conditions (caturbhiś cittacaittāḥ).

2) The absorption of non-conception (asamjñīsamāpatti) and the absorption of cessation (nirodhasamāpatti) arise as a result of three conditions [hetupratyaya, samanantarapratyaya, adhipatipratyaya], with the exclusion of the object condition (ālambanapratyaya).

3) The other dharmas, namely, the other formations not associated with the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) and the material dharmas (rūpa) arise as a result of two conditions [hetupratyaya and adhipatipratyaya], with the exclusion of the immediately preceding condition (samanantarapratyaya) and the object condition (ālambanapratyaya).

¹⁸ The minds-and-mental-events which immediately precede other minds-and-mental-events are samanantarapratyaya of the latter.

¹⁹ Every dharma indiscriminately is capable of being taken by the mind and the mental events associated with the latter. When a consciousness arises by taking it as object, this dharma is the ālambanapratyaya of this consciousness.

²⁰ The adhipatipratyaya manifests in such a way that it never presents an obstacle in any circumstance: this is its only activity (Kośabhāṣya, p. 101, l. 4-5: adhipatipratyayas tu sarvasyām avasthāyām anāvaraṇabhāvenāvasthita ity etad asya kāritram). The cause called ‘raison d’être’ is the dominant condition. This dominant condition is the one that belongs to the greatest number of dharmas or that acts on the greatest number of dharmas (Kośabhāṣya, p. 100, l. 12-15: ya eva kāraṇahetuḥ sa evādhipatipratyayaḥ ... adhiko 'yaṃ pratyayaḥ adhikasya vā pratyayaḥ).

Every dharma is kāraṇahetu with respect to all dharmas except for itself. Every dharma is kāraṇahetu of all conditioned dharmas except for itself insofar as it appears as not being an obstacle to the arising of the others (Kośabhāṣya, p. 82, l. 23-24: svato 'nye kāraṇahetuḥ. saṃskṛtasya hi dharmasya svabhāvavarjyāḥ sarvadharmaḥ kāraṇahetuḥ. avighnabhāvāvasthānāt).

The author of the Traité, or his translator Kumārajīva, avoids the term kāraṇahetu and substitutes wou tchang yin for it, probably avighnakāraṇa ‘the cause which is not an obstacle’. On the different ways of translating kāraṇahetu, see A. Hirakawa, Kośa Index I, p. 129, l. 14-15.

²¹ Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 136, p. 703a3-b1; Abhidharmasāra, T 1550, k. 1, p. 812a17-b13; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 1, p. 970b11-14; Kośa, II, p. 309-311; Kośabhāṣya, p. 101, l. 6-20.

The conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmas), being weak by nature (svabhāvadaurbalyatvāt), none of them arise from a single condition.²²

[c. Number of causes occurring in the various types of dharmas].²³

1) The mind and mental events (cittacaitta), when they arise from retribution (vipākaja), arise from five causes [kāraṇahetu, sahabhūhetu, [297a] sabhāgaḥetu, saṃprayuktahetu and vipākahetu]. Being non-defiled-indeterminate (anivṛtavyākṛta) and not being afflicted (akliṣṭa), they exclude the universal cause (sarvatragahetu).²⁴ <2178>

2) When they are afflicted (kliṣṭa), the mind and mental events also arise from five causes [kāraṇahetu, sahabhūhetu, sabhāgaḥetu, saṃprayuktahetu and sarvatragahetu], excluding the ripening cause (vipākahetu). Why? These kleśas are defiled (nivṛta) whereas the ripening (vipāka) itself is non-defiled (anivṛta); therefore the ripening cause should be excluded.

3) When they have arisen from retribution (vipāka), form (rūpa) and the formations non-associated with the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) arise from four causes [kāraṇahetu, sahabhūhetu, sabhāgaḥetu and vipākahetu]. Not being mind-and-mental-event (cittacaitta), they exclude the associated cause (saṃprayuktahetu); being non-defiled-indeterminate (anivṛtavyākṛta), they exclude the universal cause (sarvatragahetu).

4) When they are afflicted (kliṣṭa), form (rūpa) and the formations non-associated with the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) also arise from four causes [kāraṇahetu, sahabhūhetu, sabhāgaḥetu and sarvatragahetu]. Not being mind-and-mental-event (cittacaitta), they exclude the associated cause (saṃprayuktahetu); being afflicted (kliṣṭa), they exclude the ripening cause (vipākahetu).

5) The other minds-and mental-events (śeṣāś cittacaittāḥ), except for the minds pure for the first time (prathamānāsrava),²⁵ arise from four causes [kāraṇahetu, sahabhūhetu, sabhāgaḥetu and īśvarapurūṣapradhānādikaṃ kāraṇam. – All the essences arising from four conditions at most and from two at least, the theistic or Sāṃkhya systems that make the world depend on a single condition are to be excluded.

²² Kośabhāṣya, p. 101, l. 19-20: Pratyayebhyo bhāvā upajāyante na punaḥ sarvasyaiva jagataḥ

²³ Abhidharmasāra, T 1550, k. 1, p. 811c1-812a17; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 1, p. 970b3-11; Kośa, II, p. 297-298; Kośabhāṣya, p. 97, l. 14-98, l. 2.

²⁴ Anivṛta-avyākṛta (pou yin mou wou ki in Kumārajīva, wou feou wou ki in Hui-an-tsang), which may be rendered as ‘non-defiled-indeterminate’. This is an anivṛta mind, not covered by afflictive emotion (na keśācchadita) and avyākṛta, indeterminate from the moral point of view, i.e., neither good (kuśala) nor bad (akuśala), and thereby unable to project and bring about a fruit of retribution (phalapratiṅgrahanādanāśamartha).

The afflictive emotions (kleśa) and the dharmas associated with them or deriving their origin from them are called kliṣṭa, soiled, tainted.

²⁵ The prathamānāsravas are the first pure dharmas of the Path of seeing the truths, namely, the duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti and the dharmas co-existing with this kṣānti. See above, p. 130F as note, 214F, 651F, 747F, 1412F, 1796F.

saṃprayuktakahetu], excluding the ripening cause (vipākahetu) and the universal cause (sarvatragahetu). Why? Not being indeterminate (avyākṛta), they exclude the ripening cause (vipākahetu); not being afflicted (kliṣṭa), they exclude the universal cause (sarvatragahetu).

6) In regard to other things not associated with the mind (anye cittaprayuktadharmāḥ), namely, form (rūpa) and the formations non-associated with the mind (cittaprayuktasaṃskāra), it is necessary to distinguish]:

a. If they have a homogeneous cause (sabhāgaheṭu), they arise from three causes [kāraṇahetu, sahabhūheṭu and sabhāgaheṭu], excluding the associated cause (saṃprayuktahetu), the ripening cause (vipākahetu) and the universal cause (sarvatragahetu).

b. If they do not have a homogeneous cause (sabhāgaheṭu), they arise <2179> from two causes: the simultaneous cause (sahabhūheṭu) and the cause ‘not making an obstacle’ (avighnakāraṇa) [commonly designated by the name kāraṇahetu].

7) As for form (rūpa) and the formations non-associated with the mind (cittaviprayukta-saṃskāra), occurring in minds pure for the first time (prathamānāsravacitta), they arise from two causes: the simultaneous cause (sahabhūheṭu) and the cause ‘not making an obstacle’ (avighnakāraṇa).

There are no dharmas that are derived from one single cause (ekahetusaṃbhūto nāsti dharmāḥ).²⁶

The six causes (heṭu) make up the four conditions (pratyaya).

2. Causality according to the Perfection of Wisdom

The bodhisattva who practices the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā) considers the four conditions (pratyaya), but his mind is not attached to them (saṅga); even though he distinguishes (vibhajati) these dharmas, he knows that they are empty (śūnya) and like magical transformations (nirmāṇasama). Although in magical transformations there are many varieties (nānāvidhaviśeṣa), the wise man who considers them knows that they have no reality: they are only trompe-l’œil (caṣṣurvañcana), thought-constructions (vikalpa). He knows that the teachings of ordinary people (prthagjanadharmā) are all erroneous (viparita), lies (mṛṣāvāda), without reality. Is there anything real there where there are the four pratyayas? And since the teachings of the saints (bhadrāryadharmā) are derived from the teachings of ordinary people, they too are unreal.

As has been said above (p. 2142F, 2146F) in regard to the eighteen emptinesses, for a bodhisattva in the perfection of wisdom, there is no determinate nature (niyatasvabhāva) in any dharma either capable of being grasped or capable consequently of being rejected (bhinna). But as beings are attached (sakta) to the emptiness of causes and conditions, they say that they can be rejected.²⁷ <2180>

²⁶ Actually the kāraṇahetu and the sahabhūheṭu are never absent.

Thus, seeing the moon reflected in the water (udakacandra), the little child is greedy for it and is attracted to it; but when he wants to grab it and does not succeed, he feels sad and annoyed. The wise man instructs him, saying: “This moon can be seen (drṣṭa) with the eyes but it cannot be seized (grhita) with the hand.” The wise man denies only that it can be seized; he does not claim that it cannot be seen. In the same way, the bodhisattva sees and knows that all dharmas arise from the four conditions (pratyaya) but he does not grasp any determinate nature (niyatalakṣaṇa) in these conditions. Dharmas arising from the complex of the four conditions (catuspratyayasāmagrīja) are like the moon [297b] reflected in water (udakacandra). Although this moon is false and non-existent (asat), it necessarily arises from causes and conditions – namely, water (udaka) and the moon (candra) – and does not come from other conditions. It is the same for dharmas; each one arises from its own causes and conditions and has no fixed reality.

This is why [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] says here that “the bodhisattva who wants to understand the causal condition, the immediately preceding condition, the object condition and the dominant condition in accordance with the truth, must practice the perfection of wisdom.”

Question. – If one wants to understand completely the meaning of the four conditions (pratyaya), one must study the Abhidharma. Why then does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] say here that “in order to understand the four conditions, it is necessary to study the Prajñāpāramitā”?

Answer. – In the explanation dedicated by the Abhidharma to the four conditions, the beginner (ādikarmika) believes that it touches realities, but, if he examines them and goes into depth, he falls into wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi) like those that you have formulated above (p. 2172F) in rejecting the four conditions.²⁸ <2181>

²⁷ The principle of causality is an axiom that is imposed on the human mind, but on reflecting, some take it to be well-founded, others to be purely illusory.

The writers of the Abhidharma hold it to be valid: they think that that real dharmas arise from real causes and conditions; they seize their characteristics (nimitta) and adopt them (grhṇanti): they fall into realism.

The fundamentalist Mādhyamikas, like the one who appears at the beginning of this section, judge concepts of cause and effect to be absurd and reject (niśedhanti) the hetus and pratyayas as non-existent (asat): they are on the brink of nihilism.

Other Mādhyamikas, basing themselves on the true nature of dharmas. which is the absence of any nature, abstain from affirming or denying the hetus and pratyayas in which they recognize neither existence nor non-existence. This is the position taken by the author of the Traité. Slightly less drastic than the preceding, it has the advantage of not laying itself open to any criticism. It is the position of an adult explaining to a child that the moon reflected in the water is ‘seen’ when there is a moon and there is water to reflect it, but it cannot be ‘grabbed’ because it is nothing and never will be any thing.

For the udakacandra, see above, p. 364F.

²⁸ The author has commented above (p. 1095F) that the study of Abhidharma leads to realism, whereas the teaching on emptiness ends up in nihilism. The Buddha condemned the extreme views of astī and nastī, of astitā and nastitā (see p.

Furthermore, if dharmas, as causes, depend on the four conditions, how are these four conditions caused in turn? If they themselves have causes, there is an infinite regression (anavasthā); wherever there is an infinite regression, there is no beginning point (ādi); if there is no beginning, there is no cause (hetu) and hence all dharmas would be without cause (ahetuka). If there was a beginning, this beginning would be uncaused and, existing without being caused, it would not depend on causes and conditions. That being so, all dharmas themselves would exist without depending on causes and conditions.

Furthermore, dharmas arising from causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamutpanna) are of two kinds:

- a. If they pre-exist in the causes and conditions, they arise independently of causes and conditions and there is neither cause nor condition for them.
- b. If they do not pre-exist in the causes and conditions, they are each without their respective causes and conditions.

By futile chatter about the four conditions, one comes up against such errors (doṣa). But the emptiness consisting of non-perception (anupalambhaśūnyatā) of which it was a matter above (p. 2145-2149F) in the Prajñāpāramitā, does not present such faults. Thus, birth, old age, sickness and death (jātijarāvvyādhimaraṇa) perceived by the eyes and the ears of ordinary people are considered by them to be existent, but, if their characteristics (nimitta) are examined subtly, they are non-existent (anupalabdhā). This is why in the Prajñāpāramitā, only the wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) are eliminated, but the four conditions are not rejected. This is why it is said here that "in order to understand the [real] nature of the four conditions, the perfection of wisdom should be studied.

Dharmatā

Second Section UNDERSTANDING DHARMATĀ AND ITS SYNONYMS

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The problem of causality was the object of the preceding section: the author came to the conclusion that if this question is asked from the point of view of apparent truth (saṃvṛtisatya), it is to be rejected, or, rather, to be dismissed from the point of view of absolute truth (paramārthasatya).

Here he passes on to a connected question which is that of the sarvadharmāṇāṃ dharmatā, 'the dharma-nature of dharmas', an expression which Kumārajīva usually translates as tchou-fa-che-siang: 'the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas' (see vol. III, Introduction, p. xliiF).

2007F), and the Prajñāpāramitā is the non-grasping (aparigraha) and the non-rejection (anutsarga) of all dharmas (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 135, l. 2).

Dharmatā often appears in a list of synonyms which has increased over time. Contrary to the Tibetans, the Chinese lack consistency in their way of rendering these terms. The equivalents <2182> proposed by Kumārajīva are not repeated by Hiuan-tsang, and, on the pain of falling into unfortunate confusion, it is important to distinguish them carefully:

1. dharmatā, chos ṅid, che siang (K), fa eul, fa sing (H).
2. 'manner of being', tathatā, de bśin ṅid, jiu (K), tchen jou (K).
3. 'fundamental element', dharmadhātu, chos kyi dbyiṅs, fa sing (K), fa kiai (H).
4. 'limit of truth', bhūtakōṭi, yag dag paḥi mthaḥ, che tsi (K), che tsi (H).

The passage of the Pañcaviṃśati commented on here by the Traité is limited to these four terms, but other lists, more complete, have already been proposed by the earliest canonical texts:

Samyutta, II, p. 25, l. 19-20: dhātu, dharmatṭhitatā, dharmaniyāmatā, idappaccayatā.

Samyutta, II, p. 26, l. 5-6: tathatā, avitathatā, anaññathatā, idappaccayatā.

Nidānasamyukta, p. 148: dharmatā, dharmasthitaye dhātuḥ.

Ibid., p. 149: dharmatā, dharmasthitatā, dharmaniyāmatā, dharmayathatathā, avitathatā, ananyathā, bhūta, satyatā, tattva, thatāthātā, aviparītātā, aviparyastatā, idampratyatā, pratītyasamutpādānulomatā.

Ibid., p. 164: dharmatā, dharmasthitaye dhātuḥ.

Anguttara, I, p. 286, l. 7-8: dhātu, dharmatṭhitatā, dharmaniyāmatā.

Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 168: dharmatā, dharmasthitaye dhātuḥ.

Śālistamba, ed. Sastri, p. 4, l. 5-7: dharmatā, dharmasthititā, dharmaniyāmatā, pratītyasamutpādasamatā, tathatā, aviparītathatā, ananyatathatā, bhūtātā, satyatā, aviparītātā, aviparyastatā.

Sūtra cited in Kośavyākhyā, p. 293, l. 27-28: dharmatā, dharmasthititā, dharmaniyāmatā, tathatā, avitathatā, ananyatathatā, bhūtātā, satyatā tattvam, aviparītātā, aviparyastatā.

The word bhūtakōṭi does not appear in our nomenclatures.

What is this dharmatā the many synonyms of which emphasize its importance rather than its complexity? Buddhist practitioners conceive of it differently according to whether they belong to the Lesser or the Greater Vehicle.

1. The Hīnayānist dharmatā

According to the word of the Buddha himself, dharmatā is the conditioned production of phenomena, the pratīyasamutpāda discovered by Śākyamuni and preached by him throughout his entire career.

Two sūtras of the Saṃyukta are significant:

Nidānasamyukta, p. 147-148; Saṃyutta, II, p. 25-26: Pratītyasamutpādaṃ vo bhikkhavo deśayiṣye ... / pratītyasamutpādaḥ katamaḥ / yadutāsmiṃ satīdaṃ bhavaty asyotpādād idam utpadyate / yadutāvidyāpratītyayāḥ saṃskārā yāvat <2183> samudayo bhavati / avidyāpratītyayāḥ saṃskārā ity utpādād vā tathāgatānāṃ anutpādād vā sthītā eveyaṃ dharmatā dharmasthitaye dhātuḥ /- I will show you, O monks, the dependent origination. What is dependent origination? The fact that ‘this being, that is; from the production of this, that is produced’, namely, that ‘the formations have ignorance as condition’, etc., up to ‘such is the origin of the mass of suffering’. Whether a Tathāgata appears or whether a Tathāgata does not appear, this dharmatā, the basis for the existence of things, is stable.

Nidānasamyukta, p. 164: Kin nu Bhagavatā pratītyasamutpādaḥ kṛta aho svid anyaiḥ / na bhikṣo mayā pratītyasamutpādaḥ kṛto nāpy anyaiḥ / api tūtpādād vā tathāgatānāṃ anutpādād vā sthītā eveyaṃ dharmatā dharmasthitaye dhātuḥ / - Was dependent origination made by the Lord or rather by others? Dependent origination, O monks, was not made by me or by others, and, whether there appears a Tathāgata or there does not appear a Tathāgata, this dharmatā, the basis for the existence of things, is stable.

These two texts do not lend themselves to any confusion. Conditioned dharmas (saṃskāra, saṃskṛtadharma) are, by definition, the result of causes and conditions. Their dependent production (pratītyasamutpāda) is a fixed rule, a stable dharmatā, and the latter has not been made either by the Buddha or by any one else.

The question is whether this dharmatā leads to an abstract determinism or whether it constitutes an independent entity, in other words, whether it should be placed among the saṃskṛta endowed with the three characteristics of the conditioned (saṃskṛtalakṣaṇa), viz., production (utpāda), disappearance (vaya) and duration-change (sthitanyathātva) – cf. p. 36-37F, 922F, 1163F, 2051F, 2078F – or among the asaṃskṛtas completely free of these very characteristics.

The Hīnayāna schools respond differently to this question for the good reason that they do not agree on the number of asaṃskṛtas: one, three, four, five or even nine (see references to these schools in L. de La Vallée Poussin, Nirvāṇa, p. 180-187).

The Vaibhāṣikas of the Madhyadeśa, the Uttarāpathakas, the Mahimsāsakas, the Pubbaseliyas, the Mahīśāsakas and the Mahāsaṃghikas include the pratītyasamutpāda or its synonym, tathatā, among their asaṃskṛtas.

This is not the opinion of the Ceylonese Theravādins, the ones closest to the Word of the Buddha, who recognize only one asamkhata, Nibbāna. The patīccasamuppāda is a rule and not an entity.

Their spokesman, Buddhaghosa, comments in his Visuddhimagga (ed. H. C. Warren, p. 441):

Jarāsaraṇādīnaṃ dhammānaṃ paccayakkhaṇo paṭīccasamuppādo, dukkhānubandhanaraso, kummaggapaccupattāno ti vedītabbo. So pañāyaṃ tehi tehi paccayehi anonādhikeh’ eva tassa tassa dhammassa sambhavato tathatā ti, sāmaggīupagatesu paccayesu muhuttam pi tato nibbattanadhammānaṃ asambhavābhāvato avitathatā ti, aññadhammapaccayehi aññadhammānupattito anaññathatā ti, yathāvuttānaṃ etesaṃ jarāmaraṇādīnaṃ paccayato vā paccayasamūhato vā idapaccayatā ti vitto. – Conditioned origination has, as nature, being the condition of the dharmas old-age-death, etc.; as flavor, it has the prolongation of suffering; it shows itself as the bad path (= samsāra). Because such and such a dharma comes only from a definite number of such and such conditions, <2184> it is called tathatā. Because once these conditions have come together, it is impossible, even for an instant, for the dharmas that are derived from it to be produced, it is called avitathatā. Because dharmas do not arise from other conditions than their own, it is called anaññathatā. Because for the old-age-death in question, there is one condition or a group of conditions, it is called idapaccayatā.

The Sarvāstivādins assume three asaṃskṛtas: Space (ākāśa) and the two Nirvāṇas (pratisaṃkhyānirodha and apratisaṃkhyānirodha), but they do not consider pratītyasamutpāda to be an asaṃskṛta, for everything that is ‘production’ (utpāda) is obviously conditioned. Vasubandhu (Kośa, II, p. 77) makes the following comment about the Hīnyāna schools that place the pratītyasamutpāda with the asaṃskṛtas:

“Some schools (nikāyāntariya) maintain that the pratītyasamutpāda is unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) because the sūtra says: ‘Whether a Tathāgata appears or whether a Tathāgata does not appear, this dharmatā is stable.’ – This thesis is true or false according to the way it is interpreted (tad etadabhiprāyavaśād evaṃ ca na caivam). If one means that it is always as a result of avidyā, etc., that the saṃskāras, etc., are produced, not ‘without condition or because of another thing’ (apratīyānayaḍ vā pratītya); that, in this sense, the pratītyasamutpāda is eternal (nitya), we agree. If one means that there exists a certain special entity (kimcid bhāvānantaram) called pratītyasamutpāda which is eternal, that is unacceptable since production (utpāda) is characteristic of the conditioned (utpādasya saṃskṛtalakṣaṇa).”

- Indeed, it is absurd to claim that a conditioned origination is eternal, for production means ‘existence following upon non-existence’ (abhūtyābhāva).

2. The Mahāyānist dharmatā

The reasoning of the Mahāyānists is not lacking in subtlety. It can be schematized in the following way:

1. For the Early ones, the true nature of conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛta) is to come from conditions (pratītyasamutpāna). According to them, dharmatā = pratītyasamutpāda.
2. For us, dharmas coming from conditions do not exist in themselves, do not exist by themselves, are without characteristics (lakṣaṇa) and consequently do not arise. For us, pratītyasamutpāda = anutpāda.
3. To attribute a characteristic of non-arising to dharmas is to make them into unconditioned. Anutpāna = asaṃskṛta.
4. To attribute to the unconditioned any characteristic whatsoever is to change them into conditioned dharmas. Therefore asaṃskṛta = Saṃskṛta.

5. Backing away from this absurd conclusion, it is necessary to recognize that dharmas are neither saṃskṛta nor asaṃskṛta (cf. above, p. 2077-2085F, Śūnyatās no. 7 and 8), neither pratītyasamutpanna nor apratītyasamutpanna, and that their dharmatā is not absolute but contingent. Whether it is called dharmatā, tathatā, dharmadhātu, bhūtakoti, śūnyatā, original nirvāṇa, it has as unique nature the absence of nature: ekalakṣanā yadutalakṣaṇa <2185> (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 164, 225, 244, 258, 261, 262 and above, p. 1376F, 1382F, 1694F, 1703F, etc.).

While keeping the early phraseology and the early classifications, the Mahāyāna sūtras and śāstras refuse to adopt the objectifying of the dharmatā. Here are a few citations chosen from many others:

1. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 168, l. 11-17; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1262, l. 1-3, 13-17: Katame Bhagavan saṃskṛtā dharmāḥ / bhagavān āha / kāmādhātū rūpadhātūr ārūpyadhātūr ye 'py anye kecit traidātukaparyāpannā dharmāḥ / saptatṛiṃśad bodhipakṣādayo dharmāḥ / ima ucyante saṃskṛtā dharmāḥ // katame bhagavann asaṃskṛtā dharmāḥ / bhagavān āha / yeṣāṃ dharmāṇāṃ notpādo na nirodho nānyathātvam prajñāyate rāgakṣayo dveṣakṣayo mohakṣayaś ca / tathatā, avitathatā, ananyatathatā, dharmatā, dharmadhātūr, dharmasthitā, dharmaniyāmatā, bhūtakotiḥ / ima ucyante 'saṃskṛtā dharmāḥ /

Which, O Lord, are the conditioned dharmas? The Lord answered: The realm of desire, the form realm, the formless realm (i.e., the threefold world where saṃsāra takes place) and also some other dharmas included in the conditioned element, for example, the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment: they are called conditioned dharmas. – Which, O Lord, are the unconditioned dharmas? The dharmas where neither production nor disappearance nor change occur (that is, free from the three natures of the conditioned); the cessation of desire, the cessation of hatred, the cessation of delusion (otherwise called: nirvāṇa); the way of being and its synonyms up to and including the culmination of truth: all that is called unconditioned dharmas.

All these dharmas arbitrarily classed as saṃskṛta and asaṃskṛta are without inherent nature (svabhāva) and have non-existence as their own nature:

Pañcaviṃśati, p. 136-137: Rūpaṃ virahitaṃ rūpasvabhāvena yāvad bhūtakotiḥ api virahitā bhūtakotiḥsvabhāvena ... / abhāvo rūpasya svabhāvaḥ yāvad abhāvo bhūtakotiḥsvabhāvaḥ. – Form is without the inherent nature of form and so on, up to: the culmination of the real is without the inherent nature of the culmination of the real ... The inherent nature of form is a non-existence, and so on up to: the inherent nature of the culmination of the real is a non-existence.

2. The dharmatā of dharmas is emptiness, the non-existence of all dharmas.

Daśabhūmika, p. 65, l. 19-22: Api tu khalu puṇaḥ kulaputraiṣā sarvadharmāṇāṃ dharmatā / utpādād vā tathāgatānāṃ anutpādād vā sthitaivaṣā dharmatā dharmadhātusthitiḥ / ya idaṃ sarvadharmasūnyatā sarvadharmānupalabdhīḥ. – Furthermore, O sons of good family, here is what this dharmatā of all dharmas is: Whether there is appearance of a Tatha,ata or whether there is non-appearance of a Tathāgata, this dharmatā is stable, this steadiness of the fundamental element, namely, the emptiness of all dharmas, the non-existence of all dharmas.

3. Because of this emptiness, of this non-existence, all dharmas are equal: saṃskṛta and asaṃskṛta are one and the same. The dharmatā is the equality of all things:

Aṣṭādaśa, II, p. 126: Sā puṇaḥ sarvadharmāṇāṃ samatā katamā / bhagavān āha / tathātā avitathatā ananyatathatā dharmatā dharmadhātūr dharmasthitiḥ dharmaniyāmatā bhūtakotiḥ / yo 'sāv utpādād vā tathāgatānām ...

4. The pratītyasamutpāda which the Early ones held to be real and termed <2186> dharmatā, the Mādhyamikas call emptiness, nirvāṇa. This nirvāṇa, which is one with saṃsāra, is empty of nirvāṇa. – See above, p. 2015-2018F.

In the Madhyamaka philosophy, there is so little room for the Absolute that it can be neither affirmed nor denied. To qualify it as anīrvacaniya does not mean that it is ‘ineffable’, but simply that there is no reason to speak of it.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 24, l. 18-21; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 81, l. 1-11). – Moreover, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to understand the manner of being of all dharmas, the fundamental element, the pinnacle of the truth, must practice the perfection of wisdom. This is how, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva should become established in the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena sarvadharmatathatāṃ bhūtakotiṃ avaboddhukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam. Evaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ sthātavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. TATHATĀ, DHARMADHĀTU AND BHŪTAKOṬI²⁹

²⁹ Among the many synonyms of dharmatā, the sūtra mentions here only three, of which the third, the bhūtakoti, did not appear in the Hīnayāna phraseology. In the Vijñānavādin treatises, which place the dharmatā among the asaṃskṛtas, there are more explanations, more concise than those of the Traité.

Madhyantavibhāgbhāṣya, ed. G. M. Nagao, p. 23-24: Ananyathārthena tathatā nityan tathāveti kṛtvā / aviparyāsārthena bhūtakotiḥ viparyāsāvastutvāt / nimittanirodhārthenānimittam sarvanimittābhāvāt / āryajñānagocaratvāt paramārthaḥ / paramajñānaviśayatvād āryadharmaheturvād dharmadhātuh / āryadharmāṇāṃ tadāmbanaprabhavatvāt / hetvartho hy atra dhātvarthaḥ / - [Śūnyatā] is tathatā because, unchanging, it dwells always the same. It is bhūtakoti because, without error, it is free of error. It is ānimitta because, destroying the characteristic marks, it is the absence of any mark. It is paramārtha because it is the domain of the saint's knowledge. It is dharmadhātu because it is the object of supreme knowledge and the cause of the dharmas of the saint inasmuch as it is the support and the place of origin of the dharmas of the saint: here dhātu has the meaning of cause.

See also Abhidharmasamuccaya, ed. P. Pradhan, p. 12, l. 20-13, l. 5 (transl. W. Rahula, p. 18-19); Abhidharmasamuccayaavākhyā, T 1606, k. 2, p. 702b4-22; Buddhabhūmi, T 1530, k. 7, p. 323a25-29. – Note that these Vijñānavādin texts recognize a reality in the dharmatā which the Madhyamaka categorically rejects.

1) The Tathatā ‘manner of being’ of all dharmas is of two kinds: i) the specific nature (svalakṣaṇa) belonging to each dharma; ii) the dharmatā ‘true nature’.

The specific nature belonging to each dharma is, for example, the solidity (khakkhaṭatva) of earth (prthivi), the wetness (dravatva) of water (ap-), the warmth of fire (uṣṇatva) of fire (tejas), the mobility (īraṇatva) <2187> of wind (vāyu): such natures differentiate dharmas, each of which has its own nature.

The dharmatā distinguishes and postulates, in these specific natures, an ungraspable (anupalabdha), indestructible (abhedya) reality (tattva) free of defects (nirdoṣa). See (p. 2121-2126F) what has been said in regard to the emptiness of specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇasūnyatā).

Indeed, if earth (prthivi) is really solid, how can it be that glue (gavyadṛdha)³⁰, etc., when brought near the fire, loses [this solidity] which is its [297c] intrinsic nature (svabhāva)? How can it be that the man endowed with the superknowledge of the working of magic (ṛddhyabhijñā) sinks into the earth as if it were water? How does it happen that by cutting and breaking up wood (kāṣṭha) or stone (śilā), they lose their solidity? And how can it be that by reducing earth into fine dust (rajas) and hitting the latter with a stick, the earth finally disappears into the void (śūnya) and loses its nature of solidity? Examined in this way, the inherent nature of earth is non-existent (anupalabdha). But that which is non-existent is truly empty (śūnya). Therefore emptiness is the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of earth. And it is the same for all [so-called] specific natures (bhinnalakṣaṇa). This emptiness is called tathatā.

2) The dharmadhātu. – As I have said above (p. 2126F and following), dharmas taken individually (prthak, pratyekam) are empty. These emptinesses have their own respective modalities (viśeṣa) which are, however, tathatā. Together they form a single emptiness: the dharmadhātu.

This dharmadhātu itself is also of two kinds: the first, with a mind free of attachment (nirāsaṅgacittena), distinguishes (paricchinatti) dharmas as each having its own nature (svabhāva, prakṛti); the second is the immense dharma (apramāṇadharmā), i.e., the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇaṃ bhūtalakṣaṇam or dharmatā).

[Viśeṣacintibrahmapariprcchā]³¹. – As has been said in the Tch'e-sin king (Viśeṣacintasūtra): “The dharmadhātu is immense.”

The śrāvakas attain the dharmadhātu, but since their wisdom (prajñā) is limited (sapramāṇa), they cannot speak of its <2188> immensity (apramāṇam).³² In the case of the dharmadhātu, they are like the man who ³⁰ Example already used above, p. 1821F, 2232F.

³¹ T 586, k. 2, p. 43b12. – Above (p. 1848-1852F), the Traité cited a long extract from this Pariprcchā, where Śāriputra and the bodhisattva Samantapūsā exchanged views on the dharmadhātu. For the Chinese and Tibetan versions of this work, see p. 1268, note).

³² In the Saddharmapūṇḍarīka, p. 60, l. 8-10, Śāriputra, the most famed of the śrāvakas, having heard the first exposition of the Lotus, made the following comment to the Buddha: Tulye nāma dharmadhātupraveśe (in Tibetan: chos kyi dbyiṅs la hjug pa mtshuṅs na) vayaṃ bhagavatā hīnena yānena niryātītāḥ / evaṃ ca me bhagavatam tasmin samaye bhavaty asmākam evaiṣo 'parādho naiva bhagavato 'parādhaḥ /- In an equal introduction to the dharmadhātu [i.e., by introducing all of us alike – bodhisattvas and śrāvakas – into the dharmadhātu], Bhagavat has made us go by goes to the great ocean (mahāsamudra) to empty out the water but who uses a vessel (bhājana) so small that he cannot collect the immense waters.

3) The bhūtakoti. – Because the dharmadhātu is actually proven (bhūtena sāṅgātṛta), it is the culmination (koṭi) [of reality]. Thus “the saint (arhat) is established in the culmination of reality (bhūtakotyām vyavasthitaḥ).”³³

II. SYNONYMITY OF THE THREE WORDS

Question. – Tathatā, dharmadhātu and bhūtakoti: these three things are identical (ekārtha) or different (nānārtha). If they are the same, why use three words? If they are three different things, it would be fitting to distinguish them now.

Answer. – The three words are synonyms (paryāya) serving to designate the dharmatā. Why is that?

Ignorant worldly people (prthagjana) have wrong views (mithyādarśana) of all the dharmas and speak of permanent (nitya), happy (sukha), pure (śuci), real (bhūta) and personal (ātmaka) dharmas.³⁴

The disciples (śrāvaka) of the Buddha consider things according to their principal characteristics (maulalakṣaṇa). Then, not seeing any permanent dharmas, they speak of impermanence (anityatā); <2189> not seeing any happy dharmas, they speak about suffering (duḥkha); not seeing any pure dharmas, they speak about impurity (aśuci); not seeing any real dharmas, they speak about emptiness (śūnyatā), and not seeing any personal dharmas, they speak about non-self (anātman).

But, while not seeing permanent dharmas, seeing impermanence (anityatā) is a wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi).³⁵ And it is the same for the views of suffering, emptiness, non-self and impurity. That is what is called tathatā.

the Lower Vehicle. And so this thought has presented itself to me: it is, without a doubt, our [the śrāvakas'] fault, not the Bhagavat's.

- For this interpretation, see E. Burnouf, Lotus, p. 39, 361. The indivisibility (aprabheda) of the dharmadhātu has the single Vehicle as its corollary. Question in regard to the single Vehicle has been treated exhaustively by L. Hurvitz in One Vehicle or Three?, transl. into English by L. Hurvitz, Jour. Ind. Phil., 3 (1975), p. 79-166.

³³ Allusion to the canonical saying: Tiṇṇo pāraṃgato thale tiṭṭhati brāhmaṇo: “Having crossed over and attained the other shore, the brāhmaṇa is on solid ground” (Anguttara, II, p. 5-6; IV, p. 11-13; Samyutta, IV, p. 157, 174-175; Itivuttaka, p. 57). In this saying, brāhmaṇa means arahata, and pāraṃgata is synonymous with koṭigata (cf. Mahāniddesa, I, p. 20).

³⁴ Worldly people fall into the four mistakes (viparyāsa), particularly the wrong view of eternalism (śāśvatadrṣṭi).

³⁵ The śrāvakas fall into the wrong view of annihilation (ucchedadrṣṭi), for it is one thing to determine that all dharmas are impermanent and another thing to hypostatize this impermanence (anityatā). Eternalism and nihilism have both been condemned by the Buddha (cf. p. 155F, etc.)

The tathatā is fundamentally indestructible (avināśin); this is why, [in the Chandasūtra of the Saṃyuktāgama] the Buddha enunciated the three rules constituting the three Seals of the Dharma (dharmamudrā), namely: i) “All conditioned dharmas are impermanent (sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ); ii) All dharmas are non-self (sarvadharmā anātmāṇaḥ); iii) Nirvāṇa is peace (śāntam nirvāṇam).”³⁶

Question. – But these three Seals of the Dharma are completely broken (upaghāta) by the Prajñāpāramitā[sūtra] where the Buddha says to Subhūti: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who considers form (rūpa) to be permanent (nitya) is not practicing the perfection of wisdom; the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who considers form to be impermanent (anitya) is not practicing the perfection of wisdom. And it is the same if he considers it as happy (sukha) or unhappy (duḥkha), self (ātman) or non-self (anātman), peaceful (śānta) or non-peaceful (aśānta).”³⁷ That being so, why speak of the Seals of the Dharma?

Answer. – The two sūtras [touched on here, namely, the Chandasūtra and the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] are both the Word of the Buddha (buddhavacana), but it is in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra that the Buddha spoke most clearly about the true nature of dharmas (dharmatā or bhūtalakṣaṇa). <2190>[298a]

There are people who, being attached to the error of permanence (nityam iti viparyāse 'bhiniviṣṭa), reject this eternalist view (śāśvatadrṣṭi) but are not, however, attached to impermanence (anityatā): this is the true Seal of the Dharma (dharmamudā). The fact of rejecting eternalism (śāśvata) and [in turn] adopting impermanence (anityatā) should not be considered as a Seal of the Dharma. It is the same in regard to the view of self (ātmadrṣṭi) and the other views up to that of peace (śāntadrṣṭi).

In the Prajñāpāramitā, [the Buddha] condemns attachment (abhiniveśa) to the wrong views of impermanence, etc., (anityādrṣṭi), but does not condemn the fact of accepting nothing (aparigraha), of adopting nothing (anabhiniveśa).³⁸

Having acquired this tathatā of dharmas, one penetrates into the dharmadhātu, one eliminates all opinions (vipaśyanā) and does not conceive any further beliefs, for “such is its essence (prakṛtir asyaīśā).”³⁹

Thus, when a small child (bālaka) sees the moon reflected in the water (udakacandra), he goes into the water to grab the moon but, unable to grab it, he is very sad. A wise person then tells him: “Such is its essence; so don’t be sad (daurmanasya).”

³⁶ Chandasūtra of the Saṃyukta (T 99, no. 262, k. 10, p. 66b14), having as correspondent the Pāli Channasuttanta of the Saṃyutta, III, p. 132, l. 26-27. In the former, the Buddha states: Sarve saṃskārā anityāḥ, sarve dharmā anātmāṇaḥ, śāntam nirvāṇam; in the latter: Sabbe saṃkhārā aniccā, sabbe dhammā anattā. These are the seals of the Dharma (dharmamudrā): cf. p. 1369F.

³⁷ For the idea, cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 131 and foll., Śatasāhasrikā, p. 568 and foll.: Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyaṃ caratā rūpaṃ anityam iti ... rūpaṃ duḥkham iti ... rūpaṃ anātmēti ... rūpaṃ śāntam iti na sthātavya. Similarly for the other skandhas.

³⁸ Cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 135, l. 2: Yaḥ sarvadharmāṇām aparigraho 'nitsargaḥ sā prajñāpāramitā. – The fact of not accepting and not rejecting any dharma is the perfection of wisdom.

³⁹ Prakṛtir asyaīśā is a frequent refrain in Mahāyāna explanations: cf. p. 2031-2035F (definition of the 16 emptinesses), 2112F (in the Saṃrddhisūtra), 2114F note.

Finally, to completely penetrate (supravīdh-) the dharmadhātu is bhūtakoti.

III. TATHATĀ, DHARMADHĀTU AND BHŪTAKOṬI IN THE CANONICAL SŪTRAS

Question. – In the system of the śrāvakas, why do they not speak of the tathatā, dharmadhātu and bhūtakoti, whereas they are often spoken of in many places in the Mahāyāna system?

Answer. – There are some places in the system of the śrāvakas where they are also spoken of, but these places are rather rare.

1) [Bhikṣusūtra].⁴⁰ – Thus it is said in the Tsa-a-han (Saṃyuktāgama): <2191>

There was a certain bhikṣu who questioned the Buddha: Was the twelve-membered dependent origination (dvādaśāṅgapratītyasamutpāda) made by the Buddha or was it made by others?

The Buddha said to the bhikṣu: I myself did not make the twelve-membered dependent origination and it was not made by others.

Whether there are Buddhas or whether there are no Buddhas, the manner of being of the dharmas (dharmāṇaṃ tathatā), the dharma nature (dharmatā), the stability of dharmas (dharmasthititā), is eternal.

That is to say: this being, that is (yad utāsmīn satīdam bhavati), by the production of this, that is produced (asyotpādād idam utpadyte). That is to say: the formations have ignorance as condition (yad idam avidyāpratyayāḥ saṃskārāḥ), consciousness has the formations as condition (saṃskārapratyayaṃ vijñānam), and so on up to old-age-and-death (jarāmaraṇa) which is followed by grief (śoka), lamentation (parideva), suffering (duḥkha), sadness (daurmanasya) and torment (upāyāsa).⁴¹

⁴⁰ This sūtra, the original Sanskrit of which we now possess but which has no exact correspondent in the Pāli Nikāya, has already been called upon by the Traité, p. 157F n. It is the Bhikṣusūtra of the Saṃyuktāgama (T 99, no. 299, k. 12, p. 85b-c, Nidānasamīyukta, p. 164-165: Anyataro bhikṣur yena bhagavāms saṃskārā yāvat samudayo nirodhas ca bhavati /

Transl. – A certain monk went to where the Blessed one was. Having gone there and having bowed down to the feet of the Blessed one, he said to the Blessed One:

Was dependent origination made by the Blessed One or by others?

O monk, dependent origination was not made by me or by others.

However, whether a Tathāgata appears or does not appear, stable is this dharmatā, the foundation for the existence of things. The Tathāgata himself, having recognized and fully understood this [dependent origination], enunciates it, makes it known, establishes it, analyzes it, reveals it, preaches it, teaches and illuminates it.

Namely: “This being, that is; from the production of this that is produced”: “Formations have as condition ignorance”, and so on up to: “Such is the origin and the cessation [of this great mass of suffering]”.

⁴¹ Note that śokaparidevaduḥkhadauramanasya is not one of the aṅgas of the twelvefold chain.

This not being, that is not (asminn asatidaṃ na bhavati); by the cessation of this, that ceases (asya nirodhād idaṃ nirudhyate). That is to say: the cessation of ignorance results in the cessation of the formations (yad utāvidyānirodhāt saṃskāraṇirodhaḥ), by the <2192> cessation of the formations consciousness ceases (saṃskāraṇirodhād vijñāṇanirodhaḥ), and so on up to the cessation of old-age-and-death (jarāmaraṇa), by means of which grief (śoka), lamentation (parideva), suffering (duḥkha), sadness (daurmanasya) and torment (upāyāsa) cease.

- This law of production and cessation (utpādanirodhadharma), whether there is a Buddha or there is not a Buddha, is eternal. This is the place where it is a question of the tathatā.⁴²

2) [Śāriputrasimhanādasūtra].⁴³ – In the Tsa-a-han (Saṃyuktāgama), in the Chō-li-fou che-tseu heou king (Śāriputrasimhanādasūtra), it is said:

The Buddha questioned Śāriputra about the meaning of a verse (padārtha). Three times he asked him and three times Śāriputra was unable to answer. After the Buddha had given Śāriputra a brief instruction (alpanirdeśa), the Buddha went back to the vihāra to meditate.⁴⁴ <2193>

⁴² The Bhikṣusūtra us not the only canonical sūtra where tathatā occurs. The author could have mentioned the Paccayasuttanta of the Saṃyutta, II, p. 26, l. 5.

⁴³ The Traité has referred three times already (p. 220-221F; 1630F n. 2; 1746F) to this sūtra, all versions of which have been identified by E. Waldschmidt, Identifizierung einer Handschrift des Nidānasamyukta, ZDMG, 107 (957), p. 380-381:

1) Nidānasamyukta, p. 198-204. The scene takes place in Rājagṛha; the sūtra does not have a title, but here the Traité designates it under the name of Śāriputrasimhanādasūtra “Sūtra of the Lion’s Roar of Śāriputra”.
2) Saṃyuktāgama, sūtra 345, T 99, k. 14, p. 95b10-95c16. This is the Chinese version of the preceding.
3) Saṃyutta, II, p. 47-50. Sutta taking place at Sāvatthi and entitled Bhūtaṃ in the same text (Saṃyutta, II, p. 47, l. 8), Bhūtaṃ idaṃ in the Uddāna (ibid., p. 67, l. 29).
4) Saṃyutta, II, p. 54-56, sections III and IV of the Kaḷārasutta located at Sāvatthi.
- The Sanskrit-Chinese and Pāli versions show many divergences. C. Tripāthi has mentioned and discussed them in his remarkable edition of the Nidānasamyukta, p. 198-204.

⁴⁴ Nidānasamyutta, p. 198-203:

Tatra bhagavān āyusmantam śāriputram āmantrayati / uktam idaṃ śāriputra mayā parāyaṇeṣv ajitapraṇeṣu
/
ye ca saṅkhyātadharmāṇi ye ca śaikṣāḥ prthagvidhāḥ / teṣāṃ me nipakasyeryāṃ prṣṭaḥ prabrūhi mārīṣa //
ke śāriputra śaikṣāḥ ke ca saṅkhyātadharmāṇi /
Evam ukta āyusmāñ śāriputras tūṣṇi / dvir api trir api bhagavān āyusmantam śāriputra, idaṃ avocat... / dvir api trir api āyusmāñ śāriputras tūṣṇim abhūt / Evam etad bhūtaṃ [idaṃ] bhadanta ... / yad bhūtaṃ tan nirodhadharmaṃ iti veditvā nirodhadhamasya bhikṣur nirvide virāgāya nirodhāya paripanno bhavati / ima ucyante śaikṣāḥ ... yad bhūtaṃ tan nirodhadharmaṃ iti veditvā nirodhadhamasya bhikṣur nirvide virāgāya nirodhāyānupādāyasravebhyaḥ suvimuktacitto bhavati / ima ucyante saṅkhyātadharmāṇāḥ /

Evam etac śāriputra / ...

Atha bhagavān utthāyāsanaṃ vihāraṃ praviśat pratisaṃlayanāya //

Transl. – Then the Bhagavat said to the venerable Śāriputra: Śāriputra, it was said by me, in the Questions of Ajita, to the Parāyana: “Some have assessed things (saṅkhyātadharman) well; others - and they are diverse – are still practicing (śaikṣa). Tell me, O friend, I the Sage am asking you, what is their behavior? Who are those who are still practicing and who are those who have assessed things well?

Thus questioned, Śāriputra remained silent. A second and a third time, the Bhagavat asked the same question; a second and a third time Śāriputra remained silent.

Then the Bhagavat said to the venerable Śāriputra: This arising ...

- This is how it is, Lord. “This arises”. Knowing that “what arises is destined to perish”, a certain bhikṣu is directed to disgust, renunciation, cessation of that which is destined to perish: bhikṣus [like that] are called śaikṣa. – Knowing that “what has arisen is destined to perish” certain bhikṣus, out of disgust, renunciation, cessation of that which was destined to perish, have their minds completely liberated from impurities: bhikṣus [like that] are called saṅkhyātadharman.

- That is so, O Śāriputra.

Then the Bhagavat arose from his seat and went back to the vihāra to meditate.

*

The stanza ye ca saṅkhyātadharmāṇi occurs in the Ajitaṃānavapucchā of the Pārāyanavagga of the Suttanipāta, stanza 1038; it is cited in the Nettippakaraṇa, p. 17, and the Jātakas, IV, p. 266:

Ye ca saṃkhātadhammāse ye ca sekhā puthū idha / teasm me nipako iriyam
puttho pabrūhi mārīsa //

It establishes a distinction between the śaikṣas ‘disciples who are still practicing’ (śikṣā śīlam esāṃ iti śaikṣāḥ, according to Pāṇini, IV, 4, 62) and the saṅkhyātadharman, i.e., the arhats or aśaikṣas ‘who no longer practice’.

Three times the Buddha questions Śāriputra as to how they differ, and three times Śāriputra is silent. We are reduced to three hypotheses for the reasons for this silence (see those of Buddhaghosa in his Commentary on the Saṃyutta, II, p. 60, l. 16-61, l. 2; W. Geiger, Saṃyutta-Nikāya, II, p. 69, n.).

The Buddha prompts his great disciple with two words: Būtaṃ idaṃ. Śāriputra repeats them and continues: Bhūtaṃ idaṃ, yad bhūtaṃ tan nirodhadharmaṃ “This arises, and what arises is destined to perish.” This is an old canonical saying (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 260, l. 9, 14, 20, 25), often formulated as follows: Yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ “All that is destined to arise is destined to perish” (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 11, 16, 19, 23, 37, 40, 181, 226; II, p. 157, 192; Dīgha, I, p. 110, 148; II, p. 41, 43-44; Majjhima, I, p. 380, 501; II, p. 145; III, p. 280; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 47, 192; V, p. 423; Anguttara, IV, p. 186, 210; Udāna, p. 49. This saying condenses the doctrine of the prattiyasamutpāda into a few words. And it is indeed the prattiyasamutpāda we are dealing with here, for the difference between the śaikṣas and the saṅkhyātadharman (= aśaikṣas) consists in the fact that the former must still penetrate this fundamental truth (dharmaṭā, tathatā, dharmadātu, etc.) whereas the latter have so complete an understanding of it that their impurities (āsrava) have been destroyed and their task is fulfilled.

Then Śāriputra rejoined the bhikṣus and said to them: As long as the Buddha did not give me his approval (abhanumodanā), I <2194> did not reply. But now, for seven days and seven nights without stopping, I myself would be able to furnish him with explanations on that subject.⁴⁵

Then a certain bhikṣu said to the Buddha: After the Buddha had returned to the vihāra to meditate, Śāriputra uttered the lion's roar and boasted. The Buddha said to the bhikṣu: What Śāriputra said is true and not false. Why? Because Śāriputra has penetrated well the dharmadhātu (tathā hi śāriputrasya bhikṣor dharmadhātuḥ supratividdhaḥ).⁴⁶ <2195>

This is what Śāriputra has just explained here, and the Buddha congratulates him for his answer.

⁴⁵ Nidānasamyukta, p. 202-203: Athāyusmāñ Śāriputro 'ciraparakāraṇaṃ bhagavantaṃ viditvā bhikṣūn āmantrayati / apratisaṃviditaṃ mām āyusmanto bhagavān etaṃ prathamam praśnaṃ prastavān / tasya me 'bhūḍ apūrvam dhandhāyitarvam / yataś ca me bhagavāms tat prathamam praśnavyākaraṇam abhyanumoditavān tasya me etad abhavat / sacet kevalikāṃ rātrim bhagavān etaṃ evārtham anyaiḥ padair anyair vyañjanaiḥ praśnaṃ prcchet kevalikāṃ apy aham rātrim bhagavata etaṃ evārtham padair anyair vyañjanaiḥ praśnaṃ prsto vyākuryām / saced ekaṃ divasaṃ/ ekaṃ rātridivasaṃ/ saptāpi rātridivasāni Bhagavan mām etaṃ evārtham anyaiḥ padair anyair vyañjanaiḥ praśnaṃ prsto vyakudivasāni bhagavata etaṃ evārtham anyaiḥ padair anyair vyañjanaiḥ praśnaṃ prsto vyākuryām /

Transl. – Then, seeing that the Bhagavat had gone, Śāriputra said to the bhikṣus: While I did not yet know what he meant, O venerable ones, I felt more embarrassed than I have ever felt before. But as soon as the Bhagavat had approved of my first answer to his question, I had the following thought: If the Bhagavat questioned me on the same subject for a night using different phrases and different words, I would, for this whole night, be able to answer the Bhagavat on this same question using different phrases and different words. And it would be the same if the Bhagavat questioned me on the same subject for a day, or a night, or even seven days and seven nights.

⁴⁶ Nidānasamyukt., p. 203-204: Athānyataro bhikṣur yena bhagavāms tenopajagāma / upetya bhagavatpāḍau śīrasā vadirvaikānte 'sthāt / ekāntasthitaḥ sa bhikṣur bhagavantaṃ idam avocat / āyusmatā bhadanta śāriputreṇa udārārṣabhī vāg bhāṣitaikāṃśa udgrhītaḥ pariśadi samyakṣiṃhanādo nāditāḥ / apratisaṃ viditaṃ mām ...

Tathā hi śāriputrasya bhikṣor dharmadhātuḥ supratividdhaḥ //

Transl. – Then a certain bhikṣu went to where the Buddha was, and, having gone there, he bowed to the Buddha's feet and stood to one side; standing to one side, he said to the Buddha: Lord, a noble speech, a bull's speech, a categorical statement, was made by Śāriputra, and in the assembly he uttered a real lion's roar, saying: While I was ignorant of his meaning..., etc.

[The Buddha replied]: Truly, the dharmadhātu has been well penetrated by the bhikṣu Śāriputra.

*

The bhikṣu who denounced to the Buddha what he belived to be Śāriputra's boasting was named Kaḷāra: cf. Samyutta, II, p. 50.

On the adjective ārṣabha, see above, p. 1592F, note 1.

When the canonical sūtras say the the dharmadhātu has been well penetrated (supratividdha) by the Buddha or by Śāriputra (cf. Dīgha, II, p. 8, l. 13-14; p. 53, l. 13-14; Majjhima, I, p. 396, l. 10; Samyutta, II, p. 56, l. 4), they have in mind the Hīnayāna dharmatā, namely the pratītyasamutpāda (cf. Samyutta, II, p. 25, l. 17 foll.). For the Mahāyāna, the dharmadhātu is the true nature of dharmas (dharmatā) which has, as sole nature, the absence of nature.

In the śrāvaka system, the nature of production and cessation (utpādanirodhalakṣaṇa) of all dharmas is considered to be tathatā, whereas in reality it is necessary to eliminate all views (darśana) in order to discover the true nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa or dharmatā). In the passage cited here it was a question of the dharmadhātu. [298b]

Question. – In the passages [of the Bhikṣusūtra and the Śāriputrasīṃhanādasūtra which you have just cited], it speaks only of tathatā and dharmadhātu. Where then is it a question of bhūtakoti?

Answer. – As there were reasons to mention these two things, [namely, the tathatā and the dharmadhātu], these two sūtras cited here spoke of them.⁴⁷ But since there was no reason to mention the bhūtakoti, they did not speak of it.

Question. – But the bhūtakoti is nirvāṇa, and it is with nirvāṇa in mind that the Buddha preached the holy twelve-membered texts (dvādaśāṅgadharmaṃpravacana). Why then do you claim that there was no reason to speak [about the bhūtakoti]?

Answer. – There are all kinds of names (nānāvidha nāman) to designate nirvāṇa: sometimes it is called detachment (virāga), sometimes perfection (prañīta), sometimes deliverance (niḥsaraṇa).⁴⁸ These synonyms serve to designate the bhūtakoti. If [the sūtras cited here] did not use the latter term, we say it is because there was no reason to do so.

IV. SUPPLEMENTARY EXPLANATIONS

1) Let us return to the sarvadharmāṇāṃ tathatā “the manner of being of all dharmas”. At the moment when dharmas are not yet arisen (ajāta) and at the moment of their arising (jātiṣamaye) dharmas are ‘thus’ (tathā). Once arisen, whether they are past (atīta) or present (pratyutpanna), they are also ‘thus’ (tathā). This sameness of dharmas throughout the three times is called tathatā.

Question. – Dharmas not yet arisen (ajāta) do not <2196> have birth (jātidharma); when present (pratyutpanna), they have this dharma of birth and are capable of functioning, for present dharmas have a nature of activity (kāritralakṣaṇa); the recalling of past dharmas (atītvastusmaraṇa) is called the past (atīta). The three times, each of which is different, cannot be truly identical (sama). Why then do you claim that the tathatā is the identity of the three times (tryadhvasamatā)?

Answer. – In the true nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa or dharmatā), the three times are identical and not different.

Where the śrāvakas speak of dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda), the bodhisattvas speak of non-production (anutpāda): see above, p. 351F.

⁴⁷ The punctuation of the Taishō should be corrected; the period should be placed after chouo.

⁴⁸ On the synonyms for nirvāṇa, see L. de La Vallée Poussin, Nirvāṇa, p. 150-154.

As is said in the Prajñāpāramitā[sūtra] in the Jou p'in chapter (Tathatāparivarta): “The past tathatā, the future tathatā, the present tathatā and the tathatā of the Tathāgata are one and the same tathatā and are no different.”⁴⁹

Moreover, previously (p. 2062F), in the present Louen-yi (Upadeśa),⁵⁰ I have refuted the arising-dharma (utpadadharma). If there is no arising, the future (anāgata) and the present (pratyutpanna) are also without arising. Then how would the three times not be identical? What is more, past time (atītādhvan) is without beginning (anādika), future time (anāgatādhvan) is without end (ananta) and present time (pratyutpannādhvan) is without duration (asthitika). This is why the identity of the three times (tryadvasamatā) is called the tathatā [of dharmas].

2) Having cultivated the tathatā, the practitioner enters into the immense dharmadhātu. The dharmadhātu is nirvāṇa; it is indivisible (abheda) and eludes futile proliferation (niṣprapañca). The dharmadhātu is the fundamental element (maulabhāga). Just as in yellow rock (pīṭapāṣāṇa) there is gold ore (suvarṇadhātu), just as in white rock (pāṇḍarapāṣmaṇa) there is silver ore (rajatadhātu), so, in all the dharmas of the world, there is the ‘nirvāṇa-ore’ (nirvāṇadhātu).⁵¹

By their wisdom (prajñā), their skillful means (upāya), their morality (śīla) and their meditative absorptions (samādhi), the Buddhas and the saints (satpuruṣa) ripen (paripācayanti) beings and lead <2197> (upanayanti) them to find this nirvāṇa-dharmadhātu. Beings with sharp faculties (tīkṣṇendriya) know that all dharmas are dharmadhātu: these beings are like people having the superknowledge of magic (ṛddhyābhijñā) who are able to transform (pariṇam-) bricks into gold. Beings of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) carefully scrutinize dharmas and finally find the dharmadhātu in them: they are like workers in a big foundry who break up rock and finally find gold.

Moreover, the waters (udaka) that naturally flow downward end up all together in the ocean, finally all becoming of one taste (ekarasa), [the taste of salt]. It is the same for dharmas: their general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) all end up in the dharmadhātu and they become assimilated into the single nature (ekalakṣaṇa) [which is none other than the absence of nature: alakṣaṇa]⁵²: that is the dharmadhātu.

The thunderbolt (vajra) at the top of a mountain (giryagra) gradually sinks down to the bottom of the diamond level (vajrabhūmi) and there, rejoining its own element (prakṛti or svabhāva), it stops.⁵³ It is the

⁴⁹ Pañcaviṃśati, chap. LIV: Tathatāparivarta, T 223, k. 16, p. 335c10-17; T 220, vol. VII, k. 513, p. 619c25-27. – Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 623: Iti hi Subhūtitathatā cātūānagatapratyutpannatathatā ca tathāgatatahatā cādvyayam etad advaidhikāram / evaṃ sarvadharmatathatā ca Subhūtitathatā cādvyayam etad advaidhikāram //

⁵⁰ As we have seen above (Vol. III, Introduction, p. vii-viiiF and p. 1237F), the Traité presents itself under the name Upadeśa, in Chinese Louen-yi.

⁵¹ The image developed here leads me [Lamotte] to translate nirvāṇadhātu as ‘nirvāṇa-ore’, but the meaning is more complex; cf. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Nirvāṇa, p. 155, 172.

⁵² See p. 676F, 938F, 1376F, 1382F, 1621F, 1694F, 1703F, 1741F, 935F.

⁵³ The thunderbolt, cast by the powerful deities, strikes the summit of the mountains, passes through the earth (prthivī) and rejoins its natural element, the diamond level (vajrabhūmi) where it dissolves. Traditional cosmology does not same with dharmas: when [298c] one analyzes and explores them wisely, one reaches the very center of the tathatā and, on leaving this tathatā, one enters into the intrinsic nature (prakṛti <2198> or svabhāva). The tathatā without birth from the very beginning (ādyanutpanna)⁵⁴ and eliminating all futile proliferation (niṣprañca) is called dharmadhātu.

When the calf (vatsa) is tied up, it cries and bawls but, when it has found its mother again, it immediately stops crying. It is the same with dharmas: many and diverse, they are dissimilar in being taken (parigraha) and being rejected (utsarga), but as soon as they are gathered into their dharmadhātu, they cease at once: there is no way to go beyond that (nāsty utkramanasthānam). That is the dharmadhātu.

3) Bhūtakoṭi. – As I have said above (p. 2188F), the dharmadhātu is called true (bhūta); and the place of entry is called the highest point (koṭi).

*

Furthermore, taken individually (pratyekam), dharmas are ninefold (nanavidha):

- 1) They have existence (bhava).
- 2) Each has its own attribution. Thus the eye (cakṣus) and the ear (śrotra) are equally derived from the four great elements (caturmahābhautika), but the eye alone can see whereas the ear does not have the power to see. Or again, fire (tejas) has heat (uṣṇatva) for attribution, but it cannot moisten.
- 3) Each has its own power (bala). Thus fire has heat (uṣṇatva) for power, and water has moistness (drava) for power.
- 4) They each have their own causes (hetu).
- 5) They each have their own object (ālambana).

mention this vajrabhūmi. According to the Sarvāstivādin system (Kośa, III, p. 138-148), very close to the canonical sources (Dīgha, II, p. 107; Saṃyutta, II, p. 103), the receptacle world (bhājanaloka) rests on space (ākāśa) upon which are superimposed, in turn, the circle of wind (vāyumaṇḍala) – solid and which cannot be shaken by the thunderbolt – the circle of the waters (apām maṇḍalam), the level of gold (kañcanamayī bhūmi) and finally the earth proper (prthivī) with its mountains (parvata), its continents (dvīpa) and its outer surroundings, the cakravāda.

The vajrabhūmi of which the Traité is speaking here should be placed between the earth proper and the level of gold, and it is also on the level of gold that the vajrāsana ‘diamond seat’ rests - also called bodhimaṇḍa ‘area of enlightenment’ - on which all the bodhisattvas sit to realize vajropamasamādhi and thus become arhat and Buddha (cf. Kośa, III, p. 145). – For this bodhimaṇḍa, see Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 199-200 note.

The Traité establishes close relationships between the bodhimaṇḍa and the vajrabhūmi in every manner. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 82, l. 2-3, states that “thanks to his dharmacakṣus, the bodhisattva knows that such and such a bodhisattva will sit (niṣatsyate) on the bodhimaṇḍa and such and such a bodhisattva will not”. Commenting on this passage, the Traité (T 1509, k. 40, p. 350a17-19) comments: If the bodhisattva sees that, in the place where such and such a bodhisattva is, there is, under the earth (prthivyā adhistāt), the Vajrabhūmi to support this bodhisattva, and if he sees the devas, nāgas and yakṣas holding all kinds of offerings and coming to the bodhimaṇḍa, etc., he knows in advance that that particular bodhisattva will sit on the bodhimaṇḍa.

⁵⁴ Adopting the variant pen wei cheng.

- 6) They each have their own effect (phala).
- 7) They each have their own essence (prakṛti).
- 8) They each have their own limits (paryanta).
- 9) They each have their own opening up (udghāṭana) and preparations (prayoga).

When the dharmas arise, their existence and their other attributes make up nine things in all.

Knowing that these dharmas each have their existence and their full complement of attributes is the lower worldly tathatā (avaratathatā). – Knowing that these nine things finally end up in change (vipariṇāma) and ruin (parikṣaya) is the middling tathatā (madhyā tathatā). – Just as the body that comes from impurities (aśuci), even though it is bathed (dhautā) and adorned (alamkṛta), finally returns <2199> to impurity,⁵⁵ so dharmas are neither existent (sat) nor non-existent (asat), neither produced (utpanna) nor annihilated (niruddha). The absolute purity (atyantaśuddhi) that destroys all consideration about the dharmas (dharmaparīkṣā) is the higher tathatā (agrā tathatā).

Some say: In these nine things, there is a dharma called tathatā, just as there is solidity (khakkhaṭva) in earth (prthivī), moistness (dravatva) in water (ap-), warmth (tejas) in fire, movement (īraṇa) in wind (vāyu), and consciousness (vijñāna) in mind (citta). Dharmas of this kind are called tathatā.

[Paccayasutta].⁵⁶ – Thus it is said in a sūtra: Whether there are Buddhas or there are no Buddhas (utpādād vā tathāgatānām anutpādād vā tathāgatānām), the tathatā, dharmatā, dharmasthitā remain in the world eternally, that is to say, the formations have ignorance as condition (yad idam avidyāpratītyāyāḥ saṃskārāḥ): that is the eternal tathatā, the primordial Law.

The dharmadhātu is the essence (prakṛti or svabhāva) in the nine things.

When one takes possession (prāpnoti) of the realization of the fruit (phalasākṣātkāra),⁵⁷ there is bhūtakoti.

Moreover, the true nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa or dharmatā) is eternally stable (sthita) and immobile (akopya). As a result of their passions, ignorance, etc., (avidyādikleśa), beings transform and distort this true nature. The Buddha and the saints (satpuruṣa) preach the Dharma to them using all kinds of salvific means (nānāvidhopāya) and annihilate their passions, ignorance, etc., so well that beings rediscover the true nature, primordial and unchanged, that is called tathatā. This true nature, in contact with ignorance (avidyā), is transformed and becomes impure (aśuddha); but if one eliminates ignorance, etc., one finds the

⁵⁵ Compare the canonical topic mentioned above, p. 1154F, n. 1.

⁵⁶ Extract from the Pratītyasūtra of the Nidānasamyukta, p. 148 (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 296, k. 12, p. 84b12-c10) having as correspondent the Paccayasuttanta of the Samyutta, II, p. 25, l. 18-20:

Utpādād vā tathāgatānām anutpādād vā sthitā eveyaṃ dharmatā dharmasthitaye dhātuḥ.

Uppādā vā tathāgatānam anuppādā vā tathāgatānam tñitā vo sā dhātu dhammaññhitatā dhammaniyāmatā idappaccayatā.

Sūtra already cited, p. 157F as n.; 2087F, n. 4.

⁵⁷ The saint does not produce (notpādayati) the dharmadhātu (= nirvāṇa); he actualizes it (sākṣatkaroti); in technical terms, he takes possession (prāpnoti) of the dharmadhātu.

true nature. It is called dharmadhātu, viśuddhi, bhūtakoti. That is the entry into [299a] the dharmadhātu. <2200>

The dharmadhātu is immense (apramāṇa), limitless (ananta), extremely subtle (sūkṣma) and admirable (praṇīta). There is no dharma that surpasses the dharmadhātu or that diverges from it. [In its presence], mind (citta) is fulfilled (ārāgāyati) and, without looking for anything else, it actualizes it (sākṣātkaroti). The traveller who, day after day, has gone on without ever stopping, no longer has the idea of starting again. It is the same for the yogin established in bhūtakoti. Take, for example, an arhat or pratyekabuddha who is established in bhūtakoti: even if Buddhas as many as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgānādīvālukopama) were to preach the Dharma to him, he would not progress any further [because he has attained his goal]. Moreover, [having actualized nirvāṇa], he is no longer reborn in the threefold world (traidhātuka).

As for the bodhisattva entered into the dharmadhātu, it is uncertain whether he knows the bhūtakoti. Although he has not yet fully perfected (paripr-) the six perfections (pāramitā), he converts beings (sattvān paripācayati). If he realized [nirvāṇa] at that time, that would prevent him from [some day] attaining the bodhi of the Buddhas. From then on, by the power of his great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and his exertion (virya), the bodhisattva returns to exercising the practices.

Moreover, the bodhisattva knows that in the true nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa or dharmatā) there is no eternal (nitya) dharma or happy (sukha) dharma or personal (ātmaka) dharma or real (bhūta) dharma. He also abandons these considerations of the dharmas (dharmaparīkṣā). The cessation (nirodha) of all considerations of this kind is precisely the true tathatā of dharmas, nirvāṇa, non-production (anutpāda), non-cessation (anirrodha), primordial non-arising (ādyanutpannatava).⁵⁸

Thus, water is cold, but if it brought close to fire, it gets hot; when the fire is extinguished, the heat disappears and the water gets cold again as before. Applying considerations of dharmas [to the tathatā] is like bringing the water close to the fire; suppressing all considerations about dharmas is like extinguishing the fire so that the water becomes cold again. That is the tathatā, truly and eternally subsistent. Why is that? Because the dharmadhātu is like that.

Just as there is an empty aspect (śūnyabhāga) in every material dharma (rūpin), so there is a nature of nirvāṇa <2201> called dharmadhātu in dharmas. The nature of nirvāṇa is also in the many skillful means (upāya) used to attain nirvāṇa. At the time when nirvāṇa is realized, tathatā and dharmadhātu are bhūtakoti.

Finally, the immense (apramāṇa), limitless (ananta) dharmadhātu, unable to be measured by the mind and mental events (cittacaitta), is called dharmadhātu. It is so wondrous that it is called bhūtakoti.

Ādhipatya

Third Section MASTERING THE FOUR GREAT ELEMENTS

⁵⁸ Adopting the variant pen wei cheng.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 25, l. 1-3; 27, l. 8-18; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 81, l. 11-82, l. 6). – Furthermore, Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to calculate the number of subtle atoms contained in the great earth and mountains of the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu must practice the perfection of wisdom (punar aparāṃ Śāriputra trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu ye mahāprthivīparvataparamāṇas tāṃ jñātukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if, after having cut a hair into a hundred pieces, he wishes, by means of only one of these pieces, to scatter into the air the waters contained in the great oceans, the rivers, the pools and the springs of the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu and to do that without harming the aquatic species therein (trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu yo mahāsamudreṣv apskandho mahānadiṣu nadiṣu tadāgeṣu palvaleṣu taṃ sarvaṃ śatadhā bhinnayā vālāgrakoṭyābhuyukṣeptukāmena na ca tadāśrayān prāṇino viheṭhayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Suppose that all the fires of the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu were lit at the same time like at the time of the great fire at the end of the kalpa. The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to blow them out with a single brteath from his mouth must practice the perfection of wisdom (yāvāṃs trisāhasramahāsāhasra lokadhātāv agniskandha ekajvālībhūto bhavet tad yathāpi nāma kalpoddāhe vartamāne, tam ekena mukhavātena praśamayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Suppose that all the great winds of the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu arose to sweep away with their breath the entire [299b] trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu and all the Mount Sumerus as if they were all just rotting grass. If the bodhisattva-mahāsattva wishes to stop the force of these winds <2202> with his finger-tip so that they do not arise, he must practice the perfection of wisdom (trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu ye vātā imaṃ trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātuṃ sameruparvataṃ vidhvāṃsayeyus tad yathāpi nāma bisamuṣṭitām, tān sarvān ekenāṅguliparvāgreṇa saṃcchādayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. MASTERING THE EARTH ELEMENT

Question. - Why does the Buddha not praise the qualities (guṇa) of the bodhisattva, such as the six perfections (ṣaṭpāramitā), but rather he praises this great power (mahābala) [consisting of mastering the four elements]?

Answer. – Beings are of two types: i) those who love the good dharmas (kuśaladharmā); ii) those who love the fruits of ripening (vipākaphala) resulting from the good dharmas. For those who love the good dharmas the Buddha praises the qualities (guṇa); for those who love the fruits of ripening resulting from the good dharmas he praises great magical power (mahārdhibala).

Moreover, some say that the fame enjoyed by the great elements (mahābhūta) is well justified: they are infinite (ananta), indestructible (akṣaya) and always present in the world; this is why there is nobody who is able to measure their dimensions exactly. People build cities (nagara) and palaces (prāsāda), but the materials they use are insignificant (atyalpa). The earth (prthivī) itself is very extensive (vistīrṇa), it supports the ten thousand things and is very solid (drḍha). This is why the Buddha says here that in order to know fully the number of subtle atoms (paramāṇu) contained in the earth (prthivī) and the Mount Sumerus of the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu and in order to know the respective part beings hold in regard to their actions, it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom.

Question. – The subtle atoms contained in a single stone (pāśāṇa) are already difficult to count; what can be said of the subtle atoms contained in the earth and mountains of the trisāhasramahāsmahasralokadhātu? It is unbelievable [that they can be counted].

Answer. – The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas are unable to know them and, still less, the worldly people (prthagjana), but this number is known by the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas. <2203>

[Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra].⁵⁹ – Thus it is said in the Fa-houa king (Dharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra): <2204>

⁵⁹ Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, VII, Pūrvayogaparivarta, p. 156, l. 5-157, l. 8 (compare Kashgar version, p. 26, l. 7-25; Gilgit version, p. 74, l. 7-21). –Tcheng fa houa king, transl. Dharmarakṣa, T 263, k. 4, p. 88b24-c10; Miao fa lien houa king, transl. Kumārajīva, T 262, k. 3, p. 22a23-b3.

Tadyathāpi nāma bhikṣavo yāvān iha trisāhasramahāsāhasre lokadhātu prthivīdhātus taṃ kaścid eva puruṣaḥ sarvaṃ cūṛṇikuryān maṣiṅkuryāt / atha khalu sa puruṣas tasmā lokadhātore ekaṃ paramāṇurajo grhītvā pūrvasyām diśi lokadhātusāhasram atikramya tadekam paramāṇuraja upanikṣipet / atha sa dvitīyaṃ ca paramaṇurajo grhītvā tataḥ pareṇa paratarāṃ lokadhātusāhasram atikramya dvitīyaṃ paramāṇuraja upanikṣipet / anena paryāyeṇa sa puruṣaḥ sarvāvantam prthivīdhātum upanikṣipet pūrvasyām diśi / tat kiṃ manyadhve bhikṣavaḥ śakyaṃ teṣaṃ lokadhātūnām anto vā paryanto vā ganana yādhi gantum / ta āhuḥ / no hīdam bhagavan no hīdam sugata / bhagavān āha / śakyaṃ punar bhikṣavas teṣaṃ lokadhātūnāṃ kenacid ganakena gaṇakamahāmātreṇa vā gaṇananayā paryanto 'dhigantum yeṣu vopanikṣitāni tāni paramāṇurajāṃsi yeṣu vā nopanikṣiptāni / na tv eva teṣaṃ kalpakoṭinayutaśatasāhasrāṇāṃ śakyaṃ gaṇanāyogena paryanto 'dhigantum / yāvantaḥ kalpās tasya bhagavato mahābhijñāñānābhībhuvās tathāgatasya parinirvṛtasyaitāvān sa kālo 'bhūd evam acintya evam apramāṇaḥ / taṃ cāhaṃ bhikṣavas tathāgataṃ tāvacciram parinirvṛtam anena tathāgatajñānadarśanabalādāhānena yathādyā śvo vā parinirvṛtam anusmarāmi /

Transl. – It is, O monks, as if a man reduced the earth element of this trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu to powder or dust. Then, let him take a pinch of extremely fine dust in this universe, let him go to a thousand universes in the eastern direction and scatter this extremely fine dust there. Next let this man take a second pinch of extremely fine dust, go to a thousand universes beyond the first and scatter this second pinch of dust there; let him dispose in this way the entirety of this earth element in the eastern direction.

What do you think, O monks? Is it possible to calculate the total number of universes [thus reached]?

The monks said: That is not possible, O Bhagavat; that is not possible, O Sugata.

The Bhagavat continued: On the contrary, O monks, it is possible that a great mathematician, a great master of arithmetic, could calculate the total number of these universes, as many as those where the extremely fine dust was [Addressing the bhikṣus, the Buddha said to them:] “It is as if a man reduced to dust (cūṇīkuryāti) the earth and mountains of the present trisāhasramahāsāhasralokdhātu, then, [taking a pinch of this dust], he crossed over a thousand universes of the eastern direction and there set down this dust; next, [taking a second pinch of dust] he crossed over a thousand universes [beyond the first thousand] and there set down [the second pinch of dust]; finally in the same way, he used up all the dust of the present trisāhasramahāsāhasralokdhātu.”

Then the Buddha asked the bhikṣus: “Is it possible to know by calculation (gaṇanā) the number of pinches of dust and the universes?”

The bhikṣus answered: “It is impossible.”

The Buddha replied: “On the contrary, it is possible to attain [by calculation] the total number (śakyam gaṇanayā paryanto ‘dhigantum) of these universes, as well as those in which the dust was not put. As for the number of kalpas that have elapsed since the buddha Ta-t’ong-houei (Mahābhijñānābhībhū) appeared in the world, it is like the fine dust contained in universes as numerous as the sands of innumerable Ganges (apramāṇagaṇāṅadāvālukopama).”

And the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas, however, know it all; all the more reason when it is only a matter of universes as numerous as the sands of one single Ganges.

disposed, as many as those where it was not disposed. On the contrary, it is not possible, by calculation, to reach the total number of hundreds of thousands of koṭīnayutas of kalpas that have elapsed since the Bhagavat Mahābhijñānābhībhū entered into complete nirvāṇa, so great, so inconceivable, so immense is the time [separating us from it]. And moreover, O monks, I myself, by using the power of knowledge and vision of a tathāgata, remember this tathāgata Mahābhijñānābhībhū, who entered complete nirvāṇa so long ago, as though his parinirvāṇa had taken place yesterday or today.

- This passage of the Lotus has been translated twice by Kumārajīva, once in his Chinese version of the Traité (T 1509, k. 32, p. 299b17-24) finished at Siao-yao-yuan at Tch’ang-ngan on the 27th day of the 7th year of the hong-che period, i.e., February 1, 406 (see above, Vol. III, Introduction, p. XLV); a second time in his Chinese version of the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka T 262, k. 3, p. 22a23-b3) finished a few months later at Ta-sseu at Tch’ang-ngan during the summer of the 8th year of the hong-che period, also 406 (cf. Tch’ou, T 2145, k. 2, p. 10c19; K’ai-yuan, T 2154, k. 4, p. 512b23-24). The second translation is more literal than the first and, for this passage at least, it does not seem that Kumārajīva was inspired by the translation of the Lotus (T 263, k. 4, p. 88b24-c10) made previously by Dharmarakṣa who had begun the 10th day of the 8th month of the 7th year of the t’ai-k’ang period, i.e., September 15, 286 (cf. K’ai-yuan, T 2145, k. 2, p. 494a15).

According to Japanese research, the Lotus sūtra cited in the Traité seems to have been a version in the middle of Kumārajīva’s original and Dharmarakṣa’s original: see H. Nakamura, A Survey of Mahāyāna Buddhism with bibliographical notes, Part I, Jour. of Intercultural Studies, 3 (1976), p. 97. It would be interesting to know which Sanskrit version – the version from Nepal, Kashgar or Gilgit – it most closely resembles.

Furthermore, speaking of ‘immense’ (apramāṇa) things is to conform to the human point of view. Thus it is said that the waters of the great ocean are immense when they have the depth of eighty thousand yojanas,⁶⁰ and Lo heou (Rāhu), king of the Asuras, has no problem in measuring it.⁶¹

Question. – How does one obtain such a science [of measuring] by practicing the Prajñāpāramitā?

Answer. – There are men who, by practicing the Prajñāpāramitā, <2205> destroy the conflicting emotions (kleśa), wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), futile chatter [299c] (prapañca), and penetrate into the very profound dhyānas and absorptions (samāpatti) of the bodhisattvas. By the purity and extent of their memory (smṛti) and their knowledge (jñāna), they are able to distinguish the subtle atoms (paramāṇu) of all the substances (rūpa) and know their number.

Moreover, the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas who have obtained the unhindered liberations (anāvāraṇavimokṣa) do not consider calculations higher than that to be difficult (kṛcchra) and, still less, that calculation.

Moreover, there are people for whom the solidity (drḍhatva) of the earth (prthivī) and the absence of shape (saṃsthāna) of the mind (citta) are wrong. This is why the Buddha has said that the power of the mind (cittabala) is great.

By cultivating the Prajñāpāramitā, this great earth (mahāprthivī) is reduced to its subtle atoms (paramāṇu). Because the earth element possesses color (rūpa), odor (gandha), taste (rasa) and touch (spraśṭavya), it is heavy (guru) and does not have activity (kriyā) on its own. – Because the water (ap-) element has no taste (rasa), it is superior to earth by means of its movement (calana). – Because the fire (tejas) element has neither odor (gandha) nor taste (rasa), it is superior to water in its power (prabhāva). – Because the wind (vāyu) element is neither visible (rūpa) nor has it any taste (rasa) or touch (spraśṭavya), it is superior to fire by means of its movement (īraṇa). – The mind (citta) which has none of these four things [color, taste, smell and touch] has a still greater power.⁶² <2206>

⁶⁰ Kośa, III, p. 143.

⁶¹ See p. 2091F.

⁶² According to the Pañcavastuka, ed. J. Imanishi, p. 6-7, reproduced at the beginning of the Prakaraṇapāda (T 1541, k. 1, p. 627a; T 1542, k. 1, p. 692b), matter (rūpa) is the four great elements (mahābhūta) and the material derived from the four great elements (mahābhūtanī upādāyārūpa).

The four great elements are the elements (dhātu) earth (prthivī), water (ap-), fire (tejas) and wind (vāyu).

Derived matter, also called bhautika rūpa, is:

i) the five derived organic materials, namely: the organs (indriya) of the eye (cakṣus), ear (śrotra), nose (ghrāṇa), tongue (jihvā) and body (kāya).

ii) the five inorganic derived materials, namely, color (rūpa), sound (śabda), odor (gandha), taste (rasa), part of touch (spraśṭavyaikaśeṣa) and non-information (avijñapti).

The Traité adds here that, taken in abstracto and individually, the four great elements do not support the same number of inorganic derived materials: earth (prthivī) supports color, odor, taste and touch (cf. Kośa, IX, p. 288); water (ap-) has no taste; fire (tejas) has no odor or taste; wind (vāyu) has no color, no taste and no touch.

But when the mind abounds in afflictive emotions (kleśa), in fetters (saṃyojana) and bonds (bandhana), its power is very small (atyalpa). Impure but good minds (sāsravakūśalacitta) have no afflictive emotions; however, since they still grasp characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇanti), their power is small (alpa) also. In adepts of the two Vehicles, [śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha], pure minds no longer grasp characteristics and, nevertheless, since the wisdom of these adepts is limited, as soon as they leave the pure Path (anāsravamārga), their six organs (ṣaḍindriya) [begin again] to imagine and to grasp the characteristics of dharmas (dharmanimitta), and this is why they do not exhaust all the power of mind (cittabala). By contrast, in the Buddhas and great bodhisattvas, wisdom is immense (apramāṇa), unlimited (ananta), always deep in the dhyānas and the meditative absorptions (samāpatti). There is no difference between saṃsāra and nirvāṇa. The True nature of dharmas (bhūtalakṣaṇa or dharmatā) is true (bhūta) and undifferentiated (abhinna). Taken by itself, knowledge (jñāna) is both good and bad, but, in those who cultivate the Prajñāpāramitā, it is absolutely pure (atyantaviśuddha) and free of obstacles (apratigha). In one moment they can count the subtle atoms (paramāṇu) contained in the great earth and the mountains of trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātus as numerous in each of the ten directions (daśasu dikṣu) as the sands of all the Ganges (sarvagaṅgānādīvālukopama), and all the more so, those contained in each of the ten directions in universes as many as the sands of a single Ganges.

Finally, although outside of the Prajñāpāramitā one is able to conquer the superknowledge of magic (ṛddhyabhijñā), the latter will never equal the [mathematical] knowledge of which I have just spoken. This is why the Prajñāpāramitā says that in order to obtain this great power of magic (mahārddhibala), it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom. <2207>

II. MASTERING THE WATER ELEMENT

Some say that water (ap-) is the greatest of all substances. Why? Because at the zenith (ūrdhvam), at the nadir (adhas) and at the four cardinal points (diś) of the great earth (mahāprthivī), there is no place where there is no water. If the Lokapāla gods did not moderate the rain (varṣa) of the heavenly nāgas and if there were no jewel (maṇi) to disperse the waters,⁶³ heaven and earth would collapse. Furthermore, it is as a result of the waters that the classes of animate (sattva) and inanimate (asattva) beings in the world take birth (jāti) and grow (vrddhi). That is why we can know that water is very great. This is why the Buddha says here that the bodhisattva who wishes to know the number of drops of water (bindu) and to disperse them drop by drop so that they have no more power, must practice the perfection of wisdom.

A great element is the more subtle and the more powerful the smaller the number of derived substances it supports: the wind, which supports only odor, is the strongest of the four great elements.

But all of this is theoretical, for the great elements never appear in the form of isolated subtle atom (paramāṇu) but in the form of conglomerates of atoms (saṃghātaparamāṇu) or, if one wishes, molecules. The molecule into which sound does not enter, into which no organ enters, involves eight substances (aṣṭadravyaka) at least, namely: the four great elements (cātvarī mahābhūtāni) and four derived substances (cātvarī upādāyarūpāni): color, odor, taste and touch (cf. Kośa, II, p. 144-145).

The mind (citta), which is non-material (arūpin) and has no derived substance to support, is infinitely more subtle (sūkṣma) than the most subtle of the four great elements. That is why the Buddha said that its power is very great.

III. MASTERING THE FIRE ELEMENT

Some say that the fire element (tejas) is the greatest. Why? Because it has [300a] no odor (gandha) or taste (rasa) and because if water greatly overflows its banks, fire can destroy it. The power of fire is so great that it can burn the ten thousand things and illuminate all the shadows (andhakāra). From that, we know that fire is very great. This is why the Buddha says here that the bodhisattva who wishes to extinguish the great fire by his breath (mukhavāta) should practice the perfection of wisdom.

Question. – But it is thanks to the wind (vāta) that fire is finally kindled (jvalibhavati); how then do [wind and fire] mutually destroy each other?

Answer. – Although they are mutual causes, they destroy each other in time.

Question. – So be it. But fire is immense (apramāṇa), whereas <2208> the bodhisattva's breath (mukhavāta) is very small (atyalpa); how can it destroy fire?

Answer. – Thanks to his dhyānas and absorptions (samāpatti), the bodhisattva who is cultivating the Prajñāpāramitā attains a magical superknowledge (ṛddhyabhijñā) thanks to which he can change (pariṇam-) his body and make it bigger. The breath from his mouth (mukhavāta) equally increases and can extinguish the fire.

Moreover, thanks to magical power (ṛddhibala), a small wind is able to destroy, just as a small thunderbolt (vajra) is able to break up a big mountain. This is why, in view of this magical power, gods and men all submit.

Furthermore, because fire devastates vast spaces, the bodhisattva has compassion (anukampate) for beings and destroys the fire by his magical power.

⁶³ The jewel for dispersing the waters, siao choui tchou, is different from the jewel for purifying water ts'ing choui tchou (in Sanskrit, udakaprasādakamaṇi) which the Traité will mention later (T 1509, k. 36, p. 325c21): "It is like the clear water of a pool: when a mad elephant enters it, it turns into a quagmire; but if the jewel for purifying water enters into it, the water becomes pure." For the latter, see also Suvikrāntavikrīpariprcchā, T 231, k. 6, p. 717b19; Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 4, p. 266a5; Milindapañha, p. 35, l. 8 (udakappasādako maṇi) and its Chinese versions: T 1670A, k. 1, p. 697b5; T 1670B, k. 1, p. 707c4; P. Demiéville, Les versions chinoises du Milindapañha, BEFEO, XXIV (1924), p. 105, n. 4; Visuddhimagga, ed. H. C. Warren, p. 393, l. 6.

Finally, establishing a trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu is very difficult, but by his merits (puṇya) and his wisdom (prajñā), the bodhisattva is able to govern it.

IV. MASTERING THE WIND ELEMENT

Some say that, of the four great elements (mahābhūta), the power of the wind (vāyu) is the greatest. Having neither form (rūpa) nor odor (gandha) nor taste (rasa), its mobility (īraṇā) is very great. Just as space (ākāśa) is infinite, so wind too is infinite. The success or failure of giving birth depends on wind.⁶⁴ The power (prabhāva) of the great winds shakes the mountains of the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu. This is why the Buddha says here that the bodhisattva who wishes to stop the force of the winds with one finger should practice the perfection of wisdom. Why? Because the true nature (dharmatā) of the Prajñāpāramitā is immense (apramāṇa) and infinite (ananta), it can make the finger have such strength. <2209>

Ākāśadhātuspharaṇa

Fourth Section FILLING ALL OF SPACE

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 28, l. 1-2; Śatasāhasrikā, 82, l. 6-9). – Furthermore, Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva should practice the perfection of wisdom if he wants, by means of one single paryaṅka (by sitting cross-legged), to fill the entire space element in the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra yaś trisāhasramahāsāhasre lokadhātāv ākāśadhātus taṃ sarvaṃ ekena paryaṅkena spharitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. - Why does the bodhisattva sit cross-legged (paryaṅkam ābhujya niśīdati) in this way?⁶⁵

Answer. – Brahmā Devarāja, who rules the trisāharalokadhātu, had some wrong ideas (mithyādrṣṭi) and considered himself to be great. But when he saw the Bodhisattva, sitting cross-legged and filling space, his proud thoughts (mānacitta)⁶⁶ vanished.

⁶⁴ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 130, l. 6-8: Tasya khalu kālānataraṇa paripākaprāptasya garbhaśālyasyābhyantarāt mātuh kuṅṣau karmavipākajā vāyavo vānti ye taṃ garbhaśālyam samparivarttya mātuh kāyāvakṣaradvārābhimukham avasthāpayanti / sa krūrāpurīṣaṇḍa ivātmātraṃ sthānāt pracyuto duḥkham samparivarttyate / - Later, when the embryo, this thorn, has come to maturity inside the womb, there arise the winds arisen from the maturation of actions, which turn the embryo and push it towards the gate of impurity of the mother's body. This embryo, removed from its place, such a mass of bloody excrement, is painfully handled.

⁶⁵ For the paryaṅka and the benefits of this position, see above, p. 432-433F.

⁶⁶ Brahmā Devarāja's pride has already been mentioned above, p. 561-562F, 2079F, n. 2.

Moreover, by his skillful means (upāyakaūśalya) coming from this magical superknowledge (eko 'pi bhūtvā bahudhā bhavati), being many, he becomes one (bahudhāpi bhūtvaiako bhavati), being small he becomes large, being large he becomes small and, if he wants to manifest extraordinary things (āścarya), he is able to sit and fill all of space (ākāśa).

Finally, it is in order to prevent the asuras and the nāgarājas from tormenting beings that the Bodhisattva sits and fills space, thus assuring the safety of beings (sattvaṣema).

[Nandopanandanāgarājadamanaśūtra].⁶⁷ – Thus, when the nāgarājas Nan-t'o (Nanda) and P'o-nan-t'o (Upananda), the older and the younger, wanted to destroy the city of Śrāvastī, they rained down weapons (āyudha) and poisonous [300b] snakes (āśvīṣa), but Mou-lien (Maudgalyāyana), at that time properly seated, filled space and changed the offensive weapons into perfumed flowers and necklaces (hāra).

This is why the Prajñāpāramitā says here that the bodhisattva-mahāsattva should practice the perfection of wisdom if, by means of a single paryaṅka, he wants to fill all the space in the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu. <2210>

Ekapiṇḍapāta

Fifth Section CASTING THE MOUNT SUMERUS FAR AWAY

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 28, l. 2-5; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 82, l. 9-12). – Furthermore, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva should practice the perfection of wisdom if he wants, by means of a single hair, having raised up all the Sumerus, king of the mountains, in the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu, to cast them beyond innumerable and incalculable universes, without harming the beings in them (Punar aparaṃ trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu ye sumeruparvatarājās tān sarvān ekena vālenābhyutkṣipyāprameyān asaṃkhyeyān lokadhātūn samtikramya prakṣipeyaṃ na tu satvān viheṭhayeṃam iti bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – How can the bodhisattva raise the Mount Sumerus and the mountains and cast them far away beyond the innumerable universes of the other directions?

Answer. – He has no need of a lever, and this emphasizes the power of the bodhisattva who is able to lift up the mountains.

Moreover, when the Buddha is going to preach the Dharma, the bodhisattvas first adorn the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu and remove the mountains so that the ground is leveled out (sama).

⁶⁷ For this sūtra, see p. 189F, n. 3; 1359F, n. 3.

[Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra].⁶⁸ – See what was said in the Fa-houa king (Dharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra): “When the buddha [Śākyamuni] <2211> was about to join the emanated buddhas (nirmita buddha), he first leveled out the ground and also, wanting to manifest extraordinary things (adbhuta), he made it so that beings could see them.”

How is that? Each Mount Sumeru has a height of 84,000 yojanas.⁶⁹ To raise up one single Sumeru is already extraordinary (adhbhuta); to say nothing about [when the Bodhisattva raises] the hundred koṭis⁷⁰ of Sumerus in the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu; to say nothing about raising with a single hair (ekena vāḷagreṇa) the hundred koṭis of Sumerus in the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu and casting them out beyond innumerable (aprameya) and incalculable (asamkhyeya) universes. The beings who see this extraordinary exploit of the bodhisattva all produce the mind of supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarasamyak-sambodhicitta) and have the following thought: “If this bodhisattva who has not yet attained the bodhi of the Buddhas possesses such magical power (rddhibala), what will it be when he becomes Buddha?”

That is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra spoke thus.

⁶⁸ Saddharmapuṇḍ., chap. XI. – While the Buddha Śākyamuni was preaching the Lotus in the Sahā universe, a stūpa appeared in the sky; in this stūpa was enclosed the body of the tathāgata Prabhūtaratna. In order to pay homage to him, Śākyamuni miraculously created from his own body a large number of forms of the Tathāgata which, in the ten directions of space, each in the different Buddha fields, taught the Dharma to beings. All these Tathāgatas decided to go to the Sahā universe in the presence of the Buddha Śākyamuni to see and venerate the stūpa of Prabhūtaratna. There appeared with them in the Sahā universe twenty hundreds of thousands of myriads of koṭis of Buddha fields, marvelously decorated, without villages, without cities and without mountains.

Then, continues the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka (p. 245-246): Atha khalu punar bhagavān śākyamunis tathāgato 'rhan samyaksambuddhas teṣāṃ tathāgatavigrahāṇāṃ āgantānāṃ avakāśaṃ nirmimīte sma / ... tāni ca sarvāni bahubuddhakṣetrāṇy ekam eva prthivīpradeśaṃ pariśaṃsthāpayām āsa samaṃ ramaṇīyaṃ saptaratnamayaś ca vṛkṣaiś citritam. - Then the blessed Tathāgata Śākyamuni, arhat, completely and fully enlightened, created a space to contain these tathāgata-forms that had just arrived ... All these numerous Buddha fields Śākyamuni established as a single Buddha land, flat, pleasant, embellished with trees made of the seven jewels.

According to the Traité, the intention of the leveling of the ground and the disappearance of the mountains “carried to other universes” was to render the miracle visible to the eyes of all.

The Traité refers to the same chapter of the Lotus above, p. 417-418F.

⁶⁹ Sumeru is 84,000 yojanas in length, 84,000 yojanas in width, plunges into the water to a depth of 84,000 yojanas and emerges from the water to a height of 84,000 yojanas.

Aṅguttara, IV, p. 100: Sineru pabbatarājā caturāsītīyojanasahassāni āyāmena caturāsītīyojanasahassāni vithārena caturāsītīyojanasahassāni mahāsamudde ajjhogālho caturāsītīyojanasahassāni mahāsamuddā accuggato.

See also Atthasālinī, p. 298, I. 13-14; Kośa, III, p. 143.

⁷⁰ A hundred koṭis, i.e., a billion, koṭi here being equal to 10,000,000 (cf. Kośa, III, p. 189, I. 34). See above, p. 448F and n. The universe of four continents contains only one Sumeru, but in a trisāhasramahāsāhasra, this number is 1000 carried to the third power, i.e., a billion.

Sixth Section HONORING ALL THE BUDDHAS BY MEANS OF A SINGLE OFFERING

Sūtra (cf. Pañcviṃśati, p. 28, I. 11-15; Śatasāhastikā, p. 82, I. 16-85, I. 10). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes, by means of one and the same morsel of food, to satisfy all the Buddhas and their disciples present in each of the ten directions in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges. The bodhisattva-mahasattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes, by means of one and the same object (garment, flower, perfume, necklace, powder, unguent, incense, lamp, banner, parasol, etc.) to honor all the Buddhas and their disciples (Yāvanto daśasu diṅṣu gaṅgānādivālukopameṣu lokadhātuṣu buddhā bhagavantaḥ saśrāvakaśaṃghās tān sarvān ekenā piṇḍapātena pratipādayitukāmena bodhisattvena <2112> mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam. Yāvanto buddhā bhagantaḥ saśrāvakaśaṃghās tān sarvān ekavastrapuṣpagandhahārācūṛṇavilepanadhūpadīpadhvajapatākacchattreṇa pūjayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – To offer one and the same morsel of food (ekapiṇḍapāta) to a single Buddha and his monks is already difficult (duṣkara); to say nothing of the bodhisattva offering this morsel to Buddhas and their saṃghas in each of the ten directions, as numerous as the sands of the Ganges?⁷¹

Answer. – The merit of the offering (pūjāpunya) resides in the intention (citta) and not in the thing offered. It is with a great intention that the bodhisattva offers this single morsel to all the Buddhas and all their saṃghas of the ten [300c] directions. Whether they are far (dūre) or near (sāntike) is unimportant. This is why all the Buddhas see (paśyanti) this offering and accept it (pratighṛṇanti).

Question. – All these Buddhas have omniscience (sarvajñāna) and consequently see the offering and accept it; but the monks themselves do not have omniscience; how could they see it and accept it?

Answer. – The monks neither see it nor know it, and yet the donor (dāyaka) of the offering gains merit (punya). Thus, when a man sends a messenger to carry an offering to another, even if this other person does not receive it, the man gains the offering of the gift. Also, in the concentration of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi), even though nothing is given to the beings [who are the object],⁷² the yogin [who is practicing it] gains an immense merit.

Furthermore, the bodhisattvas are endowed with immense and unchanging qualities (apramāṇākṣaraḡuṣasampanna); when they offer a single morsel (piṇḍapāta) to all the Buddhas and their saṃghas of the ten directions, the latter are satisfied and yet the morsel is not used up, like a plentiful

⁷¹ In other words, to satisfy one Buddha and his saṃgha by a single ball of rice is already difficult. It is still more difficult to satisfy, with this single morsel, an incalculable number of Buddhas and saṃghas.

⁷² See above, p. 1240F.

(udbhida) spring the output of which does not dry up.⁷³ <2213> Thus, when Mañjuśrī offered a bowl of little cakes (modaka) to 84,000 monks, all of them were satisfied but the cakes were not used up.

Moreover, here the bodhisattva offers only one single bowl of food to all the Buddhas of the ten directions and, after having eaten it, the Buddhas are satisfied and go away. In contrast, the pretas, although each of them receives a mouthful of food, come back thousands of myriads of times [to get more].

Finally, the bodhisattva who cultivates the Prajñāpāramitā acquires immense gates of dhyānas and absorptions (apramāṇadhyānasamāpattimukha), immense gates of wisdom and skillful means (apramāṇaprajñopāyamukha): that is why there is nothing he is unable to do. Since the Prajñāpāramitā encounters no obstacle (anāvaraṇa), the mind (citta) and activity (kriyā) of the bodhisattva as well encounter no obstacles. This bodhisattva is able to honor the Buddhas and their saṃghas as numerous in each of the ten directions as the sands of a thousand myriads of Ganges; a fortiori, he is able to honor those of a single Ganges.

It is the same [when the bodhisattva wants to honor all the Buddhas and their saṃghas by offering them only a single thing]: a garment (vastra), flower (puṣpa), perfume (gandha), necklace (hāra), powder (cūrṇa), unguent (vilepana), incense (dhūpa), lamp (dīpa), banner (dhvajapatāka), parasol (chattra), etc.

Mārgaphaleṣu pratiṣṭhāpanam

Seventh Section ESTABLISHING ALL BEINGS IN THE FRUITS OF THE PATH

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 28, l. 16-29, l. 3; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 85, l. 10-90, l. 9). – Furthermore, Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva should practice the perfection of wisdom if he wants to establish all beings in universes as numerous in each of the ten directions as the sands of the Ganges [in the fruits of the Path]; if he wants to establish them: 1) in the [pure] aggregates of morality, concentration, wisdom, deiverance, and the knowledge and vision of deliverance; 2) in the fruit of entry into the stream; 3) in the fruit of the once-returner; 4) in the fruit of the <2214> non-retruner; 5) in the fruit of the saint, and so on⁷⁴ up to 6) in nirvāṇa without conditioned residue (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra daśasu dikṣu gaṇganadivālukopameṣu lokaṣu ye sattvās tān sarvān śīlasamādhiprajñāvimuktivimuktijñānadarśanaskandheṣu srotaāpattiphale

⁷³ Compare Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl, p. 326-329 and appendix, p. 430-437. During a holy feast, Vimalakīrti satisfied an immense crowd with a bowl of food coming from the Sarvagandhasughandhā universe. The whole crowd was satisfied and yet the food was not exhausted (sarvāvatī sā parṣat trptā na ca tad bhījanam kṣiyate). And so a person who was present commented that even if all the beings of innumerable trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātus, during one kalpa or a hundred kalpas, ate this food and took mouthfuls as big as Sumeru, this food would not diminish.

The donor's intention had conferred this power on the food

⁷⁴ The rest appear in full in the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 85, l. 16-86, l. 1: pratyekabodhi, sarvajñatā, mārgākārajñatā and sarvākārajñatā sakṛdāgāmiphale anāgāmiphale arhattve yāvad anupadhiṣeṣanirvāṇadhātau pratiṣṭhāpayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyām śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

1) On the meaning of the five [pure] aggregates, see what has been said above (p. 1349-1358F).⁷⁵

2) The srotaāpattiphala, ‘the fruit of entry into the stream’, is of two types:

a. The Buddha said that by the elimination of three fetters (trayaṇām saṃyojanānām prahāṇāt), this fruit of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛtaphala) is acquired. And it is said in the Abhidharma that by the elimination of eighty-eight perverse tendencies (anuśaya), the unconditioned fruit of entry into the stream (asaṃskṛta srotaāpattiphala) is acquired.⁷⁶ <2215>

⁷⁵ See the definitions in the canonical sources, p. 1233F, n. 3.

⁷⁶ Definition of the srotaāpattiphala according to the canonical sūtras in Sanskrit and Pāli:

Sūtra cited in Kośavyākhyā, p. 492, l. 10-14: Trīṇi cāśya saṃyojanāni prahāṇāni bhavanti parijñātāni tadyathā satkāyadrṣṭiḥ śīlavrataparamārśa vicikitsā ca / sa eṣāṃ trayaṇām saṃyojanānām prahāṇāt srotaāpanno bhavaty avinipāṭadharṃ saṃbodhiparāyaṇaḥ saptakṛdbhavaparamaḥ saptakṛtvo devāṃś ca manuṣyāṃś ca saṃsṛtya saṃdhāvyā duḥkhasyāntaṃ kariṣyati. – In the srotaāpanna, three fetters are eliminated and recognized: belief in the self, unjustified esteem for rituals and vows and doubt. By means of the destruction of these three fetters, he is ‘srotaāpanna ‘entered into the stream’, incapable of falling back into a bad destiny, on the way to enlightenment: for him there is rebirth a maximum of seven times; having transmigrated, having passed seven times among gods and men, he will realize the end of suffering. – Compare Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 46, p. 237c26-29.

The phrasing is shorter in the Pāli suttas (Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92, 200, 252; III, p. 107, 132; Majjhima, I, p. 34, 226; III, p. 81; Saṃyutta, V, p. 357, 379; Anguttara, I, p. 231-232; II, p. 88-89, 238): Idha bhikkhu tiṇṇaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayā sotāpanno hoti avinipāṭadhammo niyato sambodhiparāyano.

The Sarvāstivādin scholasticism (Śatpādābhidharma, Mahāvibhāṣā, Kośa, etc.) proposes a more elaborate definition of the srotaāpattiphala: it establishes a difference between the conditioned (saṃskṛta) and the unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) fruits and, aside from the elimination of the three fetters (saṃyojana) calls upon the elimination of the 88 perverse tendencies (anuśaya). This is the definition which the Traité summarizes here, referring to the Abhidharma.

Dharmaskandha, T 1537, k. 3, p. 464c17-26: At that time the Bhagavat was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jetavana, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. He said to the assembly of monks: There are four fruits of the religious life (śrāmaṇyaphala): srotaāpattiphala, sakṛdāgāmiphala, anāgāmiphala and arhattvaphala. Briefly, there are two kinds of srotaāpattiphala: saṃskṛta and asaṃskṛta. The saṃskṛta srotaāpattiphala is in the possession (prāpti) of this fruit and the grasping of this possession. The (six) indriyas and the (six) balas of the śaikṣa, ‘the ascetic who is still practicing’, the śīla of the śaikṣa, the kuśalamūlas of the śaikṣa, the eight mārgaṅgas of the śaikṣa, as well as all the *śaikṣadharma*s of the same class are called saṃskṛta srotaāpattiphala. – The definitive elimination of the three saṃyojanas and the definitive destruction of the *saṃyojanadharma*s of the same class, namely the definitive destruction of 88 anuśayas and the definitive destruction of the *saṃyojanadharma*s of the same class are called asaṃskṛta srotaāpattiphala.

- We should remember that the three saṃyojanas in question here are part of the group of five saṃyojanas described as lower (avarabhāga), i.e., of kāmādhātu (Kośa, V, p. 84-85). The 88 anuśayas are part of a group of 98 anuśayas of which the first 88 are to be abandoned by the seeing of the truths (darśanaheya) and the last ten by

b. When they are in the subsequent knowledge concerning [the truth] of the path (mārge 'nvayajñāna), the ascetic who has sought [the truth] by means of faith (śraddhānusārin) and the ascetic who has sought [the truth] by means of scripture (dharmānusārin) have acquired the realization of the fruit of entry into the stream (śrotaāpattiphalasākṣātkāra).⁷⁷

The Chinese characters Siu-t'o (śrotas) mean 'stream', i.e., the noble eightfold Path (ārya aṣṭāṅgikamārga). The characters Pan-na (āpanna) means [301a] 'entry'. To enter into the noble eightfold Path is to enter into the stream of nirvāṇa: that is the first vision of the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇāṃ bhūtalakṣaṇam or dharmatā). By successfully entering into this part of the immense dharmadhātu, one is classed among the āryas.⁷⁸

3) The characters Si-ki (sakṛt) mean 'a single time'; k'ie-mi (āgāmin) means 'who comes back'.⁷⁹ The ascetic so named, having left this world and taken rebirth among the gods, comes back from there one single time [into the world of men] and there finds the end to suffering.⁸⁰ <2216>

4) The characters A-na (an-) mean 'not', k'ie-mi (āgāmin) mean 'returner'. The ascetic thus named has 'not returning' as his characteristic. Having died in the desire realm (kāmadhātu), this man is reborn in the form meditation (bhāvanāheya): cf. Prakaraṇapāda, T 1541, k. 3, p. 637a10; T 1542, K. 3, p. 702a11; Jñānaprasthāna, T 1544, k. 3, p. 930c20-22; Mahāvubbhāṣā, T 1545, k. 46, p. 237c29-238a1; Kośa, V, p. 13.

⁷⁷ The Darśanamārga comprises sixteen moments of mind: the first is duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti; the sixteenth and last is the mārge 'nvayajñāna (cf. Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 681-682). In the first moment, the śraddhānusārin and the dharmānusārin are candidates for the fruit of śrotaāpanna (śrotaāpattiphalapratipannaka); in the sixteenth, they are residents in this fruit (phastha); cf. Kośa, VI, p. 194-195.

⁷⁸ As soon as he enters into the darśanamārga, the ascetic penetrates into the certainty of the acquisition of the supreme good (samyaktvaniyāma); he loses the quality of ordinary person (prthagjana) and takes on that of the saint (ārya): cf. Kośa, VI, p. 181-182.

⁷⁹ Here, in the version of the sūtra (T 1509, p. 300c22), sakṛdāgāmin has been transliterated as sseu-t'o-han (the usual transliteration), but the explanations given by the gloss of the Updeśa (p. 301a2-3) deal with another transliteration, practically unused: si-ki-k'ie-mi. This inconsistency undoubtedly escaped Seng-jouei when, according to the translation of the Upadeśa, that of the sūtra was revised in order make both texts consistent (see Traité, vol. III, p. XLVII as note).

⁸⁰ Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 166; Divyāvadāna, p. 533-534: Trayāṇāṃ saṃyojanānāṃ prahāṇād rāga dveṣa mohānāṃ ca tanutvāt kālāṃ kṛtvā sakṛdāgāmi sakṛd imaṃ lokam āgamyā duḥkhasyāntaṃ kariṣyati – By the complete destruction of the three fetters (in the course of the darśanamārga) and by the lessening of desire, hatred and delusion (in the course of the bhāvanāmārga), after his death he becomes a sakṛdāgāmin: having returned only once to this world (the kāmadhātu), he will realize the end of suffering.

Pāli wording in Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92, 93, 200, 201, 252; III, p. 107, 132; Majjhima, I, p. 34, 226, 465; II, p. 80; Samyutta, V, p. 357, 378; Anguttara, I p. 232; II, p. 89, 238; IV, p. 380: Puna ea paraṃ bhikkhu tiṇṇaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayaṃ rāgadosamohānaṃ tanuttā sakadāgāmi hoti, sakid, eva imaṃ lokam āgantva dukkhass' antaṃ karoti.

realm (rūpadhātu) or in the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu); there his impurities are destroyed (kṣiṇāsrava) and he is no longer reborn (na punarbhavati).⁸¹

Question. – But the anāgāmin who acquires parinirvāṇa in the present lifetime (dr̥ṣṭadharmaparinirvāyin) and the anāgāmin who acquires parinirvāṇa in the intermediary existence (antarāparinirvāyin) by going to the rūpadhātu, are not reborn either in the form realm or in the formless realm (rūpārūpyadhātu); then why call them 'non-returners' (anāgāmin)?⁸² <2217>

Answer. – Among the anāgāmins, there are many who are reborn in the form realm or the formless realm, whereas those who are parinirvāṇized as soon as this present life are rare; as the latter are in the minority, [they keep the name anāgāmin] which is the name of the majority. Those who obtain parinirvāṇa in the intermediate existence (antarāparinirvāyin), being also on the point of being reborn in the form realm but ⁸¹ Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 166; Divyāvadāna, p. 533, l. 24-26: Pañcanāṃ avarabhāgiyānāṃ saṃyojanānāṃ prahāṇād aupapādukaṃ tatra aprinirvāyī anāgāmy anāvṛttidharmā punar imaṃ lokam. – By the complete destruction of the five lower fetters [namely, saṭkāyadr̥ṣṭi, śīlavrataparāmarśa and vicikitsā which are to be destroyed by seeing (darśanaheya); kāmacchanda and vyāpāda which are to be destroyed by meditation (bhāvanāheya): the whole coinciding with the first 92 anuśayas,] he is of apparitional birth: It is there [in rūpadhātu = Brahmaloḥka, or more rarely in arūpyadhātu] that he will be parinirvanized; as 'non-returner', he cannot be reborn in this world [i.e., kāmadhātu].

Pāli wording in Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92, 203, 252; III, p. 107, 132; Majjhima, I, p. 34, 226; Samyutta, V, p. 356-357; Anguttara, I, 232; II, p. 89, 238: Pañcannam orambhāgiyānaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayaṃ opapātiko hoti tatthaparinibbāyī anāvattidhammo tasmā lokā. – By the complete destruction of the five lower fetters, he is of apparitional birth and it is there [in rūpadhātu = Brahmaloḥka] that he will be parinirvanized; he cannot come back from that world [the Brahmaloḥka] to this world [kāmadhātu].

See the notes of Buddhaghosa in the Commentary of the Majjhima, I, p. 164.

⁸² There are several kinds of anāgāmins: the most widespread list distinguishes five:

1) Antarāparinirvāyin who obtains parinirvāṇa in the intermediate existence (yo 'ntarābhavhe parinirvāti) at the moment when, having left kāmadhātu, he is getting ready to attain rūpadhātu.

2) Upapadyaparinirvāyin who, as soon as he is reborn in rūpadhātu, obtains parinirvāṇa in a short time (ya utpannamātro na cirāt parinirvāti).

3) Sābhisamkāraparinirvāyin who, having been born, obtains parinirvāṇa without relaxing his effort (upapadyāpratiprasabdhaprayoga).

4) Anabhisamkāraparinirvāyin who obtains parinirvāṇa effortlessly.

5) Ūrdhvasrotas who, on leaving kāmadhātu, do not obtain parinirvāṇa in the realm in which they are reborn (yasya na tatra parinirvāṇaṃ yatropapannaḥ), but who go higher (ūrdhvam) to the Akaniṣṭha gods, to the summit of rūpadhātu or to bhavāgra and find parinirvāṇa there.

Whether alone or inserted into broader contexts, the list of the five anāgāmins is very widespread in the sūtras and in the Abhidharma, both Sanskrit as well as Pāli: Dīgha, III, p. 237 (cf. Das Saṅghīṭisūtra und sein Kommentar Saṅgītiparyāya, ed. K. Mittal und V. Rosen, p. 153-156); Samyutta, V, p. 70, 201, 237, 285, 314, 378; Anguttara, I, p. 233, l. 28-35; IV, p. 14-15; p. 70-74 (in the Purisagatisutta of which the Sanskrit correspondent is cited in full in the Kośavyākhyā, p. 270, l. 22-272, ol. 3; Chinese version in Madhyama, T 26, k. 2, p. 427); Saṃgītiparyāya, T 1536, k. 14, p. 425c38-427a1; Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 174, p. 874b21-876b14; Amṛtarasa, T 1553, K. I, p. 973b12-15; Kośabhāṣya, p. 358, l. 20-359, l. 13.

seeing the torments they would have to undergo in the course of this last existence (caramabhava), take nirvāṇa all the time; this is why they too take the name of anāgāmin because it is the name of the majority.⁸³

5) Because they have destroyed all the afflictive emotions (klesā), the arhats have the right (arhanti) to the homage (pūjā) of all the devas, nāgas and asuras.⁸⁴

These arhats are of nine types.⁸⁵ <2218>

1) Parihāṇadharman, arhat likely to fall.

2) Aparihāṇadharman, arhat not likely to fall.

3) Cetanādharman, arhat likely to put an end to his lifetime.⁸⁶

4) Anurakṣaṇadharman, arhat likely to keep his lifetime.

5) Sthitākampya, arhat remaining in the fruit without moving.

6) Prativedhanādharman, arhat likely to penetrate effortlessly into the Unshakeables.

7) Akopyadharman, unshakeable arhat, [incapable of falling].

⁸³ As a general rule, the ascetic who has obtained the fruit of anāgāmin in kāmādhātu is reborn after death in rūpadhātu, sometimes even in ārūpyadhātu, and attains parinirvāṇa there. This is the case for the last four types of anāgāmins mentioned in the preceding note.

There are, however, two exceptions. When the anāgāmin called antarāparinirvāyin (the first type in the preceding note) abandons his existence in kāmādhātu to go to rūpadhātu, he obtains parinirvāṇa in the intermediate existence (antarabhāva). The anāgāmin called dṛṣṭadharmāparinirvāyin who has obtained the fruit of anāgāmin in an existence in kāmādhātu obtains parinirvāṇa during that same existence without ever going to rūpadhātu insofar as his disgust for this sphere of existence is so great (cf. Kośa, VI, p. 219).

Although the antarāparinirvāyin and the dṛṣṭadharmāparinirvāyin, in contrast to the other anāgāmins, do not go to rūpadhātu to become parinirvāṇized there, nevertheless they take the name of anāgāmin because this is the name of the majority.

⁸⁴ Compare the canonical formula in Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92; Majjhima, I, p. 284; Saṃyutta, II, p. 217; Anguttara, I, p. 220: Āsavānaṃ khayā anāsavaṃ cetovimuttiṃ paññāvimuttiṃ diṭṭhe va dhamme sayaṃ abhiññā sacchikavā upasapajjaviharati. – By destruction of the impurities, having realized, in the present existence, by his own knowledge the deliverance of mind and the deliverance by means of wisdom, free of impurities, he abides there.

⁸⁵ Like the Madhyamāgama, T 26, k. 30, p. 616a1-19, the Amṛtarasa, T 1553, k. 1, p. 973b28-c1. the Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 1, p. 246b27-29, and the Abhidharmasamuccaya, ed. P. Pradhan, p. 91, l. 4-14, the Traité distinguishes nine kinds of arhat or aśaikṣa (cf. p. 1392F, 1740F). – But in general, the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharmas have only six arhats: Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 62, p. 319c8-9; Abhidharmasāra of Dharmasī, T 1550, k. 2, p. 819c8-11; Abhidharmasāra of upśānta, T 1551, k. 3, p. 851a1-2; Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 1552, k. 5, p. 913c15-18; Kośa, VI, p. 251; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 67, p. 710c1-16.

Actually, as the Traité has noted, p. 1392F, these classifications overlap, the Buddha having expressed himself sometimes at length and sometimes briefly.

⁸⁶ For the meaning of cetanādharman = marāṇadharman, see Kośa, VI, p. 253, n. 4.

8) Prajñāvimukta, arhat delivered by wisdom.

9) Ubhayatobhāgavimukta, arhat doubly delivered from the obstacle consisting of the afflictive emotions (klesāvaraṇa) and the obstacle opposing the eight liberations (vimokṣāvaraṇa).

For the meaning of these nine types, see above (p. 1390-1391F).

The eight liberations (vimokṣa), the eight masteries (abhibhāvayatana), the ten sources of totality (kṛtsnāyatana), the absorption of cessation (nirodhasamāpatti), the concentration preventing the arising of another's afflictive emotions (araṇasamādhī), the knowledge resulting from resolution (praṇidhijñāna), etc., are the marvelous qualities (guṇa) of the arhat.

6) Moreover, he will attain nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa), and this nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa is the fact that the arhat [at the moment of his death] rejects the five aggregates (pañcaskandhān nikṣipati) of the present lifetime and then does not take up the five aggregates of the future lifetime (na tu pañcapaunarbhavikān skandhān paraṃdadadhāti), and thus his physical and mental sufferings (kāyikacaitasikaduḥkha) are completely and definitively destroyed.

About the last three fruits of the Path (mārgaphala), see what was said in regard to the first.

Danāśya mahāphalāni

Eight Section PREDICTING THE FRUITS OF RIPENING OF VARIOUS KINDS OF GIFTS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 25, l. 4-17; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 80, l. 12-92, l. 4). –

Furthermore, Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva practicing the perfection of wisdom knows what kind of gift should be made in order for it <2219> to be very fruitful. – Making the gift in this way, one is reborn in wealthy kṣatriya families, in wealthy brāhmaṇa families or in wealthy householder families. – Making the gift in a certain other way, one is reborn among the Caturmahārājika gods, the Trāyastriṃśa gods, the Yāma gods, the Tuṣita gods, the Nirmāṇarati gods or the Paranimitavaśavartin gods. – Making the gift in yet another way, one gains the first dhyāna, the second dhyāna, the third dhyāna, the fourth dhyāna, the absorption of the sphere of infinite space, the absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness, the absorption of the sphere of nothing at all or the absorption of the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception. – By this kind of gift the eightfold noble Path is produced. – By a certain other kind of gift, the fruit of entry into the stream and so on up to supreme complete enlightenment is attained (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvo mahāsattaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caraṇ jñāti yad evaṃ dānaṃ dattaṃ mahāphalaṃ bhavat. – Evaṃ dānaṃ dattvā kṣatriyamahāśālakuleṣu brāhmaṇamahāśālakuleṣu gṛhapatimahāśālakuleṣūpapadyate. – Evaṃ dattvā cāturmahārājikeṣu deveṣu trāyastriṃṣeṣu deveṣu yāmeṣu deveṣu tusiteṣu deveṣu nirmāṇaratīṣu deveṣu paranimitavaśavartīṣu deveṣūpapadyate. – Evaṃ dānaṃ dattvā prathamam dhyānaṃ dvitīyaṃ dhyānaṃ tṛtīyaṃ dhyānaṃ caturthaṃ dhyānaṃ ākāśānantyāyatanasamāpattiṃ vijñānantyāyatanasamāpattiṃ ākimcanyāyatanasamāpattiṃ naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatanasamāpattiṃ pratilabhate. - Evaṃ dānaṃ dattvā āryāśaṅgo mārga utpadyate. – Evaṃ dānaṃ dattvā srotaāpattiphalaṃ yāvad anuttarā saṃyaksambodhir anuprāpyate).

Śāstra. –

The bodhisattva-mahāsattva knows the true nature of dharmas (dharmatā) free of grasping (aparigraha), free of rejecting (anutsarga) and indestructible (anupaghāta). He practices an ungraspable perfection of wisdom (anupalabdā prajñāpāramitā), but by means of a feeling of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta), he returns to cultivate meritorious practices (puṇyakriyā).

[301b] The first gate of meritorious practices is above all the practice of generosity (dāna). [301b]

I. WHERE DOES THE EXCELLENCE OF THE GIFT COME FROM?

By the sharpness of his wisdom (prajñāpaṭivāt), the bodhisattva who practices the perfection of wisdom is able to make distinctions (paricchid-) between the merits of the gift (dānapuṇya). <2220>

1) While the object given (deyavastu) is the same, the value of the merit (puṇya) depends on the goodness or the malice of the intention (āśaya) of the donor.

[Gift of a bowl of rice].⁸⁷ – Thus, one day Śāriputra offered a bowl of cooked rice (odana) to the Buddha. The Buddha immediately gave it to a dog and asked Śāriputra: You have given me some rice and I have given it to a dog. Which of the two of us has gained more merit (puṇya)? - Śāriputra answered: If I understand well the meaning of the Lord's teaching (yathā khalv ahaṃ bhagavata bhāṣitasamarthaṃ ājānāmi),⁸⁸ by giving it to a dog the Buddha has gained more merit [than me].

- Śāriputra, the foremost of sages (prajñānatām agryaḥ) amongst all men, made a gift to the Buddha, supreme field of merit (puṇyakṣetraṃ paramam) but did not equal the Buddha who, by offering [the same gift] to this lowly field of merit, a dog, gained very great merit. This is how we know that great merit (mahāpuṇya) comes from the intention (āśaya) and does not reside in the 'field' (kṣetra) [in other words, in the beneficiary of the gift]. Had Śāriputra given a thousand, ten thousand or a hundred thousand times more, he would not have reached [the purity] of intention (āśaya) of a Buddha.

2) Question. – But you yourself have said (p. 722F) that the importance of merit is the result of the excellence of the field of merit (buddhakṣetrapraṇītatas), and by making a gift to the Buddha, Śāriputra would not have gained great merit.

⁸⁷ Episode mentioned by Akanuma, Dictionnaire des noms propres, p. 597a, but not yet identified.

⁸⁸ Cf. Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 218.

Answer. – A good 'field' also contributes to the importance of merit, but not as much as the intention (āśaya) of the donor. Why? Because the mind is the internal master (antaḥsvāmin) whereas the 'field' is just an outer (bāhya) thing. Sometimes, however, the merit of generosity (dānapuṇya) resides in the field of merit (puṇyakṣetra).

[Avadāna of Koṭikarna].⁸⁹ – Thus the arhat Yi-eul (Koṭikarna) who once had offered a single flower to a stūpa of the Buddha enjoyed happiness among gods and men for ninety-one kalpas; and by virtue of the remainder of his merit (puṇyaśeṣa), he became an arhat.

[Pāṃśupradānāvadāna].⁹⁰ – Thus king A-chou-kia (Aśoka) <2221> who, as a small child, had given some earth (pāṃśu) to the Buddha, reigned over Jambudvīpa, built eighty thousand stūpas and still later, found bodhi. The thing he had offered was very common (nīca) and the intention (āśaya) of the child (bāladāraka) quite weak (tanu). It was only because of the excellence of the field of merit (puṇyakṣetrapraṇītatas) [to which he had given] that he acquired a great fruit of retribution (mahāvīpākaphala). So we know then that [sometimes] great merit results from the good 'field'.

3) There are three things present in the highest of the great merits – the intention (āśaya) [of the donor], the thing given (deya) and the field of merit (puṇyakṣetra) – [i.e., the recipient] – are all three excellent. See for example the first chapter (prathama parivarta) of the Prajñāpāramitā where it is said (cf. p. 586F) that the Buddha [Śākyamuni] scattered marvelous flowers over the buddhas of the ten directions.

4) Finally, in the mind of the Prajñāpāramitā, the gift free of any attachment (abhiniveśa) [in regard to donor (dāyaka), the thing given (deya) and the recipient (pratigrāhaka)] wins a great fruit of ripening (mahāvīpākaphala).⁹¹ The gift made in view of nirvāṇa also obtains a great retribution.⁹² The gift made ⁸⁹ Or Avadāna of Sumana, mentioned here for the third time; see p. 1426F, n. 3, 18894F, n. 3.

⁹⁰ References, p. 723F, n. 2; 1934F.

⁹¹ The 'triplely pure' gift (trimaṇḍalapariśuddha) rests on a non-conceptual knowledge that makes no distinction between donor, recipient and thing given – which are no longer seen: see p. 650F, 676F, 707F, 724F, etc.

⁹² See p. 664-666F and n. Desire for nirvāṇa (nirvāṇārthaṃ dānam) is one of the eight motives inspiring generosity (dānavastu). It does not appear in the Pāli list (Dīgha, III, p. 258, l. 10-16; Anguttara, IV, p. 236, l. 1-8), but it does appear in the Sanskrit list (Samgītisūtra, ed. K. Mittal and V. Rosen, p. 188, l. 19-27; Saṃyuktābhidharmaśāra, T 1552, k. 8, p. 932b6-8; Kośabhāṣya, p. 270, l. 19-22): uttamārthasya prāptaye dānaṃ dadāti - "He makes a gift in order to obtain the supreme goal", i.e., to obtain arhathood, nirvāṇa (Kośavyākhyā, p. 435, l. 6).

Compare the pure gift (viśuddham dānam), the completely disinterested gift (vipākānapekṣam dānam), made by the bodhisattva in view of supreme bodhi which the Bodhisattvabhūmi, p. 135, l. 22-25, defines as follows: Na bodhisattvo dānaṃ dadad dānasyaītyātm bhogasampadam ātmabhāvasampadam vā phalavipākam pratyāśamsate, sarvasaṃskāreṣu phalguadarśi paramabodhāv anuśamsadarśi. – The bodhisattva who gives a gift expects nothing in return for the future, neither the joy of happiness nor his own bliss: in all the formations he sees no significance: it is only in supreme bodhi that he sees benefit.

Insofar as the way out of all the formations, this unconditioned - nirvāṇa - cannot be a fruit of retribution (vipākaphala).

with a feeling of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta), to save save all beings (sarvasattvapariṭrāṇāya) also obtains a great retribution.⁹³ <2222>

II. DIVERSITY OF THE FRUITS OF GENEROSITY⁹⁴

⁹³ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 270, l. 16: Yad vā dānaṃ bodhisattvo dadāti sarvasattvahiṭahetoḥ. tad amuktasyāpy amuktebhyo dānam agram. – Or else the gift which the bodhisattva makes for the good of all beings: this gift, although given by a non-liberated man to non-liberated people, is the best gift.

⁹⁴ This section is a paraphrase of the Dānupapattisutta (Dīgha, III, p. 258-260; Anguttara, IV, p. 239-241) dealing with the eight rebirths as a result of generosity. Here is the beginning:

Idh’ āvuso ekacco dānaṃ deti samaṇassa vā brāhmaṇassa vā annaṃ pānaṃ vatthaṃ yānaṃ mālāgandhavilepanaṃ seyyāvasasthapadīpeyyaṃ. So yaṃ deti taṃ paccāsiṃsati. So passati khattiyamahāsālaṃ vā brāhamaṇamahāsālaṃ vā gahapatimahāsālaṃ vā pañcahi kāmagaṇehi samappitaṃ samaṅgibhūtaṃ paricāramāṇaṃ. Tassa evaṃ hoti – ‘Aho vatāhaṃ kāyassa bhedā paraṃ maraṇā khattiyamahāsālānaṃ vā brāhmaṇamahāsālānaṃ vā gahapatimahāsālānaṃ vā sahavyuataṃ upapajjeyyan ti’. So taṃ cittaṃ dahati, taṃ cittaṃ adhiṭṭhāti, taṃ cittaṃ bhāveti. Tassa taṃ cittaṃ hīne vimuttaṃ uttarīṃ abhāvitaṃ tatr’ upapattiyā saṃvattati. Tañ ca kho sīlavato vadāmi no dussīlassa. Ijjhat’ āvuso sīlavato cetopaniḍhi suddhattā.

Puna ca paraṃ āvuso idh’ ekacco dānaṃ deti samaṇassa vā brāhmaṇasso vā annaṃ pānaṃ vatthaṃ yānaṃ mālāgandhavilepanaṃ seyyāvasasthapadīpeyyaṃ. So yaṃ deti taṃ paccāsiṃsati. Tassa sutam hoti. – ‘Cātummahārājikā devā dīghāyukā vaṇṇavanto sukhabahula ti.’ – ‘Aho vatāhaṃ kāyassa bhedā paraṃ maraṇā. Cātummahārājikānaṃ devānaṃ sahavyatam upapajjeyyan ti’. So taṃ cittaṃ dahati, taṃ cittaṃ adhiṭṭhāti, taṃ cittaṃ bhāveti. Tassa taṃ cittaṃ hīne vimuttaṃ uttarīṃ abhāvitaṃ tatr’ upapattiyā saṃvattati. Tañ ca kho sīlavato vadāmi no dussīlassa. Ijjhat’ āvuso cetopaniḍhi suddhattā.

Transl. – A certain man, my brothers, makes a gift to a monk or to a brāhmaṇa in the form of food, clothing, drink, vehicle, garland, perfume, unguent, bedding, dwelling or lamp. For what he gives, he expects something in return. He sees a wealthy family of warriors, a wealthy family of brāhmaṇas or a wealthy family of householders provided with the five objects of enjoyment, wealthy and courted. Then he thinks: “Ah, at the dissolution of my body after death, if I could be reborn among rich families of warriors, rich families of brāhmaṇas or rich families of householders!” Having made this thought, he fixes (his attention) on it, he concentrates (his mind) on it and cultivates it. This mind, directed to the low and unable to go higher, leads him to be reborn there (where he wished). And this is true, I say, for a moral man and not for a vicious man. The mental wish of a moral man derives its success from his purity.

Furthermore, my brothers, another man makes a gift to a monk or to a brāhmaṇa in the form of food, drink, clothing, vehicle, garland, perfume, unguent, bedding, dwelling or lamp. He hears it said: “The Caturmahārājika gods live for a long time; they are handsome and happy.” Then he thinks: “Ah, at the dissolution of my body after death, if I could be reborn among the Caturmahārājika gods!” Having thought thus, he fixes (his attention on it), he concentrates (his mind) on it and cultivates it. This mind, directed to the low and unable to rise higher, leads him to be reborn there (where he wished). And that, I say, is true for a moral man and not for a vicious man. The mental wish of a moral man derives its success from his purity.

[Following its explanation, the sūtra explains, in the same words, the rebirth of a generous and moral man among the other deities: Trāyastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarati, Parinirmitavaśavartin and Brahmakāyika gods.]

In addition to the great fruits of rpening (mahāvīpākaphala), as is said [here in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra], it is to be reborn in the families of the kṣatriya and so on up to becoming Buddha.

Question. – How does one get to be reborn in the families of the kṣatriyas and so on up to becoming Buddha? <2223>

Answer. – The generous (tyāgavat) and moral (śīlavat) man⁹⁵ obtains riches and honor among men and gods.

1. The seven rebirths in kāmadhātu

1) Someone gives with a perfect intention and maintains morality: he is reborn in the families of the kṣatriyas. The kṣatriyas are the kings (rājan) and great ministers (mahāmātya).

Someone else is attached to books of knowledge (the Vedas?) and does not torment beings: by his generosity and morality, he is reborn in the families of the brāhmaṇas.

[301c] Another, with generosity and mediocre morality is pleased with worldly happiness (lokasukha): he is reborn in the families of the householders (gr̥hapatī). These householders are ordinary people but very wealthy.

2) In another, generosity and morality are of somewhat higher purity (viśuddhi); this man feels repugnance for domestic things, loves to hear the Dharma and honors worthy people: he is reborn among the Caturmahārājika gods.⁹⁶ Why? Because pleasant⁹⁷ things appear there as soon as they are thought of (sahacittotpādāt prādurbhavanti); one constantly gets to see the good worthy people (satpuruṣa) of the place, and by honoring them resolutely, one draws near to practicing the meritorious action that consists of meditation (bhāvanāpūṇyakriyāvastu).

3) Another, of pure generosity and morality, honors his father and mother, reveres them (bhadanta) and passionately seeks supremacy (śreṣṭha): he is reborn among the Trāyastriṃśa gods.

4) Another, of pure generosity and morality, who loves to learn and whose mind is gentle, is reborn among the Yāma gods.

5) Another, of pure generosity and morality, develops these two qualities further; he loves learning (bāhuśrūṭya), discriminates the beautiful and the ugly, desires nirvāṇa and is intensely attached to the qualities (guṇa): he is reborn among the Tuṣita gods. <2224>

⁹⁵ In order to do good, the generous man (tyāgavat) must also be moral (śīlavat) and learned (bahuśrūta).

⁹⁶ For a precise definition of the six classes of kamādevas, see Kośa, III, p. 166.

⁹⁷ I.e., the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), colors (rūpa), etc.

6) Another, generous, magnanimous, moral and erudite (bahuśruta), loves to learn and earns his living by his own strength: he is reborn among the Nirmaṇarati gods.

7) Another, when he gives, shows deepening pure morality; he loves erudition (bāhuśrutya) and considers himself a spiritual person (sattva); but unable to undergo suffering, he seeks his satisfactions from someone else (para): he is reborn among the Paranirmitavaśavartin gods, ‘gods using the desirable objects (kāma or kāmaguṇa) created by others in a sovereign manner’.⁹⁸ This is a question of female shapes knowingly and ingeniously created by others (paranirmita); the Paranirmitavaśavartin gods take hold of these five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) and use them in a sovereign manner (vaśe vartayanti). They are like destitute people who fight over a patrimony.

Finally, it is as a result of a wish (praṇidhāna) formulated at the moment of the gift that one is reborn in the paradises.

[Dānupapattisutta].⁹⁹ – Thus it is said in a sūtra: A man cultivates a little bit of generosity and morality but is ignorant of the existence of the dhyānas and the absorptions (samāpatti). Learning of the existence of the Cāturmahārājika gods, he mentally makes them [the object] of his aspirations (cetanāpraṇidhi). The Buddha has said: “At the end of his life, this man will be reborn among the Cāturmahārājika gods: that is absolutely certain.” It is the same [in regard to rebirth among the other gods of kāmadhātu] up to and including the Paranirmitavaśavartin gods.

2. Eight rebirths in rūpadhātu and ārūpyadhātu

Furthermore, there is a generous and moral man who, while practicing generosity, mentally experiences happiness. The greater his gift, the greater his happiness. In this state of mind, he rejects the five objects of sensory enjoyment (pañca kāmaguṇa), avoids the five obstacles (pañcanivarāṇa) and penetrates [into the four dhyānas and the four samāpattis], from the first dhyāna up to the absorption of neither perception nor non-perception (naivasamjñānāsamjñā).

For these four dhyānas and the four non-material absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti), see what was said above (p. 1027-1034F). <2225>

3. Four rebirths in the noble Path

Furthermore, there are people who, having given to the Buddha and his disciples (buddhaśrāvaka), hear from their mouths a sermon on the Path. Because of the gifts they have made, their minds (citta) become gentle (mṛdu), their wisdom (prajñā) becomes sharp (tiṅṣṇa) and they are immediately reborn into the noble eightfold Path (āryāṣṭāṅga mārga). By elimination of the three fetters (trayāṇāṃ samyojanānāṃ prahāṇā), they obtain the fruit of srotaāpanna, and so on up to their arrival at the bodhi of the Buddhas. As a result of these gifts, they hear [the Buddha] preach the Dharma and then they produce the mind of supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi).

⁹⁸ Dīgha, III, p. 218: Santi sattā paranimmitakāmā, te paranimmitesu kāmesu vasaṃ vattenti seyyathā pi devā paranimmitavasavattī.

⁹⁹ Passage cited above, p. 2222F, n. 1.

The generosity of a man not detached from desire (avītarāga) results in rebirth among men, in wealth and honor, or among the six kinds of gods of the desire realm (kāmadeva). – The generosity of a man detached from desire (vitaraṅga) results in rebirth among the gods of the Brahmā realm (brahmaloka) , up to the Br̥hatphalas.¹⁰⁰ The generosity of a man freed from the notion of material (rūpa) [302a] results in a rebirth among the formless gods (ārūpyadeva).

4. Attainment of the bodhis¹⁰¹

1) The generosity of a man detached from the threefold world (trailokyavirakta), who has nirvāṇa in mind, procures the bodhi of the śrāvakas.

2) If at the moment of giving, the man has a horror of turmoil (saṃsarga), loves peace (śānta) and rejoices in profound wisdom (gambhīraprajñā), he attains the bodhi of the pratyekabuddhas.

3) If at the moment of giving, the man feels a mind of great pity (mahākaruṇācitta), wants to save the entire world and realize the highest wisdom (prajñā), very deep (atigambhīra) and absolutely pure (atyantavīśuddha), he attains the bodhi of the Buddhas.

Ṣaṭpāramitāpripūri

Ninth Section FULFILLING THE PERFECTIONS SKILLFULLY

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 25, l. 18-27, l. 2: Śatasāhasrikā, p. 91, l. 21-93, l. 1). – Moreover, Śāriputra, when the bodhisattva-mahāsattva gives while practicing <2226> the perfection of wisdom, he fulfills completely the perfection of generosity, the perfection of morality, the perfection of patience, the perfection of exertion, the perfection of meditation and the perfection of wisdom. - Śāriputra said to the Buddha: By what skillful means, O Lord, does the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who is making a gift fulfill completely the perfection of generosity, etc., up to the perfection of wisdom? – The Lord replied to Śāriputra: By not grasping the giver, the receiver or the thing given, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva completely fulfills the ¹⁰⁰ The Br̥hatphalas, in order of greatness, occupy the twelfth place in the Brahmaloḳa, the third place in the fourth dhyāna.

¹⁰¹ See above, p. 1067-1070F, the passage dedicated to the prajñā of the śrāvakas, of the pratyekabuddhas and of the Buddhas.

perfection of generosity. By not committing either wrong deeds or good actions, the bodhisattva fulfills completely the perfection of morality. By not disturbing his mind, the bodhisattva fulfills completely the perfection of patience. By not relaxing his physical and mental energy, the bodhisattva fulfills completely the perfection of exertion. By having neither distraction nor the act of attention, the bodhisattva fulfills completely the perfection of meditation. By understanding all dharmas by means of the method that grasps none of them, the bodhisattva fulfills completely the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra, bodhisattvo mahāsattvaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caran, dānaṃ dadan, upāyakaūśalena dānapāramitāṃ śīlapāramitāṃ kṣāntipāramitāṃ vīryapāramitāṃ dhyānapāramitāṃ prajñāpāramitāṃ paripūrayati. – Athāyuṣmān Śāriputro bhagantam etad avocat: Kenopāyakaūśalena bhagavan bodhisattvo mahāsattvo dānaṃ dadan dānapāramitāṃ yāvat prajñāpāramitāṃ paripūrayati. – Bhagavān āha: Anupalambhena dāyakasya grāhakasya deyasya ca dānapāramitā paripūrītā bhavati; āpattiyanāpattyanadhyāpattitaḥ śīlapāramitā paripūrītā bhavati; cittasyākṣobhaṇataḥ kṣāntipāramitā paripūrītā bhavati; kāyikacaitasikavīryāsaṃsanato vīryapāramitā paripūrītā bhavati; avikṣepāsaṃkalpanato dhyānapāramitā bhavati; sarvadharmaprajānanānupalambha-yogena prajñāpāramitā paripūrītā bhavati.

Śāstra. –

The meaning of this paripūri ‘the act of completely fulfilling’ has been fully explained above.¹⁰² Now we will speak about upāyakaūśala (or upāyakaūśalya), skillful means.¹⁰³ [In regard to the perfection of generosity], this skillful means is not to grasp (anupalambha) three things: [the donor (dāyaka), the thing given (deya) and the recipient (pratigrāhaka)]. <2227>

Question. – But in order to realize this non-grasping (anupalambha), skillful means has nothing to eliminate or nothing to do. Suppressing the three things, as here, [i.e., giver, thing given and receiver] is to fall necessarily into the view of nihilism (uccheda).¹⁰⁴

Answer. – There are two kinds of non-grasping (anupalambha): i) not grasping that which exists (upalabdhasyānupalambha); ii) not grasping that which does not exist (anupalabhasyānupa-lambha).

Not grasping that which does exist is to fall into the view of nihilism (uccheda). Not grasping that which does not exist is to put skillful means (upāyakaūśala) to work and not falling into the view of nihilism. Without skillful means, the donor, [in his gift], clings (udgrhnāti) to these three characteristics (nimitta), [i.e., the giver, the gift and the receiver]. But if he has recourse in the emptiness (śūnyatā) of these three things, he grasps the absence of characteristics (ānimitta). He who possesses skillful means from the very beginning (mūlata eva) does not see the three characteristics of generosity. This is why using skillful means (upāyakaūśala) is not to fall [into the extreme views] of existence and non-existence (bhavavibhavadrṣṭi).

¹⁰² The paripūri of the six pāramitās is the object of chapters XVII to XXX.

¹⁰³ Here Kumārajīva translates upāyakaūśalya (in Tibetan, thabs la mkhas pa) as houei fang pien, whereas the most frequently used translation is chan k'iao fang pien.

¹⁰⁴ An extreme view condemned by the Buddha: see above, p. 2007-2008F, and Kośa, V, p. 40.

Moreover, eliminating the afflictive emotions (kleśasaṃvartana) on the occasion of a gift is called skillful means.

Moreover, giving while producing a mind of great compassion toward all beings (mahākaruṇācitta) is called skillful means.

The fact of applying (pariṇāmanā) the meritorious gifts practiced during numberless past (atīta) and future (anāgata) lifetimes to supreme and perfect enlightenment (anuttarā saṃyaksambodhi) is also called skillful means.

[302b] Finally, the fact of commemorating (anusmaraṇa) the merits (puṇya) acquired by the Buddhas and their disciples (śrāvaka) in the ten directions (daśadiś) and the three times (tryadhvaṇ), the fact of being pleased with their gifts and applying them (pariṇāmanā) to supreme and complete enlightenment is also called skillful means.¹⁰⁵

These are the many potentialities constituting skillful means [in regard to the perfection of generosity]. [Mutatis mutandis, it is the same for skillful means in regard to the other five pāramitās] including prajñāpāramitā. <2228>

Buddhagūṇānuprāpana

Tenth Section ATTAINING THE QUALITIES OF ALL THE BUDDHAS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 29, l. 4-5; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 93, l. 1-3). – Furthermore, Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to attain the qualities of the blessed Buddhas, past, future and present, must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvenātītānāgatapratyutpannānāṃ buddhānāṃ bhagavatāṃ guṇāṃ anuprāptukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – The qualities of the past Buddhas have already disappeared; the qualities of the future Buddhas do not yet exist, and the qualities of the present Buddhas are not perceptible (nopalabhyante): therefore the qualities of the Buddhas of the three times (tryadhvaṇ) do not exist. Then why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speak here of the bodhisattva who, wishing to acquire the qualities of the Buddhas of the three times, should practice the perfection of wisdom?

Answer. – The sūtra does not speak of the bodhisattva wanting to acquire the qualities of all the Buddhas of the three times, but of the bodhisattva wanting to acquire for himself qualities that are not fewer than those of one Buddha of the three times. How is that? In all the Buddhas, the qualities are [numerically] equal, neither more nor less numerous.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰⁵ See chapter XLIV.

Question. – If that is true, how can one say in regard to the buddha Amita that his lifespan (āyuspramāṇa) is limitless (aparimita), that his brilliance (prabhā) covers thousands of myriads of koṭis of yojanas¹⁰⁷ and that he has saved beings of innumerable kalpas?

Answer. – The buddhafiels (buddhakṣetra) are diverse (nānāvidha): <2229> there are those that are pure (parisuddha), those that are impure (aparīsuddha) and those that are mixed (miśra).¹⁰⁸

[Trayastrīmśeṣu deveṣu buddhārohaṇaparivarta].¹⁰⁹ – Thus it is said in the San-che-san-t'ien-p'in sūtra (Trāyastriṃśadevaparivarta): At that time, the Buddha had gone to spend the rainy season among the Trāyastriṃśa gods (atra khalu varṣāvāsam bhagavān upagatas trāyastriṃśeṣu deveṣu), and when the time of dismissal [pravāraṇa] had come (atha tadaiva pravāraṇāyāṃ pratyurpasthitāyām),¹¹⁰ the four assemblies (catasraḥ parśadah) remaining on earth and not having seen the Buddha for a long time, were distressed and sad. They sent Mou-lien (Maudgalyāyana) [to the Buddha] and Maudgalyāyana said to the Buddha: Lord, why do you neglect all these people and stay with the gods?

Then the Buddha said to Maudgalyāyana: Look at this universe with its three thousand continents (trisāhasra lokadhātu). By the power of the Buddha, Maudgalyāyana looked at the universe in question and he saw there some Buddhas who were preaching the Dharma to the great assembly, other Buddhas seated ¹⁰⁶ The qualities or attributes of the Buddhas have been the subject of chapters XXXIX to XLII: they are the same in all the Buddhas, but the latter differ in certain points. The Kośabhāṣyā, p. 415, l. 14-17, comments: Tribiḥ kāraṇaiḥ sāmyaṃ sarvabuddhānāṃ / sarvapūṇyajñānasambhāra-samudāgamataḥ dharmakāyapariniṣpatitāḥ arthacaryayā ca lokasya / āyurjāti-gotrāpramāṇakṛtas tu bheda bhavati / - All the Buddhas are alike in three aspects: in that they have accumulated the entire accumulation of merit and wisdom; in that they realize the same dharmakāya; in that they give the same service to beings. But they differ in their lifespan, in caste, in clan and in the size of their body.

¹⁰⁷ Small Sukhāvatīvyūha, ed. U. Wogihara, 1931, p. 200. §8-9 (T 366, p. 347a25-29): Tat kiṃ manyase śāriputra kena kāraṇena sa tathāgato 'mitāyur nāmocyate / tasya khalu punaḥ śāriputra tathāgatasya teṣāṃ ca manusyāṇāṃ aparimitaṃ āyuhpramāṇam / tena kāraṇena sa tathāgato 'mitāyur nāmocyate / tasya ca śāriputra tathāgatasya daśa kalpā anuttarāṃ samyaksambodhim abhisambuddhasya // tat kiṃ manyase śāriputra kena kāraṇena sa tathāgato 'mitābho nāmocyate / tasye khalu punaḥ śāriputra tathāgatasyābhāpratithatā sarvabuddhakṣetreṣu /

¹⁰⁸ See below (k. 93, p. 711c18) and Yogācārabhūmi, T 1579, k. 79, p. 736c21.

¹⁰⁹ T 815, k. 3, p. 795b20-c27; T 816, k. 3, p. 811b22-812a2. – A Mahāyānasūtra relating the ascent of the Buddha to the Trāyastriṃśa heaven to preach the Dharma there to his mother; this is an episode of the Miracle of Sāmkāśya which has been mentioned above (p. 634-635F, 1765-1767F, n.).

This sūtra is known by two Chinese translations:

1) Fo cheng t'ao li t'ien wei mou chou fa king (T815), also called Fo cheng t'ao li t'ien p'in king, the title used here by the Traité. This translation was made by Dharmarakṣa at Tch'ang-ngan during the first year of the T'ai-che pperiod (265-266). Cf. Li, T 2034, k. 6, p. 62c16-17; K'ai, T 2154, k. 2, p. 494a19-20.

2) Tao chen tsou wou ki pien houa king (T816), also called Tao chen tsou king. This translation was made by the Parthian śramaṇa Ngan Fa-kin who worked at Lo-yang from 281 to 306.

¹¹⁰ Cf. Divyāvadana, p. 91, l. 12-13.

in meditation, yet others begging their food; in these many ways they were accomplishing their Buddha-work (buddhakārya).

Then Maudgalyāyana prostrated with a fivefold bow (pañcāṅgapraṇāma).¹¹¹ Sumeru, king of the mountains, shook with great trembling and all the gods were seized by great fear.

Maudgalayāyana burst into tears and bowing his head, said to the Buddha: In their great compassion (mahākaruṇā) the Buddhas do not abandon anyone: by working with these many transformations (nirmāṇa), they save beings. <2230>

The Buddha said to Maudgalyāyana: What you see is nothing at all. Beyond what you see, in the east (pūrvasyām diśi) there is a universe the ground of which is made only of gold (suvarṇamaya): the disciples of the Buddha who lives there are all arhats and their six superknowledges (abhijñā) are without obstacle. – Beyond that region of the east, there is a universe the ground of which is made only of silver (rūpyamaya): the disciples of the Buddha there all practice (śikṣante) the bodhi of the pratyekabuddhas. – Beyond this region of the east there is a universe the ground of which is made only of the seven jewels [302c] (saptaratna); on that ground there is always an immense brilliance (apramāṇaprabhā): the disciples created there by the Buddha are all bodhisattvas who have all attained the gates of dhāraṇī and samādhi and abide in the non-regressing stage (avaivartukabhūmi). You should know, O Maudgalyāyana, that all those Buddhas are myself. Thus, among all these numberless universes (lokadhātu) in the eastern direction, equal in number to the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgānadīvālukopama), there are some that are beautiful (śubha) and some that are ugly (aśubha): in all of them, it is I myself who carry out the work of Buddha. And it is the same in the universe of the south (dakṣiṇasyām diśi), of the west (paścimāyām diśi), and the north (uttarasām diśi), in the four intermediate directions (catasṛṣu vikiṣu), in the direction of the zenith (upariṣṭād diśi) and in the direction of the nadir (adhastād diśi).

- This is why it should be known that the Buddha Śākyamuni has pure universes (parisuddhalokadhātu) also, like [the Sukhāvatī] of Amita, and that the buddha Amita, as well as his pure universes, has also impure universes (aparīsuddha), like [the Sahāloka] of Buddha Śākyamuni.

The great compassion (mahākaruṇā) of the Buddhas 'penetrates as far as the marrow of their bones' (asthimajjāṃ āhatya tiṣṭhati).¹¹² Indifferent to the beauty or the ugliness of the universes, they conform (anuvartante) [to the needs] of the beings to be saved and train them (vinayanti), like a tender loving mother trains her son: should he fall into a pit of excrement, she rushes to pull him out without any regard for the annoyance.

Raising with a single hair (ekena vālena) the hundred koṭis of Sumeru in the Trisāhasramahāsmahasralokadhātu already is difficult.

¹¹¹ A bow made with arms, knees, head, chest (vakṣas) and gaze: see Monier-Willimas, p. 578a.

¹¹² A time-honored expression: a violent passion like the love of parents for their son (putrapreman), cuts in turn the skin (chavi), the hide (carman), the flesh (māṃsa), the muscles (snāyu), the bone (asthi) and 'having cut the bone, penetrates into the marrow and stays there'. In Pāli, aṭṭhiṃ chetvā aṭṭhimiñjaṃ āhacca tiṭṭhati: cf. Vin. I, p. 83, l. 4; Saṃyutta, II, p. 238, l. 16; Anguttara, IV, p. 129, l. 15.

CHAPTER L: ARRIVING AT THE OTHER SHORE

Pūrva⁹gama

First Section ARRIVING AT THE OTHER SHORE

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 29, l. 5-6; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 93, l. 5-5). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to arrive at the other shore of conditioned and unconditioned dharmas must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena saṃskṛtāsaṃskṛtānāṃ dharmāṇāṃ pāraṃ gantukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Arriving at ‘the other shore’ is coming precisely to the other shore (anta) of conditioned (saṃskṛta) dharmas and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) dharmas. By means of great wisdom, how does one get to know entirely, to exhaust entirely, (mahāprajñā), this ‘other shore’ (para)? By analyzing the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) of conditioned dharmas in many ways, and, in regard to the unconditioned dharmas, by understanding completely [the four fruits of the religious life] (śrāmanyaphala) from srotaṅgana up to Buddhahood.¹¹³

For the characteristics of conditioned and unconditioned dharmas, see what has been said above (p. 2077F).

Second Section UNDERSTANDING TATHATĀ, DHARMATĀ AND ANUTPĀDAKOṬI

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 29, l. 6-8; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 94, l. 13-19). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection <2232> of wisdom if he wishes to understand all dharmas, past, present and future, their dharma-nature and their intrinsic non-arising (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena sarvadharmāṇāṃ atītanagatapratyutpannānāṃ tathatāṃ dharmāṇāṃ anutpādakoṭim anuboddhukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

¹¹³ According to the Sarvāstivādin, the fruits of the religious life (śrāmanyaphala) are conditioned (saṃskṛta) and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta). The eighty-nine paths of abandoning (prahāṇamārga), or paths of immediate succession (ānantaryamārga), by means of which the ascetic abandons the afflictive emotions of the threefold world, make up the religious life (śrāmanya). The eighty-nine paths of deliverance (vimuktimārga) by means of which the ascetic takes possession of the abandonment are the conditioned fruits of the śrāmanya, being niṣyandaphala and puruṣakārāphala of the śrāmanya. See Kośa, VI, p. 241-242; Kośabhāṣya, p. 369-370.

Śāstra. –

Question. – Above (p. 2186F), tathatā, the ‘manner of existence’, has already been spoken of; why talk about it again here?

Answer. – Above, we talked simply of the tathatā of all dharmas; here we are speaking about the tathatā of the three times (tryadhvan). – Above, we spoke briefly (saṃkṣepeṇa); here we will speak at length (vistareṇa). – Above, we spoke of just [the tathatā];¹¹⁴ here we are speaking of three things [tathatā, dharmatā and anutpādakoṭi].

The dharmatā ‘dharma-nature’ is the dharmadhātu ‘fundamental [303a] element’; the anutpādakoṭi ‘intrinsic non-arising’ is the bhūtakoṭi ‘limit of truth’.

The tathatā of past (atīta) dharmas is the dharmatā of past dharmas, and it is the same for future (anāgata) and present (pratyutpanna) dharmas.

Furthermore, the tathatā of past dharmas is the tathatā of future and present dharmas; the tathatā of present dharmas is the tathatā of past and present dharmas. Why? Because the nature of tathatā is beyond identity (ekatva) and diversity (nānātva).

Furthermore, as I have said above (p. 2196F), there are two kinds of tathatā: the worldly (laukikī) tathatā and the supramundly (lokottara) tathatā. In terms of the worldly tathatā, the three times are each different; in terms of the supramundly tathatā, the three times are the same.

As for the dharmatā, there are action-dharmas (karman) and result-dharmas (kṛta), causes-conditions (hetupratyaya) and fruits of retribution (vipākaphala), in the same way that fire (tejas) has heat (uṣṇatva) as its nature and water (ap-) has moistness (dravatva) as its nature. The causes-conditions and the fruits of retribution of these dharmas are distinguished. Each has its specific nature <2233> (svalakṣaṇa) as has been said (p. 1524-1527F) in regard to the power [of knowledge] concerning the possible and the impossible (sthānāsthānājñānabala): that is the worldly (laukikī) dharmatā. – But if one examines and considers the nature of things, one enters into the system of non-arising (anutpāda) and one does not depart from it: this is called anutpādakoṭi ‘intrinsic non-arising’.

Objection [of the Sarvāstivādin]. – But in this dharmatā it is possible to discern the existence of the three times. The anutpādakoṭi is future (anāgata) dharmas. How is there still the past (atīta) and the present (pratyutpanna)? The Abhidharma gives the answer: “Dharmas having-arising (utpattika) are the past and the present; dharmas without-arising (anutpattika) are the future and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) dharmas.” That being so, why would you want the past and the present to be without-arising?

Answer. – In many ways previously I have refuted the existence of dharma-having-birth: all dharmas are unborn (anutpannāḥ sarvadharmāḥ). Why would the future be the only one to be without-birth? Above (p. 76-79F), in interpreting the phrase “at one time”, I refuted the existence of the three times (tryadvaṇ). The three times have only one characteristic, namely, the absence of nature (ekalakṣaṇaṃ yadutālakṣaṇaṃ); that is their nature of non-arising (anutpādalakṣaṇa).

¹¹⁴ Above, it was a matter of the tathatā, the dharmadhātu and the bhūtakoṭi, but it was to identify all three with nirvāṇa.

Moreover, the anutpāda is called nirvāṇa because nirvāṇa does not arise and does not cease. From beginning to end, nirvāṇa is absolutely without rebirth (apaunarbhavika) and all dharmas are nirvāṇa.

This is why the Buddha speaks here of their anutpādakiṇi, ‘their intrinsic non-arising’.

Pūrvamgamana

Third Section ACQUIRING PRECEDENCE, ETC.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 29, l. 9-14; ŚātasMahasrikā, p. 94, l. 19-95, l. 9). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wants to acquire precedence over all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, become the assistant of all the blessed Buddhas, participate in the close circle of all the blessed Buddhas, have a large following, acquire a following of bodhisattvas and purify great offerings (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena sarvaśrāvakaṃ pratyekabuddhānāṃ pūrvamgamena bhavitukāmena, buddhānāṃ bhagavatām upasthāyakena bhavitukāmena, buddhānāṃ bhagavatām abhyantaraparivāreṇa bhavitukāmena, <2234> mahāparivāreṇa bhavitukāmena, bodhisattvaparivāraṃ pratilabdhuṃkāmena, dakṣiṇaṃ pariśodhayatukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. ACQUIRING PRECEDENCE OVER THE ŚRĀVAKAS AND PRATYEKABUDDHAS

Question. – How can the bodhisattva who has not yet acquired the cessation of the impurities (āsravaḥ) take precedence over the holy individuals (āryapudgala) whose impurities are destroyed (kṣināsrava)?

Answer. – From his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva already takes precedence over all beings; what more can be said (kaḥ punarvādah) when he has practiced (caryā) for many kalpas?

The merits (punya) and knowledge (jñāna) of this bodhisattva are great; from lifetime to lifetime he has always been of great benefit to the śrāvakas and [303b] pratyekabuddhas. Out of recognition of the benefits (kṛtājñatā) of the bodhisattva, beings venerate him, esteem him and respect him even in his [earlier] animal existences.¹¹⁵

¹¹⁵ According to the Pāli sources, the bodhisattva, in his earlier lifetimes, was an antelope, buffalo, bull, cock, crow, elephant, dog, lizard, duck, frog, garuḍa, goose, hare, horse, iguana, jackal, lion, lizard, monkey, parrot, partridge, [Rurujātaka].¹¹⁶ – Thus, at one time the Bodhisattva was a deer (mṛga), his body golden in color (suvarṇavarṇa), his antlers (viśāṇa) made of the seven jewels (saptaratnamaya), and five hundred deer followed him as his servants.

When the Bodhisattva lived [as a lay person] among men, he was, during the fortunate periods, a noble cakravartin king; but in <2235> periods of corruption (kaṣāyakāla), he was a great king protecting the Buddhadharma and benefiting beings.¹¹⁷

When the Bodhisattva left home (pravrajita) [to embrace the religious life], if the Dharma of a Buddha existed at that time, he was a great savior-teacher for the world; but if, [at that time], the Dharma of a Buddha did not exist, he was a great heretic teacher (tīrthika mahācārya) practicing the four immeasurables (apramāṇa).¹¹⁸

Although they are without impurities (anāsrava), the arhats and pratyekabuddhas render only mediocre service: they are like a bushel of melted butter (ghṛta) which, although shiny, is only the foam (phena) of the great ocean. The bodhisattva himself, despite his impure wisdom (sāsravaprajñā) and his maturations (paripāka) renders immense service (apramāṇānugraha).

peacock, pigeon, quail, rat, deer, snake, vulture, wood-pecker, many times over (see General Index of Jātaka Stories, ed. E. B. Cowell, vol. V-VI, s.v. Bodhisattva). Many animal existences are also noted in Cinq cents Contes et Apologues extraits du Tripitaka chinois by E. Chavannes; they are noted in Hobogirin, IV, p. 317, s.v. Chikushō ¹¹⁶ Pāli Jātaka, no. 482, p. 255-263 (transl. Jātaka Stories, IV, p. 161-166); Lieou tou tsi king, T 152, no. 58, k. 6, p. 33a6-b23 (transl. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 220-224); Kieou sō lou king, T 181, p. 452b-454a; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, k. 15, p. 175a27-176b6 (transl. Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 122-128); Jātakamālā, no. 26, p. 167-175 (transl. Speyer, p. 234-244). – Illustrations: medallion from Bharhut with the inscription: Migajātakam: A. K. Coomaraswamy, La sculpture de Bharhut, 1956, p. 72 and pl. XXIX, fig. 73; Ajantā, cave II; Boro-Budur (Leemans, pl. CLXIX).

¹¹⁷ Human existences of the Bodhisattva as a lay-person: during the fortunate periods (bhadrakalpa) characterized by the appearance of Buddhas, he was a cakravartin king; during the periods of corruption (kaṣāyakāla), he was a king. The Pāli Jātaka mentions no less than forty-eight lifetimes during which the Bodhisattva was a king ruling by the Dharma; see, e.g., the Vāṭamigajātaka, I, p. 159, l. 11-12, the Mahāsīlavajātaka, I, p. 268; the Uccaṅgajātaka, I, p. 308, l. 22.

The five corruptions (kaṣāya) affect lifespan (āyus), beings (sattva), the afflictive emotions (kleśa), wrong views (dṛṣṭi) and the period (kalpa). See the notes of L. de La Vallée Poussin in Kośa, III, p. 193, 207.

¹¹⁸ Human existences of the Bodhisattva as a monk: if the Holy Dharma exists in the world, he is a model monk; if the Holy Dharma is not present, he is a great heretic teacher of high moral standards. Here the Traité has in mind the heretic Sunetra who practiced the four brahmavihāras, loving-kindness, etc., splendidly, and with whom Śākyamuni is identified in some versions of the Saptasūryopamasūtra: see above, p. 520F, 2091-2092F and notes; also the Mahākarma-vibhaṅga, p. 37.

Finally, in regard to the four kinds of purifications (caturvidhapaṛiṣkāra) that are the auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipakṣya),¹¹⁹ the arhats and pratyekabuddhas have received a great deal from the bodhisattva.

[Śūramgamasamādhisūtra].¹²⁰ – Thus it is said in the <2236> Cheou-leng-king (Śūramgamasūtra), Mañjuśrī was a pratyekabuddha 7,200,000 times and by converting people to the pratyekabuddha Vehicle, he helped them realize bodhi.

This is why the bodhisattva has precedence over the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

II. BEING THE ASSISTANT OF THE BUDDHA

The bodhisattva ‘wants to be the assistant (upasthāyaka) of the Buddha’.

1) Thus, when Śākyamuni had not yet left home (anabhinīṣkrānta), he had Tch'e-ni (Chandaka) as helper (upasthāyaka), Yeou-t'o-ye as play-mate (ahakrīdanaka),¹²¹ Kiu-p'i-ye (Gopiyā), Ye-chou-t'o (Yaśodharā) and other women of the harem (antahpura) as his intimate entourage (abhyantaraparivāra).¹²²

2) After he left home (abhinīṣkrānta), during the six years in which he practiced asceticism (duṣkaracarya), he had the pañcakas as assistants (upasthāyaka).¹²³

¹¹⁹ The arhats and pratyekabuddhas are indebted to the bodhisattva for material benefits – clothing, food, furniture and medicines – and above all for spiritual benefits, teaching the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment which were the subject of chapter XXXI.

The material benefits are known under the name of Caturvidha pūjāpaṛiṣkāra detailed in the formula: cīvara-piṇḍapāṭa-śayanāsana-glānapratyayabhaiṣajya-paṛiṣkāra: cf. Vinaya, III, P. 132, l. 8-9; Dīgha, III, p. 268, l. 1; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 288, l. 12: 291, l. 5; Mahāvastu, I, p. 49, l. 10; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 1, l. 7; Divya, p. 143, l. 6., etc.

¹²⁰ Passage from the Śūramgamasamādhī, French transl., p. 245, §147, already cited above, p. 602F and 1907F. Later, the Traité (k. 75, p. 586a28) will explain that Mañjuśrī often simulated the nirvāṇa of the pratyekabuddhas because at his time beings could be converted only by pratyekabuddhas.

¹²¹ Cf. Mahāvastu, III, p. 91, l. 7-9: Ayaṃ tva Chandaka sa yeva Bhagavato kumārabhūtasya upasthāyako eteṇa sārdaṃ kumāro abhinīṣkrānto, ayaṃ pi Udāyī purohitaputro Bhagavato kumārabhūtasya dāra-kavayasyo abhūsi sahapāṃśukrīḍanako. – Jātaka, I, p. 86, l. 14-15: So (Kāludāyī) kira rañño sabbatthasādhako abbhantariko ativissāsiko Bodhisattena saddhim ekadivase jāto sahapāṃsukūḷito sahāyo.

¹²² Like most other sources, the Traité acknowledges only two legitimate wives to Śākyamuni: Gopiyā who was sterile and Yaśodharā, mother of Rāhula. For the women of the Buddha before his Great Departure, see above, p. 1001F foll. For Goṇā or Gopiyā, whose sex has been debated, see Śūramgamasamādhī, French transl., p. 172-173note.

¹²³ During the six years between his Great Departure (abhinīṣkrāṇa) and his enlightenment (abhisambodhana), Śākyamuni had as assistants the Wou jen ‘Five men’, two characters often used by the Chinese translators to render the Sanskrit expression Pañcakābhadravargyaḥ (Lalita, p. 245, l. 16; Mahāvastu, II, p. 241, l. 2). These are the five individuals ‘of good family’ who helped the Bodhisattva during his six years of austerities, abandoned him when he renounced his mortifications, heard the great Sermon at Benares and became, after Śākyamuni, the first five arhats in the world (Catuspariṣad, p. 170). Their names are Ājñātakaupḍīya, Āśvajit, Vāṣpa, Mahānāman and Bhadraka.

3) After his enlightenment, Mi-hi (Meghiya), Lo-t'o (Rādha), Siu-na-tch'a-to-lo (Sunakṣatra), A-nan (Ānanda), Mi-tsi-li-che (Guhyaka Malla), etc., formed his close entourage (abhyantaraparivāra).¹²⁴ <2237>

¹²⁴ Many were the upasthāyakas who assisted the Buddha Śākyamuni during his public life: five according to the Traité, p. 1675F; seven according to the Commentary of the Theragāthā (Psalm of the Brethren, p. 350) and the Commentary of the Udāna, p. 217; eight according to the Vinayamātrkā, T 1463, k. 5, p. 827c12-14; see above, p. 1675-75F note. The bodhisattva Guhyaka Vajrapāṇi does not appear in this list. If the Traité thinks it proper to add him here, it is clearly in reference to the section of the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya in which the journey into the north-west of India made by the Buddha accompanied by Ānanda and Vajrapāṇi.

Above (p. 547F), the Traité alluded to this voyage and, with the help of the Tibetan and Chinese sources, the only ones available to me (Lamotte), I tried (p. 548-554F) to retrace the grand stages. Since then, the 1948 publication, with the careful clarifications of N. Dutt, of many Sanskrit pages relating to this episode (Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part I, p. XVII to XVIII, and l. 17, 1948), I have been able to retrace more precisely the itinerary followed by the Buddha and his companions (cf. Alexandre et le Bouddhisme, BEFEO, XLIV, 1951, p. 52-158).

The subject has been entirely revived by the two monumental studies of G. Tucci dedicated to Swat: Preliminary Reports on the Italian Excavations in Swat (Pakistan), in East and West, IX, 1958, p. 279-328 (see especially the notes appearing on pages 326-328 (see also pages 61 to 64). These studies, where the great Italian master uses all his talents, abound in details of topography, geography, ethnology and literary history, politics, monastics of the north-west of India. They show the importance of the Dardes in the elaboration and transmission of the voluminous and complete Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya.

In the course of his journey in the north-west, the Buddha used three itineraries: i) an itinerary in six stages, from Hastinapura to Rohitaka; ii) an itinerary in 17 stages starting from Tāmasavana and retruning to Rohitaka; iii) an itinerary linking Rohitaka and Mathurā.

In the first and the third, he was assisted by Ānanda; in the second, he was accompanied by Vajrapāṇi. This explains why the Traité here includes Vajrapāṇi in the close entourage (abhyantaraparivāra) of the Buddha.

But at this time, Vajrapāṇi was merely a simple protector demon occasionally mentioned in the canonical sources; he was still engaged, especially in the north-west of India, in this process of becoming sublimated which transformed him successively into a beneficent spirit, into a bodhisattva, into a god and, finally, even into the supreme being (see Vajrapāṇi en Inde, in Mélanges de Sinologie offerts à Paul Demiéville, I, 1966, p. 113-159). In harmony with a very widespread Mahāyānist belief, the Traité considers Guhyaka Vajrapāṇi to be a bodhisattva prevailing over all the bodhisattvas, all the more so over humans (p. 615F) and already in possession of bodhi (k. 39, p. 344a28-29).

The role played by Vajrapāṇi in the Buddha's service does not eclipse that of Ānanda, the devoted disciple. The latter kept his official title of upasthāyaka and fulfilled his mission conscientiously during the last twenty-five years of the master's life. The Mahāyānists have never contested the foremost position that Ānanda occupied at the Council of Rājagṛha where he recited the sūtras of the Tripitaka. They further wanted to include Ānanda with the great bodhisattvas such as Mañjuśrī, Maitreya, Vajrapāṇi, to compile the scriptures of the Mahāyāna (cf. p. 939-942F, n.). They know that a large number of Mahāyāna sūtras were entrusted by the Buddha himself to the care of Ānanda as well as entrusting the dedications (parīḍanā) with which they end. At the time when the Traité was composed, the grand figures of Ānanda and the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi were closely linked and mutually complemented each other. In the

III. ACQUIRING A GREAT ENTOURAGE

The bodhisattva wishes to acquire a great entourage (mahāparivāra). Holy individuals (āryapudgala) such as Cho-li-fou (Śāriputra), <2238> Mou-k'ien-lien (Maudgalyāyana), Mo-ho-kia-chō (Mahākāśyapa), Siu-p'ou-t'i (Subhūti), Kia-tchan-yen (Kātyāyana), Fou-leou-na (Pūrṇa),¹²⁵ A-ni-lou-teou (Aniruddha), etc., and also the non-regressing bodhisattvas (avaivartika), separated from buddhahood by only one lifetime (ekajātīpratibaddha), such as Mi-lo (Maitreya), Wen-chou-che-li (Mañjuśrī), P'o-t'o-p'o-lo (Bhadrāpāla), are called the great entourage (mahāparivāra) of Śākyamuni.¹²⁶

Furthermore, the Buddha has two kinds of bodies: i) a body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya); ii) a body in accord with the world (lokānuvartakakāya).¹²⁷ The worldly body (laukikakāya) had the already-mentioned entourage. As for the body born of the fundamental element, it had as assistants (upasthāyakāya) innumerable (aprameya) and incalculable (asaṃkhyeya) bodhisattvas separated from buddhahood by only one single existence (ekajātīpratibaddha). Why?

[Gaṇḍavyūhasūtra]. – It is said in the Pou-k'o-sseu-yi-kiai-t'o king (Acintyavimokṣasūtra)¹²⁸ that when he was born, the Buddha was the head of 84-000 bodhisattvas separated from buddhahood by only one existence (ekajātīpratibaddha) and that these bodhisattvas were born in his entourage like dark clouds encircling the moon.

close entourage of the Buddha, the former represents the Hīnayāna or rather the early Buddhism; the latter embodies the Mahāyāna, but both are in the service of the Buddha and his Dharma.

¹²⁵ Pūrṇa-maitrāyaṇīputra.

¹²⁶ This is indeed a mixed (miśra) entourage consisting of śrāvakas and bodhisattvas.

In bygone days long past, Bhadrāpāla at the head of five hundred monks had insulted the bodhisattva Saḍaṃparibhūta who was none other than Śākyamuni in one of his earlier rebirths. As a result of this offense, he had to undergo incalculable periods of terrible punishments. He was converted by hearing the Lotus sūtra and became an irreversible bodhisattva (cf. Saddharmapuṇḍ, chap. XIX, p. 375-384). He appears at the head of the twenty-two major bodhisattvas who were present at the preaching of the Prajñāpāramitā; he was then an old man of the Vaiśya caste and lived in Rājagṛha (see above, p. 428-429F). He plays a principal part in the Pratyutpannasamādhisūtra, also entitled Bhadrāpālasūtra. As the Traité has related above (p. 425-426F), it was he who explained the subjectivity and emptiness of dharmas to the three brothers who, in dreams, had had sexual relations with the courtesans Āmrapālī, Sumanā and Utpalavarṇā (cf. T 416, k. 1, p. 876a; T 417, p. 899a; T 418, k. 1, p. 905a-b; T 419, p. 922a-b, as well as the comments of P. Demiéville, La Yogācārabhūmi de Saṃgharakṣa, BEFEO, XLIV (1954), p. 355 and 431).

¹²⁷ A body already noted, p. 1780-1781F, 1805F, 1818F, 1908F

¹²⁸ The Traité refers to the Gaṇḍavyūha sometimes under the title Pou-k'o-sseu-yi king = Acintyasūtra (Chinese transl, p. 94b, 317a, 419a), sometimes under that of Pou-k'o-sseu-yi kaii-t'o king = Acintyavimokṣasūtra (transl. p. 303b, 308b, 576c, 754b, 756b).

[Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra].¹²⁹ – It is said in the Fa-houa king <2239> (Puṇḍarīkasūtra) that the bodhisattvas who arose from the earth each had a close entourage (abhyantaraparivāra), a great entourage (mahāparivāra). <2240>

IV. ACQUIRING A BODHISATTVA ENTOURAGE

The bodhisattva wishes to acquire 'a bodhisattva entourage' (parivāra).

There are Buddhas who are surrounded only by bodhisattvas; there are Buddhas who are surrounded only by śrāvakas; there are Buddhas who are [303c] surrounded by both bodhisattvas and śrāvakas. This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that, in order to acquire an entourage composed exclusively of bodhisattvas, the bodhisattva must practice the Prajñāpāramitā.

¹²⁹ Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, beginning of chapter XIV, Bodhisattvapṛthivīvivaraśamudgama, p. 297-298, of which, the translation by Burnouf follows: [This passage does not appear in the Gilgit manuscripts, ed. S. Watanabe, chap. XIV, Bodhisattvapṛthivīśamudgama, the first pages of which have not been found]. - Atha khalv anyalokadhātāvāgatānām bodhisattvānām mahāsattvānām aṣṭau Gaṅgānadvālukāsamā bodhisattvā mahāsattvāś tasmin samaya tataḥ parśanmaṇḍalād ... ya itaḥ Sahāyā lokadhātor dharaṇīvivarebhyaḥ samunmajante sma/

Transl. - Then bodhisattva-mahāsattvas, as numerous as the sands of eight Ganges, making up a part of those bodhisattvas who had come from other universes, arose in that moment in the midst of the assembly. Joining their palms together in respect, facing the Bhagavat and having worshipped him, they addressed him thus: If the Bhagavat will allow us, we too would explain this teaching of the Dharma in the Sahā universe when the Tathāgata has entered complete nirvāṇa. May we be able to teach it, worship it, write it! May we be able to dedicate our efforts to this teaching of the Dharma! May the Bhagavat grant us also this teaching of the Dharma! Then the Bhagavat said to these bodhisattvas: What is the use, O sons of good family, of making you responsible for this duty? In this Sahā universe, I have millions of bodhisattvas, in number equal to the sands of sixty Ganges, who serve as the retinue of one single bodhisattva. Now there are millions of bodhisattvas of this latter kind, in number equal to that of the sands of sixty Ganges, who, when I have entered full nirvāṇa at the end of time, in the last period, will have this explanation of the Dharma, who will preach it, who will explain it.

Hardly had the Bhagavat pronounced these words than the Sahā universe split open on all sides, was covered with cracks, and in the middle of these cracks there appeared hundreds of thousands of myriads of koṭi of bodhisattvas whose bodies were golden in color, endowed with the thirty-two signs marking the Great Man, who, having been under this great earth in the space situated below, came into the Sahā universe; indeed, as soon as they had heard the words pronounced by the Bhagavat, they issued from the bosom of the earth. Each of these bodhisattvas had a retinue of millions of bodhisattvas, in number equal to that of the sands of sixty Ganges, forming behind them a troop, a huge troop of which he was the preceptor. These bodhisattva-mahāsattvas, followed thus by these troops, these huge troops, troops of which they were the preceptors and which were seen in hundreds of thousands of myriads of koṭi in number equal to that of the sands of sixty Ganges, had come together from the cracks in the earth to appear in this Sahā universe.

There are three kinds of entourage (parivāra): superior, middling and inferior. The inferior one is made up of śrāvakas alone; the middling one is a mixture [of śrāvakas and bodhisattvas]; the superior one consists only of bodhisattvas.

V. PURIFYING GREAT OFFERINGS

The bodhisattva wishes ‘to purify great offerings (dakṣiṇā)’.¹³⁰

Some say: The bodhisattva collects much merit (punya) but does not eliminate his afflictive emotions (kleśa); [that is why], by accepting the pious offerings (dakṣiṇā) of people, he does not purify them (na pariśodhayati). – But the Buddha has said that for the bodhisattva <2241> who is practicing the perfection of wisdom, all dharmas are empty (śūnya) and non-existent (anupalbdha) and all the more so the fetters (saṃyojana). Once having entered into the fundamental element (dharmadhātu), the bodhisattva does not realize the limit of the truth (bhūtaakoṭiṃ na sākṣātkaroti): this is why he is able to purify the gifts [made to him].

Furthermore, the bodhisattva has very great (vipula) merits: from the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) he wants to take the place of each being in particular to undergo all the sufferings [in that being’s place]. He wants to give all his merits to all beings and only after that to find the bodhi of the Buddhas (abhisambodhi) for himself. But not being able to realize such a task alone, he will end up becoming Buddha and saving all beings.

Furthermore, the altruistic wishes (praṇidhāna) of the bodhisattva are beyond calculation (asaṃkhyeya). As the world of beings (loka), the tathatā, the dharmadhātu, the bhūtaakoṭi, the ākāśa, etc., last for a long time (cirasthitika), so the intention of the bodhisattva to remain in the world for the benefit of beings (sattvānām ¹³⁰ Kumārajīva translates pariśodhayitum by the characters tsing-pao ‘purifying-rewarding’. The bodhisattva purifies the offerings made to him by accepting them and consuming them: thus he increases the merit (punya) of the donor. The merit of the gift is of two kinds: i) the merit produced by abandonment (tyāgānvaya), merit resulting from the mere fact of abandoning; ii) the merit produced by enjoyment (paribhogānvaya), merit resulting from the enjoyment by the person who receives, of the object given (cf. Kośabhāṣyā, p. 272, l. 5-6: Dvividhaṃ hi punyaṃ tyāgānvayaṃ tyāgād eva yad upapadyate, paribhogānvayaṃ ca deyadharmaparibhogād yad utpadyate).

For reasons explained in the Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 125, and Anguttara, IV, p. 344-345, the sa^ogha may avoid or refuse the offerings of a layperson and ‘turn the begging-bowl upside down’ (pattaṃ nikkujjati). Such a refusal, although it does not entirely destroy the merit of the gift, does not ‘purify’ it: a gift made remains made (kṛta), but if the beneficiary does not accept it and does not consume it, it is not ‘accumulated’ (upacita). Accepting a gift is to ‘purify’ it (pariśodhana) and increase the merit of the donor.

The bodhisattva wants to accept the great offerings (dakṣiṇā) made to him not out of personal interest but to increase the merit of his benefactors.

hitāya) is of long duration as well and knows no limits (paryanta):¹³¹ If such a man cannot purify the merits of the offerings [made to him], who then can? A father and a mother, however heavy their fetters (saṃyojana), dedicate their entire lives so that their son may be very fortunate; how then could the bodhisattva, who has no fetters and who for an infinite number of lifetimes dedicates himself (anantajanmasu) to the welfare of beings, be unable to purify the offerings?

Finally, if a bodhisattva endowed only with compassion (karuṇācitta) but without wisdom (prajñā) is already so beneficial, what can be said of the bodhisattva cultivating the perfection of wisdom?

Question. – But how can the bodhisattva who has no more fetters still take on rebirths in the world?

Answer. – I have already answered that above (p. 1826F). The bodhisattva who has obtained the acquiescence that dharmas do not arise (anutpatikadharmakṣānti), who has obtained a body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya), who manifests by metamorphosis in different places <2242> is able to save beings (sattvatāraṇāya) and adorn the universes (lokadhātupariśodhanāya). As a result of these merits (punya), even before becoming Buddha, he can purify the offerings (dakṣiṇā).

Duṣṭacittaparivarjana

Fourth Section AVOIDING EVIL MINDS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 29, l. 14-18; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 95, l. 11-20). – Moreover, Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to not produce thoughts of avarice, immorality, malice, laziness, distraction or false wisdom should practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena mātsaryacittaṃ dauḥṣīlyacittaṃ vyāpādacittaṃ kausīdyacittaṃ vikṣepacittaṃ dausprajñācittaṃ anutpādayitukāmeṇa prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. – These six kinds of minds that are evil close the door to the six perfections (pāramitā).

I. MIND OF AVARICE

Thus, when the bodhisattva is practicing generosity (dāna) and a mind of avarice (mātsarya) arises in him, it makes the gift impure (aviśuddha); sometimes, he will not give pure things; or if he gives external things,

¹³¹ Thus, when Mañjuśrī was king Ākāśa, in the presence of the Tathāgata Meghasvara, he applied his mind to perfect enlightenment and formulated the following vow:

Nāhaṃ tvaitarūpeṇa bodhiṃ prāptum ihotsahe / parāntakoṭiṃ sthāsyāmi satvasyaikaṣya kāraṇāt //

“I am in no haste to attain enlightenment and I will remain here until the end while there remains a single being to be saved” (Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 59, p. 346a9-10, cited in Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 14, l. 7-8; compare Bodhicaryāvatāra, III, v. 21.

he does not [304a] give a lot of them; or if he gives inwardly, he does not give fully: all of this because of the thought of avarice.

But if the bodhisattva cultivates the perfection of wisdom, he knows that all dharmas are without ‘me’ (anātman), without ‘mine’ (anātmīya), empty (śūnya), like a dream (svapnopama), like a magic show (māyopama); then he gives his body (kāya), his head (śīras), his eyes (nayana), his bones (asthi), his marrow (majjā) as if they were [ordinary] bits of grass or pieces of wood (tṛṇakāṣṭha).¹³² Although this bodhisattva has not yet attained sambodhi, he always avoids producing a thought of avarice and [to this end] he will practice the perfection of wisdom. <2243>

II. THOUGHT OF IMMORALITY

Other people, having attained bodhi by renunciation of desire (vairāgya), do not produce the thought of immorality (duḥśīlyacitta). The bodhisattva, because he is practicing the perfection of wisdom, envisages nothing as immoral. Why? Morality (śīla) is the abode (āvāsa) of all good qualities (kuśalagūṇa), just as the earth (prthivī) is the support (aśraya) and the basis for all things (dravya). An immoral man cannot obtain any bodhi; how then would he be able to obtain the supreme and perfect sambodhi? This is why the bodhisattva produces no thought of immorality.

Moreover, he has the following thought: It is a rule for bodhisattvas to create happiness for beings; the immoral man, however, disturbs the entire world. This is why the bodhisattva does not produce any mind of immorality nor, a fortiori, any immoral [action].

III. MIND OF MALICE

It is already forbidden to a Hīnayānist or a lay person (prthagjana) to produce a thought of malice (vyāpadacitta), all the more reason it is forbidden to a bodhisattva who has produced the mind of supreme perfect enlightenment.

The body (kāya) is a vessel of suffering (duḥkhabhājana): it suffers vexations. Thus the murderer (vadhaka) himself goes to his punishment: of what he himself has committed, he himself suffers the consequences,¹³³ he cannot give it to another. Only by protecting his own mind is he able not to experience malice. It is like when one is suffering from wind (vātya), rain (varṣa), cold (śīta) or heat (uṣṇa), there is no use in becoming irritated.

¹³² On these gifts, commemorated mainly on the great stūpas in north-western India, see above, p. 143-145F, note.

¹³³ Canonical recollection: Majjhima, III, p. 181: Tayā v’etaṃ pāpaṃ kammaṃ katam; tvañ ñeva tassa vipākam paṭisaṃvedissasi.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva has the following thought: If the bodhisattva seeks to become Buddha, it is as a result of his great compassion (mahākaruṇā). When he gives himself up to anger (dveṣa), he is violating his vows. The wicked man does not obtain the happiness of this world (laukikasukha); how then would he obtain the bliss of bodhi? The wicked man does not find happiness for himself; how could he give it to others? <2244>

IV. MIND OF LAZINESS

The lazy man (kusida) cannot realize worldly deeds; how then would he realize supreme complete enlightenment? When pieces of wood (araṇi) are rubbed together to make fire and if [in this [process] one is interrupted many times, one never gets a fire made.

V. DISTRACTED MIND

The distracted mind (vikṣepacitta) is like a lamp (dīpa) in the wind which has light but does not illuminate objects. It is the same for the wisdom (prajñā) in a distracted mind. Wisdom is the root (mūla) of all good dharmas (kuśaladharma). In order to realize (abhinirhṛ-) this wisdom, it is first necessary to concentrate the mind: it is only afterwards that one will realize it. A drunk man (ummatta) makes no distinction between his own interest (svārtha) and the interest of others (parārtha), between beautiful things (suvarṇa) and ugly things (durvarṇa). It is the same for the man with a distracted mind: unable to recognize well beautiful worldly (laukika) things, how would he discern the supramundane (lokottara) dharmas?

VI. MIND OF FALSE WISDOM

The mind of a silly person (mūḍha) cannot attain success or setbacks¹³⁴ or, a fortiori, subtle (sūkṣma) and profound (gambhīra) notions. A man deprived of sight [304b] falls into the ditch or takes wrong paths; it is the same for the man deprived of knowledge; without the eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus), he adopts (abhinivīṣate) wrong doctrines (mithyādharmā) and does not welcome the right view (samyagdṛṣṭi). Such a man has no success in the worldly things near him (samīpe); how could he have it in supreme perfect enlightenment?

¹³⁴ The silly person is incapable of appreciating the banalities of the present life.

By practicing the perfection of wisdom, the bodhisattva can counteract the six opposing [vices]¹³⁵ (ṣaḍvipakṣa) and purify (pariśodhayati) <2245> the six perfections (pāramitā). This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that the bodhisattva who does not want to produce the six opposing [vices] should practice the perfection of wisdom.

Puṇyakriyāvastu

Fifth Section ESTABLISHING BEINGS IN THE PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTUS

PRELIMINARY NOTE.

The puṇya-kriyā-vastus are the places of the practicing (vastu = adhiṣṭhāna) of meritorious (puṇya) action (kriyā).

The expression is rendered in Tibetan by bsod-nams bya-baḥi dños-pa, in Chinese as fou-tch'ou by Kumārajīva, as fou-ye-che by Hiuan-tsang.

According to the canonical sūtras (Dīgha, III, p. 218; Anguttara, IV, p. 241; Itivuttaka, p. 51), these places of practicing are three in number:

i) generosity: dāna, shyin, che in Kumārajīva, pou-che in Hiuan-tsang.

ii) morality: śīla, tshul-khrims, tch'e-kiai in Kumārajīva, kiai in Hiuan-tsang.

iii) meditation: bhāvanā, bsgom-pa, sieou-ting in Kumārajīva, sieou in Hiuan-tsang.

As the Kośa, IV, p. 232, comments, the three things - generosity, morality and meditation - are merit, action and place of practice, each according to its nature (puṇyam api etat trayam kriyāpi vastv api yathāyogam iti puṇyakriyāvastu).

In this context, generosity is not the thing given (deya), but rather 'that by means of which something is given' (dīyate yena tad dānam), namely, the act (kriyā) of giving. Giving is a physical and vocal action and that which produces this action (kāyavākkarman sothānam): a collection of mind-and-metal-events by ¹³⁵ The characters lieou pi used here by Kumārajīva certainly correspond to Ṣaḍvipakṣa: cf. Mahāyānasūtrālamkāra, p. 164, l.17, to its Chinese version in T 1604, k. 12, p. 651c4. This concordance has been shown by G. M. Nagao in his Index to the Mahāyāna-Sūtrālamkāra, I, p. 221, l. 21.

The ṣaḍvipakṣas are the six evil minds, avarice, etc., opposing the six pāramitās: see also Sūtrālamkāra, p. 166, l. 1-2; Saṃgrahopaniśandhāna, T 1598, k. 7, p. 422b19-21; Abhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā, T 1606, k. 12, p. 750a25-28. Other references in H. Nakamura, Bukkyōgo Daijiten, III, p. 1450c-d.

means of which this physical and vocal action is produced (yena kalāpenacaittakalāpa). But the Buddha said (Anguttara, III, p. 415) that action is volition (cetanā) and action after having willed (cetayitvā karman); this is why, according to the Kośa (IV, p. 233), some scholars claim that, to be precise, meritorious action is good volition (kuśalacetanā); generosity, morality and meditation are the place of practice (vastu) of this volition.

The second place of practice of meritorious action is morality (śīla), more precisely, the fivefold morality consisting of abstention from killing, theft, illicit sexual activity, falsehood and liquor. These five abstentions (prativirati) are not actions strictly speaking and have been studied above (p. 784-819F).

Anguttara, IV, p. 241-243, explains that generosity and morality can be practiced in a small way, a medium way or a grand way. They procure, respectively, <2246> rebirth among unfortunate people, among fortunate people, or among the six classes of gods of the desire realm.

Of greater benefit still is the place of practice consisting of meditation (bhāvanā). According to the Itivuttaka, p. 19-22, the value of material gifts is only a sixteenth part of that of meditation, and the best meditation is loving-kindness (maitrī) or the mind of loving-kindness (maitrācitta), the first of the immeasurables (apramāṇa), also called brahmavihāras because they assure <2246> rebirth among the higher gods of rūpadhātu (= Brahmaloka) and ārūpyadhātu (see Traité, p. 1264-1267F, note).

The three puṇyakriyāvastus are defined in the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharmas such as the Saṃgītiparyāya, T 1536, k. 5, p. 385c12-386a26 (transl. K. Mittal and V. Rosen, p. 81-82) and the Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 82, p. 424b20-25.

*

The Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtras add two other puṇyakriyāvastus to the three basic ones, but there are divergences among the original Sanskrit and their various Chinese and Tibetan versions.

Pañcaviṃśati, p. 30, l. 1-2: vaiyāvṛtyasahagataṃ caupadhikaṃ puṇyakriyāvastu, place of practice accompanied by service and material place of practice.

Śatasāhasrikā, p. 96, l. 7-8 and 10: airyaṣpathasahagataṃ puṇyakriyāvastu, ... auśadhikasahagataṃ (correct: aupadhikasahagataṃ) puṇyakriyāvastu, place of practice accompanied by material objects.

Version of Hiuan-tsang, T 220, vol. VII, k. 402, p. 9c13: kong che fou ye che (upasthānam puṇyakriyāvastu) and yeou yi fou ye che (aupadhikaṃ puṇyakriyāvastu), place of practice consisting of service, and place of practice consisting of material objects.

Tibetan version in Tib. Trip. Vol. 18, no. 731, p. 54, fol. 36b7: rim gro las byuñ ba dan / dños po thams cad byuñ las bsod nams bya baḥi dños po /

In his translation of the present passage (T 1509, p. 304b8-9), Kumārajīva departs considerably from the original Indian. He mentions two fou-tch'ou (puṇyakriyāvastu), the first consisting of k'iu-an-tao, the second of ts'ai and fa. K'iu-an-tao perhaps is the original Indian samādāpana (cf. G. M. Nagao, Index to the Mahāyāna-Sūtrālamkāra, I, p. 258) and would mean an 'incentive (in Tib., bskul-ba) to do something'. As for ts'ai-fa, it can only mean the two kinds of generosity – material gift (āmiṣadāna) and the gift of the Dharma or teaching (dharmadāna) – mentioned in the sūtras (Anguttara, I, p. 91; Itivuttaka, p. 98).

The Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 1700-1704 also has five puṇyakriyāvastus.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 29, l. 18-30, l. 2; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 96, l. 1-11). - Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom of he wants to establish all beings in the place of practice of the meritorious action consisting of generosity, in the place of practice consisting of morality, in the place of practice consisting of meditation, in the place of practice consisting of incentive; if he wants to establish beings in meritorious material works and in meritorious works of the Dharma (Punaraparaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena sarvasattvān dānamayapūṇyakriyāvastuni śīlamayapūṇyakriyāvastuni bhāvanāmayapūṇyakriyāvastuni samādhāpanamayapūṇyakriyāvastuni pratisthāpayitukāmena , sarvasattvān aupadhikapūṇyakriyāvastuni dharmapūṇyakriyāvastuni pratisthāpayitukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – What is the place of practice of meritorious action (puṇyakriyāvastu) called?

Answer. – The Abhidharma says that merit (puṇya) is an action of body, speech or mind (kāyavānimanaskarma) that is good-impure (kuśalasāsrava).

Some say that it is unobscured-indeterminate (anivṛtāvyākṛta). Why? Because as a result of a good-impure action, one obtains as fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) a merit (puṇya) which is also unobscured-indeterminate, and that this fruit of retribution, it too, is called merit.¹³⁶ In the same way, worldly people call ‘a meritorious man’ [not only the man who carries out meritorious actions] but the one who, having actualized great things, has multiplied his successes.

In brief (saṃkṣepeṇa), this merit is of three kinds: it consists of generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and meditation (bhāvanā).

I. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF GENEROSITY

1. Definition of generosity

What is generosity (dāna)? When one gives a man garments (cīvara), beds and seats (śayanāsana), food and drink (annapāna), flowers (puṣpa), perfumes (gandha), necklaces (muktaḥāra), etc., that is a ‘gift’.

¹³⁶ In other words, merit is not only the good-impure meritorious action, but also the unobscured-indeterminate fruit of retribution of this action.

Question. – But [by themselves], these things, food, drink, etc., are already gifts. Why is it still necessary to give them?

Answer. – No, these things - food, drink, etc. - are not gifts. It is at the moment when these things, food, drink, etc., <2248> are given that there arises in the mind [of the giver] a dharma of renunciation (tyāga) opposed to the thought of avarice (mātsaryacittasya vipakṣa) and called ‘merit consisting of generosity’ (dānamayapūṇya).

This merit is sometimes pure (śubha) and sometimes impure (aśubha). It is always a good mental event (kuśalacaitta) associated with the mind (cittasamprayukta), accompanying the mind (cittānuparivartin) arising with the mind (cittasahaja). It is without form (rūpa) and without shape (saṃsthāna). It is object-producing (ālambanīkaraṇa).¹³⁷ It is associated with action (karmasamprayukta), accompanying action (karmānuparivartin) and arisen with action (karmasahaja). It is not fruit of retribution of an earlier action (pūrvakarmavipākaphala). It is developed by acquisition (pratīlambabhāvitā) and developed by practice (niṣevanabhāvitā).¹³⁸ It is to be realized by wisdom (prajñayā sāṃkṣīkartavya) and to be actualized physically (kāyena sāṃkṣīkartavya).¹³⁹ It is acquired (prāpta) by worldly persons (prthagjana) and also by the saints (ārya).¹⁴⁰

Others say that meritorious action consisting of generosity (dānamayapūṇyakriyā) is the volition (cetanā) associated with the gesture of renunciation (tyāgasamprayukta). Why? Because it is action (karman) that produces the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) and volition is action.¹⁴¹ Body (kāya) and speech (vāc) are not, strictly speaking, action; it is when they arise from volition that they are called action. <2249>

2. Pure and impure generosity¹⁴²

¹³⁷ Object-producing as reflection (manasikāra), changing of the mind (cittābhoga); cf. Kośa, VII, p. 23.

¹³⁸ Cultivation (bhāvanā) of dharmas is done in four ways: i) by acquisition (pratīlambha) of good dharmas not yet arisen; ii) by practice (niṣevana) of good dharmas already arisen; iii) by opposition (pratipakṣa) to bad dharmas not yet arisen; iv) by driving out bad dharmas already arisen. See above, p. 1123-1124F, the definition of the four samyakpradhānas and compare Kośa, VII, p. 64. The meritorious action consisting of generosity is good (kuśala) although impure; it can thus be cultivated by acquisition or by practice.

¹³⁹ According to Dīgha, III, p. 230 and Anguttara, II, p. 183, there are four kinds of dharma to be witnessed, to be actualized (sāṃkṣīkaraṇīya): i) to be witnessed by the body (kāyena), namely, the eight vimokṣas, but particularly the third and the eighth vimokṣa (see above, p. 1296F and notes); ii) to be witnessed by the memory (smṛti), namely, earlier lifetimes (pūrvanivāsa); iii) to be witnessed by the divine eye (divyacakṣus), namely, deaths and births (cyutyupapāda); iv) to be witnessed by wisdom (prajñā), namely, the destruction of the impurities (āsravāṇāṃ kṣaya). – On the way of witnessing by means of the body, see Kośa, VIII, p. 210-211.

¹⁴⁰ In a word, according to the time-honored expression, it is prthagjanāryasāmtānika (Kośabhāṣya, p. 458, l. 9).

¹⁴¹ Anguttara, III, p. 415: Cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi.

¹⁴² This subject has been studied already, p. 664-666F, 1902-1903F. This entire section appears to be an amplification on a Dānasūtra and a Dānavastusūtra dealing with the eight kinds of generosity and the motives (vastu) by which the

This gift (dāna) is of two kinds: i) pure (viśuddhi), ii) impure (aviśuddhi).

A. The following gifts are impure: 1) the nearby gift (āsadya dāna);¹⁴³ 2) the gift made out of fear (bhayadāna) of losing the object; 3) the gift made out of fear of curses; 4) the gift because the object has no more use; 5) the gift made out of friendship (maitrādāna); 6) the gift made because one is seeking power (prabhāva); 7) the gift because one obtains power by giving; 8) the [304c] gift made because death is close; 9) the gift made with the view of a good reputation (kīrtyarthaṃ dānaṃ); 10) the gift made in order to be as famous as noble individuals; 11) the gift made out of jealousy (īrṣya); 12) the gift made out of pride (māna), saying to oneself: “Little people and low people give generously; why should not I, a noble and great individual, give?”; 13) the gift made in order to obtain blessing; 14) the gift made to attract good fortune and avoid bad luck; 15) the gift made in order to penetrate into a society (parivāra); 16) the gift made distractedly, without care and disregarding the beneficiary (pratigrahaka). There are many motivations of this type.

These gifts aiming at benefits in the present life (ihaloka) are counter to purity (viśuddhi) and are called impure (aviśuddha). <2250>

B. The pure (viśuddha) gift is, as the sūtra has said,¹⁴⁴ the gift to purify the mind (cittaviśodhanārtham), the gift to adorn the mind (mano 'laṃkāṛārtham), the gift to acquire the supreme goal (paramārthasya prāptaye), the gift producing a pure thought (viśuddhacitta) capable of discerning what is favorable to nirvāṇa.

The gift made with a pure mind is like a young flower, unblemished, of beautiful color and exquisite perfume. It is said that if the gods give with impure intentions, the brilliance of their palace decreases; but if gift may be inspired: the first seven are self-interested and consequently impure (aviśuddhi); only the eighth, aiming at detachment from the world and nirvāṇa, is pure (viśuddhi).

As always, the Traité uses here the Sanskrit version of these sūtras which may be found in the Saṅgītisūtra and the Saṅgītiparyāya (ed. K. Mittal and V. Roen, p. 188-191), the Kośabhāṣya, p. 270, l. 21-22 and the Kośavyākhyā, p. 434, l. 31-435, l. 8:

Aṣṭau dānāni: 1) āsadya dānaṃ dadāti, 2) bhayād dānadadāti, 3) adān me dānaṃ dadāti. 4) dāsyati me dānaṃ dadāti, 5) dattaṃ pūrvaṃ me pitṛbhiḥ pitāmahair itidānaṃ dadāti, 6) svargārthaṃ dānaṃ dadāti, 7) kīrtyarthaṃ dānaṃ dadāti, 8a) cittālaṃkāṛārthaṃ, 8b) cittapariṣkārmārthaṃ, 8c) yogasaṃbhārārthaṃ, 8d) uttamārthasya prāptaye dānaṃ dadāti.

Transl. - Eight gifts: 1) the nearby gift, 2) the gift made out of fear, 3) the gift made 'because he gave to me', 4) the gift made 'so that he will give to me', 5) the gift made because 'my father and my grandfather gave', 6) the gift made to gain heaven, 7) the gift with reputation in mind, 8a) the gift made to adorn the mind [to obtain śuddhi], 8b) to strengthen the mind [with the mārgāṅgas], 8c) to provide the mind in view of yoga, 8d) to attain the supreme good [i.e., arhathood, nirvāṇa].

For the corresponding Pāli version, see Dīgha, III, p. 258, l. 10-16; Anguttara, IV, p. 236, l. 1-8; 236, l. 13-237, l. 3. The eighth gift is briefly formulated there: cittālaṅkāracittaparik-khāratthaṃ.

¹⁴³ Kośabhāṣya, p. 270, l. 21-22: Āsadya dānaṃ yad āsannebhya upagatebhyo dānaṃ dadāti paurāṇāḥ. – According to the early teachers, the āsadya gift (Pāli: āsajja) is made to persons who are 'close', i.e., having come from nearby.

¹⁴⁴ The Dānastusūtra which has just been cited.

they give with pure intention, the brilliance of their palace increases. The act of giving does not perish even after hundreds of myriads of lifetimes: it is like a debt (ṛṇa).¹⁴⁵

3. Increase of merit

Question. – How does the merit of generosity (dānapunya) increase?

Answer. – When one gives at the desired time (kāle), one obtains an increase of merit (puṇyābhivṛddhi).

[Kālasutta].¹⁴⁶ – As is said in the sūtra: “When one gives in time of famine (durbhikṣa), one obtains an increase of merit. When one gives to someone who has come from afar (āgantuka gamika) on desert trails or dangerous paths, when one gives constantly and uninterruptedly, when one thinks constantly of giving at the right time, then the merit of generosity increases.” See what has been said above (p. 1413-1419F) on the six recollections in respect to the recollection of renunciation (tyāgānusmṛti).

One gains much merit if one gives generously, if one gives to good people, if one gives to the Buddha, if the donor (dāyaka) and the recipient (pratigrāhaka) are pure, if one gives with a firm intention (niyatacitta), if one gives an object that one has tried hard to acquire, if one gives absolutely all that one has, if one gives in exchange for other things, if one gives one's servants (bhṛtya), one's lands, etc.

Only the bodhisattva is the one who practices such gifts with resolve (āśaya).

4. Models of generosity

a. Bodhisattva jātakas

[Velāmajātaka].¹⁴⁷ – Thus the bodhisattva Wei-lo-mo (Velāma), having made gifts for twelve years, still offered <2251> richly adorned dairy cows, vases made of the seven jewels, courtesans – the three groups each containing 84,000 items – and also other things made of wood and food (annapāna) in incalculable amounts.

[Viśvantarajātaka].¹⁴⁸ – Thus the bodhisattva Siu-ti-nien-na (Sudinna), descending from his white elephant Chan-cheng (Sujaya), gave it to an enemy family; then, withdrawing to a distant mountain, he gave his two

¹⁴⁵ See above, p. 665F, n. 2.

¹⁴⁶ Kālasutta (Anguttara, III, p. 41), already cited above, p. 671, n.1.

¹⁴⁷ Velāmajātaka, see p. 677-688F.

¹⁴⁸ On the Viśvantarajātaka, see above, p. 713F, n. 1. Add to the references already mentioned, the Sanskrit story in the Mūlasarvāśvādin Vinaya in the Saṃghabhedavastu II, ed. R. Gnoli, p. 119-133. This Jātaka has been the subject of some very interesting studies: D. Schlingloff, Die Jātaka-Darstellungen in Höhle 16 von Ajanta, in Beiträge zur Indieforschung, 1977, p. 462-466; R. F. Gombrich, A Sinhalese Cloth Painting of the Vessantara Jātaka, in Buddhism dear children to a brahṃaṇa with twelve uglinesses;¹⁴⁹ finally, he gave his wife and his eyes to a fictive brahṃaṇa. At that very moment the earth shook (bhūmicala); there was thunder and lightning and a rain of flowers fell from the sky.

[Sarvaṃdadajātaka].¹⁵⁰ – Thus king Sa-p'o-ta-to (Sarvaṃdada) chained up his own body and gave it to a brahṃaṇa.

[Śibijātaka].¹⁵¹ – Thus king Che-p'i (Sībi), in order to save a pigeon, removed [305a] a piece of flesh from his own body to exchange it for the pigeon.

[Śaśajātaka].¹⁵² – Thus when the Bodhisattva was a hare (śāśa), he roasted his own flesh to give to a hermit (ṛṣi).

All this is told in the P'ou-sa-pen-cheng king (Bohisattvajātakasūtra). <2252>

b. Śrāvaka jātakas.

There are also gifts of the śrāvakas:

[Sumedhājātaka].¹⁵³ – Thus Siu-mi-t'o pi-k'ieou-ni (Sumedhā bhikṣuṇī) along with two co-disciples, built a vihāra for the buddha Kia-na-k'ie-meou-ni (Kanakmuni) and, for numberless incalculable thousands of myriads of lifetimes, enjoyed bliss among the noble cakravartin kings and the devarājas.

in Ceylon and Studies on Religious Syncretism in Buddhist Countries, ed. by H. Bechert, 1978, p. 78-88; S. Lienhard, La légende du prince Viśvantara dans la tradition népalais, in Arts Asiatique, XXXIV, 1978, p. 139-156.

¹⁴⁹ And not to “twelve ugly brahṃaṇas” as I had translated it above, p. 713F, n. 1, line 13. The twelve uglinesses of the brahṃaṇa called Jūjaka in the Pāli jātika are listed in the T'ai tseu siu ta nouking, T 171, p. 421b22-24: “He had twelve kinds of ugliness: his body was black like pitch, on his face he had three calluses; the bridge of his nose was narrow; his two eyes were green; his face was wrinkled; his lips hung down; his speech was stammering; he had a big belly and a prominent rear-end; his legs were crooked and deformed; his head was bald” (transl. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 379).

¹⁵⁰ Sarvaṃdadajātaka told above, p. 714F. Add to the references the Karuṇāpūṇḍarika, ed. I. Yamada, II, p. 376-384.

¹⁵¹ See p. 255-260F and notes, p. 287F, 1713F.

¹⁵² An exhaustive study of this well-known jātika is in D. Schlinglof, Das Śaśa-jātaka, WZKS, XV, 1971, p. 57-67:

literary sources in Pāli, Sanskrit, Chinese and Turkish Uigur; representations in India (Ajantā, Amarāvati, Nāgārjunakoṇḍa, Goli), in Central Asia (Qyzil), Java (Borobudur). On p. 57, the author notes a Śaśajātaka incorporated in the Jātakamālā (no. 4) of Haribhatta. This text has been published by M. Hahn, Haribhatta and Gṛpadatta, in Studia philologica buddhica, I (1977), p. 31-39, ed. by the Reiyukai Library of Tokyo.

¹⁵³ The successive lives of Sumedhā are told in the Therīgathās, v. 448-522 (p. 167-174) and their commentary: Psalmes of the Sisters (p. 164-165) as well as in the Apadāna (p. 512-513).

Under the buddha Koṇāgamaṇa, she and two of her companions, Dhanañjānī and Khema, made a gift of a vihāra to the teacher. Under the buddha Kassapa, she was a friend of the seven daughters of king Kiki of Benares and, as an upāsikā, was noted for her generosity which won her rebirth among the gods for innumerable times. Finally, under the Buddha Śākyamuni, she was the daughter of king Koṇica of Mantāvati. She refused the hand of Anikadatta, [Śaivalajātaka].¹⁵⁴ Thus Che-p'o-lo (Śaivala), enjoyed happiness from lifetime to lifetime and became an arhat for having offered a bottle of cream to the saṃgha: he is foremost among those who have found happiness (sukhalābhināṃ agrya).

[Mallikājātaka].¹⁵⁵ – Thus Mo-li-fou-jen (Mallikā), for an offering <2253> to Siu-p'ou-t'i (Subhūti), obtained a fruit of retribution (vipākaphala); she was the main wife of king Po-sseu-ni (Prasenajit), in the present lifetime (ihaloka).

king of Vāraṇavatī, whom her parents wished her to accept. After having converted her family and her entourage, full of distaste for the world, she left home and became a nun. Shortly after, she attained arhathood.

In Therīgathā, v. 518, she tells about the gift that she and her two companions made to Koṇāgamaṇa:

Bhagavati Koṇāgamaṇe saṃghārāmaṃhi navanivesaṃhi / sakhīyo tīṇi janiyo vihāradānaṃ adāsīmha //

¹⁵⁴ For Śaivala (in Pāli, Sivali), see above, p. 1546F, n. 1 and 1547, n. 1. The Ekottara places Śaivala among the physically and mentally happy men, always availing themselves of the four pūjāpariṣkāra, - clothing, food, drink, bed and seat, medicine – and never falling into the three bad destinies. The Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 18, p. 90b23-25; k. 101, p. 523a22-24, stresses his precocity during his successive lifetimes: as soon as he came into the world, he asked his parents if there was anything to give as alms.

¹⁵⁵ Jātaka no. 415, III, p. 405-406. Mallikā was the daughter of a garland-maker at Sāvatti. At sixteen years of age, she went into a flower garden, met the Buddha there and offered him three balls of barley gruel (kummāsapiṇḍa) which she had been carrying in a basket of flowers. The Teacher accepted the offering and smiled. To Ānanda who asked why he smiled, the Buddha explained: “This young girl, in reward for her gift, will this very day become the main queen of the king of Kosala (ayaṃ kumārīkā imesaṃ kummāsapiṇḍakānaṃ phalena ajj'eva Kosalarañño aggamaheśi bhavissati). Indeed, king Pasenadi who had just been conquered by Ajātasattu met the young girl in the garden and, finding her gentle as well as beautiful, saw her home. That same evening, he sent for her in great pomp, seated her on a pile of jewels and conferred on her the anointment reserved for queens. She became a faithful devotee of the Buddha as well as a good wife.

However, in Jātakamālā no. 3, p. 14-18, Mallikā attributes her good fortune to an act of generosity she had performed in one of her previous lives: when she was a slave, she had given the remains of a meal (uddṛtabhaktā) to a Muni whose impurities were destroyed.

Here the Traité has it that in the course of a single lifetime Mallikā became the main wife of Prasenajit as a result of a gift made to Subhūti and not to the Buddha.

Having become queen, Mallikā met the Buddha frequently. The Mallikāsutta of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 75, and the Udāna, p. 47, tell that during a private conversation, Pasenadi asked Mallikā if there was someone dearer to him than she herself. Without heditation, she replied: “Nobody is more dear to me than myself (n'atthi kho me mahārāja koc-añño attanā piyataro), and what is true for me is also true for you.” A little angry, the king went to consult the Buddha who said that Mallikā clearly was right. Then the Teacher spoke the stanza repeated in the Sanskrit Udānavārga, V, v. 18 (p. 144):

Sarvā dīśas tv anupariṅgamyā cetasā / naivādhyagāt priyatarāṃ āramaṇāḥ kva cit //

“Traveling in mind in every direction, never will you find someone dearer to yourself than you yourself.”

[Śivājātaka].¹⁵⁶ – Thus Che-p'o (Śivā), for an offering to Kia-tchan-yen (Kātyāyana), obtained in the present existence a fruit of retribution: she is the main wife of king (Tchan-t'o-tcheou-t'o (Candrapadyota).

[Ugratagrhapatijātaka].¹⁵⁷ – Thus Yu-k'ie 't'o kiu-che (Ugratagrhapati), for offering to five hundred arhats, Chō-li-fou (Śāriputra), etc., on the same day obtained a fruit of retribution: five hundred merchants (vanij) who recieved the remains of his food each gave him a necklace (muktahāra) and he became rich immediately. As a result he was called 'suddenly rich' Ugrata.

Such gifts find their fruit of retribution in this very lifetime, and we should know that the Upadeśa declares them to be inexhaustible (akṣaya). <2254>

II. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF MORALITY

The place of practice of meritorious action consisting of morality (śīlamāyapunyakriyāvastu) is, in the words of the Buddha, meritorious action (puṇyakriyā) consisting of the five precepts (pañcaśīla).¹⁵⁸

Question. – What are the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of the wrong-doing of killing (prāṇātipātā)?¹⁵⁹

Answer. – Depriving someone of life, knowing full well that he is a living being (prāṇasaṃjñī jivitād vyavaropayati), is to commit the wrong-doing of killing (prāṇātipātā). To kill for no reason, calmly, absent-mindedly, is not committing the wrong-doing of killing; to deprive of life inattentively (vikṣepa) or out of mental disturbance (ksiptacitta) is not committing a wrong-doing of killing; to inflict a wound, (vraṇa) even though mortal, is not committing a wrong-doing of killing; a physical act (kāyakarman) not involving death is not a wrong-doing of killing; a simple act of body or speech (vākkākāman) is not a wrong-doing of killing [because bad intention is lacking]; by itself, bad intention is not enough [because the implementation is absent].

¹⁵⁶ For having made a gift to the great disciple Mahākātyāyana, then chaplain to Caṇḍapadyota, king of Avanti, Śiva, otherwise unknown, became the king's wife.

¹⁵⁷ This is probably Ugrata-of-Vaiśālī (in Pāli, Ugga Avesālīka) who made six delightful gifts to the Buddha (Manāpadāyisutta of Anguttara, III, p. 49-51) and who was proclaimed the foremost of the upāsakas who make pleasing gifts Anguttara, I, p. 26: manāpadāyākānaṃ agga). The Buddha recognized eight wondrous extraordinary qualities in him (Uggasutta in Anguttara, IV, p. 208-212; Madhyama, T 26, k. 9, p. 479c-481b); one day, he explained to him how certain beings are parinirvanized in this very life and others not (Vesālīsutta in Saṃyutta, IV, p. 109; Saṃyukta, Y 99, k. 9, p. 57b28-c13).

As homonym, Ugrata had Ugra-of-Hastigrāma (in Pāli, Ugga hatthigāmaka), proclaimed the foremost of the upāsaka benefactors of the Community (Anguttara, I, p. 26: saṃghapatthākānaṃ agga). Although the lives of the two gṛhapatis are strangely similar, the Commentary of the Anguttara, I, p. 394-396, dedicates distinct notes to them.

¹⁵⁸ See p. 819-825F.

¹⁵⁹ See p. 784-789F and n.

The stopping, abstaining (prativirati) of this wrong-doing [of killing] constitutes the good characteristic of the first precept.

According to some, this abstention is unobscured-indeterminate (anivṛtāvyaḥṛta). It belongs to the desire realm (kāmadhātavavacara) or to no realm (anavacara). It is neither mind (citta) nor mental event (caitta), neither associated with the mind (cittasamprayukta) nor accompanying the mind (cittānuparivartin); sometimes it arises with the mind (cittasahaja) and sometimes not. It is not associated with an action (karmasamprayukta) nor does it accompany the action (karmānuparivartin); sometimes it arises with an action (karmasahaja) and sometimes not. It is not the fruit of an earlier action (pūrvakarmavipākaphala). It is developed by acquisition (pratilambabhāvita) and developed by practice (niṣevanabhāvita).¹⁶⁰ It is to be realized physically (kāyena sāṅṣīkartavya) and to be realized by wisdom (prajñāyā sāṅṣīkartavya).¹⁶¹ Sometimes the thought (manaskāra) [that accompanies it] is suppressed (bhinna), sometimes not; when one abandons the desires (rāga) of the desire realm (kāmadhātu), it is suppressed. Abstention <2255> from killing occurs among worldly people (prthagjana) as well as among saints (ārya).

These are the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of the morality consisting of abstaining from killing (prāṇātipātāvirati). For the other four moralities, [refraining from theft, from illicit sexual relations, falsehood and liquor], it is the same: each according to its type participates in morality. They have been praised and commented on above (p. 784-819F) in regard to the perfection of morality (śīlapāramitā).

III. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF MEDITATION

Although the sūtra says that the meditation of loving-kindness (maitrābhāvanā) is the meritorious action consisting of meditation (bhāvanāmayī puṇyakriyā), it also says that any impure meditation (sāsravabhāvanā) able to produce a fruit of retribution usually is called meritorious action consisting of [305b] meditation.¹⁶²

Since the desire realm (kāmaloka) abounds in hatred (dveṣa) and distraction (vikṣepa), first of all we speak of the mind of loving-kindness (maitrācitta) as the sphere of meritorious action consisting of meditation

¹⁶⁰ Cf. p. 2248F, n. 3.

¹⁶¹ Cf. p. 2248F, n. 2.

¹⁶² The Itivuttaka, p. 19, says that all material meritorious actions (opadhikāni puññakiriya vatthūni) are worth only a sixteenth that of loving-kindness (mettā), of deliverance of mind (cetovimutti). As we have seen above (p. 1246-1255), loving-kindness is the first of the four immeasurables (apramāṇa), also called brahmavihāras, and the meditation that takes them as object is the most fruitful of all. Any meditation whatsoever, even if still impure, i.e., blemished by error and passions, when it is cultivated or multiplied, gives its fruit of retribution and leads to happiness in the present life, to the conquest of knowledge and vision, to mindfulness and attentiveness. Dīgha, III, p. 222, l. 17-24 and Anguttara, II, p. 44, are categorical on this point: Samādhībhāvanā bhāvītā bahulikāṭā dīṭṭhadhammasukhavihārāya ... ānāḍassana paṭilābhāya ... satisampajaññāya ... āsavānaṃ khayāy samvattati.

(bhāvanāmayī puṇyakriyā). Metaphorically (upacāratas), loving-kindness is a wish (praṇidhāna) for the happiness of beings (sattvasukha); then it sees them really enjoying this happiness.¹⁶³

It is a dharma associated with the mind (cittasamprayukta) that is called loving-kindness (maitrādharmā). This dharma belongs to the realm of subtle form (rūpadhātvavacara), or it belongs to no realm (anavacara): this, then, is the true maitrī, the metaphorical (aupacārika) maitrī itself belongs to the desire realm (kāmadhātvavacara). <2256>

Maitrī always accompanies the mind (cittānuparivartin) and arises following the mind (cittasyānuja). It is without shape (asaṃsthāna) and without resistance (apratigha). It grasps objects (dharmān ālambanīkaroti). It is not an action (karman) but, associated with action (karmasamprayukta), it accompanies action (karmānucārin) and arises with it (karmasahaja). It is not the fruit of retribution of an earlier action (pūrvakarmavipākaphala). It is developed by acquisition (pratilambabhāvita) and developed by practice (niṣevābhāvita). It is to be realized physically (kāyena sāṅṣikartavya) and to be realized by wisdom (prajñāyā sāṅṣikartavya). Sometimes in it thinking (manasikāra) is cut, sometimes not: when one has transcended the desires (rāga) of the realm of form (rūpadhātu), it is cut.

Maitrī may be with initial inquiry and with investigation (śavitarkasavicāra), without initial inquiry but with investigation (avitarkasavicāra), without initial inquiry and without investigation (avitarkāvicāra).¹⁶⁴ Sometimes it involves joy (prīti), sometimes not;¹⁶⁵ sometimes it involves the breath (āśvāsa-praśvasa) and sometimes not.¹⁶⁶ It occurs in worldly people (prthagjana) and in the saints (ārya). Sometimes it is associated with a pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā-samprayukta) and sometimes with a neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling (aduḥkṣāsukhavedanā-samprayukta). It has as its object (ālambate) first an arbitrary characteristic (adhimuktilakṣaṇa), then, as object, a reality (tattvārtha).¹⁶⁷

Practiced in the four root dhyānas (mauladhyāna) and beyond, maitrī rests on the four dhyānas (caturdhyānāśrīta). Those who attain it are stable and strong.

Maitrī may be called ‘fondness’ (anunaya): free of malice (vyāpāda) and dispute (raṇa), it is called ‘fondness’. Because it bears upon (ālambate) beings infinite in number (apramāṇasattva), it is called an ‘immeasurable’ (apramāṇa). Because it encourages beings and frees them of desire (kāma),¹⁶⁸ it is called ‘continence’ (brahmacarya). <2257>

For other explanations of the mind of loving-kindness (maitrācitta), see what has been said above (p. 1246-1255F) in regard to the four apramāṇas.

¹⁶³ See p. 1254-1255F.

¹⁶⁴ Vitarka and vicāra are eliminated in the second dhyāna (p. 1030F).

¹⁶⁵ Prīti and sukha, present in the second dhyāna, are eliminated in the third dhyāna (p. 1030F).

¹⁶⁶ In the ascetic who has attained the fourth dhyāna, the inbreath and outbreath are eliminated: Dīgha, III, p. 266;

Samyutta, IV, p. 217; Anguttara, IV, p. 409 (Catutthajjhānam samāpannassa assāsapassāsā niruddhā honti).

¹⁶⁷ The apramāṇas of which maitrī is part are an arbitrary judgment (adhimuktimanasikāra); only objective judgment (tattvamanasikāra) cuts the passions: cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 200-201.

¹⁶⁸ Strictly speaking, maitrī does not destroy desire, but it avoids it: see p. 1242F, n. 1.

Question. – In regard to the meritorious action consisting of meditation (bhāvanāmaya-puṇyakriyā), why does the Buddha mention only the mind of loving-kindness and nothing about the other [three] immeasurables, i.e., compassion, joy and equanimity?

Answer. – The mind of loving-kindness produces greater merit than all the other immeasurables.¹⁶⁹ The mind of compassion (karuṇācitta), being discontent (arati), loses merit. The mind of joy (muditācitta) thinks of its own merit and consequently its merit is not deep (gambhīra). The mind of equanimity (upekṣacitta) is a rejection (utsarga) and consequently its merit also is slight.

Moreover, the Buddha said that the mind of loving-kindness has five advantages (anuśaṃsa), but said nothing about the three other immeasurables. What are these five advantages? – i) The knife (śastra) does not wound the benevolent man; ii) poison (viṣa) does not harm him; iii) fire (agnī) does not burn him; iv) water (udaka) does not engulf him; v) in angry and wicked beings he sees only happy dispositions (sumanas).¹⁷⁰ This is not the case with the other three immeasurables.

This is why [the Buddha] said that meritorious action consisting of meditation (bhāvanāmaya-puṇyakriyā) is maitrī. The other immeasurables follow; these are the impure meditations (sāsravabhāvanā) producing a fruit of retribution (vipākaphala).

IV. PUṆYAKRIYĀVASTU CONSISTING OF ENCOURAGEMENT

When the bhikṣus can neither meditate nor recite the sūtras, to advise them and encourage them is to gain merit. When bhikṣus who are meditating and reciting the sūtras are lacking robes and food, giving these to them is also to encourage them. Moreover, out of pity (anukampā) for beings, the bodhisattva encourages them by his merits. If a monk were to look himself for material goods, <2258> he would be transgressing his discipline (śīla); that is why there is a reason to encourage him.

V. MERITORIOUS ACTIONS CONSISTING OF MATERIAL GIFTS AND OF TEACHING

¹⁶⁹ The mind of loving-kindness has the advantage over the other three apramāṇas of producing a brahmic merit (brāhmapunya); the ascetic who attains it is happy for a kalpa in the Brahmā heavens: see Kośa, IV, p. 2450-251,

¹⁷⁰ In the words of the sūtras, the concentration of loving-kindness brings five, eight, eleven advantages (anuśaṃsa): cf. p. 792F, 1266F, n. 1, and below, p. 2362F.

Material meritorious action (aupadhikapunyakriyā) consists of robes (vastra), food and drink (annapāna), beds and seats (śayanāsana), medicines (glānabhaisajya), gold [305c] (suvarṇa), silver (rajata) vehicles (yāna), horses (aśva), fields (kṣetra), houses (grha), etc.¹⁷¹ <2259>

Question. – Above (p. 2247F), you spoke about the place of practice of the meritorious action consisting of generosity (dānamayapunyakriyāvastu) and now you are speaking about the meritorious action consisting of material gifts (aupadhikapunyakriyā); what are the similarities and what are the differences?

Answer. – The gifts [concerned above] included all gifts in general: material gift (āmiśadāna) and gift of the Dharma (dharmadāna);¹⁷² gifts according to the usage of the world (saṃvṛti) and gifts in view of the ¹⁷¹ In the Pāli suttas (Saṃyutta, I, p. 233, l. 15; Anguttara, IV, p. 292, l. 20; 293, l. 10), it is a matter of opadhiikaṃ puññaṃ, glossed as upadhivipākāṃ puññaṃ in the commentaries of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 352, l. 4, and the Anguttara, IV, p. 140, l. 6. From that, the translations “Merit forming a substratum for rebirth” (Rhys Davids) or “Verdienstliches als Substrat für ein besseres Dasein” (Geiger).

But in the Sanskrit sources, aupadikaṃ puṇyam means the merit resulting from the gift of material objects, such as gardens or monasteries. The Kośavyākhyā, p. 352, l. 29 explains: upadhir ārāmavihārādīḥ, tatrabhavam aupadhikam. And in the present passage Kumārajīva renders aupādhikaṃ puṇyam by ts' ai-fou “merit coming from a gift of riches”.

The Sanskrit Āgamas dedicate a long sūtra to the seven aupadhikāni puṇyakriyāvastūni and to the seven anaupadhikāni puṇyakriyāvastūni. The original Indian text is cited in full in the Kośavyākhyā, p. 352, l. 31-354, l. 31, transl. into Chinese in the Madhyamāgama, T 26, k. 2, p. 427c25-428c5, and partially in Ekottarāgama, T 125, k. 35, p. 741b21-c26.

A. There are seven material meritorious works. When a believer, a son or daughter of good family, is endowed with them, whether he walks, stands still, lies down or sleeps, the merit increases in intensity incessantly; the merit grows (yaiḥ samanvāgatasya śrāddhasya kulaputrasya vā kuladuhitur vā carato vā tiṣṭhato vā svapato vā jāgrato vā satatasamitam abhivardhata eva puṇyam upajāyata eva puṇyam).

The believer who makes the following gifts to the community of monks of the ten directions (cāturdīśa bhikṣusamgha) is endowed with these merits:

- 1) He gives a garden (ārāmaṃ pratipādayati),
- 2) he establishes a monastery in this garden (tasminn evārāme vihāraṃ pratiṣṭhāpayati),
- 3) he furnishes this monastery with beds and seats (tasminn eva vihāre śayanāsanaṃ prayacchati),
- 4) he assures regular offerings and appropriate oblations to this monastery (tasminn eva vihāre dhruvabhikṣāṃ prajñāpayaty anukīlayajñāṃ),
- 5) he gives a gift to the new arrival (āgantukāya gamikāya dānaṃ dadāti),
- 6) he gives a gift to the sick person or to his nurse (glānāya glānopasthāyākāya vā dānaṃ dadāti),
- 7) when it is cold..., he offers meals, drinks, boiled rice or rice soups to the community (śītalikāsu ... bhaktāni vā tarpaṇāni vā yavāgūpānāni vā saṃghāyābhiniṛṭyānuprayacchati).

B. There are seven immaterial meritorious works (nirupadhika) which make merit increase also. The believer is endowed with these merits who feels noble beneficent joy associated with renunciation of the world (prītiprāmodyam udāraṃ kuśalaṃ naiḥkramyopasaṃhitam) when he hears that the Tathāgata or a disciple of the Tathāgata is dwelling in such and such a village, is about to come, is on the way, has come; and when this same believer comes to see him, hears the Dharma from his mouth, finally takes refuge and takes on the precepts.

Path. Here we want to distinguish the gift of the Dharma (dharmadāna) from the material gift (aupadhikadāna).

It was a gift of the Dharma when the Buddha, out of his great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī), turned the Wheel of the Dharma for the first time and innumerable beings found bodhi. It was a gift of the Dharma when Śāriputra, following the Buddha, turned the Wheel of the Dharma.¹⁷³ Other saints (āryapudgala), without having turned the Wheel of the Dharma, nevertheless preached the Dharma to beings and found bodhi: this also is called gift of the Dharma.

Moreover, the bodhisattva Pien-ki (Samantabhadra), the bodhisattvas Kouan-che-yin (Avalokiteśvara), Tō-ta-che (Mahāsthāmaprāpta), Wen-chou-che-li (Mañjuśrī), Mi-lō (Maitreya), etc., put to work the power of their two kinds of superknowledge (abhijñā) – the abhijñā of fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) and the abhijñā acquired by practice (bhāvanāparilambhika)¹⁷⁴ – and here too have saved beings by means of their skillful means (upāya), their brilliance (āloka), the bases of their miraculous powers (rddhipāda) and all sorts of other means: this also is called gift of the Dharma. <2260>

The pratyekabuddhas who fly in the sky¹⁷⁵ and those who lead beings to plant the roots of good (kuśalamūlavaroṇāya) by speaking a single verse: this also is called gift of the Dhrma.

Finally, the disciples of the Buddha (buddhaśrāvaka) who have not yet attained the noble Path (āryamārga) but who, sitting in meditation (pratisaṃlayana), recite the sūtras without contradicting the nature of things (dharmatā)¹⁷⁶ and convert (paripācayanti) disciples: this also is called gift of the Dharma. Everything of this type is characteristic of the gift of the Dharma.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that the bodhisattva who wants to establish beings in the six kinds of meritorious actions (puṇyakriyā) should practice the perfection of wisdom.

¹⁷² The distinction between āmiśadāna and dharmadāna is canonical: see p. 692F note.

¹⁷³ In Saṃyutta, I, p. 191, the Buddha said to Śāriputra: Seyyathāpi Śāriputta rañño cakkavattissa jeṭṭhaputto pitarā pavattitaṃ cakkam samma eva anupavatteti, evam eva kho tvaṃ Śāriputta mayā anuttaraṃ dhammacakkam pavattitaṃ samma eva anupavattesi. – Just as the oldest son of a cakravartin king correctly turns the wheel (of sovereignty) already moved by his father, so you also, Śāriputra, correctly turn the Wheel of Dharma already moved by me.

See also Majjhima, III, p. 29; Anguttara, I, p. 23; III, p. 149; Suttanipāta, v. 557 (p. 109); Theragāthā, v. 827 (p. 79); Divyāvadāna, p. 394 (already mentioned above, p. 633F, n. 2).

¹⁷⁴ These are the innate or natural abhijñās (upapattiprātilambhikā) and the abhijñās born from meditation (bhāvanāmāyā). See in Kośa, II, p. 328, the four kinds of attention (manaskāra).

¹⁷⁵ Cases of pratyekabuddhas taking flight have been noted by Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 312; II, p. 33; III, p. 51.

¹⁷⁶ According to the rules of inner criticism formulated in the Mahāpadeśa, for a text to be authentic it must be found in the sūtras (sūtre ‘vatarati’), appear in the Vinaya (vinaye drśyate) and not contradict the nature of things (dharmatām na vilomayati), i.e., the prafityasamutpāda. References in É. Lamotte, La critique d’authenticité dans le bouddhisme, in India Antiqua, 947, p. 218-222.

Pañca cakṣūṃṣi

Sixth Section OBTAINING THE FIVE ‘EYES’

Preliminary Note. – In the literal sense, the word cakṣus, ‘eye’, means the organ of the eye which, together with the visibles, produces the visual consciousness; hence the stock phrase: cakkhum ca paricca rūpe ca uppajjati cakkhuviññam (Samyutta, II, p. 72). In the figurative sense, the eye is a seeing and, more particularly, the seeing of the four noble Truths with the three turnings and twelve aspects: the tales that describe the night of enlightenment, that review each of the twelve aspects, that review each of these twelve aspects, consider it good to repeat the refrain: cakṣur udapādi, jñānam vidyā buddhir udapādi “the eye is born; the knowledge, the intellect, the erudition will be born” (Pāli Vinaya, I, p. 11; Catuspariṣad, p. 144-152; Saṃghabhedavastu, I, p. 135-136). ‘Eye’ can be synonymous with knowledge, intelligence, erudition.

Cakṣus often appears in composite form; its meaning is then determined by the word that precedes it. From the canonical sūtras, we can find the following compounds:

Māmsacakṣus (maṃsacakkhu), fleshly eye: Itivuttaka, p. 52, repeated in Kathāvatthu, p. 251.

Divyacakṣus (dibbacakkhu), divine eye: Dīgha, I, p. 82, 162; III, p. 52, 281; Majjhima, I, p. 213; Samyutta, I, p. 144, 196; II, p. 122, 213-214, 276; IV, p. 240, 243; V, p. 266, 305; Anguttara, I, p. 165, 256, 281; III, p. 19, 29, 418; IV, p. 85, 141, 143, 178, 291; V, p. 13, 35, 38, 68, 200, 211, 340.

Prajñācakṣus (paññācakkhu), wisdom eye: Samyutta, IV, p. 292; V, p. 467. <2261>

Dharmacakṣus (dhammacakkhu), Dharma eye: Samyutta, II, p. 134; IV, p. 47, 107.

Buddhacakṣus (buddhacakkhu) Buddha eye: Dīgha, II, p. 38; Samyutta, I, p. 138.

Samantacakṣus, universal eye (epithet of the Buddha): Samyutta, I, p. 137.

Nine times out of ten, in the canonical sūtras each of these cakṣus is mentioned in isolation, but with time, there was a tendency to group them together. Two classifications finally were used: the first listed three cakṣus, the second, five; and the schools’ positions lasted for a long time.

1. The classification into three cakṣus groups the māmsa-, the divya- and the prajñācakṣus.

It appears in some rare canonical sūtras: Saṃgītisūtra (Dīgha, III, p. 219; Dīrgha, T 1, k. 8, p. 50b21; T 12, k.1, p. 228b1); Ekottarāgama, T 125, k. 1, p. 550c2; Pāli Itivuttaka, p. 52.

It is the rule in the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika Abhidharmas and śāstras: Saṃgītiparyāya, ed. Mittal-Rosen, p. 86, or T 1536, k. 5, p. 388a15-20; Compilation by Vasumitra, T 1549, k. 2, p. 732a2; Mahāvīnīhāṣā, T 1545, k. 73, p. 379c7-8; Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 1552, k. 1, p. 873a29-b1.

It is also found in works of uncertain origin, such as the Śāriputrābhidharma, T 1548, k. 9, p. 599c26; 593a21-28.

2. The classification into five cakṣus, firmly adopted by the Traité, groups the māmsa- divya- prajñā- dharma- and buddhacakṣus. In principle, the Buddha alone holds all five, but he does not use them all at the same time (see Bove, p. 429-440F).

The classification into five cakṣus is fully detailed in the Mahāvastu, I, p. 158-160, a Mahāsāṃghika-Lokottaravādin work. The Lalitavistara, a work of pronounced Mahāyāna tendencies, only mentions them quickly (p. 3, l. 5; 403, l. 2). Above all, the Mahāyāna knows no other and often devotes lengthy definitions to them: Pañcaviṃśati, p. 77, l.1-80, l. 18; Śatasāhasikā, p. 290, l. 12-301, l. 2; Avatamsaka, T 279, k. 50, p. 268a12; T 291, k. 2, p. 600b10; T 292, k. 6, p. 659b14-24; Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 41, p. 240a14; k. 85, p. 486c4, 489b7; Sukhāvatīvyūha, T 363, k. 3, p. 324c11; T 364, k. 2, p. 335b17; Mahāsaṃnipāta, T 397, k. 5, p. 30a18; k. 7, p. 43a13.

The Vijñānavādins do not pay much attention to the five cakṣus, but a passage from the Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, p. 143, l. 8-9, shows that they had adopted them.

The Pāli sources, at least the less late ones, also show a list of five cakṣus where the samanatacakkhu appears in place of the dhammacakkhu: Cullaniḍḍesa, no. 235, p. 133; Atthasālini, p. 306.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 30, l. 3-5; Śatasāhasikā, p. 96, l. 11-20). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to obtain the five eyes must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punaraparam Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena pañca cakṣūṃṣi nīṣpādayitukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam). <2262>

Śāstra. –

What are these five? 1) The fleshly eye (māmsacakṣus), 2) the divine eye (divyacakṣus), 3) the wisdom eye (prajñācakṣus), 4) the Dharma eye (dharmacakṣus), 5) the Buddha eye (buddhacakṣus).

1. The fleshly eye (māmsacakṣus) sees what is close up (samīpe), does not see what is far off (dūre); sees what is in front (purastāta), does not see what is behind (prsthata); sees what is external (bahis), does not see what is internal (abhyantare); sees during the day-time (divā), does not see at night-time (rātrau); sees what is on top (upariśāt), does not see what is underneath (adhasāt).¹⁷⁷

2. Because of these screens, the bodhisattva seeks the divine eye (divyacakṣus). Having obtained the divine eye, he sees what is distant and what is near, what is in front and what which is behind, what is internal and what is external, he sees during the day and during the night, he sees what is above and what is below, for there are no further screens. This divine eye sees the provisional entities resulting from causes and conditions coming together (saṃghātāhetupratyaya), but he does not see the true nature (dharmatā), namely, emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta), wishlessness (apraṇihita), non-arising (anutpāda), non-cessation (anirodha).

¹⁷⁷ Similar development in a passage from the Karanaprajñapti cited by the Kośabhāṣya, p. 19, l. 9-14.

3. And it is the same as before: in order to see the true nature (dharmatā), the bodhisattva seeks the wisdom eye (prajñācakṣus). Having obtained the wisdom eye, he no longer sees beings (sattva), he eliminates completely the signs of identity (ekatva) and difference (nānātva), he rejects all clinging (adhyavasāna) and accepts no dharma.¹⁷⁸

4. However, the wisdom eye cannot save beings. Why? Because it does not distinguish them; this is why the bodhisattva produces the Dharma eye (dharmacakṣus). By means of this eye, he knows that such and such a man, by practicing such and such a dharma, has obtained such and such bodhi;¹⁷⁹ he knows all the methods (upāyamukha) suitable for each being in particular (prthak prthak) [306a] to attain the realization of bodhi. <2263>

5. But the Dharma eye cannot know the means appropriate to save beings everywhere; this is why the bodhisattva seeks the Buddha eye (buddhacakṣus).¹⁸⁰ There is nothing that this Buddha eye is unaware of; there is no mystery however secret it may be that it cannot discover. What is distant for other people is close for the Buddha; what is obscure for others is clear for the Buddha; what is doubtful for others is clear for the Buddha; what is subtle (sūkṣma) for others is coarse (audārika) for the Buddha; what is deep for others is shallow for the Buddha. By means of this Buddha eye, there is nothing that is not understood, seen, known, felt (yena buddhacakṣuṣānmatī kiṃcid aśrutaṃ vāvijñātaṃ vāmatam vā).¹⁸¹ Free of thinking (manasikāra), the Buddha eye is always clear on all dharmas.

In a following chapter,¹⁸² the meaning of the five eyes will be elucidated further.

Pratyutpannabuddhadarśana

¹⁷⁸ Cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 78, l. 11-16: Prajñācakṣuṣā samanvāgato bodhisattvo mahāsattvo na kaṃcid dharmam prajñānāti saṃskṛtaṃ vāsaṃskṛtaṃ vā ... yena prajñācakṣuṣā bodhisattvena mahāsattvena kaścid dharma na dṛṣṭo na śruto na mato na vijñātaḥ.

¹⁷⁹ These are particular bodhis capable of being acquired by beings on their course towards supreme bodhi. These ‘fruits of the Path’ are detailed in Pañcaviṃśati, p. 79.

¹⁸⁰ The Buddha eye is none other than the awareness of things in all their aspects (sarvākārajñatā) acquired by the Bodhisattva the very night of his great enlightenment. The Pañcaviṃśati, p. 82, explains: The Bodhisattva, having entered into the Vajropāmasamādhi, by means of the wisdom associated with a single moment of mind attains the awareness endowed with all the aspects (vajropamaṃ samādhiṃ samāpadya, ekacittakṣaṇasamāyuktayā prajñayā sarvākārajñatām anuprāpnoti).

¹⁸¹ The expression dṛṣṭa-śruta-vijñāta-mata designates the group of perceived things: what is perceived by the eye consciousness is dṛṣṭa, what is perceived by the ear consciousness is śruta, what is perceived by the mental consciousness is vijñāta, what is perceived by the nose, tongue and body consciousnesses is mata (cf. Kośa, IV, p. 160). The expression is canonical and is expressed in Pāli by the words dīṭṭhaṃ suttaṃ mutaṃ viññātaṃ: Majjhima, I, p. 135; III, p. 261; Saṃyutta, III, p. 203; Anguttara, II, p. 23, 25.

¹⁸² Pañcaviṃśati, p. 77, l. 1-83, l. 6, appearing in the Wang cheng p'in of the Chinese translation, T 223, k. 2, p. 227b10-228b1, and commented on by the Traité, T 1509, k. 39, p. 347a6-351b1.

Seventh Section SEEING, HEARING AND UNDERSTANDING ALL THE BUDDHAS OF THE PRESENT

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The five ‘eyes’ find their use in visualization of the present, past and future Buddhas. The visualization is not an appearance but rather a representation by means of which the ascetic makes these Buddhas visible.

While Śākyamuni was alive, many were the contemporaries who ‘came to see the Blessed One’ (bhagavataṃ darśanāyopasaṃkrāntāḥ) and to contemplate his physical marks. The Teacher allowed himself to be examined by the experts and the hermit Asita (Traité, p. 1344F, 1915F), by the indiscreet curiosity of Satyaka Nirgranthīputra (Traité, p. 1665F) and by the brāhmaṇas Ambaṭṭha, Brahmāyu and Sela (Traité, p. 275F, 1667F). After the death of the Blessed One, Ānanda – and he was blamed for this – had no hesitation in uncovering the Buddha’s body and showing it to the women of Kuśināgra who soiled it with their tears (Traité, p. 96F). <2264>

The appearance of a Buddha is rare, as rare as the flowering of the banana tree: fortunate are those that see the Blessed One ‘adorned with the thirty-two marks of the great man, on whose limbs shine the eighty-four secondary marks, with a halo an arm’s-span in width, splendid as a thousand suns, like a mountain of jewels moving in all captivating ways’. This stock phrase is repeated thirty-two times in the Avadānaśataka.

There is nothing supernatural in these encounters: it is with their human eyes that the Indians of Jambudvīpa, during the lifetime of the Omniscient One, contemplated him who opened the gates to the deathless for them. After his entry into parinirvāṇa, “gods and men did not see him any longer” (Dīgha, I, p. 46). - “Just as the flame blown out by the wind is calmed down, goes beyond being seen, so the Sage, shedding the psychophysical aggregates of existence, enters into peacefulness, being beyond being seen” (Suttanipāta, v. 1074).

And so, if the Teacher allowed himself to be looked at while he was in this world, it was out of loving-kindness and compassion for beings to whom the sight would be useful. The contemplation of the Buddha’s body never constituted a ritual, and when Buddhists practice the commemoration of the Buddha (buddhānusrīti), they think about his spiritual qualities, the five anāsravaskandha, rather than his physical attributes. The Traité has explained this subject above (p. 1349F).

The Dharma is the single refuge which Śākyamuni left for his disciples, and he passed on the depth of his mind when, tired of the regular attendance of his disciple Vakkali, he sent him away, saying: “It is enough, Vakkali, for you to see my body of decay; he who sees the Dharma sees me and he who sees me sees the Dharma” (cf. Traité, p. 1546F, n.). The true body of the Buddha is a teaching body.

*

The buddhology of the early times was relatively simple: the Buddhas are born only in a universe of four continents (caturdvīpalokadhātu), in India (Jambudvīpa), in the central region (Madhyadeśa), and two Buddhas never appear simultaneously in the same world (cf. Traité, p. 302F, n. 1; 535F). The Buddhas who followed one another in our world were not very numerous: Śākyamuni included, the early Buddhists listed seven, twenty-five, rarely more.

Later, at the margins of this restricted universe, Buddhists built up a grandiose cosmic system which appeared already in certain texts of the Lesser Vehicle but which gained in importance in those of the Greater Vehicle. This system distinguishes three kinds of complex universes: i) the sāhasracūḍika consisting of a thousand universes of four continents, ii) the dvīsāhasra madhyama containing a million universes of four continents, iii) the trisāhasramahāsāhasra including a billion universes of four continents.

The trisāhasramahāsāhasras are distributed in the ten directions of space: east, south, west, north, north-east, north-west, south east, south west, nadir and zenith, and they are, in each of these ten directions, as numerous as the sands of one or several Ganges. The majority also constitute Buddha-fields (buddhakṣetra) where a Tathāgata “resides, lives, exists and teaches the Dharma for the welfare and benefit of many beings”. These Tathāgatas, whose number is incalculable <2265> if not infinite, are the Buddhas of the present (pratyurpannabuddha): they were preceded by and will be followed in time by innumerable Buddhas of the past and the future (atītānāgatabuddha).

The bodhisattva of whom the Traité is speaking here formulates a series of wishes: to see the Buddhas of the present, hear their teachings and penetrate their mind; to remember the teachings of the Buddha of the present; to see the buddhakṣetras of the Buddhas of the three times and to propagate the teachings of these same Buddhas.

To actualize these wishes is not an easy thing. It cannot be a question of having recourse to human organs of limited range and coming up against many obstacles.

Calling upon the superhuman faculties is more successful: the divine eye (divyacakṣus), the divine ear (divyaśrotra) and the knowledge of another’s mind (paracittajñāna), classified among the abhijñānas and which, as we have seen, make up as many ‘eyes’ taken in the metaphorical sense of the word.

But by themselves, they are unable to attain the edges of time and space, of seeing, hearing and understanding the innumerable Buddhas of the three times peopling the innumerable universes of the ten directions.

Generally, the divine eye and divine ear do not go beyond a trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu, and the knowledge of another’s mind does not know the actual minds: the past and the future are closed to it.

In order to ‘see’ – i.e., to see, hear and understand – the Buddhas of the ten directions and three times, one must seek other solutions, and the first Mahāyānasūtras proposed some. Here it will be a matter of the Great Prajñāpāramitāsūtras and the Pratyutpannasamādhisūtras (T 416 to 419).

*

The Pañcaviṃśati, the two oldest Chinese versions of which (T 221 and T 222) are dated respectively at 291 and 286 AD, present two ‘explanations’ – if this word is appropriate here – of the vision of the Buddhas, the one by using, purely theoretically, the divyacakṣus, the other, in dreams (svapna).

1. “The bodhisattva who wishes to see, by the divyacakṣus, all the Buddhas of the present, should practice the Prajñāpāramitā”. This seeing assumes a subject (the bodhisattva), an instrument (the divyacakṣus), an object (the Buddhas of the present), but is valid only if it is realized in the view of the Prajñāpāramitā according to which the bodhisattva, the divyacakṣus, the Buddhas and the Prajñāpāramitā itself are not perceived (nopalabhyate), that is to say, are not existent.

a. What we call Prajñāpāramitā, what we call bodhisattva, are only words (nāmanātra), and this word exists neither inwardly nor outwardly nor in between (nādhātmaṃ na bahirdhā nobhayam antareṇopalabhyate); this word is only a designation, a thing by designation, existing out of designation (prajñaptimātram prajñaptidharmaḥ prajñaptisat): cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 99 (or T 223, p. 230c): Śatasāhasrikā, p. 325.

b. The bodhisattva who practices the Prajñāpāramitā does not accept (nabhiniveṣyate) any of the five ‘eyes’ including the divyacakṣus: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 106 (or T 223, p. 231b24); Śatasāhasrikā, p. 380.

c. The bodhisattva who practices the Prajñāpāramitā does not see (na samanupaśyati) either the Prajñāpāramitā or the bodhisattva or the Buddha or the words that express them: cf. Śatasāhasrikā, p. 378, l. 1-4; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 105, l. 1-3. <2266>

As well, the Prajñāpāramitā is the Buddha and is not different from him; and the Buddhas, past, future and present are Prajñāpāramitā: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, p. 293b19-21.

Consequently, the seeing of the Buddhas where there is neither subject nor instrument nor object is a non-seeing (adarśana).

This is how the bodhisattva who is practicing the prajñāpāramitā penetrates deeply into the true nature of things, and this nature [which is none other than the absence of any nature] is neither defiled nor purified (bodhisattvena prajñāpāramitāyām caratā dharmalakṣaṇām (variant: dharmāṇām dharmalakṣaṇam) supratividdham bhavati, yac ca dharmāṇām lakṣaṇam tan na saṃkliṣyate na vyavadāyate): cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 105, l. 12 (or T 223, p. 231b13-14); Śatasāhasrikā, p. 378, l. 18.

2. A son or daughter of good family, physically and mentally healthy, has no bad dreams (svapna). In dreams, he sees the Buddhas adorned with the major and minor marks, surrounded by the saṃgha of bhikṣus, and preaching the Dharma. He hears them explain the teaching of the six perfections, etc. He sees the bodhi tree, the bodhisattvas approaching it to realize sambodhi and who, becoming Buddha, turn the Wheel of the Dharma. He sees the hundreds of thousands of billions of koṭis of bodhisattvas explain how it is necessary to seek omniscience, convert beings and purify the Buddha fields. He sees the innumerable hundreds of thousands of myriads of koṭis of Buddhas in the ten directions and he learns their names, the names of their regions and their kṣetras. He is present at their parinirvāṇa and sees their innumerable stūpas made of the seven jewels. The son or daughter of good family who sees these good dreams “sleeps happily and awakens happily”: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, p. 289c25-290a13.

In this passage the Pañcaviṃśati does not have the divyacakṣus occur, but it recognizes that simple lay people, well-disposed, are able to see the Buddhas in dreams. That would be by another mode of seeing. But what is the value of it? A conversation between Śāriputra and Subhūti, recorded in the Pañcaviṃśati (T 223, p. 347a) gives us an embryonic answer. There is no difference between the state of awake and the state of sleep. Nevertheless, an act performed (kṛta) in sleep is not accumulated (upacita), i.e., attributable; it is necessary to wait for the conceptualizing (saṃkalpa) that follows the dream for it to be accumulated, for without conditions (pratyaya), action (karman) is not born. Nonetheless, the Buddha has said that all dharmas are like dreams (svapnopama) and consequently are not born.

*

A vision of the Buddhas, different from those just described, is set forth in the Pratyutpannabuddhasaṃmukhāvasthitasamādhisūtra, in Tibetan Da ltar gyi sañs rgyas mñon sum du bEugs pañl tiñ ñe ḥdzin ‘the concentration of being face to face with the Buddhas of the present’. This sūtra is often designated under the abbreviated title of Pratyutpannasamādhi or also Bhadrāpālasūtra because the bodhisattva thus named is the principal interlocutor of the Buddha.

This sūtra is known to us by Sanskrit fragments coming from eastern Turkestan (cf. R. Hoernle, Manuscript Remains, p. 88-93), by four Chinese versions and one Tibetan translation which I [Lamotte] will return to later. <2267>

“This text is one of the oldest Mahāyānasūtras. According to one conjecture, it may have been the manual of early Buddhists during the early Mahāyāna period (50-100AD). It is well known to the Chinese and Japanese Buddhists because it refers to worship of the Buddha Amitābha. The assembly where this sūtra was preached was simple, consisting only of 500 bhikṣus and 500 bodhisattvas: this shows that the sūtra goes back to the first days of the Mahāyāna. The Chinese version in one kuan (T 417 and 419?) seems to have been composed before the Prajñāpāramitā-sūtras or in a region where the thinking of the prajñāpāramitā had not been taught. The Chinese version in three kuans (T 418) had been influenced by this thinking. The Pratyutpanna-samādhi definitely influenced Pure Land Buddhism” (H. Nakamura, A Survey of Mahāyāna Buddhism with bibliographical notes, in Jour. of Intercultural Studies, III (1976), p. 83.

Whereas the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras represent mainly the ‘Wisdom Sūtras’, the Pratyutpanna-samādhisūtra is classified among the ‘Meditation Sūtras’ elaborated at about the beginning of our era by Buddhist practitioners of the Yogācāra school who were preoccupied with meditation rather than discussion, with mysticism rather than rationalism: an ancient tendency that appeared as early as the oldest canonical texts: cf. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Musila et Nārada, in MCB, V (1936-37), p. 189-222.

The leader of the Yogācāra Buddhists was Saṃgharakṣa who was considered by the Sarvāstivādins of Kaśmir as one of their patriarchs. A native of Surāṣṭra (Kathiawar), he lived in the 2nd century AD and was the teacher of Caṇḍana-Kaṇiṣka in Gandhāra. He compiled a Buddhacarita (T 194) and a Yogācārabhūmi (T 606) to which P. Demiéville has dedicated an important dissertation (La Yogācārabhūmi de Saṃgharakṣa, BEFEO, XLIV (1954), p. 339-436. The work originally contained 27 chapters describing the Hīnayānist Yoga technique; in the translation made by Dharmarakṣa it consists of 30 chapters. The fact is that the Mahāyānists showed very strong interest in the Hīnayānist dhyāna as practiced by the Sarvāstivādin communities of Kaśmir and thereby there resulted a more or less hybrid literature.

The Pratyutpannasamādhisūtra was written in this context but presents itself openly as Mahāyānist. As will be seen in the following pages, it advocates, for the use of lay people or monks, liberated or not liberated from desire, a concentration that puts them face to face with the Buddhas of the present. To acquire this concentration, there is no need for the abhijñā of the divine eye resulting from the practice of dhyāna; all that is required is a probationary period followed by a session of intense meditation of from one to seven days, at the end of which, without changing one’s position, one sees the Buddhas of the present, Amitābha in particular. Arising from this samādhi, one sees them no more: it is as if they were visions of a dream.

The Pratyutpannasamādhi is not only mentioned in the sūtra that bears its name (T 418, etc.); it is also mentioned in the Śūramgamasamādhisūtra (T 642, k. 1, p. 634a5), the Daśabhūmikasūtra (ed. Rahder, p. 82, l. 15-16), the Daśabhūmikavibhāṣā (T 1521, k. 1, p. 25c3; k. 7, p. 54a1; k. 9, p. 68c17; k. 16, p. 109b7), etc.

It seems that the Prajñāpāramitās were not aware of it. They accept that one may see the Buddhas in dream, but, as has been said above, they consider any seeing whatsoever as a purely subjective epiphenomenon brought on by wrong conceptualization (saṃkalpa). <2268>

On the other hand, in its commentary on the Prajñāpāramitā, the Traité calls upon a good thirty Mahāyānasūtras (see Vol. III, Introduction, p. XXXIV and foll.), and gives us ample information on the Pratyutpannasamādhi. Referring here exclusively to its Chinese version (T 1509), I [Lamotte] will mention a few passages as follows:

The Pratyutpannasamādhi does not occur in bodhisattvas of the first seven bhūmis who are still affected by a fleshly body (k. 37, p. 335b19; k. 49, p. 416a18; it belongs to bodhisattvas of the eighth bhūmi who are assured of the eventual attainment of enlightenment (niyāma) and have the certainty that dharmas do not arise: anutpattikā dharmakṣānti (k. 4, p. 86c3; k. 27, p. 262a20-21), as, for example, the lay bodhisattva Bhadrāpāla (k. 7, p. 11a18). By means of the upāyas acquired in the seventh bhūmi and the pratyutpannasamādhi acquired in the eighth bhūmi, the bodhisattva is superior to the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas (k. 35, p. 320a10). Thanks to this samādhi, there is no need to obtain the abhijñā of the divine eye (divyacakṣus) in order to see all the Buddhas of the present occupying the innumerable universes distributed in the ten directions (k. 9, p. 123c29; k. 33, p. 306a15); it is by assiduous practice that a son of good family will be reborn in the paradise of Amita (k. 29, p. 276a18-19). Finally, the Pratyutpannasamādhi is the father of the Buddha (k. 34, p. 314a23), whereas the Prajñāpāramitā is his mother.

Does this mean that the Traité agrees with it unreservedly? Not at all. Everything leads us to believe that even at that time there had arisen in India, probably in Kaśmir, a controversy about the respective value of the Prajñāpāramitā and the Pratyutpannasamādhi. In the following pages, the Traité reveals to us the depth of its thinking and places itself resolutely on the side of the partisans of the Prajñāpāramitā.

The abhijñās practiced in the spirit of the Prajñāpāramitā are the best ‘pointers’ of the Buddhas or, rather, the true nature of things with which the Tathāgatas are mingled: the divine eye sees them, the divine ear hears them, the knowledge of others’ minds penetrates their mind.

Conceived in this way, the abhijñās present precious benefits. Thus, the divyackaṣus is morally undefiled-indeterminate and, in this quality, does not involve any fruit of retribution; it is acquired solely by the ascetic detached from the desires of the kāmādhātu; according to the Abhidharmas, it is a pure material (rūpaprasāda) endowed with perfect clarity; finally, its acquisition and its use are easy, provided that one holds the dhyānas which, although said in parentheses, is already not too bad!

These noble qualifications are absent in the Pratyutpannasamādhi. One no longer knows if the Buddhas whose presence it calls forth are “like a dream” or simple dreams, real or illusory. One thing is certain: they result from conceptualization (saṃkalpa), from autosuggestion (k. 33, p. 306a19-21).

“The Prajñāpāramitā is the mother of the Buddhas. Of the help given by the father and that given by the mother, that of the mother is the weightiest. This is why the Buddha considers the Prajñā as his mother and the Pratyutpannasamādhi as his father. This samādhi is able only to concentrate the distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta); it helps the Prajñā to be actualized but it cannot contemplate the true nature of things (dharmāṇām dharmatā) [which is none other than the absence of nature].

The Prajñāpāramitā itself contemplates the entirety <2269> of things and reveals the true nature, There is nothing that it does not penetrate, nothing that it does not realize, and its merit is so great that it is called Mother.” (k. 34, p. 314a21-26).

With this statement, the author of the Traité places himself resolutely on the side of the rationalists who prefer gnosis to mysticism, prajñā to yoga, discernment (vipāśyanā) to tranquility (śamatha). Nevertheless, although he places the Pratyutpannasamādhi well below that of the Prajñā, he does not hesitate to give it a certain usefulness.

This stand is part of the lineage of Buddhism. It prefers the discernment of the Dharma to a vision of the Buddhas. But did not Śākyamuni say to Vakkali: “He who sees the Dharma sees me” (Saṃyutta, III, p. 120: yo kho dhammaṃ passati so maṃ passati)?

By not formally condemning the Pratyutpannasamādhi, he applies the Teacher’s recommendations praising a middle way in a literal manner: “The monks who devote themselves to trance (jhāyin) blame the monks who are attached to the doctrine (dhammayoga) and vice versa. On the other hand, they should esteem one another. Indeed, rare are the men who pass their time (vihar-) by testing the immortal element (amata dhātu). Rare also are those who see the profound reality (arthapada) by penetrating it by means of Prajñā, by means of the intellect” (Anguttara, III, p. 355-356).

*

The debate between the rationalists and the mystics was centered around three texts which were among the first to be translated into Chinese.

Under the Later Han (25-220 AD), the Yue-tche Tche Leou-kia-tch’an (Lokakṣema) at Lo-Yang translated the three following sūtras:

- 1) Aṣṭasāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā (T 224) in 10 kuan and 30 chapters, 179 AD.
- 2) Pratyutpannasamādhisūtra (T 418) in 3 kuan and 16 chapters, 179 AD. – Another version of the Pratyutpannasamādhisūtra (T 417) in one kuan and not dated is also attributed to Lokakṣema: it is probably an extract made of T 418.
- 3) Śūraṅgamasamādhisūtra, translation made in 186 AD but which has not come down to us.

These translations are authenticated by ancient colophons reproduced in the Chinese catalogues. See Śūraṅgamasamādhi, French transl., 1965, p. 67-72.

The Pañcaviṃśati Prajñāpāramitā which, as we have just seen, deals with the vision of the Buddha, was the object of two translations under the Western Tsin (265-316 AD),:

- 1) T 222, incomplete, in 10 kuan and 27 chapters only, made by Dharmarakṣa in 286.
- 2) T 221, in 20 kuan and 90 chapters, finished in 291 by Mokṣala. From the end of the 3rd century, these texts along with many others were the object of new Chinese translations, each time marking notable progress over the preceding ones. On the historical and socio-cultural circumstances under which this huge work was effected, see P. Demiéville, Inde Classique, II, 1953, p. 398-463; Yogācārabhūmi de Saṅgharakṣa, in BEFEO, XLIV, 1954, p. 339-430; <2270> Pénétration du Bouddhisme dans la tradition philosophique chinoise, in Cahiers d’histoire mondiale, III, 1956, p. 19-38; Bouddhisme chinois, in Histoire des religions (Encyclopédie de la Pléiade), I, 1970, p. 1249-1319; E. Zürcher, Buddhist Conquest of China, 1956, p. 35-36 (Lokakṣema), p. 63-64 (translation of the 25,000 P. P.); H. Nakamura, Survey of Mahāyāna Buddhism, in Jour. of Intercultural Studies, III, 1976, p. 60-139 where the recent voluminous Japanese studies are reviewed.

Houei-yuan (334-417), a native of Yen men in northern China, had fled the barbarian invasions and taken refuge in the Blue River Basin under the protection of the Eastern Tsin (317-420). About 380, in imitation of the Taoist ‘Immortals’, he went into retreat in the mountains and stayed at Lou-chan, south of the middle Blue River. There he lived until his death, surrounded by a community of monks and lay people who were practicing the cult of Amita, Buddha of the West. On September 11, 402, this community formed an organization and its members took the oath to be reborn together in Amita’s paradise. For this association which later formed the sect of the White Lotus, see P. Demiéville, Yogācārabhūmi, p. 357-359; E. Zürcher, Conquest of China, I, p. 219-222.

The association, in which the lay people numbered 123, swore to collectively win the pure land of Amita and, in order to attain this goal, they practiced the Buddhānusmṛtisamādhi ‘concentration of recollection of the Buddhas’. This was a meditation somewhat different from the simple recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛti) recommended in the canonical scriptures and which the Traité fully described above (p. 1340-1361F). An intense meditation, very close to an autosuggestion, caused, at the first opportunity, a direct vision of the Buddhas of the present and more particularly of the Buddha of the West, Amita. Among the disciples of Houei-yuan who engaged in this practice were Lieou Tch’eng-tche, Seng-tsi and Houei-yong. “Hardly had he first concentrated his mind sitting in dhyāna for half a year than he saw the Buddha in samādhi; when he came across an icon along the path, the Buddha appeared in the sky and lit up sky and earth where all became the color of gold: or else, spreading out his kāṣāya, he bathed in the pool of jewels. Having come out of samādhi, he invited the monks to recite sūtras” (T 2103, k. 27, p. 304b8-11; transl. Demiéville, Yogācārabhūmi, p. 358). The sūtras that inspired the association show a certain eclecticism in which the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, the Sukhāvatīvyūha appeared and, above all, the Pratyutpannasamādhi.

In his preface to a collection of poetry on the Buddhānusmṛtisamādhi published by a member of the association, Houei-yuan declares: “The samādhis are very numerous, but in the strength of its merits and ease of access, that of the Buddhānusmṛti is foremost” (T 2103, k. 30, p. 351b21).

However, Houei-yuan finally had some doubts. If, he asked, the Pratyutpannasamādhi is like a dream, the Buddha seen in this samādhi, is he not a simple inner product, an aspect of our consciousness? If so, what value does such a vision have?

This is the question he asked Kumārajīva in his exchange of correspondence with the Koutchean master later in the year 406: cf. Kieou-mo-lo-che fa cha yi, T 1856, k. 2, p. 134b4-21. He could not have addressed a better authority. <2271>

For this correspondence, see R. G. Wagner, Die Fragen Hui-yüans an Kumārajīva, 1973.

*

In 383 at the capture of Kushā by the armies of the barbarian king Fou Kien of the dynasty of the Later Ts’in (350-394), Kumārajīva was captured by the cavalry general Liu Kouang and forcibly taken to Leang-tcheou in the Kan-sou. There he pined away for 19 years (383-401) and kept his profound doctrine to himself, without preaching or converting. Finally in 401, another barbarian emperor who was, however, a warm partisan of Buddhism, summoned him. This was Yao Hing of the dynasty of the Later Ts’in (384-417) who reigned from 394 to 416.

Kumārajīva, then 57 years of age, arrived at Tch’ang-ngan, the great metropolis of the empire, on February 8, 402. Welcomed warmly by the emperor who put at his disposal hundreds of learned Chinese, Kumārajīva showed unprecedented activity, as much in the translations that he made as in the works that he composed himself.

On February 1, 406, the date on which the Chinese version of the Traité appeared, Kumārajīva had worked on:

1) A new translation of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā (T 223),

2) The abridged translation of the Traité which is its commentary (T 1509). Kumārajīva had brought to Tch’ang-ngan the original Indian of this treatise, entitled in Sanskrit Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa. According to the account of his disciple Seng-jouei, “he always depended on this Upadeśa”. The work was so voluminous that he was unable to render it in its entirety: he translated fully the first chapter (parivarta), but considerably abridged the 89 following chapters.

3) Two original works dealing with the Kaśmirian dhyāna as it was practiced in the 4th century of our era: Tso tch’an san-mei king ‘Sūtra on the practice of dhyāna and samādhi’ (T614), and Tch’en fa yao kiai ‘Brief explanation of the method of dhyāna’ (T 616). These two works have been analysed by P. Demiéville, Yogācārabhūmi, p. 354-357. The Mo-ho-yen louen (Mahāyānopadeśa), i.e., the Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa (see T 614, k. 2, p. 278b27; T 616, k. 1, p. 291b10) has already been cited.

The knowledge of Kumārajīva extended to the Greater as well as to the Lesser Vehicle; not only was it encyclopedic, but it was also ordered and systematized according to the scholastic procedures of the Abhidharmas to which the Traité grants such an important place. And so, as soon as he received Houei-yuan’s letter, shortly after 406, Kumārajīva had no trouble in answering him.

He wrote: “It is necessary to distinguish three kinds of samādhi where one sees the Buddha. 1) Some bodhisattvas see him by the divine eye, hear him by the divine ear or fly to the Buddhas of the ten directions. 2) Others succeed in this vision without being endowed with the abhijñās by constantly concentrating their mind on Amita and on all the Buddhas of the present. 3) Finally, there are some who cultivate the buddhānusmṛti proper; some are liberated from desire, others not, and, as a result they see the Buddha either in the form of an icon or in his ‘body of birth’ or also under all the types of all the Buddhas past, future and present. These three kinds of concentration are all three correctly called buddhānusmṛtisamādhi, but <2272> the first, that which consists of seeing the Buddhas by means of the abhijñās, is better than the others” (Ta tch’eng ta yi tchang, T 1856, k. 2, p. 124b22-28; transl. P. Demiéville, Yogācārabhūmi, p. 358, note).

Here Kumārajīva condenses ad usum Delphini the theories of the Traité concerning the vision of the Buddhas and the controversy in which, in India, the rationalists and the mystics were opposed. Nevertheless, he does not go so far as to claim, as does the Traité, that the practice of the divyacakṣus is easier than the Pratyutpannasamādhi. Apart from that, the arguments developed are the same and, in Kumārajīva’s letter, the same technical terms are used as those he had already used in his version of the Upadeśa: this is particularly the case for the expression yi-siang-fen-pie, used to render the Sanskrit word saṃkalpa.

The profound idea of the Pañcaviṃśati, of the Traité and of Kumārajīva is that the true vision of the Buddhas is that which is practiced in the view of the Prajñāpāramitā, i.e., the one that does not see.

This why Kumārajīva ends his reply to Houei-yuan with the following conclusion:

“The Buddha taught the yogācārin what he should think: ‘I have not gone there and that Buddha has not come here to me; however, I have been able to see the Buddha and hear his Dharma.’ All of that is only conceptualizing (saṃkalpa). The things of the threefold world exist as a result of saṃkalpa; either they are fruits of retribution of thinking of the previous life or products of the thinking of the present life. Having heard this teaching, the yogācārin becomes disgusted with the threefold world and increases his faith and respect, saying: ‘The Buddha has enunciated this subtle and admirable system well.’ – Then he eliminates the desires of the threefold world, deeply penetrates into samādhi and realizes the [true] Pratyutpannasamādhi.” (Ta tch’eng ta yi tchang, T 1856, k. 2, p. 135a6-11).

Sūtra (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 30, l. 6-13); Śatasāhasrikā, p. 96, l. 20-104, l. 16). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes to see, by means of the divine eye, the Buddhas in each of the ten directions in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges; if he wishes to hear, by means of the divine ear, all the teachings given by these Buddhas of the ten directions; if he wishes to penetrate [by means of mind] the mind of these Buddhas (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra ye daśasu diṅṣu gaṅgānadīvālukopameṣu lokadhātūṣu buddhā bhagavatas tān satvān divyena cakṣuṣā draṣṭukāmena, yāṃś ca te buddhā bhagavanto dharmān bhāṣante tān sarvān divyena śrotreṇa śrotukāmena, teṣāṃ ca buddhānāṃ bhagavatāṃ cetasaiva cittaṃ parijñātukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāmītāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. -

I. SEEING AND HEARING ALL THE BUDDHAS

What is seen by the divine eye (divyacakṣus) does not go beyond <2273> one trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu.¹⁸³ But here, by the power of the Prajñāpāramitā, the bodhisattva sees all the Buddhas in each of the ten directions in universes as many as the sands of the Ganges. Why? Because in the view of the Prajñāpāramitā, nothing is near (samipe), nothing is far (dūre), and there is no obstacle (pratigha) to seeing.

Question. – However, in the Pan-tcheou king (Pratyutpannasūtra = Pratyutpannabuddha-saṃmukhāvasthitasamādhisūtra (‘Sūtra of the concentration during which the Buddhas of the present are face-to-face’), it is said: “By the power of the Pratyutpannasamādhi, the ascetic, even without having

¹⁸³ The range of the divyacakṣus varies with the qualities of those who hold it. – Kośabhāṣya, p. 429, l. 17-430, l. 3:

Śrāvakaṃ pratyekabuddhabuddhāṃ tv anabhiṣaṃskāreṇa sāhasradviśāhasratrisāhasrakān lokadhātūn yathāsaṃkhyāṃ paśyanti / adhiṣaṃskāreṇa tu śrāvako ‘pi dviśāhasraṃ lokadhātūṃ divyena cakṣuṣā paśyati / trisāhasraṃ khadgaviṣṇākālpāḥ / buddhas tu bhagavān asaṃkhyeyān lokadhātūn paśyati yāvad ececcati.

- Transl. - If they do not make an effort, the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and the Buddha see, with the divine eye, one sāhasra universe, one dviśāhasra universe, one trisāhasra universe, respectively. But if they make an effort, the śrāvakas see, with the divine eye, one dviśāhasra universe, and the pratyekabuddhas, one trisāhasra universe. As for the Blessed Buddha, he sees as many innumerable universes as he wishes.

acquired the divyacakṣus, is able to see all the Buddhas of the present in the ten directions.”¹⁸⁴ On the other hand, here [in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra], by means of the divyacakṣus, the bodhisattva sees all the Buddhas of the ten directions. What are the differences between these two visions?

Answer. – 1) The divyacakṣus is non-defiled-indeterminate (anivṛtyāvyākṛta).¹⁸⁵

2) The Pratyutpannasamādhi is obtained by a person freed of desire (vītarāga) as well as by a person not freed of desire (avitarāga), whereas the divyacakṣus is obtained only by someone freed of desire.¹⁸⁶ <2274>

3) The Pratyutpannasamādhi is a vision resulting from constant meditation (nityabhāvanā), the constant practice (nityaniṣeṇa) of subjective conceptualizing (saṃkalpa).¹⁸⁷ The divyacakṣus, obtained by the practice of the superknowledges (abhiññā) is an eye consisting of pure derived matter of the four great elements of the form realm (rūpadhātoḥ caturmahābhūtāny upādāya rūpaprāsāda),¹⁸⁸ and this eye enjoys complete luminosity at all four points of the horizon (caturdiśa). That is the difference.

¹⁸⁴ Pratyutpannasamādhisūtra, T 418, k. 1, p. 905a23-27: It is not with the divine eye (divyacakṣus) that the bodhisattva-mahāsattva sees [the Buddhas of the present, Amita, etc], nor with the divine ear (divyaśrotra) that he hears them, nor by the bases of miraculous power (rdhhibala) that he goes to their Buddha fields (buddhakṣetra). Nor does he see the Buddha by dying here and being reborn over there in the buddhakṣetra: on the contrary, it is seated here in one place that he sees the Buddha Amita, hears the sūtras preached by him and recollects them all. Coming out of samādhi, he still possesses them and preaches them to people.

Other Chinese versions: T 417, p. 899a18-20; T 419, p. 922a22-27.

¹⁸⁵ The divyacakṣus and the divyaśrotra are part of the six abhiññās (cf. p. 1809F and foll.). As prajñā associated with the visual consciousness and the auditory consciousness respectively, these two abhiññās are morally indeterminate, neither good nor bad. See Kośabhāṣya, p. 423, l. 11: Divyacakṣuḥśrotrābhiññe avyākṛte, te punaś cakṣuḥśrotravijñānasamprayuktaprajñe.

¹⁸⁶ By its access to the dhyanas of rūpadhātu, vitarāga is free of the passions of kāmādhātu; avitarāga is the opposite. The pratyutpannasamādhi is within the range of all, lay and monastic, whether or not they are free of desire; the divyacakṣus is reserved for dhīyāins only, detached from kāmādhātu.

¹⁸⁷ The Sanskrit word saṃkalpa [French: imagination] (conceptualizing) appears frequently in the Madhyamakakārikās and their commentary, the Prasannapadā (p. 122, l. 6; 143, l. 11; 350, l. 8; 451, l. 11); in his translation of the Madhyamakāśāstra, Kumārajīva always renders saṃkalpa by the paraphrase yi-siang-fen-pie (T 1564, k. 2, p. 13a22-23; k. 3, p. 23a25; k. 3, p. 28b24; k. 4, p. 31a13). The equivalence has already been noted by H. Nakamura, Bukkyōgo Daijiten, I, p. 134a.

Pratyutpannasamādhi is pure autosuggestion, but practice is not useless nevertheless (see above, p. 1927-1928F, note).

¹⁸⁸ The divyaskṣus is not imaginary: it is an organ made of a pure matter (rūpaprāsāda) derived from the four great elements present in the dhyanas. See Kośa, VII, p. 123, or Kośabhāṣya, p. 429.

4) The technique (adhikāra) of the divyacakṣus is easy (sulabha): thus, when the sun has risen, seeing forms (rūpa) is not hard (kṛccha). On the other hand, the technique of the [Pratyutpanna]-samādhi is difficult: thus when one lights a lamp (dīpa) in the dark of night, seeing colors (rūpa) is not easy.¹⁸⁹

It is the same for the divine ear (divyaśrotra). <2275>

II. PENETRATING THE MIND OF THE BUDDHAS¹⁹⁰

Question. – If even a man of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) belonging to a higher stage (uttarabhūmi) does not know the mind (citta) of a man with strong faculties (tīkṣṇendriya) belonging to a lower stage (avarabhūmi), if even a bodhisattva is unable to know the mind of a single Buddha,¹⁹¹ how then (kaḥ

¹⁸⁹ The first five abhijñās, of which divyacakṣus is part, rely upon the four dhyānas, i.e., are obtained by an ascetic in dhyāna (Kośa, VII, p. 101). As the Traité has noted above (p. 1827F), in the second dhyāna the divyacakṣus is easy to obtain for the visual consciousness (caḥsurvijñāna) being absent there, the mind is concentrated (samāhita) and free of distractions. – The practice of the Pratyutpannasamādhi is more complicated. In order to attain it, the practitioner must fulfill, during a period of three months of probation, four series of four conditions each (T 417, p. 899c9-12; T 418, k. 1, p. 906a13-28). Then, the moment having come, he enters into concentration proper: “Whether he is a monk (śramaṇa) or a lay person (avadātavaśana), he thinks constantly of the field (kṣetra) of the buddha Amita in the western direction and of the Buddha of that direction, but without forgetting the rules of moral conduct (śikṣāpada). He thinks this way with full attention (ekacittena) either for a day and a night, or for seven days and seven nights. At the end of the seven days, he sees the buddha Amita. Awakened [from the samādhi], he sees him no longer. It is like in dream visions (svapnadarśana) where the sleeper does not know if they are daytime or night-time dreams, internal or external, where there are no shadows (tamas) to prevent seeing, no obstacles (pratigha) to prevent seeing” (T 418, k. 1, p. 905a14-20). – In the corresponding passage of T 417, p. 899a9-16, mention is also made of the Buddhas of the present.

¹⁹⁰ The preceding lines were about abhijñā no. 5, the cyutupapādajñāna, also called divyacakṣus, and abhijñā no. 2, the divyaśrotra. Now it is a question of abhijñā no. 3, the cetahparyāyajñāna, also called paracittajñāna, ‘awareness of the mind of another’. The canonical definitions of these three abhijñās have been cited and translated above, p. 1809-1814F. By virtue of the paracittajñāna, the ascetic, ‘by means of his mind, is aware precisely of the minds of others, of other men’ (parasatvānām parapudgalānām cetasaiva cittam yathābhūtam prajānati).

¹⁹¹ The limits of the awareness of another’s mind are clearly defined in Kośa, VII, p. 7 = Kośabhāṣya, p. 393, l. 9-12.

1) The paracittajñāna of a lower dhyāna (avaradhyānabhūmika) does not know the mind of a higher dhyāna (uttaradhyānabhūmika).

2) The paracittajñāna of a being of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), namely of the śraddhāvimukta and the samayavimukta, does not know the mind of a saint of strong faculties (tīkṣṇendriya), namely of the drṣṭiprāpta and the asamayavimukta.

3) The paracittajñāna of a lower saint does not know the mind of a higher saint, in the order, anāgamin, arhat, pratyekabuddha, Buddha.

4) When the mind of another is [past or future (atītānāgata)], the paracittajñāna does not know it, for this jñāna has as object the present minds and mental events (vartamānacittacaitta-viśayatvāt).

punarvādah) could the bodhisattva ‘penetrate the mind of all the Buddhas of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges’?

Answer. – The magical power (ṛddhibala) of the Buddha helps the bodhisattva [to know the mind of all the Buddhas]. As the sūtra says: “Of all beings, there is not one that knows the mind of the Buddha; but if the Buddha, by means of his power, helps one to know it, even insects (kṛmi) can know it.”¹⁹² This is why <2276> the Buddha helps the bodhisattvas to know the mind of the Buddhas with his magical power. [306b]

Moreover, the Prajñāpāramitā has as nature the absence of obstacles (anāvaraṇalakṣaṇa). The coarse (audārika) and the subtle (sūkṣma), the profound (gambhīra) and the superficial, the fool (bāla) and the sage (ārya), all are undifferentiated (nirviśiṣṭa). The suchness (tathatā) of the mind of the Buddhas and the suchness of the mind of the bodhisattva are one and the same suchness; they are not different. By following this suchness, the bodhisattva is able to penetrate the mind of all the Buddhas.

Finally, as for these marvelous extraordinary things (āścaryādbhutadharma), it is by not knowing them that one knows them.¹⁹³ This is why the Prajñāpāramitā says here that the bodhisattva wishing to obtain that should practice the perfection of wisdom.

Buddhabhāṣitasamdhāraṇa

Eight Section RETAINING THE TEACHINGS OF THE BUDDHAS OF THE PRESENT

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 30. l. 14-16; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 100, l. 1-5). – The bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if, after having heard the teachings given in the ten directions by the Buddhas, he wishes to retain everything [and not forget them] until he attains supreme perfect enlightenment

– Here the objector invokes the limits of the paracittajñāna in order to deny that a bodhisattva knows the mind of the innumerable Buddhas of the present.

¹⁹² Cf. Saṃghabhedā, I, p. 196, l. 19-25; Divyāvadāna, p. 77, l. 14-16; 161, l. 23-25; 466, l. 10-13: Dharmatā khalu yasmin samaya buddhā bhagavanto laukikaṃ cittam utpādayanti tadā kuntapipīlikā api prāñinas tasmin samaye bhagavataś cetasā cittam ājānati; prāgeva śakrabrahmādayo devāḥ; yasmins tu samaya lokottaraṃ cittam utpādayanti tasmin samaye mahāśrāvakā api bhagavtaś cetasā cittam nājānati; kaḥ punar vādāṃ śakrabrahmādayo devā; kuta eva kuntapipīlikā api prāñinaḥ.

Transl. – It is the rule that at the moment when the Blessed Buddhas produce a worldly mind, even the kuntapipīlika insects know the mind of the Blessed One with their own mind, and a fortiori, the gods Śakra, Brahmā, etc. But when the Buddhas produce a supraworldly mind, even the great disciples cannot know the mind of the Blessed One with their own mind; then what can be said of the kuntapipīlika insects? – In PaEi, kuntapipīlika is kunthakipillaka: these are ants.

¹⁹³ Se Pañjika cited above, p. 2021F: Tattvaṃ prajñayā vivecyamānaṃ sarvadharmānupalambha-lakṣaṇam avasitam.

– Transl. – The Absolute, discerned by wisdom, comes down to the non-perception of any dharma whatsoever.

(Bodhisattvena mahāsattvena yāms te buddhā bhagavato daśasu diṅsu dharmān bhāṣante tāñ śrutvā sarvān saṃdhārayitukāmena yāvad anuttarāṃ samyaksambodhi, abhisambuddha iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śīkṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – The teachings of a single Buddha are already hard to retain (saṃdhārayitum); how then would the bodhisattva retain and not forget the teachings of innumerable Buddhas?

Answer. – By the power of the Śrutadharadhāraṇi, the ‘dhāraṇi retaining what has been heard’,¹⁹⁴ the bodhisattva gets a strong memory (smṛti) and by the power of the dhāraṇi, he does not forget.

Moreover, as is said here, it is by the power of the Prajñāpāramitā [that the bodhisattva retains the teachings of all the Buddhas]. <2277> Perfectly pure (atyantaviśuddhi) and free of any clinging (adhyavasāna), this pāramitā is like the great sea (mahāsamudra) which receives all the rivers. Similarly, by means of this great receiver (mahābhājana), the Prajñāpāramitā, the bodhisattva retains and does not forget the innumerable teachings of the Buddhas of the ten directions.

Finally, the Prajñāpāramitā is incomparable (anupama) like space (ākāśa). After the final conflagration (kalpoddāha), a great rain (mahāvarṣa) fills everything and, except for space, there is no place that can receive it; similarly, when the rain of teachings (dharmadeśana) of the Buddhas of the ten directions comes out of the Buddhas’ mouths, there is nobody to retain it except for the bodhisattva practicing the prajñāpāramitā.

This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that in order to hear [and retain] the teachings of the Buddhas of the ten directions, the bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom.

¹⁹⁴ See p. 318F, 328F, 1865F.

CHAPTER LI: SEEING ALL THE BUDDHA FIELDS

First Section SEEING THE FIELDS OF THE BUDDHAS OF THE THREE TIMES

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 39, l. 17-18; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 100, l. 5-8). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes to see the Buddha-fields of the past and future Buddhas, and if he wishes to see the Buddha-fields of the Buddhas existing at the present everywhere in the ten directions (Punar aparaṃ, Śāriputra, bodhisattvena mahāsattvena atītanāṃ cānāgatānāṃ ca buddhānāṃ bhagavatāṃ buddhakṣetrāṇi draṣṭukāmena, pratyutpannānāṃ api samantād daśadikṣu buddhānāṃ bhagavatāṃ buddhakṣetrāṇi draṣṭukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śīkṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – But in seeing the Buddhas of the ten directions (cf. p. 2272F) the bodhisattva has already seen their Buddha-fields; why speak again here of the bodhisattva “who wishes to see the Buddha-fields”?

Answer. – [Above], the bodhisattva had not yet penetrated deeply into the dhyānas and the absorptions (samāpatti) and, had he seen the Buddha-fields of the ten directions with their mountains, rivers, plants and trees, his mind would have been distracted (vikṣipta): this is why he was limited to seeing the Buddhas. Everything happened as in the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānusrṛti) where it is said (p. 1340F) that “the yogin sees only the Buddhas but does not see the lands, the mountain, the rivers or the trees”. Here, on the other hand, the bodhisattva has obtained the power of the dhyānas and the absorptions (samāpatti) and is thus able to see as much as he wants (yathecccham), [not only the Buddhas but also the Buddha-fields].

Furthermore, the very pure Buddha-fields (pariśuddhabuddhakṣetra) are difficult to see: this is why the Prajñāpāramitā says here that “if he wishes to see the Buddha-fields, the bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom.” [306c]

Finally, each Buddha possesses hundreds of thousands <2280> of kinds of buddhakṣetras. As I said before (p. 2230F), there are pure (viśuddha), impure (aviśuddha), mixed (miśra) or absolutely pure (atyantapariśuddha) buddhakṣetras: since the latter are hard to see (durdṛśa), the power of the Prajñāpāramitā is needed to discover them. It is like the devaputra:¹⁹⁵ in his audience hall; he can be seen by the people from the outside, but in his private apartments he is not seen by anyone.

Question. – We accept that the buddhakṣetras presently existing in the ten directions can be seen; but how could one see the buddhakṣetras of the past and future Buddhas?

¹⁹⁵ Under the official title of devaputra, the Traité here means the Kuṣāṇa emperor ruling at its time: cf. Traité, Vol.

III, Introduction, p. XI.

Answer. – The bodhisattva possesses the concentration called ‘vision of the past and future’ (atītānāgata darśana); in this concentration he sees things past and future: it is like the visions in a dream (svapnadarśana).

Furthermore, the bodhisattva possesses the concentration of unceasing term (anirodhakoṭi).¹⁹⁶ In this concentration, he does not see that the Buddhas have cessation.

Question. – But these two concentrations (samādhi) are not of the eyes (cakṣus); then how could he see?

Answer. – These two concentrations are wisdoms (prajñā) metaphorically (prajñaptitas) called ‘eye’. Similarly, in the [triple] turning (parivarta) of the Wheel of Dharma (dharmacakra), on [each of the twelve aspects (ākāra) of the four noble truths (āryasatya), the ascetic obtains the ‘eye’ (cakṣus), the knowledge (jñāna), the clear intuition (vidyā), the awareness (buddhi).¹⁹⁷ <2281>

¹⁹⁶ The anirodhakoṭi, like the anutpādaakoṭi mentioned above (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 29, l. 7) is none other than the true nature of dharmas without production or cessation.

¹⁹⁷ The bodhisattva sees the true nature of things by means of pure wisdom (prajñā anāsrava) and, even in the earliest texts, this wisdom which in reality sees nothing, is metaphorically called ‘eye’ (cakṣus).

The Wheel of the Dharma is of three turnings and twelve aspects. In Sanskrit, triparivartam dvādaśakāraṃ dharmacakram (Mahāvastu, III, p. 333, l. 11; Divyāvadāna, p. 205, l. 21; 393, l. 23; Lalitavistara, p. 422, l. 2; Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 380, l. 13; Sad. Puṇḍarika, p. 179, l. 1). In Pāli, tiparivaṭṭaṃ dvādaśakārāraṃ yathābhūtaṃ nāṇadassanaṃ (Vinaya, I, p. 11, l. 20; II, l. 25; Saṃyutta, V, p. 422, l. 32.)

The expression is explained in Saṃyutta, V, p. 420-424; Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 15, p. 104c-105a; Catuspariśad, p. 142-152 or 445-446; Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, k. 32, p. 788a27-b23; Mūlasarv. Vin., Saṃghabheda, I, p. 135-136; Mahāvastu, III, p. 332-333; Lalitavistara, p. 417-418; Āloka, p. 381-382; Mahāvvyut., no. 1309-1324.

The first turning (parivarta) of the noble Truths is the Path of seeing (darśanamārga) and consists of four aspects (ākāra): 1) This is suffering (idaṃ duḥkham); 2) This is its origin (ayaṃ samudayaḥ); 3) This is its cessation (ayaṃ nirodhaḥ); 4) This is the path of the cessation of suffering (yaṃ nirodhagāminī pratipad).

The second turning is the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga) and consists of four aspects: 1) The noble truth of suffering should be known (duḥkhaṃ āryasatyaṃ parijñeyam); 2) Its origin should be eliminated (duḥkhasamudayaḥ prahātavyaḥ); 3) Its destruction should be realized (duḥkhanirodhaḥ sāṅgāt kartavyaḥ); 4) The path of cessation of suffering should be practiced (duḥkhanirodhagāminī pratipad bhāvayitavyā).

The third turning is the path of the arhat (aśaikṣamārga) and consists of four aspects: 1) Suffering is known (duḥkhaṃ parijñātam); 2) Its origin has been destroyed (samudayaḥ prahīṇaḥ); 3) Its destruction has been realized (nirodhaḥ sāṅgāt kṛtaḥ); 4) The path of the cessation of suffering has been practiced (duḥkhanirodhagāminī pratipad bhāvitā).

After each of the twelve aspects mentioned here, the sources repeat the formula: Pūrvam ananuśruteṣu dharmeṣu yoniṣo manasikurvataḥ cakṣur udapādi, jñānaṃ vidyābuddhir udapādi: “When I was meditating on these things not yet understood by me, the eye was born in me, the knowledge, the clear intuition, the awareness were born.” It is in regard to these four synonyms where the eye is taken in the metaphorical sense of wisdom (prajñā) that the Traité is alluding here. I [Lamotte] have no doubt that it is a question here of synonyms, although some scholars detect nuances between cakṣus, jñāna, vidyā and buddhi: cf. Kośavyākhyā, p. 580, l. 30-581, l. 6.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who sees the buddhakṣetras presently existing in the ten directions knows perfectly well that the past (atīta) and future (anāgata) buddhakṣetras are the same as them. Why? Because the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddhas are the same amongst all of them. In this regard, see p. 2228F.

Finally, in [the view] of the prajñāpāramitā, the present (pratyutpanna), the past (atīta) and the future (anāgata) are the same (sama) and without differences (nirviśiṣṭa) for it is a matter of one and the same suchness (tathatā), one and the same fundamental element (dharmadhātu). This is why you should not argue with us here.

Dvadaśāṅgapravacana

Second Section HEARING THE TWELVE-MEMBERED SPEECH OF THE BUDDHA

PRELIMINARY NOTE

From the evidence of the philosopher and commentator Buddhaghosa, the speech of the Buddha, such as it was presented in Ceylon in the 5th century of our era, was the object of seven different classifications. They are listed in the Samantapāsādikā, p. 16; the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, p. 15; and the Atthasālinī, p. 18):

Tad etaṃ sabbam pi Buddhavacanaṃ rasavasena ekavidhaṃ, dhammavinayavasena duvidhaṃ, pañṇamamajjhimaṇapac chimavasena tividaṃ, tathā piṭakavasena, nikāyavasena pañcavidhaṃ, aṅgavasena navavidhaṃ, dhammakhandavasena caturāṣiṣahassavidhan ti veditabbaṃ.

“It should be known that the Buddha’s speech is single in its taste, twofold because of the Dharma and the discipline, threefold because of the initial, intermediate and final (words of the Buddha), also threefold because of the baskets, <2282> fivefold because of the collections, ninefold because of the members (aṅga) and finally 84,000-fold because of the articles of the Dharma.”

The earliest texts mention a classification of the scriptures into members or aṅgas. These aṅgas are not literary genres but simply composition types in respect to form (e.g., prose or verse) or content (e.g., sermons, predictions, stories, conversations, commentaries, etc).

The major drawback of this classification is that, far from being mutually exclusive, the aṅgas overlap one another. Thus a sūtra is also a geya if it contains verse, a gāthā if it is expressed in stanzas, an udāna if it includes exclamations, an itiyuktaka if it begins or ends with certain stereotyped formulas, a jātaka if it tells about previous lifetimes, a vyākaraṇa if it contains explanations or predictions, etc.

The Pāli sources list nine members: the Sanskrit-Chinese sources usually mention twelve; the classification into nine members is called Navāṅga, the classification into twelve members, Dvādaśāṅga.

A. Hirakawa has dedicated a masterful study to the Dvādaśāṅga in his work Shoki daijō no Kenyū (Study on the early Mahāyāna), 1968, p. 721-753. Previously he had condensed his ideas into an article entitled

The Rise of Mahāyāna Buddhism in Memoirs of the Research Department of the Tōyō Bunko, no. 22 (1963), p. 61-65.

In the canonical sources, whether they are nine or twelve in number, the āṅgas are set out without any explanation. They are supposed to include the entirety of the Buddhist scriptures, but they could also be applied to any other literature, sacred as well as profane. This type of classification is not necessarily Buddhist in origin and could be derived from literary concepts widespread in the early centuries of Buddhism. This would explain the hesitation that commentators will always feel when they have to define any āṅga in particular.

1. The Navāṅga

Throughout their history, the Theravādins have maintained the division of the scriptures into nine āṅgas, cited in Pāli in the following order: 1) sutta, 2) geyya, 3) veyyākaraṇa, 4) gāthā, 5) udāna, 6) itivuttaka, 7) jātaka, 8) abbhutadhamma, 9) vedalla.

The canonical and paracanonical texts list these āṅgas without trying to define them:

Vinaya, III, p. 8.

Majjhima, I, p. 133-134; Anguttara, II, p. 7, 103, 178; III, p. 86, 88, 177, 361, 362; IV, p. 113; Mahāniddesa, I, p. 143; Cullaniddesa, p. 192.

Puggalapaññatti, p. 43, 62.

Milindapañha, p. 344, l. 3 (navāṅgasāsana).

As we have seen, the other Buddhist schools preferred the list of twelve members: the Dvādaśāṅga (in Chinese che eul pou king or che eul fen kiao); and the Sanskrit-Chinese sources exceptionally mention the Navāṅga (kieu pou king or kieu fen kiao) also. <2283>

1. The Navāṅga are mentioned in some rare canonical sūtras translated into Chinese: Parinirvāṇa, T 7, k. 1, p. 194b8; Saṃgīti, T 12, k. 1, p. 227b26-27; Aṅgulimāla, T 120, k. 2, p. 524a28; Itivṛttaka, T 765, k. 5, 684a3-4; k. 7, p. 607c17-18.

2. The Mahāsaṃghika Vinaya, like the Pāli Vinaya, counts only nine āṅgas: T 1425, k. 1, p. 227b12-13; k. 7, p. 281c18-20; k. 16, p. 356c10-13.

In the Mahāyānist sūtras and śāstras, the Navāṅga is the exception, except when it is a matter of contrasting the Hīnayānist Navāṅga with the Mahāyānist Dvādaśāṅga.

3. The Saddharmapuṇḍarīka proposes a navāṅga (p. 46, l. 1) different from the Pāli classification, which consists of (p. 45, l. 7-8): 1) sūtra, 2) gāthā, 3) itivṛttaka, 4) jātaka, 5) adbhuta, 6) nidāna, 7) aupamyā, 8) geya, 9) upadeśa.

The Chinese versions faithfully translate these passages (cf. T 262, k. 1, p. 7c25-27 and p. 8a6; T 264, k. 1, p. 140c16-18 and 26), but a few pages later, refer to the Dvādaśāṅga (cf. T 262, k. 4, p. 34b3; T 264, k. 4, p. 168c12).

4. Two Mahāyānist treatises, traditionally attributed to Nāgārjuna and both translated by Kumārajīva, the Upadeśa (T 1509) and the Daśabhūmikavibhāṣā (T 1521) disagree on the number of the āṅgas: the Upadeśa counts twelve, the Vibhāṣā, nine (T 1521, k. 2, p. 29b3; k. 3, p. 35b16; k. 6, p. 50b17; k. 9, p. 69b26-28).

5. For the Mahāyānist Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, the Navāṅga represents the Hīnayānist Buddhism which is but the semi-speech of the Buddha (T 374, k. 3, p. 383c6-9; k. 5, pl. 391a9; k. 7, p. 404a5; T 375, k. 3, p. 623b25-27; k. 5, p. 63a14; k. 7, p. 644c9), whereas the Dvādaśāṅga is supposed to contain the entirety of the Buddha's speech held by the Mahāyāna (T 374, k. 15, p. 451b15-18; T 375, k. 14, p. 693b16-19).

2. The Dvādaśāṅga

The division of the scriptures into twelve āṅgas is largely predominant in the Buddhism of the Sanskrit language, both Hīnayāna and Mahāyāna, and the twelve members are often cited in the following manner, that of the Mahāvvyutpatti (no. 1267-1278):

1) sūtra, 2) geya, 3) vyākaraṇa, 4) gāthā, 5) udāna, 6) nidāna, 7) avadāna, 8) itivṛttaka, 9) jātaka, 10) vaipulya, 11) adbhutadharma, 12) upadeśa.

Three members are added to the preceding list: nidāna, introduction showing the circumstances incidental to the speech; avadāna, story of a feat; upadeśa, systematic instruction. Two words have been sanskritized: vedalla, of obscure meaning, has been replaced here by vaipulya, 'developed text'; itivuttaka 'thus has it been said' is sanskritized as ityuktaka, having the same meaning, or hyper-sanskritized as itivṛttaka 'thus has it happened.

Ityuktaka is vouched for, with an error of spelling, in the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 100, l. 10; 1460, l. 5. Itivṛttaka occurs more frequently: cf. Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 386, l. 2; Kośavyākhyā, p. 438, l. 30; Pañcaviṃśatisāh., p. 31, l. 5; 158, l. 13; 218, l. 13; Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, ed. Kern <2284> -Nanjio, p. 45, l. 7 and Kashgar version, ed. H. Toda, II-III, p. 329, l. 30; Bodhisattvabhūmi, p. 67, l. 20; 397, l. 12-13.

For itivuttaka in Pāli, see Critical Pāli Dictionary, vol. II, p. 279b; for itivṛttaka in Sanskrit, see Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 113b.

Among the texts mentioning the Dvādaśāṅga, we may mention:

1. The four canonical Āgamas: Dīrgha, T 1, k. 3, p. 16c15-17; k. 12, p. 75-b19; Madhyama, T 26, k. 1, p. 421a19-20; k. 45, p. 709b7-8; k. 54, p. 764a14-15; Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 41, p. 300c5-8; T 100, k. 6, p. 415b1-3; Ekottara, T 125, k. 17, p. 635a11-13; k. 21, p. 657a2-4; k. 33, p. 728c3-6; k. 46, p. 794b14-16; k. 48, p. 813a16-17 and 28-29. – Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, ed. Waldschmidt, p. 386, l. 2.

2. The Vinayas of the Mahīśāsaka, T 1421, k. 1, p. 1c14-16; of the Dharmaguptakas, T 1428, k. 1, p. 569b4-7; of the Sarvāstivādins: Sarvāstivāyavibhāṣā, T 1440, k. 4, p. 526a12; k. 6, p. 540a21; of the Mūlasarv., Kṣudrakavastu, T 1451, k. 38, p. 398c25-27.

3. The Abhidharmas of the Sarvāstivādins: Saṃgītiparyāya, T 1536, k. 14, p. 427c16-18; k. 17, p. 437a24-25; Jñānaprasthāna, T 1543, k. 17, p. 853b(aberrant list of ten aṅgas); T 1544, k. 12, p. 981b6-7.

4. Stories and apologues: Chen king, T 154, k. 5, p. 107b28; Fo pao ngen king, T 156, k. 1, p. 128a5; k. 7, p. 163b28; Sin ti kouan king, T 159, k. 8, p. 328b5; Fa kiu king, T 210, k. 1, p. 566b25; Tch'ou yao king, T 212, k. 17, p. 698c1; Tche keou king, T 214, k. 1, p. 799c12.

5. The Prajñāpāramitāsūtras:

Aṣṭasāhasrikā, T 225, k. 3, p. 488a17.

Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, ed. Dutt, p. 31, l. 5-6; 158, l. 12-14; 218, l. 13-14; T 221, k. 1, p. 4a4; k. 4, p. 28a13-14; T 222, k. 1, p. 150c28; k. 7, p. 197a28; T 223, k. 1, p. 220b25-28; k. 10, p. 291a28-29; k. 22, p. 379c9-10; T 220, vol. VII, k. 402, p. 9c26-28; k. 416, p. 88c11; k. 430, p. 162c25-28; k. 440, p. 219a24-28.

Aṣṭadaśasāhasrikā, T 220, vol. VII, k. 479, p. 431c21-22; k. 509, p. 599a5-6.

Śatasāhasrikā, ed. Ghosa, p. 100, l. 9-10; 1460, l. 5-6; vol. V, k. 3, p. 15b20-21; k. 127, p. 699a7-9.

6. Avataṃsaka, T 281, p. 449a29; k. 1, p. 620c23; k. 6, p. 658c28.

7. Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 37, p. 210a4-6; k. 77, p. 436a14-6; k. 91, p. 522a25-27.

8. Mahāsaṃnipāta, T 397, k. 5, p. 30c8; k. 22, p. 157b26-28; p. 159a14 and 17; k. 31, p. 215b23.

3. Explanations of the Aṅgas

The early sources were limited to citing the nine or twelve aṅgas; they were careful not to define them, undoubtedly because they had only a very vague notion of them. Starting from the 2nd century of our era, the scholars attempted to explain the aṅgas, but their interpretations lack coherence and their hesitations betray their embarrassment. On this subject see the masterly work of E. Mayeda, A History of the Formation of Original Buddhist Texts. 1964.

In regard to the twelve aṅgas, the commentaries furnished by the following works are taken into account: <2285>

1. Abhidharmamahāvibhāṣāśāstra, T 1545, k. 126, p. 659c8-660b7.

2. Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtropadeśa, T 1509, k. 33, p.306c16-308b17; this passage will be translated in the following pages.

3. Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 1, p. 244c11-245b6.

4. Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, T 374, k. 15, p. 451b18-452a17.

5. Udānasūtra, T 212, k. 6, p. 643c.

6. Yogācārabhūmiśāstra, T 1579, k. 25, p. 418b23- 419a3; k. 81, p. 753a10-b21.

7. Hien yang cheng kiao louen, T 1602, k. 6, p. 508c15- 509a24; k. 12, p. 538b22-539a1.

8. Mahāyānābhidharmasamuccaya, T 1605, k. 6, p. 686a18-b24.

9. Mahāyānābhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā, T 1606, k. 11, p. 743b5-744a12.

10. Abhidharmayāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 595a1-b5.

The explanations furnished in the 5th century by Buddhaghosa and his school on the nine aṅgas of the Pāli traditions are later than these commentaries. They occur in the form of a stock phrase in the Pāli Commentaries of the Vinaya, I, p. 28-29, of the Dīgha, I, p. 23-24, of the Majjhima, II, p. 106, and in the Atthasālinī, p. 26.

As D. J. Kalupahana comments (Encyclopedia of Buddhism, ed. Malalasekera, I, p. 619), the real meaning of the division into nine and twelve aṅgas was almost entirely lost at the time when the Buddhist scholiasts of late date were trying to explain it. At that time, quite a few Buddhist texts were circulating among the public and found their way into the libraries of the Saṃghārāma. Lacking a better explanation, the early commentators believed or wanted to find in the Navāṅga or the Dvādaśāṅga if not references at least allusions to works recognized by their schools. Hence the rather forced comparisons which appear to guarantee the antiquity and authenticity of the entire literary output.

The Mahāvibhāṣā of the Kaśmir arhats (T 1545) was undoubtedly the first to engage on this path. It was followed by the Traité which was inspired in part by it, with the difference, however, that the Vibhāṣā was interested only in the Hīnayānist production whereas the Traité wanted to authenticate the entirety of the Mahāyānist literature.

*

Here are the twelve aṅgas according to the various recensions of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā: the first column is borrowed from the original Sanskrit, ed. Dutt, p. 31, l.5-6; the second column from the Tibetan version, Tib. Trip., vol. 18, no. 731, p. 55, fol. 37b3-4; the third from the Chinese translation of Kumārajīva, T 223, k. 1, p. 220b25-28; the fourth from the Chinese translation of Hiuan-tsang, T 220 (vol. VII), k. 402, p. 9c26-28i

1. sūtra, mdo, sieou to lo (K), k'i king (H).

2. geya, dbyaṅs kyis bsñad pa, k'i ye, (K), yīng song (H).

3. vyākaraṇa, ḥuṇ bstan pa, cheou ki (K), cheou ki (H).

4. gāthā, tshigs su bcaḍ pa, k'ie t'o, (K), fong song (H).

5. udāna, ched du brjod pa, yeou t'o na (K), tseu chou (H).

6. nidāna, gleṇ gzi, yin yuan (K), yin yuan (H).

7. avādāna, rtogs pa brjod pa, apo t'o na (K), p'i yu (H).

8. ityuktaka, - , jou che yu king (K), - .

itiyrttaka, hdi ltar h̄das pa, yi mou (ichou) to kia (K), pen che (H).

9. jātaka, skyes paḥi rabs, pen cheng (K), pen cheng (H).

10. vaipulya, šin tu rgyas pa, kouang king (K), fang kouang (H).

- , - , p'i fo lio (K), - .

11. adbhutadharma, rmaḍ du byuñ baḥi chos, wei ts 'ewng yeou king (K), hi fa (H).

12. upadeśa, gtan la dbab par bstan pa, louen yi (K), louen yi (H).

- , - , yeou po t'i chō (K), - .

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 31, l. 4-8; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 100, l. 8-14). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes to hear, recite, conserve and retain the twelve-membered speech of the Buddha, preached in the ten directions by the Buddhas, namely: 1) sūtra, 2) geya, 3) vyākaraṇa, 4) gāthā, 5) udāna, 6) nidāna, 7) avadāna, 8) ityuktaka, 9) jātaḥ, 10) vaipulya, 11) adbhutadharma, 12) upadeśa; whether or not this speech has been heard by the śrāvakas (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra yat kiṃcid daśasu dikṣu buddhair bhagadbhīr bhāṣitaṃ dvādaśāṅgaṃ buddhavacanāṃ yadidaṃ sūtraṃ geyāṃ vyākaraṇaṃ gāthā udānaṃ nidānaṃ avadānaṃ ityuktakaṃ jātaṃ vaipulyaṃ adbhūtadharmaṃ upadeśaḥ, yac ca śrāvakaiḥ śrutaṃ vā na śrutaṃ vā tat sarvaṃ śrotukāmena vācayitukāmenodgrahāṇitukāmena dhārayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. -

Above (p. 2272F) the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra spoke of the bodhisattva “wanting to hear the teachings given in the ten directions by the Buddhas and, to this end, practicing the perfection of <2287> wisdom”. Here it is a matter of these teachings, the ‘twelve-membered speech of the Buddha’ (dvādaśāṅgaṃ buddhavacanam).¹⁹⁸

I. SŪTRA

Among these texts, those that correctly (sūcanatas) express the meaning are called sūtra.¹⁹⁹ These are:

i) the four Āgamas, ii) the Mahāyānasūtras, iii) the 250 rules (śikṣāpada).²⁰⁰

¹⁹⁸ Buddhavacana, or also sāsana, buddhasāsanaṃ, atthasāsana, jināsāsana, dharmapravacana or simply pravacanāni.

¹⁹⁹ Cf. Mahāyāna Sūtrālamkāra, p. 54: āśrayato lakṣaṇato dharmād arthāc ca sūcanāt sūtram. – Sūtra is thus called because it gives information on place, nature, doctrine and meaning.

²⁰⁰ Cf. later, k. 100, p. 756b22-c1: “The words coming from the mouth of the Buddha and reproduced in writing are of two groups: the Tripiṭaka which is the doctrine of the śrāvakas, and the Mahāyānasūtras which are the doctrine of the

And, apart from the Tripiṭaka, there are also texts that are called sūtras.

II. GEYA

The kie ‘verses’ found in the sūtras are called geya ‘songs’.

III. VYĀKARAṆA²⁰¹

The predictions relating to the nine paths (navamārga) of beings, i.e., (1-3) the paths of the three Vehicles (trīyānamārga) and (4-9) the paths of the six destinies (ṣaḍgatimārga) are called vyākaraṇa. <22888>

1) [The Buddha predicts] that a certain man, after so many incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa), will become Buddha, or he predicts that after so many years (varṣa, saṃvatsara), he will become Buddha.

2) He predicts that a śrāvaka in the present lifetime (iḥaloka) or in the future lifetime (paraloka) will obtain bodhi.

3) He predicts that a pratyekabuddha, in the future lifetime only, will obtain bodhi.

Greater Vehicle. When the Buddha was in this world, the name Tripiṭaka did not exist; there were only bhikṣus who were specialists in the sūtras (sūtradhara), specialists in the discipline (vinayadhara) or specialists in catechesis (mātrkādhara). ‘Sūtra’ is the name of the sacred texts found in the four Āgamas (āgamacatuṣṭaya) and the name of the sacred texts found in the Mahāyāna. The sūtras are of two groups: the sūtras contained in the four Āgamas and the Mahāyānsūtras called Great Sūtras. To penetrate into these two groups is to penetrate into the Greater and Lesser Vehicles also. The 250 precepts (śikṣāpada) and similar texts are called ‘sūtra’.”

- The Traité recognizes as canonical and calls ‘sūtra’ the texts contained in the four Āgamas or the Āgamacatuṣṭaya of which the Sarvāstivādin sources speak (cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 17, l. 22; 333, l. 8), the Mahāyānasūtras rejected by the Hīnyāna sects and some disciplinary texts such as ‘the 250 precepts’ making up the first three song of the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya (T 1435): cf. above, p. 104F, n. 2. Buddhaghosa will likewise place the Suttavibhaṅga of the Vinayapiṭaka among the suttas.

²⁰¹ Vyākaraṇa can designate a catechesis by means of questions and answers, an explanation or a prediction. The Traité here holds only this latter meaning. When the Buddha is about to give a prediction, he smiles and multicolored rays are emitted from his upper and lower canine teeth which light up the beings of the three unfortunate destinies and the two happy destinies, proclaiming the three seals of the Dharma and making conversions. Thus doing the work of the Buddha, the rays return to the Buddha and, according to whether they have announced such and such an attaining of Bodhi, they re-enter the Buddha by such and such a part of his body. Witnessing these miracles, Ānanda asks the Buddha about their meaning and the Teacher gives him their explanation.

The predictions that the Buddha was led to give were numerous. They always unfolded according to the rituals that have just been summarized. In order to describe them, the texts, particularly those of the Sarvāstivādins, always use the same stock phrase: cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 67, l. 16-69; 138, l. 1-140, l. 7; 265, l. 16-267, l. 7; Saṃghabhedha, II, p. 161, l. 21-163, l. 20; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 4, l. 5-7, l. 6; 10, l. 5-12, l. 20; 19, l. 1-22, l. 5, etc. – This stock phrase has already been given above, p. 460F, n. 2.

4-9) He predicts that the beings belonging to one of the six other destinies [naraka, tiryāṇic, preta, manuṣya, deva, asura], in the future lifetime equally, will obtain their retribution (vipāka).

[The prediction takes place in the following manner]: [307a]

1) For the Buddha, it is the rule that, at the moment when he is going to give the prediction (vyākaraṇa) to a being, he first smiles (pūrvam smitaṃ prāviṣkaroti), then immense rays (arcis) shoot forth from his four canine teeth (daṃṣṭra): blue (nīla), yellow (pīta), red (lohita), white (avadāta), bright red (māñjiṣṭha), etc. rays.

2) The rays that stream forth from his two upper canine teeth illumine the three bad destinies (durgati) – [naraka, tiryāṇic and preta] – and, from these rays immense preachings (dharmadeśana) spread out proclaiming: “All formations are impermanent, all dharma are without self, peaceful is nirvāṇa” (sarvasaṃskārā anityaḥ, sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam). The beings who encounter these rays and hear this preaching find happiness of body and mind (kāyacittasukha), will be reborn among humans (manuṣya) and gods (deva) and, as a result, will come to the end of suffering (duḥkhasyānta).

3) The rays that stream forth from his two lower canines go upwards (upariṣṭād gacchanti) to illuminate humans (manuṣya) and gods <2289> (deva) up to the absorption of the summit of existence (bhavāgrasamāpatti):

a. The deaf (badhira), the blind (andha) and the mute (mūkha), the mentally disturbed (unmatta) and the sick (rogasprṣṭa) are cured.

b. The six [classes] of gods of the desire realm (śaṭkāmadeva), humans (manuṣya), asuras, enjoying all the happiness of the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), as soon as they come in contact with the Buddha’s rays and perceive the sounds (śabda) of the preaching of the Dharma (dharmadeśana), are seized by horror (vidūṣana) in regard to the sense pleasures and find happiness of body and mind (kāyacittasukha).

c. As for the gods of the form realm (rūpadhātudeva), the ones who are enjoying the happiness of the dhyānas (dhyānasukha), as soon as they come in contact with the Buddha’s rays and perceive the sounds of the preaching of the Dharma, they are seized with disgust [for the taste of the dhyānas] (dhyānāsvādana) and go to the Buddha.

4) This goes on while the rays have gone to the ten directions and have illuminated the six destinies (ṣaḍgati) everywhere. Having thus done the work of the Buddha (buddhakārya), they return to the Buddha, make seven circuits around his body and [are reabsorbed into him].

a. If the Buddha predicts a birth among the damned (narakapapatti), the rays re-enter him by the soles of his feet (pādātale ’ntardhīyante).

b. If the Buddha predicts a birth among the animals (tiryagupapatti), the rays re-enter through his heel (pārṣṇyām antardhīyante).

c. If the Buddha predicts a birth among the pretas (pretopatti), the rays re-enter through his big toe (pādāṅguṣṭhe ’ntardhīyante).

d. If the Buddha predicts a birth among humans (manuṣyopapatti), the rays re-enter by his navel (nābhyām antardhīyante).

e. If the Buddha predicts a birth among the gods (devopatti), the rays re-enter by his chest (urasy antardhīyante).

f. If the Buddha announces [the bodhi] of the śrāvakas the rays re-enter by his mouth (āsyē ’ntardhīyante).

g. If the Buddha announces [the bodhi] of the pratyekabuddhas, the rays re-enter by the [tuft of white hairs] between his eyebrows (ūrṇāyām antardhīyante).

h. If the Buddha announces [the sambodhi] of the Buddhas, the rays re-enter by his cranial protuberance (uṣṇīṣe ’ntardhīyante).

5) When the Buddha makes a prediction (vyākaraṇa), he first manifests these signs, then his disciples, Ānanda, etc., question him as to their meaning. <2290>

IV. GĀTHĀ

All the kīe ‘verses’, if they are composed of six, three or five metric feet (pada) or an undetermined number of metric feet, are called k’i-ye ‘geya’ and also k’ie-to, ‘gathā, stanza’.the

V. UDĀNA²⁰²

²⁰² In general, any literary composition where, under the influence of joy or sadness, an ‘exclamation’ is uttered, most often in the form of gāthā, can be called udāna. Here the Traité is going to use as example a sutta from the Saṃyutta (III, p. 55-58) entitled precisely Udāna; but the examples may be infinitely multiplied, as the expression udānam udānayaṭi ‘to utter and exclaim’ is often met in the canonical texts. The exclamation is not always made by the Buddha: it may also be uttered by the deities or by the disciples.

But udāna can also designate a given Buddhist work: for example, a collection of verses compiled after the Buddha’s parinirvāṇa dealing with the grand subjects of the religion. This collection had been divided into chapters (varga), the first dealing with impermanence (anitya) and the last with the brāhmaṇa. This brief description can be applied only to the Udāna of Eastern Turkestan, one of the minor texts classified by the Sarvāstivādins into the special collection of the Kṣudrakāgama or Kṣudrakapiṭaka (cf. Mūlasarv. Vin., Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part 4, p. 188, l. 8; T 1448, k. 3, p. 11b6; Divyāvadāna, p. 20, l. 23; 34, l. 29; Saṃyuktāgama, T 99, k. 49, p. 362c10. This Udāna of the North, according to F. Bernhard’s edition (1965), consisted of 33 chapters, the first of which is entitled Anityavarga and the last, Brāhmanavarga. In the west, this work has long been designated under the title of Udānavarga, but F. Bernhard has shown that udānavarga is a common name meaning ‘the vargas (chapters) of the Udāna’, and that the work was really called Udāna (Zum Titel des sogenannten Udānavarga, Sonderdruck der ZDMG, Supplementa I, 1969, p. 872-881). With the Dharmapada which is similar to it, the Udāna was the object of a Tibetan translation (Otani Kanjur Catalogue, no. 992) and four Chinese versions or adaptations (T210 to 213); see L. Schmithausen, Zu den Rezensionen des Udānavargaḥ, Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde Sudasiens, XIV (1970), p. 47-124; C. Willemen, The Chinese Udānavarga, 1978, p. XIII-XXVIII.

1) The yeou-t'o-na (udāna) ‘exclamations’ are called yeou-fa.²⁰³ When the Buddha needed to speak and nobody <2291> was questioning him, he elicited a question by a short exclamation.

[Udānasūtra]²⁰⁴. – Thus the Buddha was at Śrāvastī, at the Viśākhāprāsāda, and was walking in the shade. [Suddenly] he uttered this exclamation (udānaṃ udānayaṭi sma): “That there is no ‘me’ (ātman), that there is no ‘mine’ (ātmīya), how wonderful (sādhū)!”

Then a certain bhikṣu, joining his palms together (añjakim praṇāmya), said to the Buddha: “Bhagavat, that there is no me, that there is no mine, why is that a good thing?” <2292>

The Traité is going to talk about the yao-kie ‘summary verses’ of this Udāna. But the work contains only rare summary-stanzas, in Sanskrit uddāna (ed. Bernhard, p.184, 277, 510). As a result of homophony, confusion between udāna and uddāna was inevitable, but udāna comes from the root ud-an ‘to expire upwards’ whereas uddāna is derived from the root ud-dā (dayati) ‘to join, to condense’.

²⁰³ Here yeou-fa probably renders the typical exclamation aho dharmam “Ah! The Dharma!” which appears several times in the Mahāvastu, I, p. 236, l. 18; 237, l. 3; 241, l. 12; II, p. 143, l. 18; 406, l. 11: aho dharmam utīrayasuh. The expression already appeared in the fourth Rock Edict of Aśoka (ed. J. Bloch, Inscriptions d’Aśoka, p. 98): bherīghoso aho dhammaghoso, which is to be translated not as “the sound of the drums has become (aho, imperfect of hoti) the announcement of the Dharma”, but as “the sound of the drums and the cheering of “Ah! the Dharma!” according to the interpretation of L. de La Vallée Poussin, L’Inde aux temps des mauryas, 1930, p. 110).

Gods and humans often utter the exclamation “O happiness!” (udānaṃ udānenti ‘Aho sukhan ti”); cf. Dīgha, III, p. 218; l. 23-24; Anguttara, III, p. 202, l. 13; Pāli Udāna, p. 18, l. 22-23.

²⁰⁴ Udānasutta in Saṃyutta, III, p. 55-58; Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 64, k. 3, p. 16c4-17a20, of which the following is an extract:

Sāvattihīyāṃ.

Tatra kho bhagavā udānaṃ udānesi:

No c’assaṃ na me siyā / na bhavassati na me bhaṭṭasatī ti / evaṃ adhimuccamāno bhikkhu /

chindeyy’ orambhāgiyāni saṃyojanāni ti //’

The general idea of the sūtra is that by destroying the twenty-peaked mountain of satkāyadrṣṭi (considering rūpa as identical with the ātman, etc.), the ascetic escapes from the fear (trāsa) which the doctrine of non-self inspires in the non-initiated, and destroys the five ‘lower’ fetters (avarabhāgīya) binding him to the lower realm, i.e., to kāmādihātu.

The stanza No c’assaṃ, etc., cited here according to the Commentary of the Saṃyutta, II, p. 275, is obscure. Buddhaghosa explains it as: Sace ahaṃ na bhaveyyaṃ mama parikkhāro pi na bhaveyya. Sace vā pana me atīte kammābhisankhāro nābhaviṣsa, idaṃ me etarahi khandhapañcakaṃ na bhaveyya. – If I myself were not, the unessential would not be in me either. Or rather: If, in the past, there had not been a karmic process on my part, the group of the five aggregates would not exist for me today.

In his Chinese version of the Saṃyukta (T 99, k. 3, p. 16c8-10), Gunaprabha renders the stanza as follows: If there is no ‘me’ (ātman), neither is there any ‘mine’ (ātmīya); if there truly is no ‘me’, where would the ‘mine’ come from? The bhikṣu who accepts that destroys the lower fetters (avarabhāgīya saṃyojana).

The Buddha answered the bhikṣu: “The worldly person (prthagjana) who has not obtained the bodhi without impurities (anāsrava bodhi) and whose mind is covered with doubts (viparyāsa), feels great fear (trāsa) in regard to non-self (anātman) and ‘non-mine’ (anātmīya). But if the Buddha or a disciple of the Buddha teaches him the holy Dharma (saddharma), then he rejoices and obeys because, no longer having fear, there is no problem.”

- This sūtra is told in full in the Saṃyuktāgama.

2) Furthermore, as is said in the Prajñāpāramitāparivarta,²⁰⁵ the devaputras applauded Subhūti on one occasion, exclaiming: “Good! Very good! Very rare is the Blessed One; exceptionally rare is the appearance of the Blessed One!” – That [307b] also is called udāna.

3) Furthermore, after the parinirvāṇa of the Buddha, his disciples gathered and copied yao-kie ‘summary verses’ (uddāna?); verses about impermanence made up the chapter on impermanence (anityavarga) and so on up to the verses on the brāhmaṇa which made up the chapter on the brāhmaṇa (brāhmaṇavarga). – That also is called udāna.²⁰⁶

4) The collections of wonderful things are also called udāna.

Texts of this kind show the characteristics of the udānas.

VI. NIDĀNA²⁰⁷

1) The nidānas set out the circumstances (nidāna) that are at the origin of the Buddha’s teachings. Under what circumstances did the Buddha say a certain thing? In the sūtras, it is because a man asked him that he said a certain thing; in the Vinaya, it is because a man <2293> committed a certain wrong-dong (adhyācāra) that he promulgated a certain rule (śikṣāpada).

2) The facts of dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda) set forth by the Buddha are also called nidāna.

²⁰⁵ Later (k. 40, p. 353b18; k. 53, p. 441b2), mention will be made of this Prajñāpāramitā-parivarta although this title does not appear in the table of contents of T 223. The Traité is referring here to a passage from the Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 14, p. 325b, chap. XLIX entitled Wen-siang-p’in. The same passage occurs in the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. Wogihara, p. 560: Atha khalu Śākradevendrapramukhāḥ kāmāvacarā rūpāvacarāś ca devaputrā brahmacāyikānāṃ ca viṃśatidevaputrasahasāṇi yena Bhagavāṃs tenopasaṃkramya Bhagavataḥ pādau śirasābhivandyaikānte tasthuh / ekāntasthitāś ca te kāmāvacarā rūpāvacarāś ca devaputrā Bhagavantam etad avocan / gambhīrā Bhagavan dharmāḥ prakāśyante kathaṃ Bhagavann atra lakṣaṇāni sthāpyante.

²⁰⁶ For the author of the Traité, the group called ‘udāna’ is represented by the Sanskrit Udāna of Eastern Turkestan consisting of 3 Vargas, the first of which deals with anitya and the last with the brāhmaṇa. For Buddhaghosa (Commentary on the Vinaya, I, p. 28,) it is represented by the 82 suttantas of the Pāli Udāna.

²⁰⁷ Here nidāna is taken with two different meanings: i) the circumstances of time, place and people in which a sūtra was preached or a rule (śikṣāpada) was promulgated; ii) the series of the twelve conditions determining the dependent origination of phenomena.

VII. AVADĀNA

The avadānas ‘stories’ are amusing little tales (mṛdukathā) such as there are among people in the world. For example:

In the Madhyāgama: the Tch’ang a-po-t’o-na (Dīrghāvadāna);²⁰⁸

In the Dīrghāgama: the Ta a-po-t’o-na (Mahāvadāna);²⁰⁹

In the Vinaya: the Yi-eul a-po-t’o na (Koṭikarṇāvadāna)²¹⁰ and the Eul-che-yi a-po-t’o-na (Koṭivimśāvadāna);²¹¹

In the two hundred and fifty rules (śikṣāpada): the Yu a-po-t’o-na (Chandāvadāna) in one book and the P’ou-sa a-po-t’o-na (Bodhisattvāvadāna) in one book.²¹²

There are innumerable avadānas of this kind.

VIII. ITYUKTAKA²¹³

The sūtras called Jou-che-yu (Ityuktaka) ‘thus has it been said’ are of two kinds: <2294>

1) The first kind are those sūtras having as their concluding phrase (*kie-kiu*²¹⁴): “What I first promised to say has been said”.²¹⁵

²⁰⁸ Dīrghāyūrājāvadāna of the Madhyamāgama, no. 72, T 26, k. 17, p. 532c539b; Upakkilesasutta of the Majjhimanikāya, no. 128, III, p. 152-162.

²⁰⁹ Mahāvadāna (ed. E. Waldschmidt, 19523) of the Dīrghāgama, vol. 1, T 1, k. 1, p. 1b-10c; Mahāpadānasuttanta of the Dīghanikāya, no. 14, II, p. 1-54.

²¹⁰ For the Koṭikarṇāvadāna, see references mentioned above, p. 546F, n. 3 and the study by E. Waldschmidt, Zur Śroṇakoṭikarṇa-Legende, in Von Ceylan bis Turfan, p. 203-225.

²¹¹ For Śroṇa Koṭivimśa already mentioned several times (p. 1387F, 1681F, 1894F) see references to the Vinayas, p. 1389F, n. The original Sanskrit of the avādāna in the Mūlasarv. Vin. is in Saṃghabheda, II, p. 1340147, corresponding to T 1450, k. 16, p. 184b26; k. 17, p. 187b15. See also E. Waldschmidt, Ein Beitrag zur Überlieferung vom Sthavira Śroṇa Koṭivimśa, Mélanges d’indianisme à mémoire de Louis Renou, 1968, p. 773-787; A contribution to our knowledge of Sthavira Śroṇa Koṭivimśa, in S. K. De Memorial Volume, 1972, p. 107-116.

²¹² For the avadānas of Chanda and the bodhisattva, see A. Hirakawa, Ritzuzō no kenkyū, 1960, p. 389-394 and 398-402. These two individuals appear in the Vibhaṅgas of various Vinayas, but it does not seem that special sections (pou) were devoted to them.

²¹³ The ityuktaka ‘thus has it been said’ and the itivṛttaka ‘thus has it happened’ correspond to the Pāli itivittaka. The Traité distinguishes the two forms, and Kumārajīva, in the Chinese version, translates the first as jou-che-yu-king and transliterates the second as yi-mou (var. tchou)-to kia, abbreviated as mou-to-kia. There are other ways of transliterating itivṛttaka (cf. Mochizuki, Bukkyo daijiten, I, p. 166) the best seems to have been yi-ti-yue-to-kia (cf. T 374, k. 3, p. 383c7; T 397, k. 11, p. 69c27-28).

²¹⁴ In terms of this definition, the ityuktaka strictly speaking would be a sūtra where this concluding phrase appears, or also a collection of such sūtras as, for example, the Ityuktakasūtra translated into Chinese by Hui-an-tsang under the title

2) The second kind is that of the sūtras called Yi-mou (variant tchou)-to kia, i.e., itivṛttaka ‘thus did it happen’, a type of sūtra also existing outside of (or extracted from) the Tripiṭaka and the Mahāyānasūtras. Some people call them Mou-to-kia, i.e., ṛttaka ‘event’; this name, ṛttaka, is that of texts extracted from the Tripiṭaka and the Mahāyānasūtras.²¹⁶ And what is it then? It is what the Buddha said. <2295> of Pen-che king (T 765). Nevertheless, the phrase of conclusion mentioned in the Traité is not the rule: on the other hand, all the sūtras occurring in this collection begin with the phrase “I myself have heard this ityuktaka from the Bhagavat.”

Also, in his commentary on the Vinaya, I, p. 28, Buddhaghosa calls itivuttaka the 112 suttas which begin with the formula: “This has been spoken by the Blessed One, has been spoken by the Saint: thus have I heard” (vuttam hetam Bhagavatā vuttam arahatā ti me sutam). The 112 suttas in question constitute the collection of itivuttakas making up the fourth place in the fifth Pāli Nikāya.

²¹⁵ In terms of this definition, the ityuktaka proper would be a sūtra in which this concluding phrase appears, or else a collection of such sūtras as, e.g., the Ityuktakasūtra translated into Chinese by Hui-an-tsang under the name of Pen-che king (T 765). Nevertheless, the phrase of conclusion mentioned in the Traité is not a rule; on the other hand, all the sūtras occurring in this collection begin with the phrase: “I myself have heard this ityuktaka from the Bhagavat”.

Also, in his Commentary on the Vinaya, I, p. 28, Buddhaghosa calls itivuttaka the 112 suttas that begin with the formula: ‘This was spoken by the Blessed One, spoken by the Saint: this is how it was heard by me’ (vuttam hetam Bhagavatā vuttam arahatā ti me sutam). The 112 suttas in question make up the collection of the itivuttaka occupying the fourth place in the fifth Pāli Nikāya.

²¹⁶ Itivṛttaka is, in the etymological sense of the word, the story of an event, but it would be nice to know how it differs from an avadāna or a jātaka. According to Asaṅga, the itivṛttaka relates the earlier existences of the noble disciples whereas the jātakas tell the earlier existences of the Bodhisattva (Abhidharmasamuccaya, transl. Rahula, p. 132). Saṃghabhadra, in his Nyāyānūsāra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 595a, gives another explanation which E. Mayeda, in a study entitled Original Meaning of irivuttaka as an aṅga of navaṅgabuddhasŌana, summarizes thus: “I have defined itivṛttaka as a ‘kind of story in the previous world that begins in the previous world and ends in the previous world’ on the ground of the explanation of Chinese A-p’i-ta-mo-chouen-tcheng-li-louen (vol. 44). In the same commentary jātaka is defined as ‘a kind of story that begins in the present world and ends in the previous world’. Owing to this explanation, we can easily distinguish itivṛttaka from jātaka... Jātaka was one kind of itivṛttaka originally. It is remarkable that we cannot find the word ‘itivṛttaka’ (or ‘itivuttaka’ with the meaning of itivṛttaka) in the Early Buddhist texts in general except in the case of navaṅgabuddhasāsana. From this reason I can suppose with certainty that the story in the previous world was avadāna.”

Neither the Mahāvibhāṣā nor the Traité entered into these distinctions. In the present passage, the Traité is content to give an example of itivṛttaka. The sacred literature abounds in sentences and stanzas attributed to the Buddha or his disciples. Often one hesitates over the meaning to give them, for one does not know the circumstances in which they were pronounced or the reasons that provoked them. The itivṛttaka takes on the responsibility of giving them a context: if the Buddha expressed himself ‘thus’, it is because the circumstances occurred ‘thus’. These events were not invented: they can be found ‘in the Tripiṭaka and the Mahāyānasūtras’. But the choice is rather difficult and it happens that the event that is told in prose gives only an inadequate and forced explanation of the stanza. The fact remains that it is ‘extracted’ from the Tripiṭaka and in that capacity it is a speech of the Buddha.

[Example of itivṛttaka]

When king Tsing-fan (Śuddhodana) forced [some of his subjects] to go forth from home (pravraj-) and become disciples of the Buddha,²¹⁷ the latter chose five hundred of them capable of fulfilling this function and of attaining bodhi and led them to Śrāvastī. Why? These young men had not yet renounced desire (avītarāga) and, if they had remained near their relatives and their village, it was to be feared that they would violate the precepts (śīla). This is why the Buddha took them to Śrāvastī and told Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana to discipline them. During the first and last watches (yāma) of the night, these people endeavored not to sleep and, thanks to their diligence and exertion (vīrya), they attained bodhi.

When they had attained bodhi, the Buddha took them back to their native country. It is a rule among all the Buddhas to return to their native land;²¹⁸ then the Buddha, accompanied by a great crowd of devas, went to Kapilavastu, in the Hermit's Forest (Rṣivana) which is located five hundred li from, Kapilavastu: it is the pleasure garden (ārāma) of the Śākya.

The Śākya bhikṣus who, from their stay in Śrāvastī, tried not to sleep during the first and third watches of the night, found the night long and now, coming out of the Hermit's Forest in order to go to the city to beg alms, they took into account the distances they had to travel. At the moment when the Buddha read their minds, a lion (siṃha) came to bow at the feet of the Buddha and sat down at one side.²¹⁹ For these three reasons, the Buddha spoke the following stanza: <2296>

For the person who stays awake, the night is long; [307e]

For the person who is tired, the league is long;

For the fool who misunderstands saṃvāsa

The Holy Dharma is long.²²⁰

The stanza which the itivṛttaka gives here as an example is taken from the Udānavarga (I, v. 19) corresponding to the Dhammapada (v. 60). The Commentary of the Dhammapada (II, p. 1-12) suggests quite another explanation (cf. E. W. Burlingame, Buddhist Legends, part 2, p. 100-108).

²¹⁷ On the forced ordination of 500 young Śākya men, see above, p. 176-177f n., and p. 869F, n. 1. See also Saṃgahabhedā, I, p. 203-204.

²¹⁸ The Buddha's return to Kapilavastu, his native city, is told in detail in the Mahāvastu, III, p. 101-117; the Saṃgahavastu, I, p. 187 seq.; the Nidānakathā, p. 87 seq. It is represented at Sānchī (Marshall and Foucher, Monuments of Sānchī, I, p. 204-205, pl. 50a1) and on the bas-reliefs of Gandhāra (Foucher, AgbG, I, p. 459-464).

²¹⁹ This was a brāhmaṇa who, at the time of the Buddha Vipāśyin, had wickedly (cittapradūṣanena) insulted the Community. This insult was an action ending up in animal rebirths (tiryagyonyupattisaṃvartanīya). For five hundred lifetimes, the brāhmaṇa was reborn among the lions (siṃhesūpapanna).

²²⁰ Udānavarga, I, v. 19 (ed. F Bernhard, p. 102) cited in the Mahākarmavibhīṅga (ed. S. Lévi, p. 46):

dīrghā jāgarat rātrir dīrghaṃ śrāntasya yojanaṃ / dīrgho bālasya saṃsāraḥ saddhram avijānataḥ //

Dhammapada, v. 60. at the Bālavagga:

dīghā jāgarato ratti dīghaṃ santassa yojanaṃ /

The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: Before you went forth from the world (pravrajya), your mind was lazy (pramatta) and you slept a lot; this is why you did not perceive the length of the night. Now that you are vigorously seeking bodhi, during the first and third watches of the night, you are reducing your sleep; this is why you find the night very long. – Previously, it was in a chariot that you rode in the forests of Kapilavastu and you did not notice the distances. Now that you are in monks' robes (cīvara) with begging-bowl (pātra) in hand, your fatigue (śrama) is extreme and you take into account the length of the path. – Finally, this lion here, at the time of the buddha Vipāśyin, was a brāhmaṇa teacher. Having heard that the Buddha was preaching the Dharma, he went to the Buddha, but at that moment the great assembly who were listening to the Dharma were silent. At once the brāhmaṇa had a wicked thought (praduṣacitta) and uttered this harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda): “How are these shaven-headed people (muṇḍaka) different from animals? They are nothing but idiots (devānāṃpriya)”²²¹ who don't know how to talk.” As a result of this harmful action of speech (pāruṣyavāda), for ninety-one kalpas, from the buddha Vipāśyin until now, this brāhmaṇa has always fallen into animal rebirths (tiryagyonyiupatti); but at this very moment he obtains bodhi. By his foolishness, he has gone through a very long saṃsāra; however, today in the presence of the Buddha, his mind has been purified and he will obtain deliverance (vimukti). – Sūtras of this kind are called ‘extracts and reasons’. From where <2297> are they extracted? They are called extracts because they are taken from the Tripiṭaka and the Mahāyāna sūtras. Why are they called ‘reasons’? Because the three events that they tell about serve as justification.

IX. JĀTAKA

Stories of previous lives:

[The lion, the monkey and the vulture]²²² dīrgho bālānaṃ saṃsāro saddhammaṃ avijānataṃ //

²²¹ Hao-jen, ‘honest man’ is taken here in the pejorative sense of ‘imbecile’ or ‘idiot’. Shifts of analogous meaning are attested in many unrelated languages. On this subject, see M. Hara, A note on the Sanskrit Phrase Devānāṃ priya, Katre Felicitation Volume, part II, p.13-26, Indian Linguistics, Vol. 30 (1969).

²²² A longer version of this jātaka occurs in the Sāgaramatibodhisattvasūtra, translated into Chinese at Kou-tsang between 414 and 421 by the Indian Dharmakṣema, and later, in 594, incorporated into the Collection of the Mahāsaṃnipāta of which it makes up the fifth section: T 594, k. 11, p. 70a23-b18:

Long ago, there was a lion-king (siṃharāja) living in a deep mountain cave. He always had the thought: “Among all the animals I am the king; I am able to watch over and protect all the animals.” Then, on that mountain, a pair of monkeys (kapi, markata) bore two babies. One day the monkeys said to the lion-king: “O king who protects all the animals, today we entrust to you our two little ones; we would like to go to look for food and drink.” The lion-king promised to help them, and the monkeys, leaving their two little ones with the king of the animals, went away.

At that time, there was, on the mountain, a vulture-king (grdhṛāja) called Li-kien ‘Keen Sight’ (Tikṣnadarśana?). While the lion-king was sleeping, he took away the two little monkeys and went to perch on a cliff. Having awakened, the lion-king addressed the following stanza to the vulture-king:

Here I send a prayer to the great vulture-king.

Once (bhūtapūrvam) the Bodhisattva was a lion (siṃha) living in the forest. He was joined in friendship with a monkey (kapi, markaṭa). The monkey <2298> entrusted his two little ones to the lion. Then there came along a famished vulture (grdhra) in search of food. Finding the lion asleep, he stole the two little monkeys and went to perch at the top of a tree. When the lion awoke, he searched for the babies and did not find them. Seeing the vulture at the top of the tree, he said: “The monkey had entrusted his two babies to me, but while I was watching them, I was not careful; this is how you took them away and now you have

My only wish is that he magnanimously grant my prayer:
May he very kindly release these little ones.
May I not be ashamed at having failed in my promise.

The vulture-king replied to the lion-king with this stanza:

By flying, I can pass through space.
Already I have passed through your realm and I am not afraid.
If you truly must protect these two little ones,
You must give up your body to me.

The lion-king said:

Now, in order to protect these two little ones
I give up my body unsparingly like some rotten grass.
If I break my word in order to save my life,
How could it be said that I am faithful to my promise?

Having spoken this stanza, the lion climbed up with the intention of jumping off the cliff. At once the vulture-king answered with this stanza:

The man who sacrifices his life for another
Will attain the supreme happiness (anuttarasukha).
Now I give you back the two baby monkeys.
May the king of the Dharma not do any harm.

[Then the Buddha said to the bodhisattva Sāgaramati]: O son of noble family, the lion at that time was me; the male monkey was Kāśyapa; the female monkey was the bhikṣuṇī Bhadrāpālā; the two baby monkeys were Ānanda and Rāhula; the vulture-king was Śāriputra].

- A summary of this jātaka with the title ‘The lion-king willing to give his life for the monkeys’ appears in the King-liu yi-siang (T 2121, k. 47, p. 244b16-c9), a collection of texts taken from the Chinese Buddhist canon, compiled in 516 at Nankin by Pao-tch’ang.

A developed version of the same jātaka also occurs in a new translation of the Sāgaramatipariprcchā, T 400, k. 16, p. 515a23-b19, made at the end of the 10th century.

The story is well known in central Asia. The Khotanese Jātakastava (ed. M. J. Dresden, 1955, no. 32, p. 436) dedicates a note to it: The vulture with sharp beak seized the young ones, two young monkeys whom the monkey had left in your charge for a refuge. Your mind was most greatly agitated in your compassion. – You tore the delicate skin on your limbs. Great drops of blood, many and thick, a sacrifice, you gave away for them, as a propitiatory ransom, so that then he gave them back to you.

Representations on the painted walls: cf. E. Waldschmidt, Über die Darstellungen und den Stil des Wandgemälde aus Qyzil bei Kutch I, in A. von Le Coq, Buddhistische Spätantike in Mittelasien, VI, 1928, p. 51, fig. 154-157.

them. I have broken my promise and I invite you to make an agreement. I am king of the animals (paśu) and you are king of the birds (pakṣin); our dignities being equal, an exchange can be made.” – The vulture answered: “You do not appreciate the circumstances: today I am hungry and weary; why discuss our similarities and our differences?” – Judging that it was impossible for him to gain satisfaction, with his own claws (tikṣṇanakhā) the lion tore off the flesh of his sides (pārśvamāṃsa) and traded it for the baby monkeys.

[The red fish]²²³

²²³ The mention of the yellow sickness and the red fish allows us to recognize the avadāna of king Padmaka, told in many sources:

1) Avadānaśataka, I, p. 168-172, no. 31: Padmaka (transl. Feer, p. 114-116). – Suan tsi po yuan king, T 200, k. 4, p. 217a1-c4: no. 31: King Lien-houa (Padmaka) gave up his body and became the red fish.

In olden times, the Bodhisattva was Padmaka, king of Benares. An autumnal epidemic, the yellow sickness (pāṇḍuroga), broke out in the city. The king himself began to take care of his subjects, but all remedies were in vain. The doctors advised him to capture the fish called Rohita to cure the sickness but no one succeeded in capturing it. Faced with the distress of his subjects, the king sacrificed his life for them by wishing to appear as the great Rohita fish in the Vālūkā river of Benares. He dropped on the terrace of his palace, immediately died and appeared in the river as the great fish “like unto ambrosia (amṛta)”. The inhabitants of the city ran up with their knives to cut up the still living fish. For twelve years he filled beings with his own flesh and blood, never letting his mind stray from supreme bodhi. When the disease died out, the Rohita fish raised his voice and said: “I am king Padmaka; for you I have sacrificed my own life and have taken on this new form of existence. When I attain supreme perfect bodhi, I will liberate you from the ultimate sickness (atyantavyādhi) – i.e., saṃsāra – and establish you in nirvāṇa.”

2) Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā, 99th pllava: Padmakāvdāna, ed. Dass, II, p. 926-929, ed. Vaidya, II, p. 544:
abhavaṃ padmakāmhyo 'haṃ vārāṇasyāṃ nṛpaḥ purā / sarvārthiharaṇāsaktaḥ prajānāṃ janakopamaḥ // 4 // tenārtipraṇidānena vārāyāḥ sarito 'mbhasi / kṣaṇenaivāham abhavaṃ sumahān rohitas timiḥ // 10 //

3) P’ou sa pen hing king, T 155, k. 3, p. 119b18-29:

During an epidemic, the king Po-mi (Padmaka?) uprooted and burned the leaves of a tree that caused the sickness, then he threw himself into the water, changed into a fish and invited his subjects to eat him. All the sick people who ate his flesh were cured.

4) Khotanese Jātakastava, ed. and transl. by Dresden, p. 439, 39th story:

As King Padmaka, you saw the people in distress, ill with hunger, without refuge, troubled. A red fish you became like a mountain of flesh. The people ate you; they became quite well.

*

In yet other circumstances, the Bodhisattva changed into a great fish to save living beings, but it is not a question either of Padmaka or Rohita.

5) Rāṣṭrapālāpariprcchā, ed. Finot, p. 26, l. 7-8; Transl. Ensink, p. 26:
bodhicariṃ caramāṇahu pūrvam matsya babhūva yadā jalacāri /

Once in time gone by (bhūtapūrvam atīte 'dhvani), the entire population was stricken with a disease that turned them yellow and <2300> pallid (pitapāṇḍukaroga). The Bodhisattva then changed into the red fish (rohitamatsva), gave his own flesh (svaka māmsa) to the sick people and saved them from this disease.

[The bird that broke a net]²²⁴

tyakta mayāśraya satvahitāya

bhākṣita prāṇisahasraśatebhiḥ //

6) Lieou tou tsi king, T 152, k. 1, p. 1c26-2b7 (transl. Chavannes, Contes, p. 11-14), Story no. 3:

Daridrajātaka:

Once the Bodhisattva was a poor man who, in order to prevent the fish from devouring one another, threw himself into the sea and offered himself to the big fish. He was reborn as king of the sturgeons; his body measured several lis. Finding at the seashore a kingdom that was suffering from drought, he climbed out onto the shore. The people of the land began to devour him to maintain their lives. Although they ate his flesh for many months, the fish lived forever.

7) Chen king, T 154, k. 5, p. 107b8-21: chap. 55 P'i yu king (cf. Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 87).

In a land close to the ocean, in order to save his people who were reduced to famine by drought, the king Sa-ho-ta (Sarvadatta?) stopped eating; after seven days he died and came back as a gigantic fish whose flesh nourished the people.

Above, p. 714F, the Traité mentioned this king Sarvadatta or Sarvaṃdada to whom several jātakas are dedicated; see also the Khotanese Jātakastava, ed. Dresden, p. 433, 24th story.

8) Hien yu king, T 202, k. 7, p. 402a5-b24, chap. 38 entitled Chō-t'eu-lo-kien-ning (Śārdūlakarṇa); ḥDzañs blun (Tib. Trip. 1008) oder der Weise und der Thor übersetzt und herausgegeben von J. J. Schmidt, ch. XXVI.

In order to save his people from a long drought, Śārdūlakarṇa, king of Jambudvīpa, jumped from the top of a tree into a great river where he was reborn as an immense fish. For twelve years, the inhabitants were able to feed on his flesh.

The theme of the Bodhisattva-fish is exploited in the mural paintings of central Asia (E. Waldschmidt, Über die Darstellungen..., in Buddhistische Spätantike, VI, p. 59-60., fig. 198-200) and the sculptures of Barabodur (Krom and van Erp, Barabudur Archaeological description, 1927, p. 430, tables IBb 74-76).

*

In the form of a snake, the Bodhisattva repeated the deeds he had accomplished in the form of a fish. See Si-yu-ki (T 2087, k. 3, p. 883a24-26) where it is said that in the valley of Swat, near a monastery, there is the great stūpa of Sou-mo. When the Tathāgata was once Śakra Devendra, the world was suffering from an epidemic. Śakra had pity on beings and changed himself into a sou-mo snake; all those who ate his flesh were cured.

In this regard, T. Watters, On Yuanf Chwang's Travels, I, p. 236, mentions a Jātaka of the Bodhisattva taking place in the land of Kuru, district of Thanavara, capital Indraprastha. According to the Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 8, p. 44c17-29, when the Bodhisattva was Śakra devendra, he went to his country and changed into a reptile called Jen-leang. Rising up into the sky, he addressed the inhabitants of Jambudvīpa in stanzas, promising to cure them if they cut off his flesh and ate it. The sick people gathered there in crowds in the land of Kuru, cut up the reptile and ate it. All were cured. The flesh of the snake underwent no decrease and unendingly renewed itself.

²²⁴ Unidentified Jātaka.

Once (bhūtapūrvam) the Bodhisattva was a bird (paṅśin) living in the forest. He saw a man sunk in the deep water, a place not frequented by people. The man [308a] had been caught in the net (jāla) of the deity of the waters (udakadevaṛā). Now whoever is taken by this net does not escape. The bird knew the means to liberate him. He went to the Perfumed Mountain (gandhamādana), took a medicinal plant (oṣadhi) and spread it over the net; the mesh of the net broke and the man was able to escape.

- There are innumerable stories of this kind where people are saved: they are called Jātakas.

X. VAIPULYA

P'i-fo-lie 'Vaipulya'. In the language of the Ts'in, it means 'developed sūtra'. These are the Mahāyānasūtras, for example:

Pan-jo-lo-mi king (Prajñāpāramitāsūtra),

Lieou-po-lo-li king (Śaṭpāramitāsūtra),

Houa-cheou king (Kūśālamūlasaṃparigrahasūtra),

Fa-houa king (Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra),

Fo-pen-k'i-yin-yuan king,

Yun king (Meghasūtra),

Ta-yun king (Mahāmeghasūtra, perhaps T 387). <2301>

- Innumerable and incalculable are the sūtras of this kind preached for the obtaining of supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi).

XI. ADBHUTADHARMA

Wei-ts'eng-yeou 'Adbhutadharma'. When the Buddha manifests his many miraculous powers (ṛddhibala), beings are astonished at these miracles (adbhuta).

Thus, at his birth,²²⁵ the Buddha emitted great rays (arcis) that illuminated the trisāhasramahasāhasralokadhātu and the dark intermediate places (lokāntarikā); he also illuminated the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātus of innumerable buddhas in the ten directions.

Then, in front of the Buddha's mother there appeared a beautiful clear pool (udapāna) to bathe the Bodhisattva. Brahmā-devarāja held a parasol (chattraṃ dhārayati), Śakra-devendra washed his body and two Nāgas [each] emitted a stream of water (vāridhāra).

As soon as he was born, the Bodhisattva took seven steps without anyone's support (sāṃpratajāto bodhisattvaḥ saptapadāni prakrāntaḥ parigrhīto na kenacit); wherever he placed his foot, lotuses grew up ²²⁵ The miracles that marked the birth of the Bodhisattva have been mentioned above, p. 6-10F, 1343-1344F.

(yatra yatra padaṃ <2302> nikṣipati sma tatra tatra padmāni prādurbhavanti sma). And he said: “I will save all beings from birth (jāti), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa).”

There was a great trembling of the earth (prthivīcāla); the gods rained down flowers; the trees emitted sounds (ghoṣa) and heavenly music (divyātūrya) began to play. The innumerable marvels of this kind are called adbhutadharma.

XII. UPADEŚA

1) The Louen-yi (upadeśa) ‘exegesis’ responds to questioners and explains the ‘why’; furthermore, it broadly explains the meanings (artha).

[Example of Sthaviran upadeśa]

Thus, the Buddha spoke of four truths (satya).

Which are these truths? – The four noble truths (āryasatya).

What are these four? – The noble truth of suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha) and the path that leads to it (nirodhagāminī pratipad). That is an upadeśa.

What is the noble truth of suffering? – The eight kinds of suffering: suffering of birth (jātiduḥkha), etc.²²⁶

What is the suffering of birth? In each place where a being is born, he experiences suffering.

- Exchanges such as these and answers broadly explaining the meaning are called Yeou-po-t'i- chō (upadeśa).

[Example of Mahāyānist upadeśa]

Again, in the Mahāyāna, the Buddha spoke of the six perfections (pāramitā).

What are these six perfections? They go from the perfection of generosity (dānapāramitā) up to the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā).

What is the perfection of generosity? – The perfection of generosity is of two kinds: i) complete (sampanna); ii) incomplete (asampanna).

What is complete perfection of generosity? – That which is joined to the perfection of wisdom and which is obtained by the <2303> bodhisattva who has reached the tenth abode (vihāra) is said to be complete.²²⁷

What is incomplete perfection of generosity? As long as the bodhisattva who, for the first time has produced the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpādika), has not obtained the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikā dharmakṣānti), his perfection of wisdom is not joined to the perfection of wisdom and is said to be incomplete.²²⁸

[In regard to the following perfections], up to and including the perfection of dhyāna, there are similar upadeśas.

As for the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā), it is complete if it [308b] possesses the power of skillful means (upāyabala); it is incomplete if it does not possess it.²²⁹

2) Moreover, the following are also called upadeśa:

a. the Commentaries given by the Buddha,

b. the sūtras explained by Mahākātyāyana,²³⁰

c. the teachings given in accordance with the Dharma by worldly individuals (prthagjana) up to the period of the counterfeit Dharma (pratirūpaka dharma).

FINAL COMMENTS

[The passage of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra commented on here spoke of the bodhisattva wishing to hear the twelve-membered speech of the Buddha, “whether or not this speech has been heard by the śrāvakas” (yac ca śrāvakaiḥ śrutam vā na śrutam vā). Actually there is the speech of the Buddha not heard by the śrāvakas.] <2304>

Speech not heard by the śrāvakas: –

1) Sometimes, the Buddha preached the Dharma only to bodhisattvas and there were no śrāvakas there to hear.

²²⁸ In the eighth ground, the bodhisattva obtains anutpattikadharmakṣānti which destroys the passions (kleśa) but does not completely eliminate their traces (vāsanā).

²²⁹ According to the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 233, cited in the Bhāvanākrama, I, p. 194, wisdom (prajñā) without skillful means (upāyarahita) is bound (bandhana); furnished with skillful means (upāyasamprayukta), it is free (mokṣa).

²³⁰ It happened that the Buddha, having briefly explained the Dharma, went back to his cell. Then, doubting that they understood well, the monks went to Kātyāyana to ask him to explain the words of the Teacher, for, they thought: “This Venerable Mahākātyāyana, praised by the Teacher and venerated by his wise colleagues is able to explain fully the meaning” (ayaṃ kho āyasmā Mahākaccāno Satthu c’eva saṃvaṇṇito sambhāvito ca viññūnaṃ sabrahmacārīṇāṃ, pahoti c’āyasmā Mahākaccāno imassa Bhagavatā saṅkhittena uddesassa uddiṭṭhassa vitthārena atthaṃ avibhattassa vitthārena atthaṃ vibhajitum): cf. Majjhima, I, p. 110; III, p. 194, 223; Anguttara, V, p. 256, 259-260. See also Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 164-165.

Elsewhere, the Buddha proclaimed Kātyāyana ‘the foremost of those who explain fully the meaning of the concise words of the buddha’ (aggo saṅkhittena bhāsitaṃ vitthārena atthaṃ vibhajantānaṃ): cf. Anguttara, I, p. 23.

²²⁶ Cf. p. 1458, n. 1; 1745F; add Saṃghabhedā, I, p. 137 to the references.

²²⁷ In the tenth ground, the bodhisattva attains anāśravā prajñā.

2) Transforming himself by the power of his superknowledges (abhijñābala), the Buddha often went to universes accessible to one person only (ekāyanalokadhātu)²³¹ and preached the Dharma there.

3) The Buddha preached the Dharma to the gods of the desire realm (kāma-deva) and to the gods of the form realm (rūpa-deva),²³² and as there are no śrāvakas there, the latter did not hear him.

Question. – But there are arhats endowed with the six superknowledges (abhijñā) and when the Buddha preaches, even if they are not there, they can hear him with the divine ear (divyaśrotra) and see him with the divine eye (divyacakṣus). If they really know things of the past by means of the memory of their earlier existences (pūrvanivāsānasmṛti), how then would they not have heard the Buddha?

Answer. – The power of the abhijñās of the śrāvakas does not extend that far: that is why they do not hear him.

[Gaṇḍavyūha].²³³ – Moreover, when the Buddha preached the Pou'k'o-sseu-<2305> yi-kiai-t'o king (Acintya-vimokṣasūtra) to the great bodhisattvas, Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana who were at the Buddha's left and right, could not hear because they had not planted the causes and conditions necessary to hear Mahāyāna things. Thus the ascetic in dhyāna who has entered into the absorptions (samāpatti) of the ²³¹ Doubtful translation: see Edgerton, Hybrid Dictionary, p. 154, s.v. ekāyana.

²³² The Buddhas have access to the kāmadhātu and rūpadhātu heavens. They go there by means of magic (ṛddhi) in the time it takes for a strong man to extend his bent arm or to bend his stretched arm (tadyathā balavān puruṣaḥ samkuñcitam vā bāhuṃ prasārayet prasāritam vā samkuñcayet).

During the seventh year of his public life, Śākyamuni went to spend the rains season in the Trāyastriṃśa heaven, one of the six classes of Kāmadevas (cf. p. 2229F, n. 2).

The Buddha Śikhiṇ, leaving the Aruṇavati palace, appeared (pātur ahoṣi) in the Brahmaloḥa: Saṃyutta, I, p. 155.

The Buddha Śākyamuni, desiring to meet Baka brahmā who was harboring heretical views, left the city of Ukkatthā (in Kosala) where he was and came to the Brahmaloḥa: Majjhima, I, p. 326.

It is stated in the Saṃyutta, V, p. 282, that the Buddha went to the Brahmaloḥa either in a spiritual body (manomāyena kāyena) or with a body formed out of the four great elements (cātumahābhūtikena kāyena).

²³³ According to the Gaṇḍavyūha, also called Acintya-vimokṣa, the Buddha who was in the Jetavana in Śrāvastī together with an immense crowd of bodhisattvas and śrāvakas, entered into the sīṃhaviṃśatībhūtasamādhī and accomplished a whole series of wonders (vikurvitā). Only the bodhisattvas saw it; the śrāvakas, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, etc., who at the time were at the side of and behind the Blessed One, saw nothing. Indeed, that which is in the range of sight of the bodhisattvas is not within the range of sight of the śrāvakas.

Gaṇḍavyūha, ed. Suzuki, p. 19: Te [śrāvakās] tatraiva Jetavane saṃnipatitāḥ saṃniṣaṇṇā Bhagavataḥ purato vāmadakṣiṇapṛṣṭhato Bhagavato 'bhimukhaṃ saṃniṣaṇṇā na tāni Jetavane buddhāvīkurvitāny adṛakṣuḥ... // tat kasya hetor / abhijātā bodhisattvacakṣuṣpathavijñeyam hi tam na śrāvakacakṣuṣpathavijñeyam / tena te mahāśrāvakās tatraiva Jetavane sthitās tathāgatavikurvitāni buddhādhiṣṭhānāni buddhakṣetraparabuddhiṃ bodhisattvasaṃnipātām na paśyanti //

Chinese versions: T 278, k. 44, p. 679c; T 279, k. 60, p. 322b-323a; T 293, k. 2, p. 666a.

spheres of totality (krtsnāyatana) can cause all the waters (ap-) to change into fire (tejas),²³⁴ but other people cannot see this.

- [The Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] also speaks about the bodhisattva] “wishing to receive-retain (dhārayitum) entirely the [speech of the Buddha].” ‘To receive’ is to be present respectfully; ‘to retain’ is to remain for a long time without losing.²³⁵

Tryadhvabuddhapravacana

Third Section HEARING THE TEACHINGS OF THE BUDDHAS OF THE THREE TIMES

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 31, l. 8-13; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 100, l. 14-102, l. 16). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes to understand, retain, practice and make known [widely] to others everything that the Blessed Buddhas in the ten directions in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges have said, are saying, or will say (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra yat kiṃcid daśasu dikṣu gaṇḍānādīvālukoṇameṣu lokadhātuṣu buddhair bhagavadbhir bhāṣitam bhāṣyate ca śrutvā tat sarvam udgrahītukāmena dhārayitukāmena pratipattukāmena parebhyaḥ ca vistareṇa samprakāṣayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – Above (p. 2276F), the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra spoke of the [308c] bodhisattva who, “in order to retain and not forget the words of the Buddhas of the ten directions”, must practice the perfection of wisdom; why does it speak again here about understanding and retaining the teachings of the Buddhas of the three times? <2306>

Answer. – Above, the sūtra spoke of the bodhisattva wishing to retain the teachings of the Buddhas of the ten directions and, since one does not know what the teachings were, it specified that it was a matter of the twelve-membered scripture (dvādaśāṅgapravacana) which the śrāvakas heard or did not hear.

Above, the sūtra mentioned only the Buddhas in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges: here it speaks of the teachings of the Buddhas of the three times as numerous as the sands of the Ganges.

Above, it was a matter only of retaining, not forgetting, these teachings, and it was not a question of the benefits coming from this remembering; here the sūtra wants them revealed to other people. This is why the sūtra has returned to this topic.

²³⁴ This is explained fully in the Acintya-vimokṣasūtra.

²³⁵ This alinea is obviously a Chinese gloss.

Fourth Section ASSURING ONE’S OWN GOOD AND THAT OF OTHERS

Sūtra. – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes to understand what the Buddhas of the past have said and what the Buddhas of the future will say and, having understood it, to assure his own good and that of others (svaparārtha).

Śāstra. –

Question. – It is possible to understand (udgrahītum) and retain (dhārayitum) the teachings currently given in the ten directions by the Buddhas of the present; but the teachings of the past have disappeared and those of the future do not yet exist; then how can one understand them?

Answer. – I have already answered that question above, but I must repeat myself here:

The bodhisattva possesses a concentration called ‘concentration of seeing the Buddhas of the three times’ (tryadhvabuddhadarśanansamādhī); the bodhisattva who has entered into this concentration sees all the Buddhas of the three times completely and hears their teaching (dharmadeśanā). Similarly also, some heretics (tīrthika) and eminent hermits (puruṣarṣi) see and hear, by the power of their wisdom (prajñābala), the things of the past (atītadhva) that, however, have neither form (ākṛti) nor language (vyavahāra).

Furthermore, the power of the bodhisattvas is inconceivable (acintya) and, although the past has neither form nor language, they are able to see it and hear it <2307> either by using the power of the dhāraṇīs,²³⁶ or by inference (anumāna), by deducing the things of the past and the future from the present.

This is why it is said here that, in order to obtain these results, it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom.

Andhakārāvabhāsana

Fifth Section ILLUMINATING THE DARKNESS OF THE INTERMEDIARY WORLDS

Sūtra. (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 31, l. 15-19; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 102, l. 16-104, l. 16). - Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes to illumine with his brilliance all the darkness of the intermediary worlds – there where neither the sun nor the moon shines – in each of the ten directions, in the universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra yā daśasu dikṣu gaṅgana-dīvālukopameṣu lokadhātuṣv andhakāratamisrā yatra sūryacandrakasau na bhāsatas tāḥ sarvā avabhāsayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

²³⁶ Particularly the śrutadharadhāraṇi which has been mentioned above, p. 318F, 328F, 1865F.

Śāstra. –

When the Bodhisattva came down from the Tuṣita heaven into his mother’s womb (yasmin samaya bodhisattvas tuṣitād devanikāyāc cyutvā mātuḥ kuṣāv avakrāmatī), his body emitted a radiance (avabhāsa) that illuminated all the universes (lokadhātu) and also the intermediary worlds, the places of darkness (lokāntarikā andhakāratamisrā). In the same way also, at the moment of his birth, his radiance shone everywhere. In the same way also, he emitted a great radiance when he attained supreme perfect enlightenment (yasmin samaya ’nuttarāṃ samyaksaṃbodhim adhigacchatī), when he turned the Wheel of Dharma (yasmin samaye dharmacakraṃ pravartayati) and when he entered into parinirvāṇa (yasmin samaya ’nupadiṣeṣe nirvāṇadhātu parinirvāsyate).²³⁷

In other circumstances as well, he manifests his great magical superknowledge (ṛddhyabhijñā) and emits a great radiance. Thus, when he wants to preach the Prajñāpāramitā, he manifests his great ṛddhyabhijñā by means of a great brilliance that illumines everywhere the intermediary worlds, places <2308> of darkness (lokāntarikā andhakāratamisrā). Thus is his miraculous radiance spoken of in many places in the sūtras.

Question. – But that is the power of the Buddha; why are you speaking [309a] about the bodhisattva here?

Answer. – Here it is matter of the bodhisattva “wishing to obtain this power and to practice the perfection of wisdom” for this purpose. There are great bodhisattvas who have this power. Thus the bodhisattva Pien-ki (Samantabhadra), the bodhisattvas Kouan-che-yin (Avalokiteśvara), Tō-ta-che (Mahāsthāmaprāpta), Ming-kang (Jālinīprabha), Wou-leang-kouang (Amitābha), etc., have that power and their bodies emit an immense brilliance (paramāṇprabhā) illuminating in the ten directions universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges.

[Great Sukhāvatīvyūha].²³⁸ - Thus, in the universe of the Buddha A-mi-t’o (Amita), the bodhisattvas emit a perpetual radiance (nityāvabhāsa) illuminating a hundred thousand leagues (yojanaśatasahasra).

Question. – Because of what action (karman) does the bodhisattva acquire such a physical radiance?

Answer. – He has acquired this splendor thanks to the purity of his physical actions (kāyakarmaviśuddhi).

²³⁷ On these four occasions, the Buddha emits a brilliance that illumines all the universes and the intermediary worlds plunged into darkness. The main source of inspiration for the Traité here is a sutta of the Anguttara, II, p. 130-131, already mentioned above, p. 192F. For these intermediary worlds, see p. 1952F, n. 2.

²³⁸ Great Sukhāvatīvyūha, ed. A. Ashikaga, p. 49: Tasmin khalu punar ānanda buddhakṣetre ye śrāvacakā te vyāmaprabhā, ye bodhisattvās te yojanakoṭīśatasahasraprabhāḥ; sthāpayitvā dvau bodhisattvau, yayoh prabhayā sā lokadhātuḥ satatasamitāṃ nityāvabhāsasphuṭā. – In this buddha field [of Sukhāvatī], the śrāvakas have a radiance of one armspan, the bodhisattvas have a radiance of hundreds of thousands of millions of leagues, except for the bodhisattvas [Avalokiteśvara and Mahāsthāmaprāpta] by whose light this [Sukhāvatī] universe is constantly illuminated.

[Pretasūtra].²³⁹ – As is said in a sūtra, there was a preta whose head was like that of a pig (sūka) and foul-smelling insects (pūtikṛmī) came out of his mouth; however, his body was golden in color (suvarṇavarṇābhāsa). In a previous lifetime (pūrvake janmani), this preta had been a bhikṣu, but he insulted a stranger monk with harmful words (pāruṣyavāda). Since [as a bhikṣu] he had observed the pure precepts (viśuddhaśīla), his body had radiance; but, having uttered harmful words, stinking insects came out of his mouth.

A sūtra says that, according to the purity of mind (cittaviśuddhi), the radiance is superior (agra), middling (madhya) or inferior (avara).

The Paritābhas, Apramāṇbhas, Ābhāsvaras [of the second dhyāna] and the gods of the desire realm (kāmadhātudeva) possess a radiance <2309> because, out of the purity of their mind, they make gifts and observe morality.

Moreover, some people, out of compassion for beings, have set lamps (dīpa) in dark places; they have honored the holy images (pratimā) and shrines (caitya); they have offered shining things like pearls (maṇi), windows, mirrors (ādarśa), etc.; this is why their bodies have radiance.

Moreover, by constantly practicing the mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) and listening to all beings, the mind becomes pure [and the body shines].

Moreover, by always practicing the concentration of the recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛtisamādhi) and thinking about the high qualities of the Buddhas, one acquires a great bodily radiance.

Finally, the yogin who constantly practices the sphere of totality of fire (tejahkṛtsnāyatana) converts (paripācayati) fools (bala) and people of wrong view (mithyādrṣṭi) by means of the brilliance of his wisdom.

As a result of such actions, one acquires mentally the lucidity of wisdom (prajñā) and brilliance physically.

As a result of such actions, one finds the purity of physical brilliance (kāyābhāsavīśuddhi).

Sixth Section MAKING KNOWN THE NAMES OF THE THREE JEWELS

(triratnaśabdaprakāśana)

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 31, l. 19-32, l. 1; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 104, l. 16-106, l. 20). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, in each of the ten directions, there are universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges where beings hear neither the name of Buddha nor the name of the Dharma nor the name of the Saṃgha. The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to establish all these beings in right view and cause them to hear the names of the Three Jewels must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparaṃ Śāriputra yāvanto daśasu dikṣu gaṅgānādīvālukupamā-lokadhātavo yatra na buddhaśabdaṃ na dharmāśabdaṃ na saṃghaśabdaṃ sattvāḥ śṛṇvanti, tatra lokadhātuṣu tān sarvasattvān samyadrṣṭau pratiṣṭhāpayitukāmena triratnaśabdān śrāvayitukāmena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

²³⁹ Unidentified sūtra.

Śāstra. –

In a region where there had previously been no Buddha, no Dharma, no stūpa, the bodhisattva builds a stūpa and, as a result of this action, he obtains, in the course of a rebirth (punarbhava), the perfection of power (balasampad); in regions where there is no Buddha, no Dharma, no Saṃgha, he praises the Three Jewels (triratna) and helps beings enter into right view (samyagdrṣṭi). <2310>

It is said in a sūtra: In a region where there is no buddha stūpa, a man built a stūpa and thus gained a brahmic merit (brāhmaṇ puṇyam), i.e., an immense merit.²⁴⁰ As a result of that, he quickly attains the dhyānas and, by means of these dhyānas, he acquires an immense superknowledge of magical power (ṛddhyabhijñā). By its power, he goes in the ten directions and praises the Three Jewels and right view. Those who previously did not know anything about the [309b] qualities (guṇa) of the Three Jewels acquire faith in them thanks to this bodhisattva. By means of this faith (śraddhā) in the Three Jewels, they are certain that sin (āpatti) and merit (puṇya) have action (karman) as their cause and condition. Thus, believing in the efficacy of actions, they understand that saṃsāra is bondage (bandhana) and nirvāṇa is liberation (mokṣa).

For a eulogy on the Three Jewels, see (p. 1340-1406F) what has been said in regard to the eight recollections (anusmṛti).

Seventh Section HEALING THE SICK AND THE UNFORTUNATE

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 32, l. 4-8; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 106, l. 20). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if [he formulates the following wish] in ²⁴⁰ The person who builds a Tathāgata stūpa where there has not previously been one is one of the four persons producing brahmic merit: cf. Ekottara, T 125, k. 21, p. 656b1-9; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 82, p. 425c13-21; Kośa, IV, p. 250.

Saṃghabheda, II, p. 206-207: - Carvāra ime brāhmaṇ puṇyaṃ prasavanti. Katame catvāraḥ. (1) yaḥ pudgalaḥ apratiṣṭhitapūrvē prthivīpradeśe tathāgatasya brāhmaṇ puṇyaṃ prasavati, kalpaṃ svargeṣu modate.

Transl. – Four persons produce a brahmic merit: i) he who builds a stūpa enclosing bodily relics of the Tathāgata in a place on earth where there has not been one; ii) he who founds a monastery for the Community of monks of the four cardinal directions in a place on earth where there has not been one; iii) he who re-unites a community of disciples of the Tathāgata where a schism had arisen; iv) he who embraces this entire world in a mind associated with loving-kindness, a mind free of enmity, free of rivalry, free of malice, developed, increased, immense, well-practiced, and remains therein. These four persons produce a brahmic merit and rejoice in the heavens for a kalpa.

regard to beings in the ten directions in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges: “By my power may the blind see, the deaf hear, madmen recover their minds, may naked people receive clothing and may those who are hungry and thirsty be satisfied” (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra ye daśasu diṅṣu gaṅganadivālukopameṣu lokadhātuṣv andhāḥ sattvās te mamānubhāvena cakṣuṣā rūpāṇi draṅṣyanti, badhirāḥ śrotreṇa śabdān śroṣyanti, unmattāḥ smṛtiṃ pratilapsyante, nagnaś cīvarāṇi pratilapsyante, kṣudhitapipāsītāḥ pūrṇapātrā bhaviṣyanti bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

The bodhisattvas who practice the unhindered (apratihata or anāvaraṇa) prajñāpāramitā become Buddha if they attain unhindered deliverance (vimokṣa). But if they become bodhisattvas with a body born from the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya), like Mañjuśrī, etc., dwelling on the tenth bhūmi (viḥārabhūmi), they are endowed with many perfections of qualities (guṇasaṃpad). Everyone who sees them obtains what they wish for (yathāprañidhānam). Just as with the cintāmaṇi wishes are all fulfilled, so it is with the bodhisattvas of dharmadhātujakāya: everyone who sees them obtains what they desire.

Moreover, from his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) and during innumerable kalpas, the Bodhisattva has healed the 96 eye diseases;²⁴¹ for innumerable lifetimes, he has given his eyes to beings; by the brilliance of his wisdom (prajñāvabhāsa), he has destroyed the darkness of wrong views (mīthyādrṣṭīmas); out of his great compassion (mahākaruṇā), he wants the wishes of all beings to be fulfilled. As a result of such actions, how would beings not recover their sight on seeing the body of the Bodhisattva? And it is the same for all the other sick people.

Concerning these [miraculous cures], see what has been said above (p. 485-495F) in [the chapter XIV entitled] Fang-kouang (Raśmipramokṣa).

Manuṣyātmabhāva

Eight Section ASSURING A REBIRTH AMONG HUMANS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 32, l. 8-9; Śatasāśrikā, p. 109, l. 20-110, l. 4). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, in each of the ten directions, in <2312> universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, there are beings in the three bad destinies. The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes that “by his power, all those beings may attain a human existence” must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra ye daśasu diṅṣu gaṅganadivālukopameṣu lokadhātuṣu durgatyaupapannāḥ sattvās te sarve mamānubhāvena manuṣyatmabhāvaṃ pratilapsyanta iti bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

²⁴¹ See above, p. 486-487F.

Question. – It is as a result of a good action (kuśaladharman) accomplished by oneself that one attains a human existence (manuṣyātmabhāva). Why then does the bodhisattva here wish that, by his power (mamānubhāvena), beings in the three bad destinies may find a human existence?

Answer. – It does not say that it is because of an action of the bodhisattva that beings obtain a human existence; it states only that it is as a result of the beneficent power (anubhāva) of the bodhisattva that they obtain it. By the power of his superknowledges (abhijñā), his transformations (nirmāṇa) and his preaching (dharmadeśana), the bodhisattva makes beings practice the good (kuśala) and thus acquire a human existence.²⁴² See what a sūtra says: <2313>

²⁴² Actions are strictly personal and non-communicable; the good as well as the bad actions ripen for their author and for no-one else:

Majjhima, III, p. 203: Kamassakā sattā kammaḍḍyādā kammayonī kammabandhū kammaṇṇasaraṇa. – Beings have actions as their own property, heritage, womb, blood relations and refuge.

Majjhima, III, p. 181: Taṃ kho pana te etaṃ pāpaṃ kammaṃ n'eva mātaraṃ kataṃ na bhātaraṃ kataṃ na bhaginiyā kataṃ na mittāmaccehi kataṃ na ñātisālohithehi kataṃ na samanabrāhmaṇehi kataṃ na devatāhi kataṃ; tayā v' etaṃ pāpaṃ kammaṃ kataṃ; tvañ ñeva tassa vipākaṃ paṭisaṃvedissasi. - This bad action which is yours was not done by your mother or your father or your brother or your sister or by your friends and advisers or your relatives and blood-kin or the monks and brāhmaṇas or the gods. You alone have done this bad action; you alone will gather the fruit of it.

Anguttara, III, p. 186: Yaṃ kammaṃ karissati kalyāṇaṃ vā pāpakaṃ vā tassa dāyādo bhavissati. – The man will be the inheritor of the good or bad actions that he will accomplish.

Action determines births: it projects beings into good or bad destinies:

Majjhima, I, p. 390: Yaṃ karoti tena upapajjati. – As the work that he accomplishes, such is the existence that falls due to him. [Cf. the Brhadāranyakā Upaniṣad, IV, 4, 5 (ed. Foucher, p. 80): Yat karma kurute, tad abhisampadyate, “he reaps according to his actions”. – Chāndogya Upaniṣad, V, 10, 7 (ed. Foucher, p. 68): Tad ya iha ramaṇīyacaraṇāḥ, abhyāso ha yat te ramaṇīyaṃ yonim āpadyeran. “Those who have satisfactory conduct have the future of obtaining a satisfying birth.”]

Majjhima, III, p. 203: Kammaṃ satte vibhajati yadidaṃ hīnappanātatātāyā. – Action separates beings by distributing them among miserable or pleasant destinies.

Anguttara, III, p. 415: Atthi kammaṃ nirayavedaniyaṃ, kammaṃ tiracchānayaṇivedaniyaṃ, atthi kammaṃ pittivisaṇavedaniyaṃ, atthi kammaṃ manussalokavedaniyaṃ, atthi kammaṃ devaalokavedaniyaṃ, ayaṃ vuccati kammānaṃ vemattatā. – There are actions that ripen into feeling in the hell realm, among the animals, among the pretas, in the world of humans and finally in the world of the gods; such is the diversity of actions.

In the face of the rigidity of this doctrine, how is it that the bodhisattva can wish, in the sūtra, that beings of the three bad destinies may obtain a human existence? Admittedly, it is not easy by carrying out himself an action the fruit of which will be gathered by others. But nothing prevents the bodhisattva from using his power in such a way that the beings of the three bad destinies themselves carry out actions that will permit them to be reborn among humans. Supposing even that the intervention of the bodhisattva turns out to be in vain, it will at least have the benefit of purifying his own mind. The strict application of the law of karma does not prohibit the bodhisattva from formulating good wishes.

[Mahāvedallasutta, etc.]²⁴³. – There are two conditions (pratya) required for the production of right view (samyagdr̥ṣṭer utpādāya): i) externally (bahirdhā), the hearing of the Holy Dharma (saddharmaśravaṇa); ii) internally (adhyātmam), right reflecting (yoniso manasikāra).

As in the case of a plant (oṣadhi), internally there is a seed (bīja); externally there is moist (sneha) earth and only subsequently, the plant is born (utpāda).²⁴⁴ [309c] Without the bodhisattva, notwithstanding their [good actions], these beings would not be born [in a human existence]. This is how we know how great is the good work carried out by the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Question. – But how does the bodhisattva make all the beings of the three bad destinies obtain deliverance (vimukti)? The Buddha himself would be unable to do so; how then could the bodhisattva?

Answer. – There is nothing wrong (doṣa) in that the bodhisattva wishes to do that mentally. Moreover, as many beings obtain deliverance, it is said here [hyperbolically] that all obtain it.

The body of the buddhas and great bodhisattvas emits immense rays everywhere (apramāṇān raśmin niścārayati); from these rays there appear innumerable emanation bodies (nirmāṇakāya) <2314> which penetrate the three bad destinies in the ten directions everywhere [i.e., among the damned (naraka), the animals (tiryāṇic) and the pretas]. Then, the fire is extinguished and the boiling water cools down in the hells (niraya); the beings who are there and whose minds are purified (cittaviśuddhivāt) are reborn among the gods or among humans. – The pretas, whose hunger and thirst (kṣupipāsa) have been satisfied, develop a good mind and they too are reborn among the gods and humans. – The animals (tiryagyoni), finding food wherever they wish (yatheccham), drive away their fears (bhaya), develop a good mind and they too are reborn among gods and men. Thus all beings of the three bad destinies obtain deliverance (vimukti).

Question. – But other sūtras²⁴⁵ say that these beings “are reborn among the gods or humans” (devamanuṣyeṣūpapadyante); why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra say here only that they “obtain a human existence” (manuṣyabhāvaṃ pratilabhante)?

Answer. – Among humans, it is possible to cultivate great qualities (mahāguṇa) and also find happiness (sukha). On the other hand, the gods are strongly attached to [heavenly] bliss and consequently cannot cultivate the Path (mārga). This is why the bodhisattva wishes that the beings of the three bad destinies “obtain a human birth” only.

Finally, the bodhisattva does not wish that beings find happiness only; he also wants them to obtain deliverance (vimukti) and the eternal happiness of nirvāṇa (nityasukhanirvāṇa). This is why he does not mention rebirth among the gods here.

²⁴³ Majjhima, I, p. 294; Anguttara, I, p. 87: Dve kho paccayā sammādiṭṭhiyā uppādāya: parato ca ghoso yoniso ca manasikāro.

²⁴⁴ A comparison developed in the Śālistambasūtra cited above, p. 1152-1153F, note.

²⁴⁵ Many sūtras that say that at the dissolution of the body after death, beings endowed with good bodily, etc., actions are born in a good destiny [namely, those of gods and humans], in the heavens, in the worlds of the gods (kāyasya bhedaṁ paraṃ maraṇāt sugatau sarge devalokeṣūpa-padyante): cf. Pāli Concordance, I, p. 248, s.v. ariyaṇaṃ anupavādaka.

Ninth Section ESTABLISHING BEINGS IN THE FIVE PURE ELEMENTS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 32, l. 9-15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 110, l. 4-13). – The bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes, by the his own power, to establish (pratiṣṭhāpita) beings in each of the ten directions in universes as many as the sands of the Ganges in morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā), deliverance (vimukti), knowledge <2315> and the vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana), and attain the fruit of srotaāpanna and the others up to supreme complete enlightenment.

Śāstra. –

Question. – Above (p. 2213F), the five pure elements (anāsravaskandha) and the fruits of the Path (mārgaphala) were already discussed; why speak of them again?

Answer. – Above, it was a matter of the attributes only of the śrāvaka, the fruit of srotaāpanna and the others up to nirvāṇa without conditioned residue (nirupadhiṣeṣanirvāṇa); here we are speaking of the three Vehicles all together: śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha [and Buddha] all attaining supreme complete enlightenment.

Tathāgatateryāpatha

Tenth Section IMITATING THE BEARING OF THE BUDDHA

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 32, l. 18; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 110, l. 13-14). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to imitate the bearing of the Buddha must practice the perfection of wisdom (Punar aparāṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvena tathāgatateryāpathaṃ śikṣitukāmena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – What is the bearing (īryāpatha) of the Buddha?

Answer. – The bearing is the four physical movements or postures: [walking (caṅkrama), standing (sthāna), sitting (niṣīdana) and lying down (śayyā)²⁴⁶].

²⁴⁶ According to the well-known stock phrase: Caturvidham īryāpathaṃ kalpayati caṅkramati tiṣṭhati niṣīdati śayyāṃ kalpayati: Catuspariśad, p. 318; Divyāvadāna, p. 161.

1. Walking (caṅkrama)

Like the king of the elephants (nāgarāja), the Buddha turns his body in order to look.²⁴⁷

When he walks, his feet are four inches (caturāṅgulam) above the ground and, although he does not set foot on the ground, the traces of the wheel on his soles are visible [on the earth].²⁴⁸ <2316>

He walks neither too slowly nor too quickly.²⁴⁹

He does not bend his body.²⁵⁰

He always raises his right hand to reassure beings.

2. Sitting posture (niṣīdāna)

He sits cross-legged with his body upright.²⁵¹

3. Lying down posture (śayyā)

[310a] He always lies down on his right side and places his knees one on top of the other.²⁵²

²⁴⁷ Cf. Majjhima, II, p. 137: Avalokento kho pana so bhavaṃ Gotamo sabbakāyēn’ eva avaloketi. This is a polite gesture.

²⁴⁸ Loke sutta of Anguttara, II, p. 37-39; Saṃyutta, T 99, no. 101, k. 4, p. 28a20-b18 and T 100, no. 267, k. 13, p. 467a26-b24; Ekottara, T 125, k. 31, p. 717c18-718a12:

In the land of Kosala, mid-way between Ukkatthā and Setavyā, the brāhmaṇa Doṇa saw footprints on the ground [read padesu in place of pādesu: according to the Commentary of the Anguttara, III, p. 77, pada is rather a place trodden by the feet (pādehi akkanataṭṭhāna), a footprint (padavajja[raṇḍa]). On these footprints there were thousand-rayed wheels with rims and all of the attributes (cakkāni sahaṣṣarāṇi sanābhikāni sabbākāraparipūrāṇi). Doṇa told himself that these prints could not have been made by a man. He followed them and finally saw the Buddha seated at the foot of a tree. Struck by the dignity of the Teacher, he asked him if he were a deva, a gandharva, a yakṣa or a man. To all these questions the Lord answered in the negative and presented himself as Buddha. It was then that he pronounced this famous phrase which the Lokottaravādins later blew up out of proportion: Seyyathāpi uppalam... evam eva kho loke jāto loke samvaddho lokam abhibhuyya viharāmi anupalitto lokena.

We may notice that the Chinese versions mentioned here reproduce this phrase only very incompletely.

On the footprints of the Buddha, see Hßbßgirin, II, p. 187, s.v. Bussokuseki; Ceylon Encyclopedia, III, p. 450, s.v., Buddhapāda.

²⁴⁹ Majjhima, II, p. 137: So nātisīghaṃ gacchati nātissaṇikaṃ gacchati.

²⁵⁰ Majjhima, II, p. 137: So antaragharaṃ pavisanto na kāyaṃ unnāmeti, na kāyaṃ onāmeti, na kāyaṃ sannāmeti, na kāyaṃ vināmeti.

²⁵¹ Dīgha, I, p. 71; Majjhima, I, p. 56; Saṃyutta, I, p. 170; Anguttara, II, p. 210: So pacchābhattam piṇḍapāṭapaṭikkanto nisīdati pallaṅkaṃ ābhujitvā ujum kāyaṃ paṇidhāya parimukhaṃ satim upaṭṭhapetvā. – Sanskrit Parinirvāṇa, p. 268, 288: Nyaṣīdat paryāṅkaṃ ābhujjarjūṃ kāyaṃ praṇidhāya pratimukhaṃ smṛtim upaṭṭhāpya.

The mat of grass that he spreads out is well arranged and not disordered.²⁵³

4. Manner of eating (bhojana)

When he eats, he is not attached to the taste; for him, good and bad food are the same.²⁵⁴ <2317>

5. Manner of speaking (ghoṣa)

To accept an invitation from people, he keeps silent and does not refuse.²⁵⁵

His speech is gentle (maṇḍu), skillful, beneficial and timely.²⁵⁶

*

As for the postures (īryāpatha) of the dharmakāya Buddhas, they are: In one single stride (ekena padena), they traverse, in the east, universes as many as the sands of the Ganges, and the sermons (dharamdeśana) of their brahmic voice (brahmasvara) has the same range.

For the characteristics of the dharmakāya Buddhas, see what has been said above (p. 546F).

Nāgarājavalokita

Eleventh Section LOOKING IN THE MANNER OF THE ELEPHANT, ETC.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 32, l. 18-33, l. 9; Śatasāhasarikā, p. 110, l. 16-18;., p. 110, l. 20-111, l. 1, and 111, l. 18-112, l. 7.) - Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes this: “May I look with the gaze of the king of the elephants”. The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes this: “May I walk four inches above the ground without my feet touching the earth”, and

²⁵² Dīgha, II, p. 134; Majjhima, I, p. 354; Saṃyutta, I, p. 27, 107: Bhagavā dakkhiṇena passena sīhaseyyaṃ kappesi, pāde padam accādhāya sato sampajāno uṭṭhānasaññaṃ manasikāritvā. – Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 266, 286, 294:

Bhagavān dakṣiṇena pārśvena śayyāṃ kalpayati pāde pādāṃ ādhāyālokaśaṃjñīṃ pratismṛtaḥ saṃprajāna utthānasaṃjñāṃ mamsaikurvānaḥ.

²⁵³ Anguttara, I, p. 183: So yad eva tattha honti tiṇāni vā paṇṇāni vā tāni ekajijhaṃ saṃharitvā nisīdāni pallaṅkaṃ ābhuñjitvā.

²⁵⁴ Majjhima, II, p. 138: Rasapaṭisaṃvedi kho pana so bhavaṃ Gotamo āhāraṃ āhāreti, no ca rasarāgapaṭisaṃvedi.

²⁵⁵ Majjhima, I, p. 161; Saṃyutta, I, p. 183: Adhvāsesi Bhagavā tuṇhībhāvena. – Catuspariśad, p. 194; Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 144; Divya, p. 151: Adhivāsayati Bhagavān ... tūṣṇīmhbāvena.

²⁵⁶ Cf. Majjhima, II, p. 140: Aṭṭhaṅgasamannāgato kho paṇ’ assa bhoto Gotamassa mukhato ghoṣo niccharati, viṣṣaṭṭho ca viññeyyo ca maṇḍu ca savanīyo ca bindu ca avisāri ca ninnādī ca.

“Surrounded and honored by many thousands of myriads of koṭi of devas, from the Cāturmahārājikāikas to the Akaniṣṭhas, may I go to the foot of the bodhi tree.” (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvenaivam upaparīkṣamānena ‘kim ity ahaṃ nāgarājāvalokitam avalokayeyam ‘ iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam. Bodhisattvenaivam upaparīkṣamānena ‘kim ity ahaṃ prthivīm caturaṅgulam asprśan padbhyāṃ gacchey ‘ iti, ‘kim ity ahaṃ cāturmahārājakāyadevair yāvad akaniṣṭhair anekadevakoṭinīyutaśatasahasaraiḥ parivṛtaḥ puraskṛto bodhidrumamūlam upasaṃkrameyam ‘ iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. -

I. GAZE LIKE THAT OF THE ELEPHANT <2318>

When one swivels one’s body and, in order to look, turns one’s whole body, this is “the gaze like that of the elephant” (nāgāvalokita).²⁵⁷

This is a mark of the Great Man (mahāpruṣalakṣaṇa). The body (kāya) and the mind (citta) are especially united; this is why, when one has something to look at, body and mind turn together. Thus when a lion has seized its prey, it is not because the latter is small that the lion is going to cool its ardor.²⁵⁸

It is the same for the Buddha. When he has something to look at or something to say, his body and his mind function together (yugapad vartante) and never are separate. Why? Because for incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa), he has cultivated the faculty of attentiveness (ekacitta) and as a result of this action, the bone of his skull (mūrdhāsti) is but one with the body:²⁵⁹ there is no separation between them.

Moreover, from lifetime to lifetime, the Buddha has eliminated pride (māna); this is why he does not scorn beings and when he looks at them, he turns completely towards them.

²⁵⁷ For anatomical reasons as well as out of politeness, the Buddha, “turning his whole body completely to the right, looks with the look of the elephant.” It is a time-honored expression: in Pāli, nāgāpalokitam apaloketi (Dīgha, II, p. 122, l. 4; Majjhima, I, p. 337, l. 3); in Sanskrit, daṁṣiṇena sarvakāyena nāgāvalokitenāvalokayati (Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 226; a fragment of the Madhyamāgama published by E. Waldschmidt, Teufeleien in Turfan-Sanskrittexten, 1976, p. 146, l. 13-15). In Tibetan: gyas phyogs su sku tams cad phyogs te bal glaṅ lta ba ltar gzigs.

The Chinese version of the Madhyamāgama (T 26, k. 30, p. 622a12) renders nāgāvalokita as long-che ‘dragon-nāga’, whereas it is a matter of ‘elephant-nāga’ (hastināga). The Commentary of the Majjhima, II, p. 420-421 explains: Yathā nāma hatthināgo ito vā etto vā apaloketukāmo gīvaṃ aparivattēvā sakalasārēṇ ‘eva nivattivā apaloketi, evaṃ sakalasārēṇ ‘eva nivattivā apalokesi. – Just as the elephant-nāga wishing to look around, does not turn its neck but swivels its entire body in order to look, so the Buddha turns his whole body to look.

²⁵⁸ The Buddha swivels his whole body as easily as an ordinary person turns his neck. In the same way the lion is so powerful that it uses as much force to catch a small prey as a big one.

²⁵⁹ The human body has 360 bones (asthi) according to the Aṣṭāṅgasamgraha, 3, 5, and Aṣṭāṅgharḍaya, 3, 3; 300 bones according to the Sūtrata, 3, 5. In Buddhas, they are fewer because many are fused together and the skull is joined to the trunk. Above (p. 278F, n. 1) we have seen that the Vibhāṣā recognizes only 103 bones in buddhas.

[Nīhāvādāna].²⁶⁰ – As it is said in the Ni-t’o-a-pa-t’o-na (Nīhāvādāna), Nītha was a street refuse-sweeper in the land of Śrāvastī and yet the Buddha patted his head with his hand and <2319> invited him to go forth from the world (pravrajitum); he was the only one who did not scorn him.

II. LEVITATION

“The Buddha’s feet glide four inches above the ground”. If the Buddha were always flying, beings would suspect him of not being of the human race and would not take refuge (śaraṇa) in him. On the other hand, if the Buddha’s feet touched the ground, beings would find that he was no different from an ordinary being and would have no respect (gaṛava) for him. This is why, while gliding four inches above the ground, the Buddha does not trample the ground but yet the traces of the wheel appear on the ground.

Question. – But the Buddha always emits a radiance one armspan in width (vyāmaprabhā),²⁶¹ and his feet do not tread on the ground; why then would beings not honor him?

Answer. – For innumerable kalpas, beings have accumulated serious faults and so they have doubts about the Buddha. They say: “The Buddha is a master magician who deceives people with his tricks”,²⁶² or also: “If his feet do not tread on the ground, it is because that is his nature (prakṛtir asyaśiṣā); what is so wonderful about a bird flying?” There are beings who, as a result of the gravity of their faults, do not see the physical marks (lakṣaṇa) of the Buddha and simply say: “The Buddha is a very powerful śramaṇa.”²⁶³ Those who speak in this way are like very sick people who, on the point of dying, consider the remedies (bhaiṣajya) and good food as stinking (durgandha) and consequently do not pay [310b] any attention to them.

III. THE PROCESSION TO BODHI

“The Buddha goes to the foot of the bodhi tree surrounded and honored by many thousands of myriads of koṭi of devas, from <2320> the Cāturmahārājakāyikas to the Akaniṣṭhas”: this is a constant rule (dharmatā) among the Buddhas.

The Buddha Bhagavat goes to the foot of the bodhi tree in order to destroy two kinds of Māras, the ‘fetter’ Māra (saṃyojanamāra) and the lord-god Māra (īśvaradevaputramāra), and also to realize omniscience (sarvajñatā). Why would the crowd of devas not honor him, not accompany him?

²⁶⁰ See p. 1634F, n. 1.

²⁶¹ This is the ‘usual’ light of the Buddha; cf. p. 277F, 455F.

²⁶² Majjhima, I, p. 375, 381; Anguttara, II, p. 190, 193: Samaṇo Gotamo māyāvī, āvaṭṭaniṃ māyaṃ jānāti aññatīthiyānaṃ sāvake āvaṭṭeti.

²⁶³ In the canonical scriptures, the heretics address the Buddha by calling him Samaṇo Gotama.

Besides, from existence to existence, the devas have always helped and protected the Bodhisattva: already when he was leaving home, the devas made the palace people and the palace women sleep stupidly, and they held their hands over the hoofs of the horse [Kañṭhaka] when he leaped over the ramparts; now the devas make sure that they accompany the Bodhisattva to the foot of the bodhi tree.

Question. – Why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra not say that innumerable people (aprameyamanuṣya), kṣatriyas, brāhmaṇas, etc., accompany the Buddha, but speak only of the devas?

Answer. – The Buddha was alone in the deep forest when he began to look for the bodhi tree. But the forest is not a place frequented by people. This is why the sūtra does not speak of people.

Moreover, men do not have the divine eye (divyacakṣus) or the knowledge of another's mind (paracittajñāna) and consequently did not know that the Buddha was about to attain saṃbodhi. This is why the sūtra does not speak of men.

Moreover, the devas are higher than men. This is why the sūtra speaks only of devas.

Moreover, the Buddhas always love solitary places (vivikasthāna),²⁶⁴ and as the devas hide themselves and do not show themselves, they do not disturb his solitude. This is why the sūtra speaks only of the presence of the devas.

Finally, seeing that the five bhikṣus²⁶⁵ had gone away <232> and abandoned him, the Bodhisattva went alone to the foot of the tree. This is why he made the wish (prañidhāna) [to be accompanied by the devas].

Divyavastraṃstara

Twelfth Section ATTAINING SAṂBODHI ON A BED OF CELESTIAL ROBES

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 33, l. 9-12; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 112, l. 7-15). – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he envisages the following: “At the time when I sit down at the foot of the bodhi tree, may the gods – from the Cāturmahārājikas to the Akaniṣṭhas – lay down a bed of celestial robes there” (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvenaivam upapariṣamāṇena ‘kim iti me bodhidrumamūle niṣīdataś cāturmahārājakāyikā devā yāvad akaniṣṭhā devā divyavastrasaṃstaram kuryur’ iti prajñāpāramitāyām śikṣitavyam).

²⁶⁴ The Blessed One was a solitary person and a lover of solitude: Bhagavā pavibitto pavivekassa ca vannavādī (Majjhima, II, p. 6, 8). Often he expressed the wish to retreat for a fortnight in solitude and no one was to approach him except to bring him food: Icehā’ ahaṃ bhikkhave aḍḍhamāsaṃ paṭisalliyitum namhi kenaci upasankamitabho aññatra ekena piṇḍapātanihārakena (Samyutta, V, p. 12, 320). All the Tathāgatas had the same preference: Suññāgāre kho tathāgatā abhiramanti (Vinaya, II, p. 158).

²⁶⁵ The Five of the fortunate group, Ājñāta-Kauṇḍinya, etc., who had been present at the mortifications of the future Buddha and who had left him when he took some food: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 247.

Śāstra. –

Question. – But according to the sūtras, the Buddha spread out grass (ṭṭha) at the foot of the tree and sitting on that, he attained saṃbodhi. Why the does the bodhisattva wish for celestial garments (divyavastra) as a seat?

Answer. – It is in the sūtras of the śrāvakas that it is a matter of a bunch of grass,²⁶⁶ the Mahāyānasūtras, on the other hand, refer to <232> what beings saw: some saw him spread the grass at the foot of the tree, others saw him spread celestial mats; the visions vary according to the lesser or greater merits (puṇya) of the beings.

Moreover, the Buddhas of birth body (janmakāyabuddha) collect grass at the foot of the tree, whereas the Buddhas of body born from the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya) use heavenly robes as seat or things higher than these robes.

Finally, the Buddha realizes saṃbodhi in a deep forest, at the foot of a tree; if there are people in the forest who see him, they offer him grass; if these are noble men (kulaja) who see him, they offer him garments of ²⁶⁶ Saṃghabhedā, I, p. 113 (T 1450, k. 5, p. 122c-23-28): Tato bodhisattvaḥ kālikanāgarājena saṃstīyamāno vajrāsanaḥbhimukhaḥ saṃprasthitaḥ. sa saṃlakṣayati: ṭṭhasaṃstare niṣadyām kalpayāmīti. tasya ṭṭhaiḥ prayojanam iti śakro devānām indro bodhisattvasya cetasā cittam ājñāya gandhamādanāt parvatāt tūlasaṃsparśānām turṇāṇām bhāram ādāya svastikayāvāsikavarṇam ātmānam abhinirmāya bodhisattvasya prastād avasthitaḥ. bodhisattvaḥ kathayati: bhadrāmukhā dīyantām mamaītāni ṭṭhānīti. śakreṇa devendreṇa bodhisattvasya pādāyor nipatya sagauraveṇa dattāni. tato bodhisattvaḥ svastikasyayāvāsikasyāntikāt ṭṭhāny ādāya devatopadiṣṭena mārgena yena bodhimūlaṃ tenopasaṅkrāntaḥ; upasaṅkramya anākulam asaṅkulaṃ ṭṭhasaṃstaraṃ prajñāpayitum ārabdhāḥ.

Transl. – Then the Bodhisattva, covered with praise by the nāga king Kālīka, went towards the Diamond Seat. He said: “I am going to sit on a bed of grass.” Seeing that he needed grass, Śakra king of the gods, taking to mind the Buddha’s thought, went to Mount Gandhamādana to gather an armful of grass, soft to the touch like cotton; he changed himself into a grass-seller called Svastika and went to stand in front of the Bodhisattva. The Bodhisattva said to him: “Friend, give me that grass.” Śakra king of the gods fell to the Bodhisattva’s feet and respectfully gave it to him. Then, taking the grass that Svastika the grass-seller had given him, he went to the bodhi tree by way of the path the gods had shown him. Having come there, he set about arranging the grass in an orderly way.

- The gift of grass by Svastika (in Pāli, Sothiya) is told in many sources:

Mahīśāsaka Vin., T 1421, k. 15, p. 102c15-16; Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, k. 31, p. 781a12-17.

Lives of the Buddha: Sīeou king pen k’i king, T 184, k. 2, p. 470a28-b2; P’ou yao king, T 186, k. 5, p. 514c13-20; Ta tchouang yen king, T 187, k. 8, p. 587a20-b4; Yin kouo king, T 189, k. 3, p. 639c4-11; Pen hing rsi king, T 190, k. 26, p. 773a7-20; Tchong hui mo ho ti king, T 191, k. 6, p. 950a15-21; Pen hing king, T 193, k. 3, p. 75c25-28; Teh’ou yao king, T 212, k. 7, p. 644c11-14.

Mahāvastu, II, p. 131, l. 12; 264, l. 5-7; Lalitavistara, P. 286, l. 3-288, l. 10; Sad. puṇḍarīka, p. 421, l. 6-7.

Nidānakathā, p. 70-71.

high quality as seat. But in the forest there are no nobles; therefore it is a nāga and the gods who each present to him a beautiful robe as a seat.²⁶⁷

The robe of the Cāturmahārājakāyikas weighs two pala; that of the Trāyastriṃśa, one pala; that of the Yāmas, eighteen dharāṇa; that of the Tuṣitas, [310c] twelve dharāṇa; that of the Nirmāṇaratis, six dharāṇa; that of the Parānirmitaśavartins, three dharāṇa.

The robe of the gods of the form realm (rūpadhātu) has no weight. The robe of the gods of the desire realm (kāmadhātu), being made of tree-tips, has neither warp nor woof: it is like a thin skin of ice, clear with all sorts of colors, pure and of ineffable brilliance.

The Bodhisattva sits down on these precious robes spread out as as a seat and realizes supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi).

Question. – Why does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speak only of the devas spreading out robes (vastra) and say nothing about the great bodhisattvas of the ten directions who themselves set out thrones (āsana) for the Buddha?²⁶⁸ At the moment when the Buddha is going to realize sambodhi, all the bodhisattvas set out thrones for the Buddha. <2323> These thrones have a length of one league (yojana) and a width of one league, ten leagues, a hundred leagues, a thousand leagues, ten thousand leagues, an infinite number of leagues; and their height is also in proportion. These precious thrones come from the pure merit (anāsravapuṇya) of the bodhisattvas. They are invisible to the divine eye and all the more so, they cannot be touched by the hand. The Buddhas of the ten directions (daśadigbuddha) and the three times (tryaḍvabuddha), their victory over Māra (māradharṣaṇa), their enlightenment (abhisambodhana), their wonders (vyūha) and their Buddha deeds (buddhakārya) are seen clearly as though in a clear mirror (ādarśa). Why then does the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra not speak of these precious thrones?

Answer. – The Prajñāpāramitās are of two kinds: i) those that are addressed both to the śrāvakas and to the bodhisattvas and devas; ii) those that concern bodhisattvas possessing the ten bhūmis (daśavihārasamanvāgata) exclusively. It is in this latter type that the ‘bodhisattvas setting out thrones for the Buddha’ will be discussed. Why? The gratitude (kṛtajñāna) which the devas have for the Buddha is not as great as that of the great bodhisattvas [separated from Buddhahood] by only one or two lifetimes. Why would such bodhisattvas not be able to use the power of their superknowledges (abhijñābala) to honor the Buddha? But in the present passage, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is addressed also to the śrāvakas; this is why it does not speak [of the great bodhisattvas, but only of the devas].

Vajramayaḥ pradeśaḥ

Thirteenth Section CHANGING THE SURROUNDING GROUND INTO DIAMOND

²⁶⁷ See detail in chapter XX of the Lalitavistara, p. 290-299: Bodhimāṇḍavyūha.

²⁶⁸ Cf. the gift of thrones related in the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 247-250.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 33, l. 12-14; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 113, l. 3-5). – The bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he envisages thus: “When I shall have attained supreme complete enlightenment, may every place where I walk, stand, sit or lie down change into diamond” (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvenaivaṃ upapariṣamānena 'kim iti me 'nuttarāṃ samyaksaṃbodhim abhisambuddhasya gacchatas tiṣṭhato niṣaṇṇasya śayānasya prthivīpradeśo varjramayaḥ saṃtiṣṭheta' iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Question. – Why is the earth (prthivī) changed into vajra ‘diamond’ where the Buddha takes up the four postures (īryāpatha)? <2324>

Answer.²⁶⁹ – 1) According to some, when the Bodhisattva comes to the foot of the bodhi tree, he sits in this place and attains supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksambodhi). At that moment, the Bodhisattva penetrates the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇām dharmatā), and then there is no earth that can support him.²⁷⁰ Why? For beings the earth is a deception and exists as retribution (vipāka) conditioned by previous actions (karman); this is why it is incapable of supporting <2325> the Bodhisattva. When the Bodhisattva is about to realize sambodhi, he has knowledge of the true nature (dharmatājñāna) as 'body' (kāya), and then the place where he is seated changes into Vajra.

²⁶⁹ The answer is inspired by the old Buddhist cosmology.

According to the canonical sūtras (Dīgha, II, p. 107; Kośavyākhyā, p. 15), the earth (prthivī) rests upon the water (udaka) or Circle of waters (abmaṇḍala); the water or Circle of waters rests on wind (vāyu); the wind rests on space (ākāśa); space does not rest upon anything. – In this summary, there is no mention of gold (kañcana) or diamond (vajra).

Later scholasticism, particularly that of the Sarvāstivādins (Kośa, III, p. 138-141; Kośabhāṣya, p. 157-158) gives more details:

1) Resting on space, there arises below, by the force of the actions of beings, the Circle of wind (vāyumaṇḍala): it is 1,600,000 leagues (yojana) high, immeasurable in circumference, solid (dr̥ḍha) to the extent of being unable to be cut into by Vajra 'thunderbolt, or diamond'.

2) Superimposed on the Circle of wind, the Circle of waters (abmaṇḍala), 1,120,000 yojanas high. But after a certain time, stirred by the winds that create the power of actions, the water becomes gold (kāñcana) in its upper part, just as boiled milk becomes cream (pakvaṣīrī śarībhāvayogena). Then the Circle splits into two parts:

a. a lower part constituting the Circle of waters proper, 800,000 yojanas high,
b. an upper part, 320,000 yojanas high, called the earth of gold (kāñcanamayī mahī) in the Kośabhāṣya, p. 158, l. 13; the wheel of gold (kāñcanacakra) in the Sarvāstivādin Āgama cited in Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 148, l. 15; the Circle of gold and diamond (kāñcanavajramaṇḍala) in the Pañjikā, p. 168, l. 7. This last name, which associates vajra with gold, deserves to be remembered.

3) Differing in height, the Circle of waters and the earth of gold are equal in diameter (1,203, 450 yojana) and in perimeter (3,610,350 yojana).

4) The earth of gold supports the earth (prthivī), the universe of four continents encircled by the cakravāda which gives it the shape of a wheel.

Wherever the buddhas have attained or will attain sambodhi, the vajra which plunged into the waters, slips through the earth of gold (kāñcanamayī mahī) and comes to the surface of the earth where it forms the Diamond Seat (vajrāsana) more than a hundred paces in circumference (Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 8, p. 915b15-17).

For this Diamond Seat and the area of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍa) that surrounds it, see Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 198-200, note; Ceylon Encyclopedia, III, p. 207 and 217, s.v. Bodhimaṇḍa and Bodhipūjā. We may add that, in a figurative sense, the expression bodhimaṇḍa simply means the complete spiritual presence of the Dharma or Dharmakāya of the Buddhas.

²⁷⁰ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 161, l. 12-14: Tasya [Jambudvīpasya] madhye kāñcanamayyām prthivyām vajrāsanaṁ abhinirvṛttaṁ yasmin niṣadya sarve bodhisattvā vajropamaṁ samādhiṁ utpādayanti. nahi tam anyā āśrayaḥ pradeśo vā soḍhuṁ samarthah. – At the center of Jambudvīpa, resting on the earth of gold, the Diamond Seat where all the bodhisattvas sit to realize the diamond-like concentration. No other place, no other location is able to support the Bodhisattva [in this concentration].

2) According to others, the Earth (prthivī) rests on the Circle of gold (kāñcanamaya maṇḍala or kāñcanamayī mahī); the Circle of gold rest on the Vajra; from the [upper] point of the Vajra arises a terrace (prāsāda) similar to a lotus flower (padmapuṣpa); just above, it supports the place where the Bodhisattva is sitting and prevents it from sinking This is why the area of enlightenment [311a] (bodhimaṇḍa) where the Bodhisattva sits is called Vajra.

3) According to yet others, as soon as the Bodhisattva has realized sambodhi, every place where the Buddha takes up the four postures (īryāpatha) changes into diamond.

Question. – But the Vajra itself is deceptive for beings and exists as a result of actions: how can it support the Buddha?

Answer. – Even though the Vajra comes about by deception, it is much more solid (dr̥ḍha) than the Earth (prthivī) and nothing can surpass it. The Vajra plunges into the water (ap-) and there the nāga kings offer this solid substance to the Buddha and, as a result of the actions of his earlier lives (pūrvanivāsakarman), the Buddha has this solid support (supraṭiṣṭhasathāna).

Moreover, the Buddha transforms the Vajra and the four great elements (mahābhūta) into empty space (ākāśa), and this Ākāśa itself is not deceptive. The wisdom (prajñā) of the Buddha is not deceptive either. [Ākāśa and Prajñā] are both alike; this is why they can support him.

Ekakālātā

Fourteenth Section CARRYING OUT ABHISAMBOBODHI, PREACHING AND CONVERSIONS ALL IN THE SAME DAY

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 33, l. 14-34, l. 5; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 113, l. 5-13). – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he envisages this: “When I leave home and go forth, may I realize supreme complete enlightenment and turn the Wheel of Dharma on the same day”, and “When I turn the Wheel of Dharma, may innumerable incalculable beings obtain the purity of the dust-free and stainless eye of Dharma about dharmas; may innumerable and incalculable beings have their minds liberated from impurities by detachment from things; and may innumerable and incalculable beings become non-regressing in their course toward supreme complete enlightenment” (Punar aparāṁ Śāriputra bodhisattvena <2326> mahāsattvenaivam upaparīkṣamāṇena ‘kim ity ahaṁ yatraiva divase ‘bhiniṣkrāmeyaṁ tatraiva divase ‘nuttarāṁ samyaksambodhiṁ abhisambudhyeyaṁ tatraiva divase dharmacakraṁ pravartayeyam’ iti, ‘kim iti me dharmacakraṁ pravartayamānasyāprameyāṇām asaṁkhyeyānām sattvānām virajo vīgatacalaṁ dharmeṣu dharmacakṣur viśuddham, aprameyāṇām asaṁkhyeyānām sattvānām anupādāyāsravebhyaś cittāni vimucyeraṁ, aprameyā asaṁkhyeyāḥ sattvā avavartikā bhavyur anuttarāyām samyaksambodhāv’ iti prajñāpāramitāyām śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. -

I. BECOMING BUDDHA AND PREACHING THE DHARMA THE SAME DAY

In unfortunate ages (kalpakaṣāya),²⁷¹ among beings of wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭika), in order to eliminate the wrong views of beings, some bodhisattvas devoted themselves zealously to very austere practices (duṣkaracaryā). Thus, in the Uruvilvā forest, the Buddha Śākyamuni ate only one grain of sesame (tila), one grain of rice (taṇḍula).²⁷² The heretics (tīrthika) said: “Even though he practiced austerities, our former teacher could not follow them for more than six years”,²⁷³ and other men said: “The Buddha is undergoing today the painful retribution (duḥkhavipāka) of bad actions (akuśalakarma) of his former lives.”²⁷⁴ There are some bodhisattvas who believe that the Buddha really suffered those pains; that is why they say to themselves: “When I go forth, may I realize abhisambodhi on that same day.”

Moreover, there are some bodhisattvas who go forth (abhinīṣkramanti) during fortunate times. Thus *Ta-t'ong-houe*i (Mahābhijñāñāna), in search of abhisambodhi, sat cross-legged (pariyāṇkam ābhujya) for ten lesser kalpas (antarakalpa) until <2327> he attained abhisambodhi.²⁷⁵ Learning this, some bodhisattvas say to themselves: “May I attain abhisambodhi on the same day that I go forth.”

There are some bodhisattvas who, after having realized abhisambodhi, do not immediately turn the Wheel of Dharma (na sadyo dharmacakram pravartayanti).

a. Thus, for twelve years after he had attained abhisambodhi, the Buddha Jan-teng (Dīpaṃkara) only emitted light rays (raśmi) and, as there was no one to understand him, did not preach the Dharma.²⁷⁶

²⁷¹ In his translation of the Lotus (T 262), Kumārajīva renders the expression kalpakaṣāya of the Sad. puṇḍ., p. 43, l. 4; 65. l. 13, by Ngo che. The kalpakaṣāya is one of the five corruptions (Kośa, III, p. 193).

²⁷² On the fast and mortifications of Śākyamuni at Uruvilvā, see p. 12F, n. 1.

²⁷³ This was the thought of the Fortunate Five: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 247; Saṃghabhedā, I, p. 108, etc.

²⁷⁴ The nine torments endured by the Buddha set a doctrinal problem which have been fully discussed above, p. 507-514F. We may add to the references given in the note on p. 509F the Mūlasarv. Vin., Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part I, p. 211-218. According to the Hīnayānists, by these torments and illnesses the Buddha expiated the wrong-doings of his former existences. For the Mahāyānists and the Traité (p. 517F, 1512F), these were apparent faults and fictitious torments simulated by the Buddha for the benefit of others.

²⁷⁵ Sa. Puṇḍarīka, p. 160: Atha khalu bhiksavo daśānām antarakalpānām atyayena sa bhagavān Mahābhijñāñānābhībhūṣ tathāgato 'rhan samayaksambodho 'nuttarāṃ samayaksambodhim abhisambuddhaḥ.

Compare Gilgit recension, ed. S. Watanabe, p. 76, and the Kashgar recension, ed. H. Toda, I, p. 28.

²⁷⁶ Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 98, p. 506a24 seq.: The bodily brilliance (prabhā) of the tathāgata arhat samayaksambuddha Dīpaṃkara shone and illumined the city of Dīpavatī. Its perimeter was one yojana. For twelve years there was no difference between day and night. – Ibid., k. 183, p. 916b19-20: The buddha Dīpaṃkara turned the wheel of Dharma in the city of Dīpavatī on Mount Ho-li-to-lo (?).

It follows that, for the twelve years following his enlightenment, Dīpaṃkara did his buddha-work by emitting an especially brilliant light. Then, when he had found listeners capable of understanding, he turned the Wheel of Dharma during a first sermon.

b. Also, the Buddha Siu-chan-to (Suśānta) who was about to become buddha but had no-one to receive his teachings, created a fictive buddha (nirmītabuddha) who, for a whole kalpa, preached the Dharma and saved beings, whereas Suśānta himself had already entered parinirvāṇa.²⁷⁷

c. Also, the Buddha Śākyamuni, having become buddha, waited 57 days before preaching the Dharma.²⁷⁸

Learning this, some bodhisattvas say to themselves: “May <2328> I turn [311b] the Wheel of Dharma immediately when I become buddha.”

II. SIMULTANEOUSLY PREACHING AND CONVERTING²⁷⁹

²⁷⁷ The Buddha Suśānta has already been mentioned above (p. 418F). The Pañcaviṃśati speaks of him twice:

T 223, k. 21, p. 374c26-29: Once there was a buddha called Suśānta. In order to save bodhisattvas, he created a buddha by emanation (nirmāṇa), then himself entered into parinirvāṇa. For half a kalpa, this fictive buddha (nirmītabuddha) did the work of a buddha and, after having made the prediction (vyākaraṇa), entered into parinirvāṇa. All the beings in the world said that the Buddha was really parinirvanized, but, O Subhūti, fictive beings are really without birth or cessation.

T 223, k. 23, p. 390c4-6: The Buddha Suśānta attained anuttarā samyak sambodhi and, for the followers of the three Vehicles, he turned the Wheel of Dharma. As there was nobody to receive the prediction (vyākaraṇa) of Bodhisattva, Suśānta created a buddha by emanation, abandoned his life and entered into nirvāṇa without residue.

²⁷⁸ See above, p. 419F, n. 1.

²⁷⁹ To reach nirvāṇa, the ascetic must travel a path of seeing (darśanamārga) which involves 16 moments of mind, and a path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga) which involves 162 moments of mind. During this course, he enters into possession of four fruits of the path (mārgaphala), also called fruits of the religious life (śrāmaṇyaphala). He becomes srotaāpanna at the 16th moment of the darśanamārga, sakrdāgāmin, anāgāmin and arhat (asaikṣa) at, respectively, the 12th, 18th and 162nd moments of the bhāvanāmārga.

Buddhist texts use a stereotyped formula in describing the acquisition of the fruit of srotaāpanna: “In the venerable one there arises the eye of Dharma, without dust or stain”, sometimes completed by the saying: “He knows that all that has a beginning is subject to destruction.”

Pāli Concordance, II, p. 408. s.v. dharmacakkhu, p. 513, s.v. nirodhamma. - Āyasmato N. virajam vītamalam dammacakkhuṃ udapādi yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhamman ti.

Catuspariśad, p. 152; Saṃghabhedā, I, p. 136; Mahāvastu, III, p. 333, l. 19. - Āyusmati N. virajo vīgatamalam dharmeṣu dharmacakṣur utpannam (variant: viśuddam).

To designate the acquisition of the fourth fruit, the fruit of arhat, another formula is used: “In the venerable one, by detachment, the mind was liberated from impurities.”

Pāli Concordance, I, p. 348, s.v. āsavehi. – Tassa N. anupādāya āsavehi cittaṃ vimuccati (or vimucci).

Catuspariśad, p. 162, 170, 190, 322; Saṃghabhedā, I, p. 138, 139, 143; Nidānasamyukta, p. 170; Mahāvastu, III, p. 227, l. 4. - Āyusmato N. anupādāyasravebhyaḥ cittaṃ vimuktam (in plural, cittāni vimuktāni).

Access to a fruit of the path is a type of conversion usually brought about by a speech of the Buddha. Entry into possession of the fourth fruit, the fruit of arhat, is usually preceded by several sermons of the Buddha. Thus Ājñāta Kaundinya who, after Śākyamuni, was the second arhat in this world, attained the final goal after two times only: during the sermon on the four noble Truths, he became a srotaāpanna, in possession of the dharmacakṣus, but it was

There are Buddhas who save beings, but in limited numbers. Thus, when the Buddha Śākyamuni turned the Wheel of Dharma, <2329> Kiao-tch'en-jou (Kaunḍinya) was the only person to obtain the first [fruit] of the Path (prathamam mārgaphalam, i.e., srotaāpattiphala) and 80,000 devas also obtained the purity of the dust-free and stainless eye of Dharma (virajo vigatamalaṃ dharmeṣu dharmacakṣur viśuddham).²⁸⁰ Learning that, some bodhisattvas [as here] make the following wish (prañidhāna): “When I turn the wheel of the Dharma, may innumerable incalculable beings obtain the purity of the dust-free stainless Dharma eye.”

When the Buddha Śākyamuni first turned the Wheel of Dharma, a single bhikṣu [namely Kaunḍinya] and some devas obtained the first [fruit of the path, the srotaāpattiphala], but nobody obtained arhathood or the bodhi of the bodhisattvas. This is why some bodhisattvas, [as here], make the following wish: “When I become Buddha, may the minds of innumerable incalculable beings, by detachment in regard to things, have their minds liberated from the impurities, and may innumerable incalculable beings become irreversible in their course to supreme complete enlightenment.”

Question. – But in all the Buddhas, the magical power (rddhibala), qualities (guṇa) and salvific activity (sattvapariṭrāṇa) are the same;²⁸¹ why then do these bodhisattvas make such wishes (prañidhāna)?

Answer. – A single Buddha can create innumerable incalculable bodies by transformation (nirmāṇa) and save beings by them. However, in the universes (lokadhātu) some are pure (pariśuddha) and some are only at the end of the sermon on non-self that his mind was liberated from impurities and he became arhat (cf.

Samghabhedā, I, p. 136, l. 15-16, and p. 138, l. 6-7).

The Samghabhedāvastu of the Mūlasarv. Vinaya gives the list of the first 61 arhats and relates the historical detail of their final conversion.

- 1) The Buddha Śākyamuni.
- 2) Ājñāta Kaunḍinya (I, p. 138)
- 3-6) The other four members of the Fortunate Group (p. 139).
- 7) Yaśas (p. 143).
- 8-11) The 50 young men of Benares (p. 148).

This list also appears in Catuspariśad (p. 162, 170, 180, 208, 212) and with slight differences, in the Pāli Vinaya (I, p. 14, 18, 19, 20).

These conversions of limited number were never instantaneous and, to bring them to completion, the Buddha himself had to intervene several times with his encouragement and advice.

The bodhisattva pictured here by the Prajñāpāramitā wishes that, at his first sermon, innumerable beings would accede instantaneously to the fruits of the path. A bold, not to say unrealizable wish, but quite to the honor of the bodhisattva.

²⁸⁰ The Traité cites Sarvāstivādin sources textually, the Catuspariśad, p. 152, and the Samghabhedā, I, p. 136: Asmin khalu dharmaparyāye bhāṣyamāṇe āyuṣmata ājñātaKaunḍinyasya virajo vigatamalaṃ dharmeṣu dharmacakṣur utpannam aśītīnāṃ ca devatāsahasrāṇām. – The Pāli Vinaya (I, p. 11, l. 32-35) does not mention the gods, whereas the Mahāvastu (III, p. 333, l. 19-334, l. 1) mentions 18 koṭi of devas.

²⁸¹ On the similarities and differences among the Buddhas, see Kośa, VII, p. 80-82, and notes.

impure (aparīśuddha). The bodhisattvas see or hear it said that some buddhas, by austerity (duṣkaracaryā), have attained abhisambodhi with difficulty and have not immediately turned the Wheel of Dharma. Thus, for example, <2340> the Buddha Śākyamuni realized abhisambodhi only after six years of austerity and, when he first turned the Wheel of Dharma, nobody obtained the bodhi of the arhats, still less the bodhi of the bodhisattvas.²⁸² This is why these bodhisattvas, not knowing that the buddhas are equal in power, make the wishes [mentioned here in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra]. Nevertheless, the magical power (rddhibala) and the qualities (guṇa) are identical (sama) and without difference (nirviśiṣṭa) in all the buddhas.

Ekadharmadeśana

Fifteenth Section BRINGING INNUMERABLE BEINGS TO ARHATHOOD BY A SINGLE SERMON

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 34, l. 5-7; Śatasāhastikā, p. 113, l. 13-16). – The bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he envisages thus: “When I attain supreme complete enlightenment, may there be an immense incalculable saṃgha of śrāvakas, and may a single preaching of the Dharma be enough that, in one single session, [these innumerable incalculable śrāvakas] become arhats (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvenaivam upaparīkṣamānena ‘kim iti me ‘nuttarāṃ samyaksambodhīm abhisambuddhasyāpameya ‘saṃkheyaḥ śrāvakasamgha bhaved ekadharmadeśanayā cāpameyā asaṃkhyeyāḥ śrāvakā ekāsanikā arhanto bhavyur’ iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

1) There are Buddhas whose śrāvakasamgha is limited.

Thus, the Buddha Śākyamuni had a samgha of 1250 bhikṣus (ardhatrayodaśāni bhikṣuśatāni).²⁸³ <2331>

²⁸² Actually, as we have just seen, after the first sermon of the Buddha at Benares, Kaunḍinya and the gods obtained just the fruit of srotaāpanna.

²⁸³ At Uruvilva, Śākyamuni conferred ordination to a thousand Jāṭilas, disciples of the three Kāśyapa brothers; soon after, he repeated the ordination at Rājagṛha where he admitted into his order 250 disciples of the heretic Saṃjaya, brought by Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana. In the company of these 1250 bhikṣus, the Teacher traveled through Magadha, and this invasion of yellow robes outraged the population: “The śramaṇa Gautama”, they said, “is aiming at bringing about the absence of children, widowhood, the extinction of the family. He has just ordained as monks the thousand Jāṭilas, then the two hundred and fifty parivrajakas of Saṃjaya, and here many young people of good family in the country of Magadha are taking up the religious life under the direction of the śramaṇa Gautama” (Pāli Vinaya, p. 43; Catuspariśad, p. 394; Mahāvastu, III, p. 90).

Many other ordinations were subsequently performed, but it remained understood that Śākyamuni’s samgha consisted of 1250 bhikṣus: aḍḍhatelasa bhikkhusata (Vin. I, p. 220, l. 20; 224, l. 6; 249, l. 13; Dīgha, I, p. 47, l. 4; 49, l. 15; Saṃyutta, I, p. 192, l. 10).

Kāśyapa prostrated to the feet of the Blessed One and said: “The Blessed One is my teacher; I am his disciple” (Saṭṭhā me Bhagavā, sāvako ham asmi). [Kośabhāṣyā, p. 212, l. 3 and 6: There are ten kinds of ordination (upasampad)...; the 4th, by recognizing the Blessed One as teacher, in the case of Mahākāśyapa (daśavidhā upasampad iti... śāṣṭur abhyupagamān mahākāśyapasya)].

The Blessed One encouraged Kāśyapa and, having encouraged him, he arose from his seat and went away. Then Kāśyapa said: “For seven days while I was imperfect, I enjoyed the food [offered] by the land; on the eighth day, perfect knowledge was produced in me.”

This comment confirms the assertion of the Traité in terms of which Kāśyapa, when he saw the Buddha, obtained the first fruit of the Path, then, eight days later, became arhat. Actually, by recognizing the Blessed One as teacher, he ‘entered into the stream of nirvāṇa’ (srotaāpanna) and this recognition constituted his ordination. Eight days later, perfect knowledge (āññā) was produced in him and he became arhat.

Kāśyapa’s assertion which Bakkula will attribute to him (Majjhima, III, p. 127, l. 7-8) is worded in Pāli as follows: Sattāham eva kho ahaṃ, āvuso, sāṇo raṭṭhapiṇḍaṃ bhuñji, atha aṭṭhamiyaṃ aññā udapādi.

‘Enjoying the food of the land’ seems to be out of context, for the quest for food is the job of all monks, perfect as well as imperfect. Sāṇa, which I [Lamotte] have translated above as ‘imperfect’ is a rare word. According to the Commentary of the Saṃyutta, II, p. 199, l. 1, it means, etymologically, sa-ina, ‘in debt’; in the figurative sense, sa-kilesa, ‘with passions’. The commentary does not specify which ones, but as sāṇa is opposed here to aññā, the perfect knowledge of the saints, we could take it that it is all the passions to be abandoned by seeing the truths, or darśanaheyakleśa (cf. Kośa, V, p. 13).

The sāṇa would be something like a good worldly person (prthagjana) practicing the three śikṣā (high morality, high thought, high wisdom) in view of the destruction of the impurities (saikṣa). The expression saikṣa prthagjanakalyāṇaka is time-honored (Divya, p. 419, l. 17; 429, l. 17).

The Commentary of the Anguttara, I, p. 183, l. 8-10, has it that Kāśyapa had been worldly (puthujjana) during the seven days that preceded his coming to arhathood (sattadivasamattaṃ puthujjano hutvā aṭṭhame aruṇe ... arahattaṃ pāpunī).

Judging from the Chinese versions, the assertion made here by Kāśyapa was formulated differently in the Sanskrit Saṃyukta:

T 99, k. 41, p. 303c1-2: As for myself, for eight days, it was by practicing (śikṣ-) the Dharma that I received alms-food; on the ninth day, I produced [the fruit] of aśaikṣa.

T 100, k. 6, p. 418c14-15: As for myself, for eight days, as śaikṣa, I obtained the [first] three fruits [: fruits of srotaāpanna, sakrādāgāmin and anāgāmin], and on the ninth day, I destroyed all the impurities (āsrava) and became arhat.

Compare Mahāvastu, III, p. 53, l. 7-9: Sa khalv aham, āyuṣmann Ānanda, bhagavatā iminā ovādena ovāditto aṣṭhāham evābhūsi śaikṣo sakaraṇiyo navame yevāññāṃ ārāgaye. – And as for myself, O venerable Ānanda, encouraged by this exhortation of the Blessed One, for eight days I was yet a śaikṣa having still something to be done, and, on the ninth day exactly, I attained perfect knowledge].

- Here, in abridged form, is the rest of the Cīvarasutta of the Saṃyutta, II, p. 221. It is Kāśyapa who is speaking:

Then the Blessed One, going off the path, sat down at the foot of a tree. Then I folded into four and spread out my saṃghāṭi made of pieces of cloth, and I said to the Blessed One: “May the Lord sit here; this will make me happy for a long time!”

Ānanda first obtained the fruit of srotaāpanna, then after having served the Buddha for twenty-five years and after the Buddha’s parinirvāṇa, he became arhat.²⁸⁷

Thus these arhats did not obtain the four [fruits] of the Path simultaneously. This is why the bodhisattva [here] wishes that innumerable śrāvakas become arhats in a single session (ekāsanika) in the course of a single sermon of the Dharma. <2335>

Sixteenth Section LEADING INNUMERABLE BODHISATTVAS TO THE STATE OF AVAIVARTIKA BY MEANS OF A SINGLE SERMON

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 34, l. 4-5; Śatasāhasrika, p. 113, l. 16-17). – “May I have an immense incalculable saṃgha of bodhisattva-mahāsattvas and, in the course of a single sermon of the Dharma, may innumerable incalculable bodhisattvas become non-regressing” (‘Kim iti me ‘prameyo ‘saṃkhyeyo bodhisattvānaṃ mahāsattvānaṃ saṃgho bhaved ekadharmadeśanayā cāprameyā asaṃkhyeyā bodhisattvā avavartikā bhaveyur’ iti).

Śāstra. –

The Blessed One sat down on the indicated seat and said to me: “Your saṃghāṭi made of pieces of cloth, O Kāśyapa, is soft.” – “May the lord accept my saṃghāṭi out of pity for me!”

“Will you wear, O Kāśyapa, my worn out rags?” – “Yes, I will wear them, Lord.”

Then I gave to the Blessed One my saṃghāṭi made of pieces of cloth and I received in return the rags of hempen cloth, so worn-out, of the Blessed One.

²⁸⁷ Ānandasutta of the Saṃyutta, III, p. 105-106 (Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 10, p. 66a5-b5): At the Jetavana in Śrāvastī, Ānanda commented to his colleagues how useful (navaka) Pūrṇa Maitrāyaṇiputra had been to them by teaching them that the notion of “I am” (asmi) comes from the five aggregates and by making them see that the latter are impermanent. Ānanda ended his comment by saying: Idaṃ ca pana me āyasmato puṇṇassa Manatāniputtassa dhammadesanaṃ sutvā dhammo abhisameto. “When I had understood this teaching of the Dharma by venerable Pūrṇa Maitrāyaṇiputra, the Dharma was understood by me.” The long-winded speech of the Saṃyukta (l. c.) is more accurate and more complete: “When I had heard this teaching, I obtained the perfectly pure dust-free and stainless eye of the Dharma (virajo vigatamalaṃ dharmacakṣur viśuddham): since then, I have always preached this Dharma to the fourfold assembly, but I do not preach it to the anyatīrthikas, śramaṇas, brāhmaṇas and parivrājakas.” This then is the first fruit of the Path, the fruit of srotaāpanna which Ānanda obtained at that time: see also the Commentaries of the Saṃyutta, II, p. 308, l. 24-25 and the Theragāthās in Psalms of the Brethren, p. 349, etc.

- Ānanda was the Buddha’s attendant (upasthāyaka) for the last twenty-five years of his life. To the references noted above, p. 94F, n.1, and 1675F, n. 1, add Saṃghabeda, II, p. 59-64.

- As we have seen above, p. 100F, Ānanda realized arhathood after the Buddha’s parinirvāṇa, at the time of the Council of Rājagṛha.

This is what the bodhisattva wishes here.

1) Most often the Buddhas have śrāvakas as saṃgha and do not have a special saṃgha of bodhisattvas, like Maitreya, Mañjuśrī, etc. Since the Buddha Śākyamuni did not have a special bodhisattva saṃgha, he entered into his śrāvaka saṃgha and sat there.

There are buddhas who, preaching the Dharma in reference to the single Vehicle (ekaṃ yānam ārabhya), choose for themselves an exclusively bodhisattva saṃgha.

Finally, there are buddhas who have a mixed (miśra) saṃgha where śrāvakas and bodhisattvas are mingled. Thus, in the buddhafiield of Buddha Amita, the bodhisattva saṃgha is numerous and the śrāvaka sangha is fewer in number.

This is why the bodhisattva wishes [here] “to have and immnse saṃgha of bodhisattvas.”

2) When certain buddhas first turn the Wheel of the Dharma, it happens that nobody becomes ‘non-regressing’ [in the progress to supreme complete bodhi].

This is why the bodhisattva [here] wishes that “in the course of his first sermon of the Dharma, innumerable (aprameya) incalcukable (asaṃkhyeya) people become non-regressing.”

Aparimitaṃ āyuhpramāṇam

Seventeenth Section OBTAINING THE IMMENSE LONGEVITY AND IMMENSE RADIANCE OF THE BUDDHAS

Sūtra (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 34, l. 9-10; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 113, l. 18-114, l. 1). – The bodhisattva who wishes to obtain the limitless longevity and limitless radiance [of the Buddha] must practice the perfection of <2336> wisdom (Kim iti me 'parimitaṃ cāyuhpramāṇam bhaved ity aparimitā ca prabhāsampad bhaved iti prajñāpāramitāyām śīkṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. APPARENT LONGEVITY OF THE BUDDHAS

The length of life (āyuhpramāṇa) of the Buddhas is long, or short:²⁸⁸

²⁸⁸ Compare the Sanskrit Mahāvadāna, ed. Waldschmidt, p. 69-70 and its Chinese versions, T 1, k. 1, p. 2a4-8; T 2, k. 1, p. 150b27-c5; T 4, p. 159c11-15: Vipasyin 80,000; Śikhin 70,000; Viśvabhuj 60,000; Krakasuna 40,000; Kanakamuni 30,000; Kāśyapa 20,000; Śākyamuni 100. – Pāli Mahāpadāna in Dīgha, II, p. 3-4: Vipassī 80,000; Sikhi 70,000; Vessabhu 60,000; Konāgamana 30,000; Kassapa 20,000; Gotama 100.

See also above, p. 269F, 299-300F.

Pi-p'o-che (Vipaśyin), 84,000 years.

Kiu-leou-souan-t'o (Krakasunda), 60,000 years.

Kia-na-k'ie-meou-ni (Kanakamuni), 30,000 years.

Kia-chō (Kāśyapa), 20,000 years.

Che-kia-wen (Śākyamuni) a little more than 100 years.

Mi-lō (Maitreya), 84,000 years.²⁸⁹

The ordinary radiance (prabhā) of Buddha Śākyamuni is one armspan (vyāma); that of Maitreya, ten lis.²⁹⁰

II. REAL LONGEVITY OF THE BUDDHAS

The life-span (āyuhpramāna) and radiance (prabhā) of the buddhas are each of two kinds: i) hidden (tiraṣkṛta), ii) apparent (āviṣkṛta). [Those that are hidden] are real (bhūta); [those that are apparent] are manifested for the benefit of beings.

The real life-span is limitless (aparimita); the apparent life-span is limited amd measured for the benefit of beings.

The real life-span of the buddhas cannot be short (alpa). Why? Because the buddhas are endowed with causes and conditions that lead to a long life (dīrghāyuhṣaṃvartanīya).

[Bako brahmā sutta.]²⁹¹ – Thus, for having once (pūrvanivāse) saved the life of some villagers, P'o-k'ie-fan (Bakabrahmā) obtained an immense (aprameya) incalculable (asaṃkhyeya) lifespan. <2338>

²⁸⁹ Cf. Madhyama, T 26, k. 13, p. 510b8; Divyāvadāna, p. 66, l. 21-22.

²⁹⁰ Vyāmaprabhā of Śākyamuni, above, p. 277F, 454-455F. – Mahādhyuti of Maitreya, in Maitreyavyākaraṇa, ed. Lévi, p. 136, v. 47.

²⁹¹ Bako brahmā sutta of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 142-144; Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 1195, k. 44, p. 324b3-c16; T 100, no. 108, k. 6, p. 412b7-c18; Sanskrit fragments in Mahākarmavibhaṅga, ed. Lévi, p. 34, l. 8-35, l. 14.

In Sanskrit the sūtra is entitled Bakapratyekabrahmasūtra. The interlocutor of the Buddha is Bakabrahmā, also called (in T 99) Bakabrahmadeva.

This sūtra consists of two parts, one part in prose (which occurs in Majjhima, I, p. 326) and one part in stanzas.

The following is a summary of the Pāli recension:

At that time the Blessed One was at Sāvatti, in the Jeta forest in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍika. At that time, Bakabrahmā conceived a wrong view. He said: “Our realm is permanent (nicca), solid (dhuva), eternal (sassata), definitive (kevala), not subject to disappearing (acavanadhamma). It is not born, it does not live, does not die, does not disappear and is not reborn; apart from it, there is no exit [from saṃsāra].”

The Blessed One read his mind and in the time it takes for a strong man to extend his folded arm or to fold his extended arm, he disappeared from the Jetavana and appeared in the Brahmaloaka.

Seeing the Blessed One coming from afar, Bakabrahmā said to him: “Come, O Lord, be welcome; it has taken a long time for you to come here.”

The Blessed One said to Baka: “You are wrong, O Baka; you are truly in error in claiming that your realm is permanent, etc.”

Baka – We are seventy-two, O Gotama, who have accomplished meritorious actions. We are sovereign beings (vasavattin) who have gone beyond birth and death. Our ultimate rebirth as Brahmā comes from the Vedas. Many are the people who invoke us.

The Blessed One – Brief and not long is your life that you consider to be long. I myself know, O Brahmā, that your life-span will be a hundred thousand nirabhūda.

Baka – Blessed One, if you are the “Seer of eternity” who has triumphed over birth, old age and sorrow, tell me what have been my previous vows and my good practices, which I know.

- Four jātakas describing the ups and downs of Baka during his earlier lives explain why, without being eternal, he now enjoys a long life. The jākata to which the Traité alludes here is first in the Chinese versions of the Saṃyukta, but second in the Pāli Saṃyutta:

1) Saṃyutta, I, p. 143, l. 24-27:

Yam eṇikulasmim janam gahitāṃ / amocayī gayhakaṃ niyyamānaṃ // tan-te purāṇaṃ vatasīlavattaṃ / suttappabuddho va anusarāmi //

On the banks of the Eṇī (= the Ganges), you freed a crowd who had been seized, captured and led away. This vow and this good action that once were yours, I remember them like someone who wakes up from a dream.

2) Mahākarmavibhaṅga, p. 34, l. 14-35, l. 6:

Yā eṇikūle janatāṃ grhitāṃ.

Eṇī nāma nadi / yasyā anukūle rājā kaścid grhitāḥ pratamitreṇa Himavantam anupraviśya / sa nīyamāna eva vadhyam prāptaḥ sabalavāhanaḥ / tena ṛṣibhūtena ṛddhyā vātavarsaṃ muktaṃ / sa copāyena pratyamitrajanakāyo vibhrāmitaḥ sa rājā mokṣitaḥ / tat te dvitīyaṃ vrataśīlavṛttaṃ / svapnād vibuddho ‘nusmarāmi //

sa ca rāja Bodhisattvo babhūva //

On the banks of the Eṇī the prisoner crowd

The Eṇī is a river. On its banks, a certain king was seized by his enemy who took him away to the Himavat. This king taken by force with his army and his chariots was abjured to be put to death. [Baka] who was then a hermit magically unleashed the wind and the rain. By this trick, the enemy armies were dispersed and the king was saved. This king was none other than the future Buddha [in an earlier existence].

3) Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 44, p. 324c1-4.

Once the inhabitants of a village (grāmaka) were captured and robbed by thieves (caura); but then you saved them all and they found freedom. On your part, this was a vow and a good action (vrataśīlavṛtta). As for myself, I remember this story (nidāna) as if I had come out of a dream (suptaprabuddha iva).

4) Saṃyukta, T 100, k. 6, p. 412c1-4:

In the world of the Brahmā gods (brahmaloka), the life-span does not surpass a half kalpa,²⁹² and this brahmadeva [Baka] is alone in having an immense longevity. Thus he conceived a wrong view <2339> (mīthyādrṣṭi) and said: “I alone am eternally subsistent (nityastha).”

The Buddha went to him and, to destroy this wrong view, told him a jākata [from which it emerges] that Bakabrahmā is enjoying such a long life for having formerly saved a village.

All the more reason that the life of the Buddha should be long, the Buddha who, from lifetime to lifetime, has saved innumerable incalculable beings, either by helping them with material goods (āmiśadravya) or by exchanging his life for theirs. Then why should not his lifespan surpass one hundred years?

Furthermore, the discipline of abstaining from taking life (prāṇātīpātaprativirati) is the karmic cause and condition leading to a long life (dīrghāyuhṣaṃvartanīya). In his great loving-kindness (mahāmettā), the Buddha has an affection (preman) for beings which penetrates to the marrow of the bones (asthimajjan). He is constantly dying for beings: why then would he destroy life?

Answer. – Jambudvīpa being bad, the life of the Buddha there must be short. In other places that are good, the life of the Buddha would be long.

Question. – If that is so, the Bodhisattva who is born in the palace <2340> of king Śuddhodana in this Jambudvīpa, who leaves home (abhinīṣkrāmati) and who realizes enlightenment (abhisambudhyate) is the Once there were thieves (caura) who looted and damaged a village (grāma), oppressed and tied up the inhabitants and escaped with great spoils. At the time, you manifested great bravery, saved all the people and as a result, they suffered no damage.

It is to this jākata that the Traité is alluding here. It is told in full in the Commentary of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 210-211, of which here is the translation:

Another time, the penitent [Baka] built himself a hut of leaves at the edge of the Ganges near a forest village. Brigands descended on this village one day and went away carrying with them the furniture, the livestock and the slaves. The oxen, the dogs and the people uttered great shouts. The penitent heard them; he wondered what it was, understood that a danger menaced the people and declared that, if he were alive, these beings would not perish. He entered into dhyāna based upon the superknowledges, then, emerging from it, he created an army facing the brigands by means of a mind of abhijñā. Blue with fear, the brigands thought that the king was certainly coming to attack them and, putting down their spoils, they took flight. The penitent ordered each person to take back his own property and that was so.

- Before taking rebirth in the Brahmāloka, Baka was a Buddhist monastic. It is said in the Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, k. 3, p. 461a13-15: There was an āyusmat named P’o-k’ie (Baka). Venerable Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana taught him the contents of the Dharma (dharmoddāna) and he became anāgāmin. After death, he was reborn among the Brahmadevas and had the name P’o-k’ie-fan (Bakabrahmā). When Kokālika, a disciple of Devadatta, accused Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana of misconduct, Bakabrahmā came down from the Brahmā heaven to defend his former teachers (see above, p. 807-809F) ²⁹² The Brahmā gods occupying the first dhyāna include three categories: the Brahmakāyikas, the Brahmapurohitas and the Mahābrahmās. For their size and their lifespan, see Hbbgīrin, p. 115a s.v. Bon. For the reasons just explained, Bakabrahmā was assured of an exceptionally long lifespan, but not eternal.

real Buddha; and in other places, by his magical power (rddhibala), he creates by emanation (nirmite) fictive buddhas who save beings.

Answer. – That is not correct. Why? Because, in the Jambudvīpa of the other universes, each one says to himself: “The Buddha here is the real Buddha; the Buddhas elsewhere are the fictive (nirmite) Buddhas.” How do we know that? In the Jambudvīpas of the other universes, if they know that the Buddha is fictive, they would not accept his teachings (śāsana) or his rules (śikṣāpada) with faith.

Let us take a strange universe where the human life-span (āyuhpramāṇa) is a kalpa; for these people, a buddha of one hundred years would not even have lived for a single one of their days; the people would merely scorn him (avamāna) and would not accept his teaching. The Buddha transforms the kalpa which these beings hold as real as he pleases.

[Śūraṃgamasamādhisūtra.]²⁹³ – This is what is said in the Cheou-leng-yen-king (Śūraṃgamasūtra): The life of the Buddha Chen-t'ong-pien-tchao (Vikurvaṇavairocana) is 700,000 incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa). The Buddha [Śākyamuni] said to Mañjuśrī: “That buddha is myself”, and the Buddha [Vairocana] in turn said: “The Buddha Śākyamuni is myself.”

From that we know that the life-span (āyuhpramāṇa) of the buddhas is [312b] truly limitless (aparimita). In order to save beings, the Buddhas manifest a long life (dīrgha) or a short life (alpa) [according to the circumstances]. As you said above (p. 2339F), the Buddha Śākyamuni who saves beings by his magical power (rddhibala) does not have an [apparent] life-span different from that of people; there is no need for him to live for a hundred years: in one single day he could perform his buddha activity (buddhakārya).

[Miracle of the multiplication of fictive Buddhas.]²⁹⁴ – Thus, one day Ānanda had the following thought: The bhagavat Jan-teng (Dīpaṃkara), the buddha Yi-ts'ie-cheng (Viśvabhū) and the buddha Pi-p'o-che (Vipaśyin) appeared during favorable ages; their life-spans (āyuhpramāṇa) were very long and they were able to fulfil their buddha activity (buddhakārya). My Buddha Śākyamuni has appeared in a bad age (kalpakaṣāya) and his life-span will be very short. Soon there will be no more Bhagavat and he will not be able to complete fully (paripṛ-) his buddha activity.

At that very moment, the Bhagavat entered into the concentration of the rising sun (sūryadayasamādhi) and created innumerable buddhas, as many as the rays (raśmī) of the sun spreading in the ten directions, by emanation (nirmāṇa) from his body. Each of these fictive buddhas (nirmītabuddha) was in the universes and each one there fulfilled his buddha activity: some preached the Dharma, others manifested the superknowledges (abhijñā), others were in samādhi, others took their meals: in these many ways, they did the work of the Buddha and saved beings.

On emerging from this concentration, the Buddha asked Ānanda: Did you see and hear all these things? - Ānanda answered: Yes, I saw them.

The Buddha asked Ānanda: Does the Buddha fulfill his buddha activity by such magical power (rddhibala)? - Ānanda replied: Supposing that the Buddha lived only a single day, even the plants (trṇakāṣṭha) of the great earth would all be saved, and beings also; all the more reason when he lives for a hundred years.

From that we know that the life-span of the buddhas is limitless (aparimita) but that, in order to save beings, they manifest either a long life or a short life.

Thus, when the rising sun is reflected (pratibhāṣate) in a body of water, it is regulated (anuvartate) by the size of the body of water; if it is large, the reflection lasts for a long time; if it is small, the reflection quickly disappears. When the sun lights up a mountain of lapis-lazuli (vaidūrya), crystal (sphaṭika) or pearl (maṇi), its reflection (pratibimba) lasts for a long time. When fire burns plants, if the latter are not numerous, it is quickly extinguished but if they are numerous, it lasts for a long time. On the pretext that there is no more fire in the place where it is extinguished, we cannot say that there were places where it burns for a long time.

The interpretation is the same in regard to the dimensions of the Buddha's radiance (buddhaprabhā).

²⁹³ Cf. Śūraṃgamasamādhi, French transl., p. 267-270.

²⁹⁴ See p. 531-535F, 1352-1353F. The Traité returns here for the third time to this sūtra which I [Lamotte] have not been able to identify exactly.

CHAPTER LII: ELIMINATION OF THE TRIPLE POISON

First Section ELIMINATING THE THREE POISONS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 34, l. 10-15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 114, l. 3-10). – The bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he envisages the following: “When I have attained supreme complete enlightenment, may there be no desire, no hatred, no delusion in my buddha-field and may even the name of the triple poison be absent” and, “From then on, may all beings be endowed with wisdom so that they recognize: “Good is generosity! Good is discipline! Good is self-mastery! Good is continence! Good is non-violence toward living beings!” (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvaivam upaparīkṣamaṇena ‘kim iti me ‘nuttarāṃ samyaksambodhim abhisambuddhasya tatra buddhakṣetre rāga dveṣamohā na bhaveyus triviṣaśabdo ‘pi na bhaved iti, ‘kim iti sarvasattvā evaṃrūpayā prajñāyā samanvāgatā bhaveyur yad evaṃ jānīran sādhu dānaṃ sādhu damaḥ sādhu saṃyamah sādhu brahmacaryaṃ sādhu avihimsā sarvaprāṇibhūteṣv’ iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

Triviṣakṣaya

I. ELIMINATING THE THREE POISONS FROM THE KṢETRA

Question. – If the universe [in question here] is free of the three poisons (triviṣa) as well as the name (śabda) of these poisons, why is the Buddha born there?

Answer. – Desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha) are called the three roots of evil (akuśalamūla):²⁹⁵ these are the dharmas that have the realm of desire (kāmadhātva) as their domain. When the Buddha speaks of desire, hatred and delusion, it is a question of [the roots of evil] belonging to the desire realm, but when <2344> he speaks of afflicted ignorance (kliṣṭāvidyā), the latter penetrates all three realms.²⁹⁶

There are buddha-fields that contain only (kevalam) men of desire: for these beings the bodhisattva [here] wishes that, at the time when he becomes Buddha, “in his universe there will be neither the three poisons (triviṣa) nor even the name of the three poisons (triviṣaśabda).” But there are also pure buddha-fields (pariśuddhabuddhakṣetra) that contain only non-regressing bodhisattvas (avaivartika) with body born from ²⁹⁵ Dīgha, III, p. 214; Anguttara, I, p. 201: Tīṇi akusalamūlāni. Lobho akusalamūlaṃ, doṣo akusalamūlaṃ, moho akusalamūlaṃ.

²⁹⁶ Afflicted ignorance (kliṣṭāvidyā) is present in the triple world: it is not moha, the root of evil but, more precisely, saṃmoha, confusion, in regard to the truths: cf. Kośa, V, p. 71.

the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya); they no longer have any passions (kleśa) but retain only the traces (vāsanā);²⁹⁷ for them the bodhisattva wishes that “even the name of the triple poison will be absent in his universe.”

Some say: When the bodhisattva formulates the vow to save all beings, beings are really not all saved. Similarly here, when he wishes that in his universe there would not be the name of the three poisons, it is clear that the three poisons will still be found there and will not be exhausted. Indeed, if there were no more triple poison, of what use would the Buddhas still be? If on earth there were no more great shadows (tamas) we would not need the light of the sun. As it is said in a sūtra:

[Abhavyasūtra].²⁹⁸ – “If three dharmas did not exist, the Buddha <2345> would not be born into the world, and if these three dharmas are not destroyed, it would be impossible (abhavya) to escape old age, sickness and death. These three dharmas are the three poisons.”

Finally, there are universes (lokadhātu) where beings, analyzing dharmas, say: “This is good (kuśala), that is not good (akuśala); this is bondage (bandhana), that is deliverance (mokṣa), etc.”;²⁹⁹ and they indulge in futile chatter (prapañca) about nirvāṇa of unique nature (ekalakṣaṇa-nirvāṇa). This is why the bodhisattva ²⁹⁷ As we have seen above, p. 1760F seq., the traces of the passions (kleśavāsanā) persist in the arhat and even in the avaivartika bodhisattvas of the eighth bhūmi; only the Buddha has eliminated them.

²⁹⁸ Abhavyasūtra of the Nidānasamyukta, p. 204-210 (Chinese versions, T 99, no. 346, k. 14, p. 95c17-06b24; T 99, no. 760, k. 28, p. 199c27-200a13) and Abhabbo sutta of Anguttara, V, p. 144-149. – Comparative study in E. Waldschmidt, Identifizierung einer Handschrift des Nidānasamyukta aus den Turfan-Funden, ZDMG, 107 (1957), p. 372-401; Sūtra of the Nidānasamyukta, BSOAS, XX (1957), p. 569-579.

Sanskrit: magadheṣu nid anam / traya ime bhikṣavo dharmā saṃvidyante anīṣṭā amanāpā lokasya / katame trayah / tadyathā vyādhir abhavyo vyādhim jarāṃ maraṇaṃ prahātum /

Pāli: tayo bhikkhave dhammā loke na saṃvijjeyyūṃ na thatāgato loke appahāya abhabbo jātim pahātum jaraṃ pahātum maraṇaṃ pahātum /

Transl. of the Sanskrit. – The story took place in Magadha. There are, O monks, three unpleasant, disagreeable and annoying things for the world. What are these three things? They are sickness, old age and death. If these three things, unpleasant, disagreeable and annoying to the world, did not exist, the Tathāgatas, saints, fully and rightly enlightened, would not be born in the world to throw light on the well-preached doctrine and discipline. But since the three things, unpleasant, disagreeable and annoying to the world, namely old age, sickness and death, do exist, the Tathāgatas, saints, rightly and fully enlightened, are born into the world to bring to light the well-preached doctrine and discipline. If one has not rejected three [other] things, one is incapable of avoiding sickness, old age and death. What are these three things? They are desire, hatred and delusion. If one has not rejected these three things, one is incapable of avoiding sickness, old age and death.

- The Traité has twice already referred to this sūtra: cf. p. 300F, n. 2; p. 543F, n. 1.

²⁹⁹ On these dualistic conceptions formally condemned by the Madhyamaka, see chap. VIII of the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 301-318; the distinction between bandhana and mokṣa is criticized, p. 306 at top of page.

hopes [here] that, in his universe, “beings do not produce the three poisons”, knowing full well that the true nature of the three poisons (triviṣadharma) is nirvāṇa.³⁰⁰ <2346>

II. ENDOWING THE KṢETRA WITH A SPECIAL WISDOM

Question. – [The bodhisattva hopes here that in his buddhakṣetra] “all beings are endowed with such a wisdom that...” What is this wisdom (prajñā)?

Answer. – This wisdom is the correct worldly view (laukikī samyagdr̥ṣṭi). In this correct worldly view, beings say: “There is generosity (asti dānam), there is [fruit of ripening] of good or bad actions (asti suḥṭaduṣṭkṛtānām karmānām vipākaphalam), there is a world here below and a world beyond (asty ayam loko 'sti paro lokah), there are arhats.”³⁰¹ Believing in the existence of good and bad actions, <2347>, they approve of generosity (dāna); believing in the existence of arhats, they approve of morality (śīla), they approve of concentration (samādhi), they approve of continence (brahmacarya). Having obtained the ³⁰⁰ The three poisons, rāga, dveṣa and moha are no longer to be rejected but rather to be taken, for they are themselves deliverances: Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 156, 264, 274, 286, 289, 310.

³⁰¹ The distinction between mundane (laukikī) and supramundane (lokottarā) samyagdr̥ṣṭi is canonical. Here the Traité reproduces almost literally the Cattārisakasutta of the Majjhima, III, p. 72, l. 4-20 (compare Saṃyukta, T 99, no. 28, p. 203a21-b2).

Sammādiṭṭhiṃ p' ahaṃ, bhikkhave, dvayaṃ vadāmi. Atthi, bhikkhave, sammādiṭṭhi sāsavā puññabhagiyaṃ upadhivepakkā; atthi, bhikkhave, sammādiṭṭhi ariyā ... paññindriyaṃ paññabalaṃ dhammavicayasambojjaṅgo sammādiṭṭhi maggaṅgā.

Transl. – I say, O monks, there are two kinds of right view. There is an impure right view contributing to merit and ending up in a rebirth; there is a noble supramundane pure right view, constituting a member of the Path.

What is the impure right view, contributing to merit and leading to a rebirth? There is generosity, there is sacrifice, there is oblation, there is fruit of ripening of good or bad actions, there is a world down here and a world beyond, there are in the world monks and brāhmaṇas of right progress and right conduct who, having realized this world and the other world by their own superknowledge, teach them,

What is the noble pure supramundane right view, constituting a member of the path? In a man of noble mind, of pure mind who is in possession of the noble Path and cultivates the noble Path, it is the wisdom, the faculty of wisdom, the power of wisdom, the factor of enlightenment called discrimination of dharmas, the right view constituting a factor of the path.

- In contrast to the heathen (mithyādr̥ṣṭika), the man with mundane right view respects the natural (or conventional law); he believes in the efficacy of rituals, in reward for good and punishment for evil, in the future life; he honors his parents and the deities; he venerates monks and brāhmaṇas. But this right mundane view is impure (sāsrava) because it rests on the belief in the self, in the ātman, which is a false belief. Although it contributes to gaining merit (punjabhāgiya) and leads to good rebirths in the higher destinies, it is incapable of putting an end to suffering and does not assure deliverance. On the other hand, the right supramundane view, not contaminated by belief in the self and which is a factor of the Path, is truly liberating.

power of right view (samyagdr̥ṣṭi), they approve of non-violence toward beings (avihiṃsā sarvaprāṇibhūteṣu). This mundane correct view (laukikī samyagdr̥ṣṭi) is the root (mūla) of wisdom free of impurities (anāsravā prajñā).

This is why the bodhisattva wishes here that the name of the three poisons is not found in his field.

Desire (rāga) is of two kinds: bad desire (mithyārāga) and simple desire; hatred (dveṣa) is of two kinds: bad hatred (mithyādveṣa) and simple hatred; delusion (moha) is of two kinds: bad delusion (mithyāmoha) and simple delusion.

Beings who are the victims of the three kinds of bad poisons (mithyāviṣa) are difficult to convert and save; those who are victims of the three kinds of simple poisons are easy to save. When the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speaks here of “eliminating the name of the three poisons”, it is a matter of eliminating the name of the three bad poisons.

As for the five expressions: “Good is generosity! (sādhu dānam), etc.”³⁰² [used here by the sūtra], see what has been said above (p. 504-506F) in the Fang-kouang chapter (Raśmipramokṣa).

Saddharmāvīpralopa

Second Section PREVENTING THE DISAPPEARANCE OF THE HOLY DHARMA

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 34, l. 16-17; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 114, l. 11-12). – The bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he wishes that, after his parinirvāṇa, there will be neither the disappearance of the Holy Dharma nor [313a] even the name of this disappearance ('Kim iti me parinirvṛtasya saddharmāntardhānaṃ na bhaved antardhānaśabdo 'pi na baved iti prajñāpāramoitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. - <2348>

Question. – If even the Buddha who is the king of the Dharma must disappear, why should his Dharma not disappear?

Answer. – As I have already said above, this was a wish (prañidhāna) of the bodhisattva, but is not itself realizable.

³⁰² The series of approvals introduced by sādhu is a stock phrase, present in the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras in the form of many variations: cf. Pañcaviṃśati p., 10, l. 7-8; 34, l. 14-15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 19, l. 7-8; 114, l. 8-9. The formula of Saṃghabheda, I, p. 73, l. 19-20 (sādhu damaḥ sādhu saṃyamaḥ sādhu arthacaryaḥ sādhu kuśalacaryaḥ sādhu kalyāṇacaryaḥ) is almost the same as that of Mahāvadānasūtra, ed. E. Waldschmidt, p. 128, For the Pāli wording, more developed, see Dīgha, II, p. 28, l. 31-33.

1) All conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharma) are the result of a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrīsamutpanna); how then would they subsist eternally (nityastha) and not perish?

The Buddha is like the full sun and the Dharma like the light that remains at the setting of the sun; why would this remaining light at sunset not disappear? It is only because the Dharma lasts for a long time and nobody sees it disappear that it is said not to disappear.

2) Moreover, the bodhisattva [of whom the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is speaking here] sees that among the Dharmas preached by the Buddhas, some remain for a long time (cirasthītika) and others do not. Thus the Dharma of Buddha Kāśyapa lasts seven days; the Dharma of Buddha Śākyamuni lasts for a thousand years.³⁰³ This is why the bodhisattva makes the following wish: “Although my Dharma is conditioned (saṃskṛta), I wish that it will be prolonged and not disappear, like fire (agni) that, on finding fuel (indhana), continues uninterruptedly.”

3) Moreover, the Dharma of the Buddhas is the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇām dharmatā). Now this true nature is without production (anutpāda), without destruction (anirōdha), without interruption (anuccheda), without permanence (aśāsvata), without one-ness (anekārtha), without multiplicity (anānārtha), without coming (anāgama), without going (anirgama),³⁰⁴ without grasping (anupādāna), without agitation (ānīḥya), without attachment (asaṅga), without support (anāśraya), non-existent (asat), like nirvāṇa. Dharmatā being like that, how could it disappear (antardhāna)?

Question. – Dharmatā being like that, all the buddhadharmas are necessarily without destruction (anirōdha).

Answer. – Defined in this way, the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇām dharmatā) is indestructible. Nevertheless, there are people who, out of false conceptualization (saṃkalpa),³⁰⁵ grasp characteristics in things <2349> (dharmaṣu nimitāny udgrhṇanti) - characteristics of cessation, etc. (vināśādilakṣaṇa) – and resort to dualistic theories, believing in disappearances (antardhāna). But in the true nature of things (dharmāṇām dharmatā) there is no disappearance.

4) Finally by practicing the obstacle-free (anāvāraṇadharmā) prajñāpāramitā, the bodhisattva accumulates immense qualities (aprameyaguṇa) and, conforming to his original vow (pūrvapraṇidhāna), his Holy Dharma continues [in time] and nobody sees it disappear. However, everything happens like the shooting of the bow and arrow: when the archer shoots an arrow up into the air, the arrow goes far and, even though nobody sees it disappear, it necessarily finally drops.³⁰⁶

Buddhanāmasāvāṇa

³⁰³ After Śākyamuni’s parinirvāṇa, his Dharma persists for a thousand years: the Dharma properly called (saddharma, tcheng-fa) lasts 500 years and the counterfeit Dharma (pratirūpakadharmā, siang-fa) for another 500 years. On the disappearance of the Holy Dharma of Śākyamuni, see details in Lamotte, Histoire de bouddhisme indien, p. 210-222.

³⁰⁴ These are the eight ‘not’s’ of Nāgārjuna: cf. p. 326F; 1638F, n.4.

³⁰⁵ Here again Kumārajīva uses the characters yi-siang-fen-pie to translate saṃkalpa.

³⁰⁶ An example already used above, p. 1261F.

Third Section BRINGING INNUMERABLE BEINGS TO ABHISAṂBODHI BY HEARING THE NAME OF THE BUDDHAS

PRELIMINARY NOTE

This is the last wish formulated by the bodhisattva presented here by the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra.

This is a bodhisattva who has made the resolution (cittotpāda) to attain abhisambodhi some day and, by virtue of that, to become fully and completely enlightened. The sūtra gives neither the name of this bodhisattva nor the name he will take once he becomes buddha. The bodhisattva formulates the following wish: “When I shall have attained abhisambodhi, may beings living in each of the ten directions in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges also be settled into abhisambodhi as soon as they hear my name.” Only the hearing of the name (nāmadheya) is required; there is no question of meditation or of recollection (anusmṛti) of the name or of vocal invocation.

In order to realize this wish, the bodhisattva must “practice the perfection of wisdom” (prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śīkṣitavyam), i.e., conceive it and practice it in the spirit of the prajñāpāramitā.

From the point of view of relative truth, this wish is unrealizable. No buddha has ever saved all beings at one time, whether by the hearing of his name or by any other means. The proof of this is that in the innumerable universes distributed throughout the ten directions, buddhas have appeared, now appear, and will appear forever in order to save beings from old age, sickness and death. If the whole world had been saved once and for all, the appearance of buddhas would be useless.

On the other hand, from the point of view of absolute truth, the wish formulated here by the bodhisattva is completely realizable; furthermore, it has already been realized. How does the bodhisattva practice it? By practicing the prajñāpāramitā. What is there to say? The answer is given to us by the sūtra itself (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 38, l. 16-39, l. 1; Śatasāhastikā, p. 119, l. 18-120, l. 5):

Tathā hi kṛtrimaṃ nāma pratidharmam / te ca kalpitāḥ / āgantukena nāmadheyena vyavahrīyante / tāni bodhisattvaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caran sarvanāmāni <2350> na samanupaśyaty asamanupaśyan nābhiviśate / punar aparaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ carann evam upaparīkṣate nāmamātram idaṃ yaduta bodhisattva iti / nāmamātram idaṃ yaduta bodhi iti / nāmamātram idaṃ yaduta prajñāpāramiteti / nāmamātram idaṃ yaduta prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caryeti /

“Actually the name is fictive; it is an anti-dharma; the things [which it designates] are imaginary and expressed by a sound which is foreign to them. The bodhisattva engaged in the perfection of wisdom does not consider all these names and, not considering them, does not become attached to them. Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva engaged in the perfection of wisdom determines this: bodhisattva is only a name, bodhi is only a name, buddha is only a name, prajñāpāramitā is only a name and the practice of prajñāpāramitā is only a name.”

That being so, the bodhisattva who wishes to lead all beings to abhisambodhi and buddhahood by the simple hearing of his name is the victim of an illusion, since beings, the buddha, abhisambodhi and the bodhisattva himself are purely imaginary. The prajñāpāramitā, itself only a name, is the absence of all illusion, or in other words, the destruction of wrong views. That is the truth!

Empty of content though it may be and precisely because it is empty of content, the Truth is liberating: Veritas liberabit vos. It is omnipotent and there is no wish that it cannot realize, for the good reason that there is no wish to be realized.

The buddhas and the great bodhisattvas of the tenth bhūmi who have the Prajñāpāramitā as mother and the Dharmadhātu as body are mingled with the Truth and, like it, are all-powerful.

The hearing of the name of the buddhas (nāmadheyaśravaṇa) naturally is followed by a reflection (manasikāra), more or less prolonged, on these same buddhas, and this reflection is often followed by an oral invocation (ākṛanda), “Namo buddhāya”.

The spiritual practice of buddhānusmṛti commonly practiced by monks and lay people begins with a settling of the mind (samādhi) on the ten names (adhivacana) of the buddhas (cf. p. 124-144F; 1340-1342F): it is placed among the dharmaś of the Path leading to nirvāṇa.

Pure Land Buddhism has been the subject of much research recently. The Japanese production has reached unimaginable proportions and H. Nakamura has reported on it in Survey of Mahāyāna Buddhism, Journal of Intercultural Studies, no. 3, 1976, p. 112-120. The primordial aim of this religious movement has been to assure its adherents a rebirth in the paradise of the buddhas without, nevertheless, excluding access to complete perfect enlightenment at a much later date. The method proposed to realize these objectives is presented as being easy and the names of the buddhas plays a major role in it. In order to take rebirth in Sukhāvātī, the Western Paradise, it is necessary first to hear the name of the Buddha Amitābha or Amitayus, but this is only a prior condition. Next, it is necessary - and this is essential - to dedicate to it a mind free of any distraction (avikṣipta). Opinions differ on the length of this reflection (manasikāra) or this commemoration (anusmṛti): for some, one single thought (ekacitta), i.e., a single mind-moment, is enough; others say that it should continue for ten thoughts, for one day and one <2351> night, for ten days and ten nights, or even that it should be prolonged indefinitely. This commemoration sees its efficacy increase if it takes place at the moment of death (see above, p. 1534-1539F) and if the ascetic formulates the vow (prañidhāna) to be reborn in Sukhāvātī. In return for this, the dying person will see, coming to him, the Buddha Amitābha surrounded by a saṃgha of bhikṣus and bodhisattvas and, after his death, will accede to the Western Paradise. However, this favor will be denied to those who have committed the five sins of immediate retribution (ānantarya) or who have rejected the Holy Dharma (saddharmapratikṣepa): cf. the Small Sukhāvātyūha, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 202, l. 11-19; Large Sukhāvātyūha, ed. A. Ashikaga, p. 13, l. 22-14, l. 8.

The Amida soteriology is complex; in it, the hearing of the name and commemoration of the buddhas, the wish to be reborn in the Pure Land, the mind at death, the personal intervention of Amitābha, and the exclusion of the biggest wrong-doings occur in turn. The two Sukhāvātyūhas, both in their original Indian form as well as in the numerous Chinese and Tibetan versions, have, in time, undergone important revisions, mainly in regard to the number of vows formulated by the bodhisattva Dharmākara when he ‘adorned’ his future buddha-field. This composite character in Amidism poses a mass of delicate questions the description of and often the solution to which may be found in K. Fujita, Genshi Jōdo Shisō na Kenkyū (Studies on Early Pure Land Buddhism), 1979.

In the Chinese and Japanese extensions of Amidism, a growing importance is attached to the oral invocation of Amita. See P. Demiéville, Sur la pensée unique, in BEFEO, XXIV, 1924, p. 231-246; G. Renondeau, Le Bouddhisme japonais, in Encyclopédie de la Pléiade, History of Religions, I, p. 1337-1340: the articles devoted to Amita in Encyclopedia of Buddhism of Ceylon, I, p. 434-463. – In the 10th century, Kbya (903-972) traveled through Japan proclaiming the name of the Buddha of the West. Incessantly repeated according to Hōnen (1133-1212), piously pronounced only once according to Shinran (1173-1262), accompanied by dance according to Ippen (1239-1289), the nembutsu became, solely by the power of Amita and in the absence of any merit, the main if not the only means of salvation. The adept who pronounces it is assured of being reborn after death in the Western Paradise. The nembutsu works its effects ipso facto and infallibly, like a sacrament.

The bodhisattva whom the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra presents here formulates a wish both more simple and more ambitious, more simple in method - for it is a matter of only the hearing of the name (nāmadheyaśravaṇa) – and also more ambitious in method - for the goal is not to be reborn collectively in the Pure Land, but to establish all beings in the abhisambodhi of the buddhas. This goal is attained only in the perspective of the perfection of wisdom, the view of emptiness.

Is the hearing of the name, like ‘the adoration of the Buddha Amita’ (Nan-wou-a-mi-t’o-fo, namo-amidabutsu) the only means of salvation, infallible and producing its effect immediately by the sole fact of being pronounced? Is it not, amongst many others, an adjuvant to bodhi, useful certainly, but not indispensable, the practice the success of which is not necessarily guaranteed and producing its result only after the event?

The question arose for those who had access to sutras of tendencies as different as, on the one hand, the Prajñāpāramitās and, on the other hand, the Sukhāvātyūhas. This was the case for the author of the Traité who, throughout <2352> his commentary, cites these texts abundantly. Forced to take a position, he refuses to recognize the unconditional value of a nembutsu in the hearing of the name. Here is what his reasoning will be:

1) The hearing of the name is not the unique means of realizing abhisambodhi. The buddhas save beings by various means, the most common of which is preaching the Dharma (dharmaśeṣa). But there are others: emitting rays, performing miracles, spreading perfumes, producing sounds, etc.

2) None of these means is infallible, for the capacities and dispositions of beings to be converted must be taken into account. Thus, Śākyamuni who appeared in an impure land and at a bad age, increased his preaching but did not always convince his auditors. The inhabitants of Magadha criticized him and his cousin Devadatta accused him of charlatanism.

3) It is not enough to hear the word ‘buddha’ in order to obtain bodhi: in order to come to this final outcome, Sudatta and Śaila had to receive in addition the admonitions and instructions of Śākyamuni.

4) The hearing of the name and access to abhisambodhi are not mingled in one single moment of mind: at the best, the hearing will be the immediate antecedent (anantarapratyaya) to abhisambodhi.

In conclusion, the hearing of the name does not act as a talisman or a magical formula; it is not the unique and infallible means to realize great enlightenment instantaneously. It may be compared to the slight cleavage that makes an already ripe fruit to fall, to the drop of water that makes a vase that is already full to overflow.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 34, l. 16-18; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 114, l. 14-16). – The bodhisattva must practice the perfection of wisdom if he envisages the following: “When I attain supreme complete enlightenment, may beings, in each of the ten directions in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, be established as soon as they hear my name in supreme complete enlightenment” (Bodhisattvena mahāsattvenaivam upaparīkṣamāṇena ‘kim iti me ‘nuttarāṃ samyaksambodhim abhisambuddhasya, saha śravaṇena me nāmadheyaśya, ye daśasu diṣṣu gaṅgāna-dīvālukopameṣu lokadhātuṣu sattvās te niyatā bhaveyur anuttarāyāṃ samyaksambodhā’ iti prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam).

Śāstra. –

I. THE TWO KINDS OF BUDDHA

Question. – Some people are born in a time when one can meet a Buddha and when the Buddha’s Dharma is present; however, sometimes they fall into hell (niraya). This was the case for :

T’i-p’o-ta (Devadatta),³⁰⁷ <2353>

Kiu-kia-li (Kokālika),³⁰⁸

Ho-to che-tseu (Hastaka Śākyaputra),³⁰⁹ etc.

³⁰⁷ Cf. p. 407F, note.

³⁰⁸ The lies of Kokālika followed by his fall into hell have already been noted, p. 63F, and told in full, p. 806-813FF.

³⁰⁹ Above, p. 693F, the Traité has already mentioned a certain Ho-to (Hastaka) along with Devadatta. The former, I [Lamotte] think, perhaps wrongly, should be replaced by Udraka Rāmaputra. The transcription Ho-to che-tseu which is found here shows that it is a question of Hastaka Śākyaputra (in Pāli, Hatthaka Sakyaputta) distinct from many other Hastakas mentioned in the scriptures and particularly Hastaka Āṭavika whose story is told above, p. 562-565F.

Hastaka Śākyaputra appears in the Vinayas in regard to the first Pāṭyantika dealing with lying: Pāli Vin, IV,p. 1-2 (cf. Comm. of the Dhammapada, III, p. 390-391); Mahīśāsaka Vin., T 1421. k. 5. p. 37b12-37c6; Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, K. 11, p. 634a6-634c10; Sarvāstivādin Vin., T 1435, k. 9, p. 63b12-64a5. Here is the transl. of the latter source, the most detailed:

They fell into hell because the three bad dharmas <2354> (akuśaladharma) – rāga, dveṣa and moha] – covered their minds. But then how can the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra say here that, in the absence of the Buddha, in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, it is enough to hear the name of a buddha (buddhanāmadheyaśravaṇa) to attain abhisambodhi?

The Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī. At that time in southern India, there was a master in the art of debate; his belly was covered with sheets of copper and he wore a lamp on his head. He came to Śrāvastī and people asked him why he was [armor-clad] in such a way. He answered: “My wisdom is strong and I am afraid that my belly might burst.” He was also asked why he carried a lamp on his head and he replied that it was to light up the darkness. People said: “You foolish brāhmaṇa, the sun lights up the whole continent; why do you talk about darkness?” He answered: “Don’t you know there are two kinds of darkness? One is when the light of the sun and the moon are absent; the other is delusion (moha), when the light of wisdom (prajñā) is absent.” People said: “It is because you have not seen the bhikṣu Ho-to che-tseu (Hastaka Śākyaputra) that you talk that way. If you had seen and heard him, the rising of the sun would be shadows and the night would be the sun-rise.” Then the inhabitants of the city begged the bhikṣu Hastaka Śākyaputra to come and debate with the brāhmaṇa. Hastaka, hearing this invitation, became despondent but could do no other than to start out for the city.

On the way, he saw two rams fighting. He took this as an omen and said to himself: “This ram is the brāhmaṇa, this other ram is me.” Seeing that the ram that represented himself was losing, he became more depressed. Following on his way, he saw two bulls fighting and said to himself: “This bull is the brāhmaṇa, the other bull is myself”; here again the bull that represented himself was losing. Continuing on his way, he saw two men fighting and he said to himself: “This man is the brāhmaṇa, that man is myself.” Again the man representing himself was the loser. About to enter the debate hall, he saw a woman carrying a pitcher of water, but the pitcher broke and the water spilled out. He thought: “I see bad omens: I cannot avoid defeat.” Nevertheless, unable to do anything else, he entered the house. There, on seeing the eyes and the face of the debate master, he understood that he would be vanquished, and his grief was extreme. He went to sit down and when it was announced that the debate could begin, he answered: “For the moment I am a little sick; wait until tomorrow.” Having said that, he went [to the Jetavana in Śrāvastī] where he had a place to live. In the last watch of the night (paścime yāme), he left to go to Rājagṛha.

The next day, the inhabitants [of Śrāvastī] gathered together; they waited for Hastaka for a long time but he did not appear. The time having passed, they went to the Jetavana and began to look for him (amveṣaṇa). The bhikṣus [in Jetavana] told them: “During the last watch of the night, Hastaka took his robe and his bowl (pātracīvaram ādāya) and went away.” Hearing this, the citizens blamed Hastaka in many ways (anekaparyāyeṇa vigarhanti), saying: “How can a bhikṣu lie thus?” One man told it to a second, the second to a third and so on, and so [Hastaka’s] bad name spread throughout the city. Then the bhikṣus of little desire (alpeccha) who were simple (alpakṛtya) and kept the precepts strictly (dhūtavādin) took their robe and bowl and entered the city to beg their food (pinḍāya). Hearing about the affair, they were displeased and after their meal they went to tell the details to the Buddha (tair etat prakaraṇam bhagavato vistareṇārocitam).

Then, for this reason [and in this circumstance], the Buddha called the assembly of bhikṣus together (atha bhagavān etasmin nidāna etasmin prakaraṇe saṃghaṃ saṃnipātayati). He blamed [Hastaka] in many ways, saying: “How can a bhikṣu lie in this way?” Having blamed him in many ways, he said to the bhikṣus: “In view of ten advantages, I promulgate the following rule for bhikṣus (daśānuśaṃsān pratītya bhikṣūṇāṃ śikṣāpadam prajñāpaviṣyāmi) and from now on this rule must be worded thus (adyāgreṇa caitac śikṣāpadam uddeṣṭavyam): If a bhikṣu lies knowingly, he commits a pāṭyantika (saṃprajānamṛṣāvādāt pāṭyantikā).”

Answer. – Above (p. 513F, 1805-1806F, 1818F, 1889F, 1907F, 1940F, 2238F, 2311F, 2322F), I have already said that there are two kinds of Buddhas: i) the Buddha with the body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya); [313b] ii) the fictive Buddha (nirmāṇabuddha) who adapts himself to the sufferings of beings. In speaking of the dharmadhātujakāya Buddha, we say that it is enough to hear his name to find salvation; in speaking of the nirmāṇakāya Buddha who is adapted to beings, we say that in accordance with their karmic cause and conditions, some beings, even though they are dwelling with this Buddha, fall into hell.

There is no-one that this dharmadhātukakāya buddha cannot save (paritrāṇa), no wish (praṇidhāna) that he cannot fulfill (paripūraṇa). Why? Because for innumerable (aprameya) incalculable (asaṃkhyeya) kalpas he has accumulated all the roots of good (kuśalamūla) and all the good qualities (guṇa). His omniscience (sarvajñatā) is unhindered (anāvaraṇa) and complete (sampanna).

The devas and the great bodhisattvas rarely see it. Like the cintāmaṇi, it is hard (durdṛśa) to see and hard to acquire (durlabbha) it, but those who do see it have their wishes fulfilled. – It is like the sudarśa(?) plant: those who see it escape from all their misfortunes. – It is like the cakravartin king: people who see him do not lack wealth (dhana). – It is like Śakra devendra: people who see him obtain <2355> all their desires (yathecccham).³¹⁰ – It is like Brahmadeva rāja: beings who depend on him chase away all their fears (bhaya).

People who commemorate (anusmaranti) the name of the bodhisattva Kouan-che-yin (Avalokiteśvara) are freed from all danger;³¹¹ all the more so if they commemorate the dharmadhātujakāya buddha.

³¹⁰ See Dhvaṃjāgrasūtra cited above, p. 1335-1338F.

³¹¹ The Traité is referring here to the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, chap. XXIV, p. 438, l. 5-439, l. 2. The bodhisattva Akṣayamati asks the Buddha the reasons why the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara is so named. The Buddha replies in these words:

Iha kulaputra yāvanti sattvakoṭinayutaśatasahasrāṇi yāni duḥkhāni pratyānubhavanti tāni saced avalokiteśvarasya bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya nāmadheyaṃ śṛṇuyus te sarve tasmād duḥkhaskandhāt parimucyeraṇ / ye ca kulaputra sattivā avalokiteśvarasya bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya nāmadheyaṃ dhārayisyanti sacet te mahaty agniskandhe prapateyuḥ sarve te 'valokiteśvarasya bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya tejasā tasmān mahato 'gniskandhāt parimucyeraṇ / sacet punaḥ kulaputra sattivā nadībhīr uhyamānā avalokiteśvarasya bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasyākṛandam kuryuḥ sarvāḥ tā nadyas teṣāṃ sattivānāṃ gādham dadyuḥ /

Burnouf's translation. – O son of noble family, everything that exists in this world of hundreds of thousands of myriads of creatures that suffer pain, all these creatures have only to hear the name of the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara to be freed from this great mass of suffering. If those who happen to fall into a great mass of fire recall the name of this bodhisattva-mahāsattva, they will be delivered from this great mass of fire by the splendor of the bodhisattva-mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara. If, O son of noble family, these beings happen to be carried away by the current of the rivers, if they invoke the bodhisattva-mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara, all the rivers will provide a ford for these beings immediately.

- Aside from slight grammatical differences, such as parimucyeyuḥ in place of parimucyeraṇ, the Gilgit version, ed. S. Watanabe, p. 304, l. 6-14, presents the same text.

According to this passage faithfully rendered in Chinese by Dharmarakṣa in 286AD (T 263, k. 10, p. 128c22-129a2) and by Kumārajīva in 406 (T 262, k. 7, p. 56c6-11), a distinction must be made between hearing the name

II. HEARING THE NAME OF THE BUDDHAS

1. As a rule, Śākyamuni saves by his preaching

Question. – The Buddha Śākyamuni also participates in the body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya) and is not <2356> different from [the other Buddhas]. Then, since he is present in the world, why are there still people who commit the five sins of immediate retribution (ānantarya), starving people (kṣudhita), thieves (caura) and other miserable people of the same kind?

Answer. – The original pact (pūrvābhyupagama) of the Buddha Śākyamuni was the following: “I came into a bad age and it is by teaching the Path (mārga) that I wish to save beings: I did not come to provide them the happiness of this world (laukikasukha), riches and honors.” If this Buddha had wanted to use his powers to give them those things, there is nothing he could not have realized.

Moreover, among people [in the bad age], the power of their merits (punyabala) is slight and the defilements of wrongdoings are heavy: this is why they do not find deliverance as they wish (yathecccham).

Moreover, the Buddha at present teaches only pure nirvāṇa and nevertheless, people blame and criticize him:

[Criticisms of the Māgadhians].³¹² – They said: “Why does the Buddha <2357> make so many disciples and convert (nayati) the populace? That is bondage (bandhana) as well.”

(nāmadheyaśravaṇa, wen-ming) which liberates from the mass of suffering, its memorization (dhāraṇa, tch'e) which protects from fire, and its invocation by loud cries (ākṛanda, tch'eng) which saves from water.

Here the Traité speaks only of those who ‘commemorate’ (anusmaranti, nien) the name of Avalokiteśvara. In the main meaning of the word, anusmṛti is a mental act and not a vocal act. The Traité recognizes that those who commemorate the name of the great bodhisattva escape from dangers but, different from the Lotus, it does not say that they are liberated from the mass of suffering (duḥkhaskanda), a liberation which is none other than nirvāṇa, vimukti. Rather, it notes that recourse to Avalokiteśvara, profitable though it may be, is less efficacious than calling upon these depersonalized buddhas that are the dharmadhātujakāya.

³¹² The numerous conversions carried out by the Buddha since his first sermons did not fail to provoke displeasure and criticisms:

Pāli Vin., I, p. 43: Tena kho pana samayena abhiññātā-abhiññātā Māgadhikā kulaputtā bhagavati brahmacariyaṃ caranti. manussā ujjhāyanti khyanti vipācenti: aputtakatāya paṭipanno samaṇo Gotamo, vedhavyāya paṭipanno samaṇi Gotamo, kulupacchedāya pautipanno samaṇo Gotamo. idāni anena jaṭṭasahassaṃ pabbājitaṃ, imāni ca aḍḍhateyyāni paribbājakasatāni Saṅghaeyāni pabbājitaṃ, ime ca abhiññātā-abhiññātā Māgadhikā kulaputtā samaṇe Gotamo brahmacariyaṃ caranti. api 'ssu bhikkhū disvā imāya gāthāya codenti:

*āgato kho mahāsāmaṇi Magadhānaṃ Giribbajāṃ /
sabbe Saṅghaye netvāna, kaṃ su dāni nayissatīti //*

When the Buddha converts just by preaching the Dharma, people already criticize him; what would they not say if he indiscriminately distributed the happiness of the world (lokasukha)?

[Criticisms of Devadatta].³¹³ – Wanting to have the mark of the thousand-rayed wheel (sahasrāra cakra) on the soles of his feet (pādatala), Devadatta had an iron (ayas) mold made, had it heated and cauterized his

Foucher’s translation. – At that time, many young people of good family in the land of Magadha embraced the religious life one after another under the direction of the Blessed One. The populace murmured and became angry: “The śramaṇa Gautama aims to bring about the absence of children, to bring about widowhood, to bring about the extinction of the family. He has just ordained as monks the thousand anchorites (jaṭila), then the two hundred and fifty monks of Sañjaya, and now many young people of noble family in Magadha one after another are embracing the religious life under the direction of the śramaṇa Gautama.” And when these people saw the bhikṣus, they wanted to quarrel with them with this stanza:

“The great śramaṇa has come
To the capital of the land of Magadha;
He has converted all the disciples of Sañjaya;
Whom will he convert today?”

- On the same subject, see also Catuspariṣad, p. 394 and Mahāvastu, III, p. 90.

³¹³ Here the Traité gives a version augmented by an episode told by the Mūlasarv. Vin.: Samghabhedha, II, p. 165-165; T 1450, k. 18, p. 191c20-192a7:

Punar api devadattaḥ ajātaśatruḥ katayati: tvam mayā rāje pratiṣṭhāpitaḥ: tvam api māṃ buddhatve pratiṣṭhāpaya iti; sa kathayati: bhagavataḥ cakrankapādatalacihnātā lakṣaṇam asti; tava tu cakrankapādatalacihnātā nāti iti; sa kathayati: aham cakrankapādatalacihnām abhinirvartayāmi iti; tena ayaskārā āhūya uktāḥ: śakṣyatha mama pādatala cakrankam kartum? iti; te kathayanti: ārya <yadi> śaknoṣi vedanāṃ śodhum iti; sa kathayati: kuruta, śakṣyāmi iti; te saṃlakṣayanti: balavān eṣaḥ; yady evam evāṅkyāmaḥ, sthānam etad vidyate yat pārṣṇiprahāreṇa asmān jīvītāḥ vyaparopayiṣyati; iti taiḥ kanthāṃ chidrayitvā uktāḥ: ārya anena kanthāchidreṇa pādau praveśaya iti; tena kanthādhidreṇa pādau praveśitau; ayaskārir agnivarṇaṃ cakram kṛtvā pādāv aniktau; sa duḥkām tīvrāṃ kharāṃ kaṭukha, amanāpāṃ vedanāṃ vedayate; bhikṣubhiḥ kokālikāḥ prṣṭaḥ: kutra devadattaḥ? sa kathayati: amuṣmin pradeśe cakrankapādaciḥnatām abhinirartayati iti; bhikṣavas taṃ pradeśaṃ gatāḥ; tair asau śruto duḥkhavedanārto vikrośan; te bhagavatsakāśam upasaṅkrāntāḥ.

Transl. – Furthermore, Devadatta said to Ajātaśatru: “I have established you in kingship; now in turn you establish me in buddhahood.” Ajātaśatru answered: “The Blessed One has the sign of a wheel on the soles of his feet, you do not.”- Devadatta replied: “I will make one” and he called some ironworkers and asked them: “Can you make me the mark of a wheel on the soles of my feet?” The answered: “Yes, Lord, if you are able to withstand the pain.” – “Do it then”, said Devadatta, “I will withstand it.”

The ironworkers commented as follows: “This man is strong; if we mark him in this way, it is possible that with one blow of his heel, he can take our lives.” And so, having made a hole in the wall, they said to Devadatta: “Lord, put your two feet through this hole in the wall.” This Devadatta did, and the ironworkers heated a wheel white-hot and marked his two feet. Devadatta felt the sharp, violent, biting, unpleasant feeling.

The bhikṣus asked Kokālika: “Where is Devadatta?” Kokālika answered: “In a certain place, he made the mark of the wheel on the soles of his feet.” The bhikṣus went to that place and heard Devadatta who was howling with pain. The bhikṣus went to the Blessed One.

feet withy it. Wounded by the cauterization, he was howling with pain. Ānanda heard him, burst into tears and said to the Buddha: “My brother is going to die; may the Buddha save him out of pity!”

The Buddha extended his hand and felt Devadatta’s body, uttering this oath of truth (satyopayācana): “If it is true that I consider Rāhula and Devadatta equal [in my affection], may Devadatta’s suffering disappear.” Immediately Devadatta’s pain disappeared. Devadatta grasped the hand [extended to him], examined it and recognized that it was the hand of the Buddha. Then he made the following statement: “The son of Śuddhodana assures his livelihood (jīvitaṃ kalpayati) by this medical trick.”³¹⁴ The Buddha said to Ānanda: “Do you see Devadatta? How could he be saved when he nourishes such feelings?” [313c]

- The people of the fortunate ages do not have such faults (doṣa), but a being like Devadatta cannot be saved by the happiness of this world (lokasukha). All kinds of stories (nidāna) on this subject have been told in full above (p. 868-878F).

2. The Buddhas do not save solely by the hearing of their name

Furthermore, the bodies of the Buddhas are innumerable (aprameya), incalculable (asaṃkhyeya) and dissimilar in aspect (nānāvidhākāra):

1) There are Buddhas who, by preaching the Dharma (dharmadeśana) to beings, make them obtain abhisambodhi.

2) There are Buddhas who emit immense rays (apramāṇaraśmin <2359> pramocayanti) and the beings who encounter them obtain abhisambodhi.³¹⁵

³¹⁴ Compare Samghabhedha, II, p. 94: Tato Bhagavatā gajabhujasadrśaṃ bāhum abhiprasārta grdhrakūṭaṃ parvatam bhitvā ... karaṃ devadattasya sthāpayitvā satyopayācanaṃ kṛtam: yena satyena yathā rāhulabhadre priye ekaputrake cittam amūṇādhikaṃ tathaiva devadatte tena satyena rujā śamaṃ gacched iti. satyopayācanakālasamanantaram eva devadattasya rujā praśantā sa ... bhagavataḥ pāṇiṃ nirīkṣate ... ; sa saṃlakṣayati: śramaṇasya gautamansya pāṇir iti ... tathāpi buddhamahātmyo-paśāntarujaḥ kathayati: śobhanaṃ te siddhārtha vaidyakam adhigatam; śakṣyasya anena jivikāṃ kalpayitum iti.

Transl. – Then the Blessed One extended his arm like the trunk of an elephant, made it pass over Vulture Peak Mountain and placed his hand on Devadatta, uttering this oath of truth: “If it is true that I have exactly the same feelings towards Devadatta as I have for my dear only son Rāhulabhadra, by virtue of this truth may the torment that Devadatta feels be pacified. “As soon as he had uttered these words of truth, Devadatta’s pain subsided. Devadatta examined the hand of the Blessed One and recognized it as that of the monk Gautama. Even though his torment had been pacified by the kindness of the Buddha, Devadatta said to him: “The medical skill, O Siddārtha, that you have acquired is marvelous; you will be able to ensure your livelihood by it.”

On the Buddha’s gesture of passing his hand across a wall or a rock face to cure Devadatta or to reassure Ānanda frightened by a vulture, cf. Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 921b8-15; Fa hien tchouan, T 2085, p. 862c21-24; A. Foucher, AgbG, I, p. 497-499 and fig. 249.

³¹⁵ See p. 456F.

3) There are Buddhas who, by their superknowledge of magic (ṛddhyabhiññā) and their miracles (prātihārya) direct the minds of beings, and the latter obtain abhisambodhi.

4) There are Buddhas who show only their form bodies (rūpakāya) and beings obtain abhisambodhi.³¹⁶

5) There are Buddhas who emit sweet perfumes from all their hair-pores (romakūpa) and the beings who smell them obtain abhisambodhi.³¹⁷

6) There are Buddhas who, by giving food to beings, make them obtain abhisambodhi.

7) There are Buddhas whom it is sufficient to commemorate (anusmaraṇamātreṇa) to obtain abhisambodhi.

8) There are Buddhas who, by the sounds (śabda) made by plants (ṭṛṇakāṣṭha), do the work of the Buddhas (buddhakārya) and lead beings to obtain abhisambodhi.³¹⁸

9) There are Buddhas whose name people hear (nāmādheyaṃ śṛṇvanti) and they thus obtain abhisambodhi. It is in regard to these Buddhas that the bodhisattva says here: When I become Buddha, may those who hear my name find the Way (uttāraṇa).³¹⁹

3. The hearing of the name alone is insufficient to produce abhisambodhi

Moreover, the hearing of the name (nāmadheyaśravaṇa), by itself, is not enough to obtain abhisambodhi. After having heard the name <2360> [of the Buddhas], one practices the Path and only afterwards does one obtain the way (uttāraṇa).

[Sudatta's bodhi].³²⁰ – Thus the eminent (śreṣṭhin) Siu-ta (Sudatta) first heard the name of the Buddha, rejoiced in his heart, went to the Buddha, heard the Dharma and thus obtained bodhi.

³¹⁶ Śākyamuni showed his tongue and his cryptorchidia to the brāhmaṇas Ambaṭṭha, Brahmāyu and Sela (cf. p. 275F, n. 1: 1667F) his chest and his armpits to the nirgrantha Satyaka (p. 1665-66F, and notes).

³¹⁷ When the buddha Amitābha, in the form of the bhikṣu Dharmākara, carried out the bodhisattva practices, a lotus perfume came from all his pores of his skin and all kinds of food and drink flowed from the palms of his hands. Cf. Large Sukhāvatī, ed. A. Ashikaga, p. 25-26: Tasya sarvaromakūpebhya utpalaghandho vāti sma ...; savānnapāṇakhādyaḥbojyalehyarasābhinirhārāḥ sarvopabhogaparibhogābhinirhārāś ca pāṇitalābhyāṃ prasyandantaḥ prādurbbhavanti sma.

³¹⁸ In Amitābha's paradise, the trees shaken by the wind produce articulated sounds, sweet and enchanting, which serve as predictions. Cf. Large Sukhāvatī, p. 32: Vātena preritānām ca vrkṣāṇām valgumanojñānirghoṣo niścaraty asceanako 'pratikulāḥ śravaṇāya.

³¹⁹ Here tou may be rendered by 'safety' but the translation 'way' or 'passage' is less compromising. The character tou serves to translate the Sanskrit words pāramitā and uttāraṇa: cf. G. M. Nagao, Index to the Sūtrālamkāra, II, p. 234a.

³²⁰ Sudatta, better known by the name of Anāthapiṇḍaka (in Pāli, Anāthapiṇḍika), heard a friend pronounce the word 'buddha' three times, but that was not the reason that determined his conversion. He attained, not the bodhi of the arhats but the fruit of srotaāpanna, when, on the next day, the Buddha gave him the graded instructions meant for lay people.

[Śaila's bodhi].³²¹ – Also, the brāhmaṇa Che-yi-lo (Śaila) <2361> first heard the name of 'Buddha' at the home of the jaṭila-brahmacārin Ki-ni-ye (Keniya); his mind was overjoyed; he went straight to the Buddha; he heard the Dharma and obtained bodhi. <2362>

On the conversion of this famous individual, see the Sudatta sutta in Saṃyutta, I, p. 21-212, and the Saṃyuktāgamas, T 99, no. 592, k. 22, p. 157b18-158b23; T 100, no. 186, k. 9, p. 440b2-441a26; the Pāli Vin., II, p. 154-157; the Mahīśāsaka Vin., T 1421, k. 25, p. 166b9-167b4; the Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, k. 50, p. 938b20-939a27; the Sarv. Vin., T 1435, k. 34, p. 243c20-244b15; the Mūlasarv. Vin., Saṃghabhedha, ed. Gnoli, I, p. 166-170, and Śayanāvastu, ed. R. Gnoli, p. 14-18.

Having come to Rājagṛha on business, Sudatta went to his brother-in-law Rājagṛhaka and found him in the midst of preparing a fine banquet. He asked if he was celebrating a wedding or if he was getting ready to receive king Bimbisāra. His brother-in-law replied with these words: "I am not celebrating a wedding and I am not receiving king Bimbisāra; however, I am preparing a big sacrifice because tomorrow I have invited the saṃgha with the Buddha at its head (api ca me mahāyaṇṇo paccupaṭṭhito, svātanāya buddhapamukho saṃgho nimantito)."

"Did you say the Buddha?" asked Sudatta. "Yes, O householder, I did say the Buddha" (buddho 'ti tvam gahapati vadesīti. – buddo 'i' āhaṃ gahapati vadāmīti). This question was asked three times and three times the same answer was given. Then Sudatta ended: "The word 'buddha' is indeed rare in the world" (ghoso pi kho eso dullabho lokasmin yad idaṃ buddho buddho 'ti).

But as the Traité comments here, Sudatta heard it three times but did not take immediate advantage of it. He wished to go immediately to the Buddha who was then in the Sītavana near Rājagṛha. Thinking that the time was inopportune, his brother-in-law advised him to wait until tomorrow. Sudatta was so impatient to meet the Teacher that he woke up three times during the night thinking that it was dawn.

Finally the gates of the Sītavana were opened and Sudatta saw the Buddha who was seated and who invited him to approach. Sudatta fell down at his feet. After exchanging salutations, the Teacher explained the graded teachings to him (anupūrvī kathā): he spoke to him about generosity, morality and heaven; he explained the dangers of desire and the benefits of renunciation; he ended his sermon with the four noble truths. It was only then that the dust-free stainless eye of the Dharma arose in Sudatta (virajaṃ vitamalaṃ dhammacakkhuṃ udapādi): this is the expression dedicated to designate, not accession to abhisambodhi or even the bodhi of the arhats, but simply the attainment of the first fruit of the religious life, the fruit of srotaāpanna.

It does not appear that in his lifetime Sudatta ever attained arhathood. Proof of this is that after he died he was reborn among the gods: the Anāthapiṇḍika of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 51-56, speaks of a Sudatta devaputta (§ 6) and an Anāthapiṇḍika devaputta (§ 10).

Therefore, according to the canonical sūtras, it is not sufficient to hear the word 'buddha' in order to be settled, by that very fact, in supreme complete enlightenment.

³²¹ The conversion of Śaila (in Pāli, Sela) is told, partially in the same words, by the Selasutta of the Suttanipāṭa, p. 102-112, and of the Majjhima, II, p. 146. – See also the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 46, p. 798a25-799c16.

The jaṭila master Keniya was living at Āpaṇa, the capital of the Aṅguttarāpas in the land of Aṅga. He was a staunch brāhmaṇist but, coming to learn that the Buddha along with 1250 bhikṣus was traveling in the area, he went to see him and invited him to lunch on the following day. According to his custom, the Buddha accepted by remaining silent and Keniya went home to prepare the reception with his friends and family.

These texts say only that [Sudatta and Śaila] ‘heard the name’. The hearing of the name (nāmadheyaśravaṇa) is a cause and condition (hetupratyaya) for obtaining bodhi but is not bodhi.

4. The hearing of the name and abhisambodhi are not simultaneous³²²

Keṇiya had as a friend in Āpaṇa the learned brāhmaṇa Sela who was a specialist in the Vedas and auxiliary sciences, an expert in interpreting physical signs and learned in mantras which he taught to 300 disciples. The same afternoon, as he was passing by his friend’s home and seeing him so busy, he asked what he was preparing for. Keṇiya answered: “The Buddha Bhagavat is in the neighborhood, in the Green Forest, and I have invited him and his saṃgha to have lunch with me.”

The same dialogue occurred between Sela and Keṇiya as between Sudatta and his brother-in-law. “Did you say the Buddha?” asked Sela. “Yes, I did say the Buddha”, answered Keṇiya. And Sela cried: “The word ‘buddha’ is indeed rare in the world.”

Again this time, the fact of having heard three times the word ‘buddha’ had no more effect on Sela than it had had on Sudatta. Nevertheless, curious, Sela together with his 300 students went to the Green Forest and respectfully greeted the Buddha. He had plenty of time to discover the thirty-two marks of the Great Man on the body of the Blessed One, including those of the tongue and cryptorchidia (see above, p. 274-276F, 1667F). They knew that anyone bearing the thirty-two marks is destined to become a cakravartin king or a fully and completely enlightened Buddha. Wanting to be sure that he was indeed in the presence of a Buddha, Sela praised Śākyamuni, for he knew from the very old brāhmaṇas that “if one praises them, those who are truly holy, fully and completely enlightened, will reveal themselves” (ye te bhavanti arahanto sammāsambuddhā, te sake vaṇṇe bhañṇamāne attānaṃ pātukaronti).

The pious stratagem worked and, approving of the praises which Sela made in stanzas ringing with piety, Śākyamuni firmly and simply admitted himself to be Samibuddha and, since he was addressing a brāhmaṇa, Brahmabhūta.

Fully convinced, Sela and his disciples asked to be received into the order and on the spot they were given ordination. This was not yet bodhi, but they entered the Path.

The next day, the Buddha and the saṃgha went to Keṇiya the jaṭila and took part in the banquet he had offered them. After the meal, the Buddha thanked his host and departed. Shortly afterward, Sela and his companions realized in this very life the supreme goal of the religious life and recognized that they had destroyed rebirth: Khinā jāti.... Thus there were on this earth some new arhats (aññataro kho paṇāyasmā Sela apariso arahataṃ ahoṣi). Sudatta, as we have seen in the preceding note, had to be content with the fruit of srotaāpanna.

Does the fact of having heard the name of Buddha occur in the spiritual conquests? The sūtras say nothing about it. In any way, if the hearing did have a result, it was not immediate. When the new arhats attained the bodhi of the śrāvakas, eight days had elapsed since the hearing of the name of Buddha and their taking refuge (yan taṃ saraṇaṃ āgamha ito aṭṭhami, cakkhumā; sattarattena Bhagavā dant’ amha tava sāsaṇe).

³²² The hearing of the name and the obtaining of abhisambodhi are not mingled in one and the same moment of mind (eka cittakṣaṇa) which, as we have seen above (p. 1983F, n. 1), is infinitesimal in duration. The hearing does not act in the manner of a magical spell instantaneously and infallibly producing its effect.

Question. – However, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that one hears the name of the Buddha and that “at the same time” (saha śravaṇena) one obtains abhisambodhi. It does not say that after having heard the name it is necessary to practice the Path in order to finally obtain abhisambodhi.

Answer. – Here the expression “at the same time” (or simultaneously) does not mean ‘in one and the same mind-moment’ (ekacittena): it only means that there is no intermediary (antara)³²³ [between hearing the name and abhisambodhi]: that is what the expression “at the same time” means.

[Metta sutta].³²⁴ – As the sūtra says: “When the mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) is cultivated, the seven members of saṃbodhi (saptasambodhyaṅga) are cultivated at the same time (sahagata).”

Objection. – But the meditation of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi) is impure (sāsrava), for it has beings as object (sattvān ālambate); how then could one cultivate, at the same time, the <2363> seven members of saṃbodhi (saptasambodhyaṅga) [which themselves are pure (anāsrava)]?

Answer. – After loving-kindness has arisen, one cultivates the seven members of saṃbodhi. As there are no other dharmas [that are inserted between maitrī and the saṃbodhyaṅgas], we say that they arise at the same time (sahagata).

The expression ‘at the same time’ can have two meanings: i) it can designate strict simultaneity (samakāla); ii) it can designate posteriority in the long run, provided that no other dharma comes to be inserted between the two terms. Here, as it is a mind of maitrī and [without any other intermediary (antara)] a practice of the seven saṃbodhyaṅas, it is said that they arise at the same time.

5. Causes other than the hearing of the name occurring in the obtaining of abhisambodhi³²⁵

³²³ Adopting the variant kien.

³²⁴ Saṃyutta, V, p. 119, l. 3-5: Idha bhikkhave bhikkhu mettāsahagataṃ satisambojjhaṅgaṃ bhāveti // la // mettāsahagataṃ upekhāsambojjhaṅgaṃ bhāveti vivekanissitaṃ virāgaṇossitaṃ nirodhanissitaṃ vossaggapariṇāṃim. – Here, O monks, the bhikṣu [who cultivates maitrī], by that very fact cultivates the smṛtisambodhyaṅga ‘going with maitrī’; he cultivates by that very fact the [dharmapravacayas, vīrya, prīti, praśrabdhi, samādhi] and upekṣā-sambodhyaṅga ‘going with maitrī’, dependent upon separation, detachment, destruction, and having abandonment as goal.

This sūtra is cited in summary in Kośabhāṣya, p. 146, l. 12-14. One cannot take it as an argument to assume the absolute simultaneity of maitrī and the saṃbodhyaṅgas. Indeed, maitrī marred by belief in the self is impure, whereas the seven saṃbodhyaṅgas depending on detachment from the world are pure, and the pure practices cannot co-exist with the impure practices. The truth is that the development of the saṃbodhyaṅgas follows the development of maitrī immediately and without intermediary (samanantara).

Similarly, the obtaining of abhisambodhi follows the hearing of the name of the Buddhas (nāmadheyaśravaṇa) without intermediary, but is not mingled with it.

³²⁵ The conquest of abhisambodhi comes about with the help of causes and conditions, the main ones being the merits acquired by the ascetic himself and – according to the Greater Vehicle – the grace of the Buddhas. By itself, the hearing

1) Furthermore, in some beings the merits (puṇya) are ripe (pakva) and the fetters (saṃyojana) are slight (tanu); they will obtain abhisambodhi. If they hear the name of the Buddhas, they will obtain it at once.

2) Moreover, it is by the power (prabhāva) of the Buddhas that they hear and find the way (uttāraṇa).

Thus when an ulcer (gaṇḍa) is ripe and there is nobody to prick it, a very small cause is enough for the ulcer to break by itself. When a fruit (phala) is ripe [314a] and there is nobody to gather it, a small breeze is enough to make it fall by itself. A new piece of cotton cloth (kārpāsa), white and clean, easily takes the dye (raṅga).³²⁶ In regard to men, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says here that by hearing the name of the Buddhas they immediately obtain abhisambodhi. Another example: when a preta who has taken possession of a man hears the exorcism (mantra) of the hermit (rṣi), he abandons his victim and flees. <2364>

6. How is the name of the Buddhas spread?

Question. – But who then spreads the name of the Buddhas beyond universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges in a way that beings hear it?

Answer. – 1) By his miraculous power (ṛddhibala), the Buddha emits innumerable rays (raśmi) from the pores of his skin (romakūpa); on each of these rays there are precious lotuses (ratnamaya padma); on each of these lotuses there sits a Buddha, and each of these Buddhas saves beings by preaching the Holy Dharma (saddharma) and also by saying the name (nāmadheya) of the Buddhas; this is how the beings hear it. See what has been said above (p. 456F) in the chapter on Fang-kouang (Raśmipramokṣa).³²⁷

2) Moreover, according to their earlier vows (pūrvapraṇidhāna), the great bodhisattvas go to the places where the Dharma of the Buddhas does not exist and there they proclaim the name of the Buddhas, as has been said in the present chapter: this is how beings hear it.

3) There are also people of great merit who hear the voice of the Buddhas coming from the sky: this was the case for the bodhisattva Sa-i 'o-po-louen (Sādāpraruditā).³²⁸ of the name would not be able to realize abhisambodhi; it is, nevertheless, the slight cleavage that makes the ripe fruit fall, the drop of water that makes the vase of merits overflow.

³²⁶ Seyyathā pi nāma suddham vattham apagatakālakam sammad eva tajanam patiganheyya: Digha, I, p. 110, 148; II, p. 43, 44; Majjhima, II, p. 145; Anguttara, IV, p. 186, 213. – Tadyathā śuddham vastram apagatakāḍakam rajanopagam raṅge prakṣiptam samyag eva raṅgam pratighṛṇāt: Catuspariśad, p. 180, 233, 452, 454; Samghabhedha, I, p. 142, 144; Divyāvadāna, p. 617.

³²⁷ See also p. 1352-1353F.

³²⁸ For Sādāpraruditā, see above, p. 1353F and 1354F, n. While he was seeking the Prajñāpāramitā and was staying in a forest, he heard a voice coming from the sky (tena ... antariṅgān nirghoṣaḥ śruto 'bhū) that said to him: “Go, O son of good family, to the east and there you will hear the Prajñāpāramitā”: cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 927; Pañcaviṃśatī, T 223, k. 27, p. 416a-b; Śatasāhasrikā, T 220, book VI, k. 398, p. 1059a26.

4) The name of the Buddhas is also heard through the intermediary of deities, through the sounds (ghoṣa) made by the trees or in dream (svapna).³²⁹

5) There are also Buddhas of inconceivable power (acintyabala) who come to proclaim or pronounce it.

6) Finally, there are bodhisattvas who take the oath to save all beings. This is why they say [the following]: “When I attain abhisambodhi, may beings in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, as soon as they hear my name, all realize abhisambodhi.” But in order to do this, they must practice the perfection of wisdom. <2365>

Samāpti

Conclusion

Preliminary note. – In the course of chapters XLII to LII covering volumes IV and V of the present work, the bodhisattva presented by the Pañcaviṃśatī has formulated a series of sixty-two wishes (praṇidhāna). The latter are in accord with the twofold aim assigned to the bodhisattva at the moment when he produced the mind of enlightenment (bodhicittotpāda): realizing abhisambodhi, saving innumerable beings and by this fact, assuring his own benefit (svārtha) and that of others (parārtha).

Most of these vows are realizable by current practices: thus a non-Buddhist can indeed conquer the first five abhijñās by judicious practice of the mental concentrations. Other vows are not realizable: it is impossible to bring all beings to abhisambodhi by merely making them hear the name of the Buddhas.

The six virtues assigned to the bodhisattva (generosity, morality, patience, exertion, concentration and wisdom) are within the range of any person of good will but, since they are still sullied by errors and desires, they produce only worldly fruits and at best lead only to rebirths in the good destinies, among gods or humans.

To be truly efficacious, these virtues must be practiced in the view of the Prajñāpāramitā which transforms the virtues into ‘perfections’ (pāramitā): thus, a gift is perfect when its author sees neither donor nor beneficiary nor thing given. It is the same for the other virtues: for a wisdom to be perfect it must have overturned the barriers separating the true from the false. Whether they appear to us to be realizable or not, all the vows of the bodhisattva are actually already realized if they are conceived in the perfection of wisdom. This Prajñāpāramitā, also called ‘knowledge of all the aspects’ (sarvākārajñāna), is the knowledge of the true nature (dharmatā, dharmadhātu) of things, whose ‘sole characteristic is the absence of characteristics’ (ekalakṣaṇam yaduta alakṣaṇam). All beings (sattva), including the bodhisattvas and the buddhas, are empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ (ātmātmyaśūnyatā), all phenomena (dharmā) are empty of inherent nature and specific nature and, consequently, without origination or cessation. The Prajñāpāramitā that sees them thus does not see them; this wisdom is a non-wisdom. It itself is without inherent nature and character: it is the absence of wrong views. In this capacity, it holds the force of truth: “There is nothing that it does not penetrate, nothing that it does not realize” since there is nothing to penetrate, nothing to realize. In their body of truth (dharmakāya) or, using the words of the Traité, in their body born of the fundamental element (dharmadhātujakāya), the Buddhas and great bodhisattvas who are the replica of it, are themselves also all-powerful.

³²⁹ In the Great Sukhāvatī, ed. Ashikaga, mention is made of the pleasant voice (valgumanojñanirgōṣa) of trees shaken by the wind (p. 32) and of beings who, by thinking even for a single moment of mind (ekacittotpādena) of the Tathāgata Amitābha, see him in dreams (svapnāntaragata) and are reborn in Sukhāvatī (ibid, p. 43).

The non-seeing of beings and phenomena logically involves the destruction of all speech and all practice (sarvavādacaryoccheda) and, even better, the non-functioning (apavṛtti), the pacification (upaśama) of the mind, which is none other than nirvāṇa. But with the example of the Buddha, the bodhisattva is not only a great sage, he is also a great compassionate one (mahākāruṇika): “When the bodhisattva cultivates the Prajñāpāramitā, he sees that all dharmas are empty and that this emptiness itself is empty; from then on, he abolishes all seeing and acquires the Prajñāpāramitā free of obstacles. Then, by the power of <2366> his great compassion (mahākāruṇā) and skillful means (upāya), he returns [to saṃsāra] to accomplish meritorious actions (puṇyakarman) and, as a result of these meritorious actions, there is no wish that he does not fulfill.” As Vimalakīrti says (French transl., p. 233), wisdom without skillful means is bondage (upāyarahitā prajñā bandhaḥ), but wisdom associated with means is deliverance (upāyasahitā prajñā mokṣaḥ). The bodhisattva combines the two.

The methods put into use by the bodhisattva must suit the dispositions and capacities of the beings to be converted and are, like the latter, innumerable. The most direct and most efficient method is samādhi which purifies and clarifies the mind. Especially to be recommended is the pratyutpannasamādhi which has been fully discussed above (p. 2273-75F). In contrast to prajñā, it does not penetrate the true nature of things, but by fixing the mind on the Buddhas of the present, “it concentrates it in such a way that prajñā is produced.”

The large Perfection of Wisdom sūtras dedicate a chapter to Prajñā “Mother of the Buddhas” but remain silent on “the Father of the Buddhas”. The Traité repairs this omission by making the pratyutpannasamādhi the father of the Buddhas. The two parents are indispensable but, in the birth, the role of the mother is more painful and more meritorious than that of the father.

A bird needs two wings to soar in space; samādhi and prajñā are required to accede to bodhisattvaniyāma (cf. p. 1797-98F) and to abhisambodhi. In the Mahāyāna they continue to hold the major place that they already occupied in the śrāvaka system as integral parts of the Path to nirvāṇa. A canonical stock phrase (Dīgha, II, p. 81, 84, 91; cf. Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 160, 228) emphasizes their importance:

Sīlaparibhāvito samādhi mahapphalo hoti mahānisaṃso, samādhiparibhāvitā paññā mahapphalā hoti mahānisaṃsā, paññāparibhāvitam cittam sammad eva āsavehi vimuccati. – Cultivated by śīla, samādhi bears great fruits, brings great benefits. Cultivated by samādhi, prajñā bears great fruits, brings great benefits; indeed, the mind cultivated by prajñā is completely freed from impurities. [And the destruction of the impurities is nirvāṇa].

Buddhism has evolved over the course of time but along the lines drawn by the Buddha at the beginning and without ever re-assessing its premises.

Question. – In the preceding chapters (chap. XLII - LII), the bodhisattva wants to acquire various qualities (guṇa) and formulates the wish (praṇidhāna) for them. All these things are to be realized by a group of various practices (nānācaryāsāmagrī); why then does the Prajñāpāramitā-sūtra, [in place of detailing these practices], only recommend that he practice the prajñāpāramitā?

Answer. – 1) The sūtra in question is called Prajñāpāramitā and the Buddha wants to explain it. This is why he praises the prajñāpāramitā chapter by chapter (parivarta).

2) Moreover, the prajñāpāramitā is the mother of the Buddhas (buddhamātr). <2367> The task (yatna, śrama) of the mother is greater than that of the father. This is why the Buddha considers prajñā as his mother,³³⁰ <2369> and the Pratyutpannasamādhi as his father. This samādhi can only concentrate the ³³⁰ A characteristic trait of the Prajñā literature is to present Prajñāpāramitā as ‘the Mother of the Buddhas’. This figure already appears in the mixed Sanskrit stanzas of the Ratnagūṇasaṃsaya, XII, v. 1 (ed. Yuyama, p. 49):

Mātāya putra 'bahu santi gilānikāya te sarvi durmanasa tatra prayujyayeyuḥ / em eva buddha pi daśaddiśi lokadhātāu imu prajñāpāramita mātu samanvāharanti //

“If a mother of many sons falls sick, all these sons are saddened and busy themselves around her to tend her. In the same way also, the Buddhas in universes of the ten directions busy themselves around the perfection of wisdom, their mother.”

The medium and the large Prajñās dedicate a chapter to the Mother of the Buddhas, sometimes under the title of Lokasaṃdarśanaparivarta, sometimes under that of Buddhamātr-parivarta:

Aṣṭasāh., ed. Wōhīhara, XII, p. 529: Lokasaṃdarśana. – T VII, no. 220, XII, p. 814b: Lokasaṃdarśana.

Aṣṭadaśādāh., T VII, no. 220, XV, p. 601c: Lokasaṃdarśana.

Pañcaviṃśatisāh., T VIII, no. 223, XLVIII, p. 323a: Buddhamātr. – T VII, no. 220, XLVI, p. 224c:

Buddhamatr.

Śātasāh., T VI, no. 220; XLI, p. 552c: Buddhamātr.

The following are some extracts of the Aṣṭasāh., ed. Wōhīhara, p. 529 et seq.: Atha khalu Bhagavān punar apy āyuṣmantaṃ Subhūtim āmantrayate sma / tadāyathāpi nāma Subhūte strīy bahavaḥ putrā bhāveyus pralujyate vā / evam iyaṃ Subhūte prajñāpāramitā tathāgatānām asya lokaasya saṃdarśayatṛī /

Transl. - Then the Blessed One said to venerable Subhūti: O Subhūti, it is like a woman who has many sons; if she falls sick, all her sons expend great effort to remove all danger of death from their mother. Why? Because, they say, we have been brought up by her; she has accomplished difficult tasks for us; for us she is the giver of life and the revealer of the Loka (taken here in the sense of ‘world’). Similarly, O Subhūti, the Tathāgatas have the same regard for this Prajñāpāramitā. Why? Because she is the mother, the parent of the Tathāgatas; for us she is the indicator of Omniscience and the revealer of the Loka (a designation here of the five skandhas). <2368>

Subhūti. – How, O Blessed One, is the Prajñāpāramitā the revealer of this Loka for the Tathāgatas, and what is this Loka mentioned here by the Tathāgatas?

The Blessed One. – What is called Loka here by the Tathāgata is the five skandhas, namely, form, feeling, conception, formations and consciousness.

Subhūti. – How, O Blessed One, are the five skandhas designated here by the Prajñāpāramitā of the Tathāgatas, or what is it that is designated by the Prajñāpāramitā?

The Blessed One. – The five skandhas, as long as they are not broken or disintegrated, are designated here by the Prajñāpāramitā by the name of Loka. What does that say? They are designated as not breaking up and not disintegrating. Indeed, O Subhūti, since the five skandhas do not exist in inherent nature, they have emptiness as nature, and this very emptiness does not break up, does not disintegrate. Thus the Prajñāpāramitā of the Tathāgatas is the revealer of the Loka [understood in this way]. And the signlessness, the wishlessness, the inactivity, the non-arising, the non-existing, the fundamental element, they also, do not break up, do not disintegrate. Therefore, O Subhūti, the Prajñāpāramitā of the Tathāgatas is the revealer of the Loka [understood in this way].

*

Loving sons watch over their mother who has given birth to them and brought them up into the Loka; in the same way, the Buddhas consider their mother to be the Prajñāpāramitā from whom they derive and who reveals to them the Loka (lokasaṃdarśayitrī).

The word Loka, which means free space, the world, people, etc., is derived from the root loki, which means a light, a lamp (loki bhāṣāyām dīptau ca), to which are related the Latin lux, the Greek leukos, etc.

In contrast, an imaginary etymology of ancient date derives Loka from the root luji or ruci, meaning to break into pieces or, in the passive, breaking up (ruci bhaṅga). Thus in some Buddhist texts, Loka, meaning breakage, has become synonymous with skandha, the five psychophysical aggregates of existence: form, feeling, conception, formations and consciousness.

In the Kośabhāṣya, ed. Pradhan, p. 5, l. 15-16, we read that the skandhas are also suffering (duḥkha), origin (samudaya), Loka, subjects of false views (dr̥ṣṭhāna) and existence (bhava). ...”They are Loka insofar as they break up” (lujyata iti lokah).

On this subject, Hīnayānists and Mahāyānists are diametrically opposed.

1) The former, with rigorous orthodoxy, believe that the skandhas break up. The Buddha has repeated again and again in the sūtras: That which is impermanent (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), subject to change (vipariṇāmadharman) cannot be said to be ‘mine’, cannot be said to be ‘me’. (see references, p. 19197F).

He also said: Yan taṃ jātaṃ bhūtaṃ saṃkhatam palokadhammaṃ taṃ vata mā palujjīti, n’etaṃ thānam vijjati: It is impossible that everything that is born, that has become, that is conditioned and subject to be broken, does not break up. Cf. Vin. II, p. 118, 144, 158, 163; Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 402, 408.

He also said that the Loka, i.e., the skandhas, are called thus because it breaks up (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 52: Lujiatīti kho tasmā Loko ti vuddatī) and that this Loka (rūpa, etc.) is an empty Loka, empty of ‘me’ and ‘mine’ (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 54; Suñño loko ... attena vā attaniyena vā).

In a word, starting from impermanence, the ‘breakage’ of the skandhas, the Hīnayānists arrived at their Emptiness (śūnyatā).

2) On the other hand, the Mahāyānists affirm that the skandhas are called Loka “inasmuch as they do not break up and do not disintegrate”. Not that these skandhas are eternal, far from it. These conditioned skandhas do not break up because they never existed, existing only in the imagination of fools. Without intrinsic nature, they have as nature emptiness (śūnyatā), and this emptiness, just like the other unconditioneds, ānimitta, apraṇihita, etc., does not exist at all. <2369>

Also when the Prajñāpāramitā, the mother of the Buddhas, is presented as the ‘revealer of the Loka’ (lokasaṃdarśayitrī), it should be understood as the revealer of the true nature of the skandhas which is none other than distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta) in such a way that prajñā is produced, but it cannot see the true nature of things (dharmāṇām dharmatā). The Prajñāpāramitā can see dharmas completely and discern their true nature; there is nothing that it cannot penetrate, nothing that it cannot realize; its qualities (guṇa) are so great that it is called mother. Also, although the yogin who cultivates the six perfections (pāramitā) and a group of many qualities is able to realize all his wishes, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra says only that “he must practice the prajñāpāramitā”.

3) Furthermore, as will be said in a following chapter: “Without the Prajñāpāramitā, the other five pāramitās are not called perfections”.³³¹ Even by [314b] cultivating all the practices (caryā) one does not completely fulfill (paripṛ) the wishes: it is like colored drawings which, without glue (gavyaḍṛdha), are not usable. If even in the course of beginningless (anādikālika-saṃsāra) saṃsāra, beings who cultivate generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), patience (kṣānti), exertion (vīrya) dhyāna and wisdom (prajñā) obtain the mundane fruits of retribution (laukika vipākaphala), these again will revert to nothing. Why? Because prajñāpāramitā is missing in them. But now, it is with the help of the Buddhas (buddhopakāra) and with prajñāpāramitā that these beings cultivate these six things [generosity, morality, etc.], and this is why these the absence of any nature. The expression lokasaṃdarśayitrī is translated literally by Kumārajīva (T 223, p. 323b4): neng-che-che-kien; Hiuan-tsang (T VII, no. 220, p. 224c13) renders it by a periphrasis neng che che kien tchou fa che siang, which gives in Sanskrit, lokadharmatāsaṃdarśayitrī ‘revealer of the true nature of the Loka’.

*

Commenting on this passage, the Traité (T 1509, k. 69, p. 544a19-28) comments as follows:

Question. – Other sūtras [than those of the Prajñāpāramitā] say that the five skandhas are called ‘loka’ because they break up (lujyante) and disintegrate (pralujyante); Why then is it said here that the Prajñāpāramitā reveals (saṃdarśayati) the non-breakage, non-disintegration, non-arising (anutpāda), non-cessation (anirōdha), etc., of the five skandhas?

Answer. – The other sūtras come under the Hīnayāna system whereas this one comes under the Mahāyāna system. The Hīnayāna speaks mainly about impermanence (anityatā) and then about the emptiness of dharmas whereas the Mahāyāna speaks particularly about emptiness (śūnyatā) of dharmas. The Hīnayāna speaks of impermanence so that beings fear saṃsāra, but in the Mahāyāna, it is not like that, and that is why it speaks of non-breakage, non-disintegration, etc. Here the Buddha himself gives us the same reason: emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta), wishlessness (apraṇihita) themselves “do not break up and do not disintegrate” (na lujyante vā na pralujyante vā), and the Prajñāpāramitā states that that indeed is the [true] nature of the loka [i.e., the skandhas].

³³¹ Tchao-ming p’in, chapter XL of the Pañcaviṃśati where it is said (T 223, k. 11, p. 302b24-302c3; T 220, book VII, k. 505, p. 576c23-577a3): O Kauśika, the prajñāpāramitā of the bodhisattvas surpasses the dāna-, śīla-, kṣānti-, vīrya- and dhyāna-pāramitās. Just as those blind from birth (jātyandhapuṃsa), be they a hundred, a thousand or a hundred thousand, cannot travel on the road or enter a city without a guide, so, O Kauśika, the first five pāramitās, if they are separated from the prajñāpāramitā, are like blind people without a guide, and cannot travel the Path or obtain omniscience. O Kauśika, if the first five pāramitās find the prajñāpāramitā as guide, then they really have an ‘eye’ and, guided by the prajñāpāramitā, they have the right to be called ‘perfections’.

Compare Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 384: Yadā punaḥ Kauśika dānaṃ śīlaṃ kṣāntir vīryaṃ dhyānaṃ ca prajñāpāramitāpariṅghitā bhavati tadā pāramitānāmadheyaṃ pāramitāśabdam labhate tadā hy āsaṃ cakṣuḥpratilambho bhavati pañcānāṃ pāramitānāṃ sarvajñatāmārgāvatārāya sarvajñatānuprāptaye.

are called perfections (pāramitā) and bring about (sādhayanti) abhisambodhi so that the succession of the Buddhas (buddhaprabandha) will be uninterrupted (asamucchinna).

4) Moreover, when the bodhisattva cultivates the prajñāpāramitā, he sees that all the dharmas are empty (śūnya) and that this emptiness itself is empty; from then on he abolishes all seeing (darśana) and obtains the unhindered (anāvaraṇa) prajñāpāramitā. Then, by the power of his great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and skillful means (upāya), he comes back to accomplish meritorious actions (puṇyakarman) and because of these very pure actions (parisuddhakarman), there is no wish that he cannot fulfill. The other merits (anyapuṇya) which themselves lack prajñāpāramitā do not possess this unhindered prajñāpāramitā. How then could one say that in order to realize his wishes, it is enough for him to practice the virtue of generosity (dānapāramitā), etc.?

5) Finally, when the first five perfections – [generosity, morality, patience, exertion and dhyāna] – are separated from wisdom (prajñā), they do not have the name of perfections (pāramitā). The first five perfections are like blind men (andha); the prajñāpāramitā is like seeing (cakṣus). The first five perfections are like an unbaked clay pot (aparipakva ghaṭa); the prajñāpāramitā is like a baked clay pot (paripakva ghaṭa).³³² The first five <2371> perfections are like a bird (pakṣin) without its two wings (pakṣa); the prajñāpāramitā is like a bird with its wings.³³³

For these many reasons, the Prajñāpāramitā is able to realize great things. This is why it is said that in order to acquire the qualities (guṇa) and [realize] one's wishes (praṇidhāna), it is necessary to practice the perfection of wisdom. <2373>

³³² The example of a baked clay pot and an unbaked clay pot, already used by the Traité, p. 1875F, is taken from the P'i-yu p'in (Aupamya-parivarta), chapter LI of the Pañcaviṃśati (T 223, k. 15, p. 330a; T 220, book VII, k. 444, p. 2141a-b).

Compare Aṣṭasāh., p. 586: Tadyathāpi nāma Subhūte strī vā puruṣo vā 'paripakvena ghaṭenodaka parivahed veditavyam etat Subhūte nāyaṃ ghaṭaś ciraṃ anuvartasyate Kasya hetoḥ / yathāpi nāma suparipakvatvād ghaṭasya /

Transl. - Thus, O Subhūti, if a woman or a man takes water in an unbaked clay pot, you must know, O Subhūti, that this pot will not last long, that soon it will break and dissolve. Why? Because this pot has not undergone firing and so it will be reduced to a simple earthen residue.

Thus, O Subhūti, if a woman or a man takes water in a well-baked pot, from a stream, a river, a pool, a well or any other reservoir of water, you must know that, when it is carried, the pot will arrive home in good condition and without being damaged. Why? Because this pot has been well fired.

³³³ Example used above, p. 1930F.

CHAPTER XX (2nd series): SETTING OUT ON THE MAHĀYĀNA

PRELIMINARY NOTE

In Kumārajīva's Chinese translation (T 223, k. 6, p. 256c-259c), Chapter XX of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā is entitled Fa-ts'iu p'in (Samprastānaparivarta or 'Setting out' on the Mahāyāna) It corresponds to pages 214, l. 6 to 225, l. 19 of the Sanskrit text edited by N. Dutt. Under the same title, it is commented on in Chapter XX (2nd series) of the Traité (T 1509, k. 49-50, p. 409c-419c). Given its importance, it is essential to give its translation here.

This chapter deals with the stages in the career of the bodhisattva, a complicated subject which has been the object of many studies for a long time. Although beginning to be out of date, the studies of L. de La Vallée Poussin are still instructive: the article Bodhisattva in Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, II, 1909, p. 739-754; La carrière de Bodhisattva, appearing in his translation of the Vijñaptiātraśiddhi, II, 1928, p. 721-742. Also very useful are the studies dedicated to the Abhisamayālamkāra and the Prajñā literature: E. Obermiller, The Doctrine of the Prajñāpāramitā as exposed in the Abhisamayālamkāra of Mātreyā, Acta Orientalia, XI, 1932, p. 1-133; Analysis of the Abhisamayālamkāra, Calcutta Oriental Series, no. 27, 1922-43, p. 149-179; E. Conze, Abhisamālamkāra, Serie Orientale Roma VI, 1954; The Large Sūtra on Perfect Wisdom, 1975, p. 163-178.

The career of the bodhisattva occupies a place of choice in the enormous Japanese production centered on the Mahāyāna in particular: cf. H. Nakamura, A Survey of Mahāyāna Buddhism, Journal of Intercultural Studies, No. 3, 1976, p. 61, n. 1. In the pages that follow, I [Lamotte] will borrow many references to the works of R. Yamada, Daijō Bukkyō Seiritsuron Josetsu (An Introduction to the Development of Mahāyāna Buddhism), 1959; A. Hirakawa, Shoki Daijō Bukkyō no Kenkyū (Studies on early Mahāyāna), 1968, a work condensed by its author in an article entitled The Rise of Mahāyāna Buddhism, Memoirs of the Research Department of the Tōkyō Bunko No. 22, 1963, p. 57-106.

Over time, the stages of the career of the bodhisattva have been the object of numerous classifications. I [Lamotte] will mention only those of which the author of the Traité was aware or may have been aware, namely:

1. the four stages or the four practices (caryā) belonging to the bodhisattvas,
2. the ten grounds (bhūmi) or the ten abodes (vyavasthāna) reserved for the bodhisattvas,
3. the ten grounds shared (sādhāraṇabhūmi) by adepts of the three Vehicles.

I. THE FOUR BODHISATTVA STAGES OR PRACTICES

1. Four stages are to be traversed during which the bodhisattva becomes successively: <2374>

- 1) Prathamacittotpādika (tch'ou fa yi) or Mahāyānasamprasthita (fa ts'iu ta tch'eng): Bs. who produces the mind of Bodhi for the first time and sets out on the Greater Vehicle.
- 2) Śaṭpāramitācaryāpratipanna (hing pa lo mi): Bs. devoted the the practice of the six perfections.
- 3) Avinivartanīya (pou t'ouei tchouan or a wei yue tche): Bs. non-regressing up to bodhi.
- 4) Ekajātipratibaddha (yi cheng pou tch'ou or yi cheng so hi): Bs. separated by only one lifetime from buddhahood.

This classification first appeared in the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, probably the oldest of the P.P. sūtras; from there it passed into the large P.P. sūtras (Aṣṭadaśa, Pañcaviṃśati, Śata) and was repeated with some supplementary explanations in some Mahāyānasūtras.

Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 831. – T VIII, no. 224, p. 465a24-25. –T VIII, no. 225, p. 501a3-10. – T VIII, no. 227, p. 575a19-21. – T VII, no. 220, p. 849a26-29; 914c1-4. – T VIII, no. 228, p. 650b2-7.

Aṣṭadaśa, T VII, no. 220, p. 666b9-12. Pañcaviṃśati, T VIII, no. 221, p. 101c21-24. – T VIII, no. 223, p. 358c10-13. – T VII, no. 220, p. 302a6-10.

Śatasāh., T VI, no. 220, p. 752c27-753a2.

Mahāsamnipāta, T XIII, no. 397, p. 67a4-13.

Wen chou che li wen p'ou sa chou king, T XIV, no. 458, p. 435b20-c4.

Wen chou che li wen p'ou t'i king, T XIV, no. 464, p. 482b10-15.

Gayāśrīṣa, T XIV, no. 465, p. 485a4-b8. – T XIV, no. 466, p. 487c26-488b4. – T XIV, no. 467, p. 490c1-491a13.

The Traité has mentioned it above, p. 1795-98F.

2. The four practices (caryā) of the bodhisattva:

- 1) Prakṛticaryā, the natural qualities and virtues of the Bs.
- 2) Prañidhānacaryā, the production of the mind of bodhi.
- 3) Anulomacaryā, conduct in conformity with vow.
- 4) Anivartanacaryā, assured and non-regressing conduct up to bodhi.

These four bodhisattvacaryās are proposed by the Mahāvastu, a work derived from the branch of the Mahāsāṃghikas called the Lokottaravādins of Madhyadeśa. The practices concerned are listed in vol. I, p. 1, l. 3-4; p. 46, l. 6-7; p. 63, l. 11-14 and in full detail, from p. 46, l. 8 to p. 63, l. 14.

This classification is different from and independent of the preceding one but, like it, is modeled on the scheme of the śrāvaka's career, the adept of the Lesser Vehicle who, after being instructed by the Buddha and after a long period of effort, enters into the path of nirvāṇa, successively conquers the fruits of srotaāpanna, sakṛdāgāmin and anāgāmin and finally accedes to arhathood. There is, thus, a parallelism between the career of the śrāvaka and that of the bodhisattva, with the essential difference that the former pursues his own benefit (svārtha) above all, whereas the latter assures both his own benefit and that of others (parārtha).

II. THE TEN BODHISATTVA GROUNDS OR ABODES

Many are the Mahāyāna texts that arrange the bodhisattva career into ten grounds (daśabhūmi, sa bcu, che ti) or ten abodes (daśavyavasthāna, rnam par dgod pa bcu, che tchou), but the names attributed the bhumis and the vyavasthānas vary according the schools. Five lists are to be taken into account:

1. Ten bodhisattvabhūmis, without names or explanations, according to the Mahāyānist avadānas (pen yuan),

Several texts limit themselves to mentioning the ten grounds:

Karuṇapūṇḍarika, T III, no. 157, p. 195c13. – T III, no. 158, p. 328b19-20.

Ta tch'eng pen cheng sin ti kouan king, T III, no. 159, p. 298c1; 299a9; 305a26; 316c27; 320a19; 324c3; 329b4.

Sieou hing pen k'i king, T III, no. 184, p. 463a25.

T'ai tseu jouei ying pen k'i king, T III, no. 185, p. 473b12.

Lalitavistara, T III, no. 187, p. 550b4.

Kouo k'iu hien tsai yin kouo king, T III, no. 189, p. 623a24.

2. Ten bodhisattvabhūmis, not named but analyzed to a large extent according to the large P.P. sūtras in the chapter on the Mahāyānasamprasthāna.

This chapter consists of two parts: the first part enumerates the ten bhumis and, for each of them, indicates the things to be practiced and the things to be avoided; the second part repeats all of these things and comments on them. Nothing leads one to suspect that the commentary is a later addition.

The chapter belongs solely to the Prajñā literature. It does not appear in the Aṣṭasāhasrikā but does appear in all the large P.P. sutras.

Aṣṭadaśa, T VII, no. 220, p. 490b2-497b19.

Pañcaviṃśati, ed. N. Dutt, p. 214, l. 6-225, l. 19. – T VIII, no. 221, p. 27a14-29b29. – T VIII, no. 222, p. 196b8-199a5. – T VIII, no. 222, p. 196b8-199a5; T VIII, no. 223, p. 256c4-259c15. – Tib. trip., vol. 18, no. 731, p. 140-146, fol. 251a8-266a7. – T VII, no. 220, p. 82b21-88c24.

Śatasāh., ed. P. Ghosa, p. 1454, l. 1-1473, l. 18. – T V, no. 220, p. 303a14-309b26.

This is the chapter on which the Traité will comment in the following pages. See also the Āloka, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 99-104.

3. Ten bodhisattvabhūmis, named and explained, according to the Mahāvastu referring to a Daśabhūmikasūtra. The names of the ten bhumis are indicated in the Mahāvastu, I, p. 76, l. 13-18; altogether it covers pages 63, l. 16 to 157, l. 13.

- 1) Durārohā, bhūmi difficult of access.
- 2) Baddhamānā, hindered bhūmi.
- 3) Puṣpamaṇḍitā, bhūmi adorned with flowers.
- 4) Rucrā, delightful bhūmi.
- 5) Cittavistarā, stretching the mind bhūmi.
- 6) Rūpavatī, bhūmi full of beauty.
- 7) Durjayā, invincible bhūmi.
- 8) Janmanideśa, confirmation of birth (?).
- 9) Yauvarājya, quality of the crown prince.
- 10) Abhiṣeka, crucial anointment.

The Mahāvastu is alone in proposing this classification of which scholastic Buddhism has no account.

4. Ten bodhisattva vyavasthānas (rnam par dgod pa bcu, che tchou), named and explained, in the Avataṃsaka in the chapter on the bodhisattvadaśvyavasthānas. <2376>

The Sanskrit names of these ten abodes are given by the Gaṇḍhavyūha, ed. D. T. Suzuki and H. Idzumi, p. 84.

- 1) Prathamacittotpādika (tch'ou fa sin): bodhisattva producing the mind of bodhi for the first time.
- 2) Ādhikarmika (tche ti): beginner.
- 3) Yogācāra (sieou hing): practicing the practices.
- 4) Janmaja (cheng kouei): of noble birth.
- 5) Pūrvayogasampanna (fang che kiu tsou): without antecedents.

6) Śuddhādhyāśaya (tcheng sin): animated by high pure resolve.

7) Avivartya (pou t'ouei): without regressing.

8) Kumārabhūta (t'ong tchen): crown prince [of the Dharma].

9) Yauvarājya (fa wang rseu): quality of crown prince.

10) Abhiṣikta (kouang ting): anointed with crucial anointment.

This classification is derived from the Avataṃsaka and related texts:

Avataṃsaka, T IX, no. 278, p. 444c27-446b23. – T X, no. 279, p. 84a21-85c11. P'ou sa pen ye king, T X, p. 449c15-450c27.

P'ou sa che tchou hing tai p'in, T X, no. 283, p. 454c1-456c5.

Ta fang kouang tsong tch'e pao kouang ming king, T X, no. 299, p. 886b15-888b20.

Tsouei cheng wen p'ou tchou tch'ou keou touan kie king, T X, no. 309, p. 967c27-988.

5. Ten bodhisattabhūmis, according to the Daśabhūmikasūtra, or Daśabhūmiśvara, the Sanskrit text of which has been edited by J. Rahder, 1926, and by R. Kondō, 1936.

- 1) Pramuditā (rab tu dgaḥ ba, houan hi or ki hi): the joyous bhūmi.
- 2) Vimalā (dri ma med pa, li keou): the stainless bhūmi.
- 3) Prabhākara (hod hphro ba can, tseng yao or yen houei): the bhūmi of fiery prajñā.
- 5) Sudurjayā (šin tu dbyans dkaḥ ba, nan cheng or ki nan cheng): the bhūmi difficult to conquer.
- 6) Abhimukhī (mñon du gyur ba, hien tsai): the bhūmi of presence.
- 7) Dūraṃgamā, (rin du soñ ba, chen jou or yuan hing): the far-going bhūmi.
- 8) Acalā (mi gyo ba, pou tong): the unshakable bhūmi.
- 9) Sādhumatī (legs paḥi blo gros, chan ken or chan houei) the bhūmi of good prajñā.
- 10) Dharmamegha (chos kyi sprin, fa yun): the cloud of Dharma bhūmi.

This classification, like the preceding one, is derived from the Avataṃsaka (of which it forms a chapter) and related texts:

Avataṃsaka, T IX, no. 278, p. 542c27-a1. – T X, no. 279, p. 179b21-24.

Daśabhūmikasūtra, T X, no. 285, p. 458c18-24. – T X, no. 286, p. 498b29-c3. – T X, no. 287, p. 536b3-6.

Daśabhūmikavibhāṣā, T XXVI, no. 1521, p. 21a12-13.

Daśabhūmikasūtropadeśa, T XXVI, no. 1522, p. 127c4-7. <2377>

Maitreyapariṣcchā, T XXVI, no. 1525, p. 235c19.

Upadeśa, T XXV, no. 1509, p. 411a27-29; 586a21-22.

In the large P.P. sūtras, some mention is made of this classification: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, ed. N. Dutt, p. 229, l. 24-230, l. 1; T VII, no. 220, p. 119a12-15; 226c3-5. - Śatasāhasrikā in the translation by Hiuan-tsang, T V, no. 220, p. 14a22-24; 23a23-24; 40a7-9; 67a15-17; 80a28-b3. T VI, no. 220, p. 696b24-27. Even supposing that these comments are authentic, they represent but a few drops in the ocean of the Prajñāpāramitā and had no influence on Buddhist Gnosis.

But the classification into ten bhūmis, Pramuditā, etc., finally supplanted the preceding ones: this is the one that will be retained by the Madhyamaka treatises (e.g., Candrakīrti's Madhyamakāvatāra) and by the Yogācāras: cf. Sūtrālaṃkāra, ed. S. Lévi, p. 181-183; Madhyāntavibhāga, ed. G. M. Nagao, p.35-36; Ratnagotravibhāga, ed. E. H. Johnston, P. 52; Bodhisattvabhūmi, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 376-370; Abhidharmasamuccaya, ed. P. Pradhan, p. 92, transl. W. Rahula, p. 159; Mahāyānasamgraha, transl. Lamotte, II, p. 196-211; Siddhi, transl. L. de La Vallée Poussin, p. 613-619.

III. THE TEN GROUNDS SHARED BY ADEPTS OF THE THREE VEHICLES

Here it is no longer a matter of the grounds reserved for bodhisattvas alone but of four groups of grounds occupied by the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas, the bodhisattvas and the Buddhas, respectively. The list was elaborated in the Prajñā school and presents some similarities with that of the ten bodhisattva-vyavasthānas mentioned above.

1) Śuklavidaśanā (dkar po rnam par mthoñ baḥi sa, tsing kouan); ground of clear seeing. – Variant attested by the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1563, l. 1, and some Chinese translations: Śuśkavidaśanā (kan houe): level of dry seeing, i.e., not moistened by absorption. Variant derived probably from a faulty reading: śuśka for śukla.

2) Gotra (rīgs kyi sa, sing or tchong sing); ground of the spiritual lineage.

3) Aṣṭamaka (brgyad paḥi sa, pa jen or ti pa): ground of the eighth saint or of the aspirant srotaāpanna.

4) Darśana (mthoñ baḥi sa, kien or kiu kien): ground of seeing or of srotaāpanna.

5) Tanū (bsrab paḥi sa, po): ground of the reduction of the passions or of the sakṛdāgāmin.

6) Vīṭarāga (ḥdod chags dañ bral baḥi sa, li yu): ground of the saint freed from the passions or of the anāgāmin.

7) Kṛtāvi (byas pa bsrāñ baḥi sa, yi tso or yi pan): ground of the saint who has done what had to be done or of the arhat.

8) Pratyekabuddha: ground(s) of the solitary Buddhas.

9) Bodhisattva: the (ten) grounds of the bodhisattva.

10) Buddha: the ground of the Buddhas.

In this list, only the śrāvaka grounds, seven in number, are itemized.

The list does not appear again in the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, but does appear in all of the large P.P. sūtras: <2378>

Aṣṭadaśa, ed. E. Conze, I, p. 183, l. 24-25; 197, l. 4-8. – T VII, no. 220, p. 497b14-15; 698b12-13.

Pañcaviṃśati, ed. N. Dutt, p. 225, l. 16-18; 235, l. 18-19. – T VIII, no. 221, p. 29b25-26. – T VIII, no. 222, p. 199a1-2. – T VIII, no. 223, p. 259c12-13; 261a4-6; 346b5-6; 377c22-24; 383b20-21; 383c11-13. T VII, no. 220, p. 88c20-21; 97c26-28; 119a4-12.

Śatasāhasrikā, ed. P. Ghosa, p. 1473, l. 11-16; 1520, l. 20-22; 1562, l. 21-1563, l. 2. – T V, no. 220, p. 321c29-322a1. – T VI, no. 220, p. 905a15-17; 917b20-22.

Upadeśa, T XXV, no. 1509, p. 191a17; 197b23; 411a26-29; 585c28-586a25; 643a5-6; 657a11.

Compare Āloka, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 104, l. 3-11.

The career of the bodhisattva goes from the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) up to the arrival at supreme complete enlightenment constituting buddhahood. The Prajñā thinkers attribute to it ten stages or ten degrees which they metaphorically designate under the name of 'grounds' (bhūmi). Having established this list reserved for solitary bodhisattvas, they thought to draw up a vaster one, this time including all the adepts of the Holy Dharma, śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattvas and Buddhas: this is the list called the list of shared grounds (sādhāraṇabhūmi). It also involves ten grounds, those of the pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattvas and Buddhas each counting as one (numbers 8 to 10) whereas those of the śrāvakas (numbers 1 to 7) counting as seven. Where were they found? In the early scriptures and mainly in the Vinayas and Abhidharmas where these seven śrāvakabhūmis appear in part or in full as has been shown by A. Hirakawa, The Rise of Mahāyāna Buddhism, Memoirs of the Research Department of the Tōkyō Bunka, no. 22, 1963, p. 67-68.

The career of the śrāvaka is strictly called the Path of nirvāṇa traveled by the saints or āryas. Leaving aside a preparatory period, it goes from entry into the certainty of acquisition of the supreme good (samyaktvaniyāmāvakrānti) or nirvāṇa up to obtaining the state of arhat. During this career, by means of seeing (darśana) and repeated meditation (bhāvanā) of the noble Truths, the ārya gathers the four fruits of the religious life (śrāmaṇyaphala) successively, the fruits of srotaāpanna, sakṛdāgāmin, anāgāmin and arhat.

The career of the śrāvaka is punctuated with a certain number of stages which some early sources, rather rare it is true, describe also as grounds (bhūmi) and which may be placed parallel to the grounds of the bodhisattva. As we have just seen, the Prajñāpāramitā enumerates seven, śuklavidaśana, etc., but the early sources (Vinaya and Abhidharma of the Sarvāstivādins) are usually content to give a much lower number.

1) Two bhūmis: Darśana and Bhāvanā, represented by anājñātamañjñāsyāmindriya and ājñātendriya respectively. Cf. Mahāvibhāṣā, T XXVII, no. 1545, p. 344a3-4; 909c22. – Vibhāṣā, T XXVIII, no. 1546, p. 256c9.

2) Three bhumis: Darśana, Bhāvanā and Aśaikṣa. Cf. Mahāvibhāṣā, T XXVII, no. 1545, p. 740a14; 944a25. – Abhidharmahr̥daya by Upaśānta, T XXVIII, no. 1551, p. 849c24-25. – Saṃyuktābhidharmahr̥daya, T XXVIII, no. 1552, p. 910c6.

3) Four bhumis, according to Ghoṣaka: Tanū, Vītarāga, Aśaikṣa and Bhūmiphala <2379> or Nirvāṇa (cf. Mahāvibhāṣā, T XXVII, no. 1545, p. 137b27-28) or Darśana, Tanū, Vītarāga and Aśaikṣa (cf. Vibhāṣā, T XXVIII, no. 1546, p. 114a12-13).

4) Four bhumis according to Pārśva: Prayoga (sieou hing ti), Darśana (kien ti), Bhāvanā (sieou ti) and Aśaikṣa (wou hio ti). Cf. Mahāvibhāṣā, T XXVII, no. 1545, p. 560c7-8. – Vibhāṣā, T XXVIII, no. 1546, p. 398b13-14.

5) Six bhumis, according to Kātyāyanīputra: Prayoga, Darśana, Tanū, Vītarāga, Aśaikṣa and Bhūmiphala or Nirvāṇa. Cf. Mahāvibhāṣā, T XXVII, no. 1545, p. 147b29-c3.

6) Six bhumis: Gotra, Aṣṭamaka, Darśana, Tanū, Vītarāga and Kṛtāvi. Cf. Vinayamātrkā, T XXIV, no. 1463, p. 801b20-25. It is possible that the large P.P. sūtras may have borrowed this list, putting a śukladarśanabhūmi ahead of it. Even if that is the case, it would be dangerous to conclude a dependency between the Prajñās and the Vinayamātrkā the relationship of which is unknown; for some critics it would be of Haimavata origin; for others, of Dharmagupaka origin.

*

Whatever its origin, the list of the ten shared grounds has complicated the career of the bodhisattva in a strange way. We may recall that this career begins with the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) and ends with the arrival at supreme complete bodhi (anuttarā samyakṣambodhi). It involves a certain number of stages or steps designated by the name of grounds (bhūmi). Two groups of grounds are to be distinguished:

1) The grounds proper, i.e., reserved for the bodhisattva. They are ten in number. In the early Prajñās, they are not named, but the Avatamsaka calls them Pramuditā, Vimalā, Prabhākarī, Arciṣmatī, Sudurjayā, Abhimukhī, Dūraṅgamā, Acalā, Sādhumatī, Dharmameghā.

2) The shared grounds (sādhāraṇabhūmi) belonging to the disciples of the Buddha altogether divided into three groups: i) the śrāvakas whose grounds are seven in number: Śuklavidarśana (variant, Śuṣkavidarśana), Gotra, Aṣṭamaka, Darśana, Tanū, Vītarāga, Kṛtāvi; ii) the pratyekabuddhas whose grounds are not specified in number; iii) the bodhisattvas to whom are reserved the ten grounds proper just mentioned.

In the following pages, I [Lamotte] will refer to these two groups of grounds by calling them the ‘grounds proper’ and the ‘shared grounds’.

The bodhisattva has two ways of accomplishing his career. He can travel through the grounds proper (what I [Lamotte] will call the ‘career of grounds proper’, or he can travel through the shared grounds (what I [Lamotte] will call the ‘career of shared grounds’).

1. The career of the grounds proper

It is by far the most usual. It is described in chapter XX of the Pañcaviṃśati entitled Samprasthānaparivarta (T 223, k. 6, p. 256c-259c) and commented on in the present chapter of the Traité.

2. The career of the shared grounds

It has been passed over unnoticed up until now, although it was set out in chapter LVII of the Pañcaviṃśati entitled Chen ngao p'in, or also Teng tchou p'in (Pradipavartiparivarta): cf. T 223, k. 17, p. 346b2-7: <2380>

Subhūti asked the Buddha: Bhagavat, what are the ten grounds which the bodhisattva completely fulfills in order to obtain anuttarā samyakṣambodhi? – The Buddha replied: The bodhisattva who completely fulfills the Śuṣkavidarśanābhūmi, the Gotrabhūmi, the Aṣṭamakabhūmi, the Darśanabhūmi, the Tanūbhūmi, the Vitarāgabhūmi, the Kṛtāvibhūmi, the Pratyekabuddhabhūmis, the Bodhisattvabhūmis, the Buddhabhūmi, this bodhisattva, I say, who completely fulfills these bhumis obtains anuttarā samyakṣambodhi.

At first sight it seems strange that, in order to accomplish his own career, the bodhisattva begins by fulfilling that of a śrāvaka but, although initially the practices of the śrāvaka and the bodhisattva are the same, the mind in which they are performed is quite different.

The explanations given by the Traité (T 1509, k. 75, p. 585c25-586a25) merit a translation:

In this passage, the Buddha again explains the causes and conditions leading to anuttarā bodhi. From his first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva practices the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā) and completely fulfills the [shared] grounds, from the first to the tenth. These ten grounds help in realizing anuttarā bodhi. These ten grounds are the Śuklavidarśanābhūmi, etc.

1) Śuklavidarśanābhūmi. – It is of two kinds: i) that of the śrāvaka, ii) that of the bodhisattva. The śrāvaka, solely in view of nirvāṇa, exerts himself (utsahate) to conquer bodhi. Practicing the concentration of contemplating the Buddhas or the contemplation of the ugly (aśubhabhāvanā), practicing loving-kindness (maitrī), compassion (karuṇā) or the reflections on impermanence (anityadatādimanasikāra), he accumulates good dharmas and rejects bad dharmas. Although he has a certain wisdom (prajñā), he is unable to find the water of the dhyāna-samāpattis nor is he able to obtain Bodhi as a consequence. This is why this ground is called the ground of the dry earth. – In the bodhisattva who has just produced the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), this stage is prolonged as long as he has not attained the preparatory conviction (anulomikī kṣānti). [This stage covers the shared grounds 1 to 5, from Pramuditā to Sudurjayā].

2) Gotrabhūmi. – The śrāvaka [conquers the four nirvedhabhāgāyā kuśalamūla, roots of good leading to penetration of the noble truths], from heat (uṣmagata) up to the supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma). The bodhisattva, however, obtains the preparatory conviction (anulomikī kṣānti) [during the shared ground no. 6, Abhimukhī]; he is attached to the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇām dharmatā), no longer produces any wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) and obtains the water of the dhyāna-samāpattis.

3) Aṣṭamakabhūmi. – [In the course of this ground, the śrāvaka] goes from duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti to mārga 'nvayajñānakṣānti: these are the first fifteen moments of mind [of the Satyadarśanamārga, or Path of seeing the truths. – For the bodhisattva, it is [the definitive obtaining] of the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) and entry into the [definitive] position of bodhisattva (bodhisattvaniyāma). [This result is attained in the course of or at the end of the 7th ground proper, the Dūramgamā]. <2381>

4) Darśanabhūmi. – [For the śrāvaka], this is the obtaining for the first time of a fruit of sainthood (āryaphala), namely, srotaṣṭhāna. – For the bodhisattva, it is the bodhisattva ground of non-regressing (avaivartika). [It coincides with the shared ground no. 8, the Acalā].

5) Tanūbhūmi. – [The śrāvaka], if he is srotaṣṭhāna or sakṛdāgāmin, partially destroys the nine kinds of passions (kleśa) of the desire realm: [six categories if he is sakṛdāgāmin]. – As for the bodhisattva, passing the non-regressing level Avaivartikabhūmi and as long as he has not become buddha [and remains in the grounds proper no. 8 and no. 9, Acalā and Sudarjayā], he destroys all the passions, and the traces (vāsanā) that remain become very slight (tanūbhavanti).

6) Vitarāgabhūmi. – Here, [the śrāvaka] abandons all the passions, desire, etc. (rāgadikkleśa) of the desire realm (kāmadhātu) and is called anāgamin. – As for the bodhisattva, because of his renunciation (vairāgya), he obtains the five superknowledges (abhijñā). This corresponds to ground proper no. 9, Sudarjayā].

7) Kṛtāvibhūmi. – [Here] the śrāvaka obtains the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣajñāna) and the conviction that they will not arise again (anutpādajñāna), and he becomes arhat. – As for the bodhisattva, he completely fulfills the ground of Buddha (buddhabhūmi) [coinciding with the shared ground no. 10, the Dharmamegha].

8) Pratyekabuddhabhūmi. – In an earlier existence, he has planted the causes and conditions for the bodhi of the pratyekabuddhas; in the present existence, because of a minor event (see above, p. 1068-68F), he has left home (pravrajita) and, having found the profound doctrine of the nidānas (= pratītyasamutpāda), he has realized the bodhi of the pratyekabuddhas. In the language of the Ts'in, Pi-tche-fo is also called Pi-tche-kia-fo.

9) Bodhisattvabhūmi. – This is the [shared grounds] from Śukladarśanabhūmi to Kṛtāvibhūmi, as has been said above. It is also the [shared grounds] going from the Pramuditā bhūmi to the Dharmamegha bhūmi: all are called Bodhisattvabhūmi. Some say that all the grounds from the production of the first mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) to the diamond-like concentration (vajropamasamādhi) are called Bodhisattvabhūmi].

10) Buddhabhūmi. – These are all the attributes of Buddha, beginning with the knowledge of phenomena in all their aspects (sarvākārajñatā).

In his grounds proper, the comportment (pratipatti) of the bodhisattva is perfect; his vision (vidarśana) of the grounds of another is perfect. For these two reasons together, the bodhisattva is perfect (sampanna).

- Some critics are surprised that the Traité places the Avaivartika in the fourth stage of the bodhisattva's career. But a distinction is made here: as we will see, the Avaivartika is in the fourth stage (Darśanabhūmi) of the shared levels, but at the eighth stage (Acalabhūmi) of the grounds proper only. The present passage has nothing revolutionary about it; to the contrary, it follows the purest abhidharmic tradition.

Sūtra. – Atha khalu bhagavān āyusmantam subhūtim etad avocat / yad api subhūtir evam āha / katham bodhisattvo mahāsattvo mahāyānasamprasthito bhavati / iha subhūte bodhisattvo mahāsattvaḥ ṣaṣṭu <2382> pāramitāsu caran bhūmer bhūmiṃ samkrāmati / ayaṃ bodhisattvo mahāsattvo mahāyāna-samprasthita ity ucyate / athāyusmān subhūtir bhagavantam etad avocat / katham bhagavan bodhisattvo mahāsattvo bhūmer bhūmiṃ samkrāmati / bhagavān āha / bodhisattvo mahāsattvaḥ sarvadharmāṇām asaṃkrāntim jñāti / na hi kaścid dharmo ya āgacchati vā gacchati vā samkrāmati vā upasamkrāmati vā / api tu bodhisattva yā sarvadharmāṇām bhumis tāṃ na manyate na cintayati bhūmiparikarma ca karoti na ca bhūmiṃ samanupaśyati /

Then the Blessed One said to venerable Subhūti: You also asked me, O Subhūti, how the bodhisattva-mahāsattva sets out on the Mahāyāna. Well then, Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who, going along with the six perfections, passes from ground to ground is said to have set out on the Mahāyāna.

Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One: How, O Blessed One, does the bodhisattva-mahāsattva pass from ground to ground? – The Blessed One answered: The bodhisattva-mahāsattva knows the non-passing of all the dharmas; indeed, there is no dharma that comes or that goes, that passes by or that approaches. However, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva does not think, does not reflect about the level of the dharmas and yet he practices the preparations for the grounds but does not see the grounds.

Śāstra (p. 411a16). – Above (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 194), Subhūti had questioned the Buddha about the Mahāyāna, and the Buddha had answered (ibid., p. 194-214) by explaining the many characteristics of the Mahāyāna to him.³³⁴ Also above (ibid., p. 214), Subhūti had asked a question about starting out for the ³³⁴ According to the Pañcaviṃśati (p. 194-225), the many characteristics of the Mahāyāna are classified in the following way:

1. the six pāramitās (p. 194-195).
2. the twenty śūnyatās (p. 195-198).
3. the one hundred and twelve samādhis (p. 198-203).
4. the twenty-one groups of practices (p. 203-212): 1) four smṛtyupasthānas, 2) four samyakprahānas, 3) four ṛddhipādas, 4) five indriyas, 5) five balas, 6) seven bodhyaṅgas, 7) aṣṭāṅgamārga, 8) three samādhis, 9) eleven jñānas, 10) three indriyas, 11) three samādhis, 12) ten anusmṛtis, 13) four dhyānas, 14) four apramānas, 15) four samāpattis, 16) eight vimokṣas, 17) nine anupūrvavivahāras, 18) ten tathāgatabalas, 19) four vaiśāradyas, 20) four pratisaṃvids, 21) eighteen āveṇika buddhadharmas.
5. the forty-three dhāraṇīmukhas (p. 212-214).

Mahāyāna (mahāyānasamprasthāla) and here also the Buddha answered about the characteristics of this setting out.

The bodhisattva-mahāsattva going in this Vehicle (yānarūḍha) knows that from the beginning (ādita eva) all dharmas are without coming (anāgama), <2383> without going (anirgama), unmoving (acala) and without setting forth (asamprasthāna), because the fundamental element is eternally stable (sthita).

Furthermore, by minds of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta), by the perfection of exertion (vīryapāramitā) and by the power of skillful means (upāyabala), the bodhisattva returns to practice the good dharmas (kuśaladharmas) and, still seeking the higher grounds (uttarabhūmi),³³⁵ he does not grasp the characteristics of these grounds (na bhūminimittāny udgrhnāti) and does not see these grounds.

Question. – But [in order to answer Subhūti's question precisely], the Buddha should have spoken here about the Greater Vehicle (mahāyānasamprasthāna); why then does he speak about setting out for the grounds (bhūmisamprasthāna)?

Answer. – The Greater Vehicle is the grounds; [thus, to speak about the grounds is to speak about the Greater Vehicle]. The grounds are ten in number; to go from the first to the tenth is to 'start out' (samprasthāna). Thus a man riding on a horse (aśva) who wants to ride on an elephant (hastin), abandons the horse and gets up on the elephant; and to ride on a dragon (nāga), he abandons the elephant and mounts the dragon.

Question. – What are the ten grounds?

Answer. – There are two kinds of grounds: i) the grounds belonging to the bodhisattva (bodhisattvabhūmi) alone, ii) the shared grounds (sādhāraṇabhūmi).³³⁶

The shared grounds go from the ground of dry seeing (śuṣkavidarśanābhūmi) to the ground of the Buddhas (buddhabhūmi).

The grounds belonging to the bodhisattva alone are:

- 1) the joyous ground (pramuditā bhūmi),
- 2) the stainless ground (vimalā bhūmi),
- 3) the shining ground (prabhākarī bhūmi),
- 4) the ground of fiery wisdom (arciṣmati bhūmi),
- 5) the ground difficult to conquer (sudurjayā bhūmi),
- 6) the ground of presence (abhimukhī bhūmi),
- 7) the far-gone ground (dūraṅgamā bhūmi),

6. the ten bhūmis (p. 214-225).

³³⁵ Bhūmis 8 to 10.

³³⁶ See the preliminary note to this chapter.

8) the unshakeable ground (acalā bhūmi),

9) the ground of good wisdom (sādhumatī bhūmi)

10) the ground of the cloud of the Dharma (dharmameghā bhūmi).

For the characteristics of these grounds, see the full explanation in the Che-ti king (Daśabhūmika sūtra). <2384>

Bhūmi I

1. Sūtra. – Katamaṃ ca bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya bhūmiparikarma / prathamāyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena bodhisattvena mahāsattvena daśabhūmiparikarmāṇi karaṇitāni / adhyāśayaḥṣṭaḥprathānupalambhayogena /

evam ukta āyusmān subhūtir bhagavantam etad avocat / katamad bhagavan bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasyādhyāśayaparikarma / bhagavan āha / yad bodhisattvo mahāsattvāḥ sarvajñatāpratisaṃyuktaiḥ cittotpādaiḥ kuśalamūlāni samurānayaati /

What is the preparation of the grounds in the bodhisattva-mahāsattva? The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who is in the first ground should fulfill ten preparations:

1) the strength of his high aspiration by means of the method of non-apprehending.

Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Bhagavat: For the bodhisattva-mahāsattva, what, O Bhagavat, is this preparation consisting of a high aspiration? – The Bhagavat answered: By means of resolutions associated with omniscience, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva accumulates the roots of good.

Śāstra (p. 411b1). – In order to enter into the first ground, the bodhisattva must accomplish ten things, from high aspiration (adhyāśaya) up to true speech (satyavacana).³³⁷ Subhūti knows this very well, but in order to cut the doubts (saṃśaya) of beings on this subject, he questions the Bhagavat and asks him: “What is this high aspiration? “ The Buddha answers: “It is to accumulate the roots of good by means of resolutions associated with omniscience.” In regard to the resolutions associated with omniscience, we may note: When the bodhisattva-mahāsattva produces the mind of supreme complete enlightenment for the first time (prathamato 'nuttarasamyaksambodhicittam utpādayati), he makes the following vow (praṇidhāna): “May I become Buddha in a future lifetime (anāgate janmani).” Thus this mind of supreme complete enlightenment constitutes a ‘resolution associated with omniscience’ (sarvajñatāsamprayukta cittotpāda). ‘Associated’ (samprayukta) insofar as it joins the mind to the wish to become Buddha.

For the bodhisattva of keen faculties (nīkṣendriya) who has accumulated merits (punya) greatly, the passions (kleśa) are slight (tanu) and the past wrongdoings (atīṭāpatti) are less numerous. When <2385> he produces the mind of bodhi (cittotpāda), he forms the high aspiration (adhyāśaya) which takes pleasure in abhisambodhi and, from lifetime to lifetime, the concerns about worldly things (loka) decrease: this is what is here called ‘resolutions associated with omniscience’ (sarvajñatāsamprayukta cittotpāda).

³³⁷ Compare Abhisamayālaṃkāra, I, v. 48-50 (p. 7-8); Āloka, p. 99. Properly speaking, these ten parikarmas are to be practiced in the course of the prayogamārga preceding entry into the first bhūmi.

In all the virtues that he practices, generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), concentration (saṃādhi), etc., the bodhisattva does not seek either the happiness of this world or that of the other world (ihaparalokasukha), or longevity (āyuhpramāṇa) or safety (kṣema); he seeks only omniscience (sarvajñatā). Just as a miser (matsarin) refuses for any reason to give even a single coin (kārṣāpaṇa), saves them and piles them up with the sole desire of becoming rich, so the bodhisattva, whether his merits (puṇya) are many or not, seeks nothing other than to save them and pile them up with the view of omniscience.

Question. – But if the bodhisattva does not yet have omniscience and has not yet tasted its flavor (rasa), how can he form the high aspiration (adhyāśaya)?

Answer. – I said above that it is a question of someone of keen faculties (tīkṣṇendriya), of slight passions, of pure qualities, who is not fond of the world. Without even having heard the Mahāyāna praised, he hates the world: what then if he has heard it praised?

Thus, Mo-ho-kia-chō (Mahākāśyapa) had taken as wife a woman golden in color (suvarṇavarṇa), but as he did not love her, he abandoned her and entered into the religious life.³³⁸

Also seeing in the middle of the night that his courtesans were like corpses, Ye-chō tch'ang-tchō-tseu (Yaśaḥ śreṣṭhiputra) left his precious sandals worth a hundred thousand [kārṣāpaṇas] on the bank of the river, crossed over the river and went straight to the Buddha (śatasahasraṃ maṇipādukayugam nadyāvāarakāyās tīre ujjhītvā, nadīm vāarakāṃ pratyutṭīryayena bhagavāṃs tenopasaṃkrāntāḥ).³³⁹

The noblemen and kings who, out of disgust, thus renounced the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) are innumerable. Why then does the bodhisattva, who has heard speak of the many qualities (guṇa) of the bodhi of the Buddhas, not at once make the resolution <2386> (cittotpāda) to penetrate it deeply? Thus, in the chapter Sa-t'o-po-louen (Sadāprarudita-parivarta) which will follow,³⁴⁰ the daughter of a nobleman (śreṣṭhidārikā), having heard the praises of the Buddha, immediately left her home and went to T'an-wou-kie (Dharmodgata).³⁴¹

Moreover, as his five spiritual faculties (pañcendriya), faith (śraddhā), etc., are complete (paripūrṇa) and ripe (paripakva), the bodhisattva is able to acquire the high aspiration (adhyāśaya). A small child whose five organs (pañcendriya), eye (cakṣus), etc., are not complete, does not discern the five objects (pañcaviṣaya) and does not distinguish what is beautiful and what is ugly; it is the same when the five spiritual faculties, faith, etc., are not complete: one does not distinguish between the good and the bad, one does not know the difference between what is bondage (bandana) and what is deliverance (mokṣa), one loves the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) and one falls into wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi). But the person whose five spiritual faculties, faith, etc., are complete is able to distinguish good from bad. If already he takes pleasure in the śrāvaka system advocating the ten good paths of action (daśakuśalakarmapatha), why would he not think more deeply yet of supreme bodhi?

As soon as he first produces the mind of supreme bodhi, he has already gone beyond the world; he goes even further when he has perfected [this mind of supreme bodhi].

Furthermore, when the bodhisattva begins to taste the flavor (rasa) of the Prajñāpāramitā, he is able to produce the high aspiration (adhyāśaya). A man closed up in a dark prison who sees the light through a narrow slit, leaps for joy; he thinks and tells others that he alone has seen such a light and, in his joy and happiness, he produces a high aspiration; thinking of this light, he seeks to escape by any means. It is the same for the bodhisattva: closed up in the dark prison of the twelve bases of consciousness (dvādaśāyatana) and of ignorance (avidyā) by his earlier actions (pūrvakarma), everything that he knew and saw was false; but when he has heard the Prajñāpāramitā and tasted its flavor a little bit, he thinks deeply about omniscience (sarvajñatā) and wonders how to get out of the prison of the six sense organs (ṣaḍindriya), like the Buddhas and the āryas. <2387>

Finally, when the bodhisattva has produced the mind of supreme complete enlightenment, he acts in conformity with his wish (yathāpraṇidhānam); this is why he produces the high aspiration (adhyāśaya) that consists of loving all dharmas, but none as much as omniscience (sarvajñatā); of loving all beings, but none as much as the Buddhas; of penetrating deeply into the feelings of compassion (karuṇacitta) to work for the benefit of all beings (sarvārthakriyā): these are the characteristics of adhyāśaya. In the first ground, the bodhisattva must always practice these resolutions (cittotpāda) [associated with omniscience].

*

2. Sūtra. – Sarvasattvasamacittatāparikarma sattvānupalabdhitām upādāya // yad bodhisattvaḥ sarvajñatāpratisaṃyuktaiś cittotpādaiś caturpramāṇany abhinirharati maitrīkaruṇāmuditopekṣam /

The equality of mind towards all beings by not apprehending any being. – By means of the resolutions associated with omniscience, the bodhisattva produces the four immeasurable [feelings]: loving-kindness, compassion, joy and equanimity.

Śāstra (p. 411c16). – When the bodhisattva has obtained this high aspiration (adhyāśaya), he equalizes his mind in regard to all beings. Beings always love their friends and hate their enemies, but, for the bodhisattva who has obtained the high aspiration, enemy and friend are equal; he regards them as the same.

Here the Buddha himself defines the equality of mind (samacittatā) as being the four immeasurable feelings (caturapramāṇa). When the bodhisattva sees beings experiencing happiness (sukha), he produces minds of loving-kindness (maitrī) and joy (muditā) and formulates the vow (praṇidhāna) to lead all beings to find the happiness of a Buddha. – When he sees beings undergoing suffering (duḥkha), he produces a mind of compassion (karuṇā) and, out of pity for them, he formulates the vow to eradicate the sufferings of ³³⁸ On the marriage of Mahākāśyapa and Bhadrā, soon followed by separation, see above, p. 287F, n. 1.

³³⁹ On the conversion of Yaśas, see above, p. 1545F, n. 4. To the references, add Samghabhedha, I, p. 139-141.

³⁴⁰ Tch'ang-t'i p'in, chapter 88 of the Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 27, p. 416a-421b.

³⁴¹ In this chapter, the daughter of the śreṣṭhin went with her father and mother to the bodhisattva Dharmodgata to pay homage to him. – Cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 953: Atha khalu sā śreṣṭhidārikā Dharmadgatasya bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya pūjārthaṃ satkāraṃ ca prasthīā.

all beings. When he sees beings who are neither unhappy nor happy, he produces a mind of equanimity (upekṣā) and formulates the vow of bringing them to renounce any feeling of fondness (anunaya) or aversion (pratigha).

For other explanations of these four immeasurable feelings, see what has been said above (p. 1239-1273F).

*

3. Sūtra. – Tyāgaparikarma dānadāyakapratigrāhakānupalabdhitām upādāya // yad bodhisattvaḥ sarvasattvebhyo 'vikalpitam dānam dadāti // <2388>

The generosity of not apprehending either gift or giver. - The bodhisattva makes gifts to all beings free of discrimination.

Śāstra (p. 411c28) – Generosity (tyāga) is of two kinds: i) Making a gift by giving up a material object (āmiṣa); ii) obtaining bodhi by giving up the fetters (saṃyojana). The former is 'abandoning' insofar as it rejects avarice (mātsrya); by contrast, the latter, the 'abandoning' of the fetters, plays the role of cause and condition (hetupratyaya). It is necessary to reach the seventh ground in order to abandon the fetters.

Question. – There are several kinds of abandoning: internal (ādhyātmika) or external (bāhya) gift, small (laghu) or large (guru) gift, material gift (āmiṣadāna) or gift of the Dharma, worldly gift (laukikadāna) or supraworldly gift (lokottaradāna), etc. Why then does the Buddha speak only of supraworldly gift 'free of discrimination' (avikalpita) and free of conceptualization (asaṃkalpita)?

Answer. – Although generosity is of any type, the Buddha speaks only of great generosity, the generosity that does not grasp the characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇahita).³⁴²

Furthermore, the Buddha subscribes to no dharma and therefore teaches the bodhisattva a generosity 'without adherence' (nirāsaṅga), in conformity with the teachings of the Buddhas.

Here it would be necessary to speak at length about the generosity free of discrimination (avikalpitadāna); as for the other kinds of generosity, they have been the object of many explanations already in several places.

*

4. Sūtra. – Kalyāṇamitrāsevanāparikarma nairmāṇyatām upādāya // yāni kalyāṇamitrāṇi sarvajñātāyaṃ samādāpayanti teṣāṃ mitrāṇāṃ sevānā bhajanā paryupāsanaṃ śuśruṣā /

The good services rendered to good friends by not deriving any pride from them. – Helping, venerating, respecting and listening to good friends who encourage one to omniscience.

³⁴² Triply pure generosity (trimaṇḍalapariśuddha) where there is total absence of giver, gift and recipient: cf. p. 675-677F, 724F.

Śāstra. – (p. 412a4) – On the good services rendered to good friends, see the explanations given above (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 156). <2389>

*

5. Sūtra. – Dharmaparyeṣṭiparikarma sarvadharmānuplabdhitām upādāya // yad bodhisattvaḥ sarvajñātāpratīṣaṃyuktaiḥ cittotpādair dharmāṃ paryeṣate na ca śrāvakaḥ pratyekabuddhabhūmau patati /

The search for the Dharma by means of the non-apprehension of all the teachings. – The bodhisattva seeks the Dharma with resolutions associated with omniscience and [hence] does not fall to the rank of śrāvaka or pratyekabuddha.

Śāstra (p. 412a5). – There are three kinds of Dharma:

1) The supreme Dharma of all (sarveṣv anuttara), i.e., nirvāṇa.

2) The means of attaining nirvāṇa (nirvāṇaprāptyupāya), i.e., the noble eightfold Path (āryāṣṭāṅgamārga).

3) All good words (subhāṣita), truthful words (satyavacana) promoting the eightfold noble Path. These are: (a) the eighty-four thousand articles of the Dharma (caturaśītidharmaskandha-sahasra), or (b) the twelve-membered speech of the Buddha (dvādaśāṅgabuddhavacana), or (c) the four Baskets (catuspiṭaka) consisting of (i) the [four] Āgamas (āgamacatuspiṭaka), (ii) the Abhidharma, (iii) the Vinaya, (iv) the Kṣudrakapiṭaka, plus all the Mahāyānasūtras such as the Mahāprajñāpāramitā, etc. All that is called Dharma.³⁴³

To seek the Dharma (dharmaparyeṣṭi) is to write it, to recite it, to study it and to meditate on it. These texts heal the mental illnesses (cittavyādhī) of beings. The bodhisattva sacrifices his life to gather together these text-remedies.

Thus while still a bodhisattva, the Buddha Śā was called Lo-fa (Dharmarata). At that time there was no buddha, and this bodhisattva had not yet heard a good word (subhāṣita), but he was searching everywhere for the Dharma and did not relax his exertion (virya); however, he had not yet found it. One day, Māra transformed himself into a brāhmaṇa and said to him: "I have a stanza (gāthā) spoken by a buddha; I will give it to you if you agree to write it using your skin as parchment, your bone as pen and your blood as ink." Dharmarata thought: "During my previous lifetimes I have lost my life an incalculable number of times without ever deriving any benefit from it." Immediately he flayed his skin, put it out to dry and wrote the stanza on it. <2390> Māra went to take his life when, at that moment, the Buddha, aware of the extreme resolve of the bodhisattva, arose from the direction of the nadir (adhodīś) and came to teach him the ³⁴³ This brief summary shows that the Traité did indeed use the Sanskrit canon of the Sarvāstivādins as canonical scripture, reserving a separate place for the minor scriptures designated here by the name Tsa-tsang in Chinese, Kṣudrapīṭaka in Sanskrit or, quite simply, Kṣudraka: cf. p. 341F, n. 1.

profound Dharma. Immediately Dharmarata obtained the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti).³⁴⁴

Sa-t'o-po-louen (Sadāprarudita) also sought the Dharma by ascetic practices (duṣkara-caryā).³⁴⁵

The bodhisattva Śākyamuni drove five hundred nails into his body in order to find the Dharma.³⁴⁶

The king Kin-kien (Kāñcanasāra) perforated his body in five hundred places, [put wicks in the holes] and threw himself into the flames in order to light them.³⁴⁷

All these heroes were seeking the Dharma by means of these ascetic practices and deeds in order to teach beings.

Finally, the Buddha himself says here that “by seeking the Dharma [with resolutions associated] with omniscience, the bodhisattva does not fall to the rank of śrāvaka or of pratyekabuddha”.

*

6. Sūtra. – Abhikṣṇanaṣkramyaparīkarma grhāṇupalabdhītām upādāya // yad bodhisattvaḥ sarvajātiṣv avyakīrṇacittena niṣkrāmati / tathāgataśāsane pravrajati / na cāsyā kaścīd antarāyo bhavati /

The continual departure from the world by the non-apprehension of the householder life. – From lifetime to lifetime and with an unmixed intent, the bodhisattva goes forth from the world and becomes a monk in the Tathāgata's order, and is not hindered by anyone. <2391>

Śāstra (p. 412a25). – The bodhisattva knows that the householder life (grhāvāsa) is the cause and condition (hetupratyaya) of many wrongs (āpatti). “If I remain at home”, he says to himself, “I myself will be unable to carry out the pure practices (viśuddhacaryā); how then could I lead others to practice them? If I follow the rules of the householder life, I would have a whip and a stick, etc., and I would be tormenting beings. If I act in conformity with the Holy Dharma, I will violate the rules of the householder life. I have two things

³⁴⁴ Jātaka of Dharmarata already mentioned above, p. 975F, n. 1; 1853F, n. 4. – References to Kotanese and Uigur sources in M. J. Dresden, The Jātakastava, 21st story, p. 432 and 339. – Mural painting at Qyzil, in E. Waldschmidt, Über die Darstellungen..., p. 15, and table 1, fig. 1.

³⁴⁵ Wishing to honor the Prajñāpāramitā and offer gifts to the bodhisattva Dharmadgata, Sadāprarudita sold his body to Śakra disguised as a young man. The sale being concluded, he took a sharp knife, pierced his right arm and let the blood flow; then he pierced his right breast, cut off the flesh and, to break his bones, ran into a wall. Cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 947.

³⁴⁶ Jātaka of king P'i-leng-kie-li (Bhṛṅgāra?) who drove a thousand nails into his body in order to hear from the mouth of the brāhmāṇa Raudrākṣa the Buddhist stanza: anityā bata saṃskārāḥ. Cf. P'ou-sa-pen-hing king, T 155, k. 3, p. 119b15-16; Hien-yu king, T 202, k. 1, p. 350a-b; King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 25, p. 136c20-137a3.

³⁴⁷ Jātaka of Kāñcanasāra told above, p. 688F, b. 4. – References to the Khotanese, Uigur and Sogdian sources in M. J. Dresden, The Jātakastava, 43rd story, p. 440 and 451. Friezes from Qyzil in E. Waldschmidt, Über die Darstellungen..., p. 16 and 17, fig. 25 to 31.

to think about: if I do not leave home today, I will, of course, be forced to leave it at the time of death; if I abandon it by myself today, my merit (puṇya) will be great.”³⁴⁸

Again the bodhisattva has the following thought: “Kings and noblemen, powerful as gods, seek happiness and do not find it; death takes them away cruelly. As for myself, I am abandoning home for beings in order to keep the pure morality (viśuddhaśīla) [of the monastic], seek the abhisambodhi of the Buddhas and fulfill the causes and conditions for the perfection of morality (śīlapāramitā).”

Here the Buddha himself says that “from lifetime to lifetime and with an unmixed intention, the bodhisattva goes forth from home”. With an unmixed intention (avyavakīrṇa-cittena), for the bodhisattva does not leave home to embrace the ninety-six kinds of [heretical] doctrines, but only to enter into the Tathāgata's order (tathāgataśāsane pravrajitum). Why? Because in the Tathāgata's order, both kinds of correct seeing (samyagdṛṣṭi) are present: correct worldly (laukika) view and correct supramundly (lokottara) view.”³⁴⁹

*

7. Sūtra. – Buddhakāyapṛhāparīkarma lakṣaṇāṃvyañjanāṇupalabdhītām upādāya // yad bodhisattvo buddhavigrahaṃ dṛṣtvā na kadācid buddhamanasikāreṇa virahito bhavati yāvad anuttarāṃ samyaksambodhiṃ anuprāpnoti /

Taking delight in the Buddha's body by the non-apprehension of the major and minor marks. – Having seen the body of the Buddha, the bodhisattva never ceases thinking about the Buddha until he attains supreme complete enlightenment.

Śāstra (p. 412b8). – The Buddha hears the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddha praised in many ways: the ten powers (bala), <2392> the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), great loving kindness (mahāmaitrī), great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and omniscience (sarvajñāna). Moreover, he sees the Buddha's body adorned with the thirty-two major marks (lakṣaṇa) and the eighty minor marks (anuvyañjana), emitting a great brilliance (mahāprabhā) and unceasingly honored by gods and men, and he says to himself: “In a future lifetime, I too will be like that.” Even if he does not fulfill the causes and conditions required to meet a Buddha, already he is delighted in him, and if he does fulfill them, he is even more pleased. Possessing the high disposition (adhyāśaya), he takes delight in the Buddha, and this is why he always succeeds in meeting a Buddha from lifetime to lifetime.

*

8. Sūtra. – Dharmavivaraṇaparīkarma dharmabhedāṇupalabdhītām upādāya // yad bodhisattvaḥ saṃmukhibhūtasya tathāgatasya parinirvṛtasya vā sattevbyho dharmam deśayati ādau kalyāṇam madhye

³⁴⁸ By contrast with the householder life, the religious life has numerous advantages which have been detailed above, p. 839-843F.

³⁴⁹ See Majjhima, III, p. 72.

kalyāṇaṃ paryavasāne kalyāṇaṃ svarthaṃ suvyañjanaṃ paṇīuddhaṃ paripūrṇaṃ yaduta sūtraṃ yāvad upadeśāḥ /

The propagation of the Dharma by the non-apprehension of the subdivision of this Dharma. – Whether a Tathāgata is still present in the world or has already become parinirvāṇized, the bodhisattva preaches the Dharma to beings, the Dharma which is good at the beginning, good in the middle and good at the end, of good meaning and letter, completely pure and perfectly full, namely, the sūtras, etc. up to the Upadeśas.

Śāstra (p. 412b13). – Having sought the Dharma as has been said above, the bodhisattva “preaches it to beings (sattvebhyo deśayati).” The lay bodhisattva (grhastha) practices material generosity particularly; the monastic (pravrajita) bodhisattva, in his love and respect for the Buddha, always practices the generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna).

Whether a Buddha is present in the world or not, the bodhisattva <2393> is well established in morality (śīla) without seeking fame (śloka) or profit (lābha). Equalizing his mind toward all beings, “he preaches the Dharma to them” (dharmam deśayati).

This Dharma is “good at the beginning” (ādaḥ kalyāṇa) because it praises generosity; it is “good in the middle” (madhye kalyāṇa) because it praises morality (śīla) in detail; it is “good at the end” (paryavasāne kalyāṇa) for, in reward for these two things [– generosity and morality –], the bodhisattva is going to be reborn in a buddha-field (buddhakṣetra) or become a deity.

Or again, the Dharma is good at the beginning because in seeing the five aggregates of attachment (pañcopādānaskandha) of the triple world (traiḍhātuka) abounding in suffering, one feels disgust (nirvedacitta) towards them. It is good in the middle because one abandons lay life and separates oneself from the world. It is good at the end because the mind is liberated from the disturbing emotions (kleśa).

Or finally, the Dharma is good at the beginning because it first explains the Vehicle of the śrāvakas. It is good in the middle because it explains [next] the Vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas. It is good at the end because it [finally] proclaims the Greater Vehicle.

The Dharma is “good in meaning and good in letter” (svārtha suvyañjana). In the threefold speech, the elocution may be good while the reasoning is mediocre and superficial, or the reasoning may be profound and good while the elocution is imperfect; this is why the sūtra says here that the meaning is good and the letter is good.

The Dharma is “completely pure” (paṇīuddha) because, having eliminated the stains of the triple poison, it enunciates only the True Dharma (saddharma), without mixing in false dharma (adharma).

The Dharma is “completely clear” (paripūrṇa) because the noble eightfold Path (ārya aṣṭāṅgikamārga) and the six perfections (ṣaṭpāramitā) are complete in it.

On the twelve-membered [speech of the Buddha] (dvādaśaṅgabuddhavacana), sūtra, etc., see what has been said above (p. 2286-2303F).

*

9. Sūtra. – Mānastambhanirghātānaparikarma, adbhutatānupalabdhitām upādāya // yad bodhisattvas tena mānastambhanirghātānena na jātu nīcakuleṣūpapadyate /

The destruction of pride and vanity by the non-apprehension of any superiority whatsoever. – By the destruction of pride and vanity, the bodhisattva is never reborn into lowly families. <2394>

Śāstra (p. 412b29). – The bodhisattva goes forth from home (pravrajati), observes morality (śīlam rakṣati), preaches the Dharma (dharmam deśayati) and cuts the doubts of beings (sattvānām saṃśayāṃś chinatti); and sometimes he becomes puffed up and experiences pride (māna) and vanity (stambha). In that case, he should make the following reflection: “I have shaved my head, I have put on the yellow robe (kāṣāya) and with bowl in hand, I beg for my food. This is of the nature of destroying pride and vanity in me. How could I feel pride and vanity in that?”

Moreover, pride and vanity dwell in the human mind. These faults stifle the qualities, they are detested by men and are the source of a bad reputation. In later lifetimes, the prideful are always reborn among wild animals or, if they are reborn among humans, they are base and lowly in condition.

Knowing that pride and vanity have these immense defects, the bodhisattva destroys this pride and this vanity in order to seek supreme complete enlightenment. If the person who begs for material things should be humble and modest, then what should be said about the person who is seeking the peerless bodhi?

Because he has destroyed pride and vanity, the bodhisattva is always reborn among the nobility and never in lowly families.

*

10. Sūtra. – Satyavacanaparikarma vacanānupalabdhitām upādāya // tatra katamad bodhisattvasya satyavacanaparikarma / bhagavān āha / yaduta bodhisattvasya yathāvādītā tathākāritā / imāni bodhisattvena mahāsattvena prathamāyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena daśaparikarmāṇi karaṇīyāni //

Truthful speech by means of non-apprehension of any speech. – What is truthful speech in the bodhisattva? – The Bhagavat replied: It is the fact that the bodhisattva “acts as he says”.

These are the ten preparations for accomplishment by the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the first ground.

Śāstra (p. 412c9). – Truthful speech is the root of all good (kuśala), the cause and condition of rebirth among the gods; it is believed and accepted by all people. He who puts it into practice does not pretend generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) or wisdom; merely by cultivating truthful speech, he wins immense merit (punya). Truthful speech is “acting as one says”.

Question. – There are four [good] vocal actions (vākkaṃman): [abstaining from lying (mṛṣāvāda), from malicious gossip (paiśunya-vāda), from harmful speech (pāruṣya-vāda) and from idle speech (saṃbhinnapralāpa)³⁵⁰]; why does the sūtra not mention “truthful speech” here?

³⁵⁰ See p. 771F.

Answer. – In the Buddhadharma, truth (satya) is specially honored; this is why the sūtra here speaks of the truth that encompasses (saṃgrhṇāti) the four [good] vocal actions. One obtains nirvāṇa by means of the truth.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who relates to beings will [inevitably] endure harmful words (pāruṣyavāda), idle words (saṃbhinnapralāpa) and malicious gossip (paiśuṇyavāda); sometimes he will even commit the grave wrongdoing of false speech (mṛṣāvāda) himself. He must correct this in the first ground. On the first ground, the bodhisattva is not yet able to practice the four [good] vocal actions fully; this is why the sūtra mentions only “truthful speech” [here]; in the second ground, he will be able to practice it fully.

Question. – Why is it a matter of only the “ten preparations” (daśaparīkarma) in the first ground?

Answer. – The Buddha is the king of Dharma, having mastery (vaśita) over all dharmas. He knows that these ten preparations can produce the first ground. He is like a good physician (vaidya) who knows the number of medicines (bhaiṣajya) necessary to cure the sickness, sometimes five, sometimes ten. Therefore there is no objection that can be raised against the number [of preparations].

Bhūmi II

1. Sūtra. – Punar aparaṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena dvitīyāyāṃ bhūmau vartamānenāṣṭau dharmā abhīkṣaṇaṃ manasikartavyāḥ / katame 'ṣṭau / yaduta śīlaparīśuddhiḥ / iatra katamā bodhisattvasya śīlaparīśuddhiḥ / yaduta bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya śrāvakaṃ pratyekabuddhacittānāṃ amanasikāraḥ / ye 'pi tadānye dauḥśīlyakārā bodhiparipanthakārā dharmāḥ teṣaṃ amanasikāraḥ / iyaṃ bodhisattvasya śīlaparīśuddhiḥ /

Moreover, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva on the second ground must think about eight dharmas continually. What are these eight?

1) Purity of morality.

In the bodhisattva, what is the purity of morality? – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva does not think about the concepts of the śrāvakas or the pratyekabuddhas <2396> nor does he think about other doctrines, immoral teachings that are an obstacle to bodhi.

Śāstra (p. 413c10). – In the first ground, the bodhisattva mainly practiced generosity (dāna); now he knows that morality is superior to generosity. Why? Morality takes in all beings whereas generosity does not include all of them. The domain of morality is immense (aprameya): this is how the morality consisting of not killing living beings (prāṇātīpātaprativirati) grants life to all beings. Beings are innumerable and infinite, and the merit [consisting of sparing them] is itself immense and infinite.

Here the sūtra briefly mentions (saṃkṣepaṇa) the “teachings that create an obstacle to bodhi” (bodhiparipanthakara): these are ‘immoral’ doctrines (dauḥśīlyakara). A teaching must be free of any immorality to be called pure (parīśuddha). If the concepts of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas already [in some respects] constitute a stain on morality (śīlamala),³⁵¹ what can be said then (kaḥ punarvādaḥ) of these other doctrines, overtly bad?

*

2. Sūtra. – Kṛtajñatā kṛtaveditā // yad bodhisattvo mahāsattvo bodhisattvacaryāṃ carann alpam api kṛtam āsaṃsārān na nāśayati prāg eva bahu /

Acknowledgement and gratitude. – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva traveling on the bodhisattva career does not, until the end of saṃsāra, forget any favor even if it is small, or, all the more so if it is big.

Śāstra (p. 413c17). – Some people say: “It is because of merits won in my previous existences (pūrvanivāsapuṇya) that I have obtained such a benefit”. Others say [to their benefactor]: “I am personally deserving: what benefit have you done for me?”

To speak thus is to fall into wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi). And so the Buddha says here that the bodhisattva must acknowledge kindnesses (kṛtajña). Although beings in their previous existences may have acquired the rights to happiness (sukhahetu), they would be unable to enjoy this happiness if, in their present existence, certain circumstances [such as the generosity of a benefactor] did not occur. Thus the seeds (bīja) of the grain are in the earth, but without rain <2397> (vr̥ṣṭi) they cannot sprout. It cannot be said that the rain is of no use on the pretext that the earth produces the grain. Although the benefits we gather at present have been planted [by us] during earlier lifetimes, why would the fondness and kind feelings of our benefactors not play a part in these benefits?

Moreover, acknowledgement (kṛtajñatā) is the source of great compassion (mahākaruṇāmūla) and opens the first door to good actions (kuśalakarmaṇ). The grateful person is loved and esteemed by people; his renown extends afar; after his death, he is reborn among the gods and finally he will attain abhisambodhi. In this regard, the Buddha has told the story of the following Jātaka:

³⁵¹ This is not a criticism. Sthavira Buddhism is in perfect agreement with natural morality (śīla) and religious discipline (saṃvara). However, it does not attain the perfection of morality (śīlapāramitā) advocated by the Mahāyāna which depends essentially on the non-existence of sin and its opposite (āpatyānāpatyānadyāpatititām upādāya): cf. p. 770F, 861F.

[Rkṣajātaka.]³⁵² – A man went to the mountains in order to cut <2340> wood. He lost his way in a violent ³⁵² Rkṣa- or Rkṣapatijātaka, making up part of the stock of jātakas situated at Benares in which king Brahmadatta always appears. Like so many other fables, it contrasts the kindness of animals with the ingratitude of humans. The story has been amply illustrated in the Buddhist art and literature of both Vehicles.

Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya, Samghabhedavastu, ed. R. Gnoli, II, p. 104-106 (= T 1450, k. 15, p. 177a26-c18):
bhūtapūrvam bhikṣavo vārāṇasyām nagaryām anyatamo daridrapuruṣaḥ prativasati; sa kāṣṭhāni vikrīya jivikām ... tadāpy eṣa akṛtajñā akṛtavedī; etarhy apy eṣa akṛtajñāḥ akṛtavedī.

Transl.: Once, O monks, a poor man was living in the city of Benares; he earned his living by selling wood. One day, having risen very early, he took his curved axe and went to the forest in search of wood. Unexpectedly a great cloud arose accompanied by showers and wind. The man who, rightly or wrongly, was trying to find another spot and went from one tree to another, but the rain got heavier and he finally took shelter in a cave in the mountain. There was a bear in this cave; seeing it, the man was frightened and wanted to flee. The bear said to him: “My child, why are you afraid? You have nothing to fear from me; stay.” Although hesitant, the man was so worried that he could not leave. Then the bear took him up in its arms, carried him into the cave and fed him with roots and fruits.

The storm lasted seven days without stopping. Seven days passed and on the eighth, the sky cleared and the cloud disappeared. The bear, having looked at the sky in the four directions of the horizon, brought the man abundant roots and fruits and said to him: “My child, the storm has passed, the sky is clear and the clouds have disappeared. Go in peace!” The man fell to his feet and said to the bear: “Father, I am leaving but I must do you a favor in return.” The bear answered: “My child, the only thing you must do for me is not to betray me to anyone.” The man answered: “Father, so be it.” He circumambulated the bear, prostrated at its feet and went away.

The man entered Benares as a certain hunter was going out to hunt. This hunter saw him and said: “Friend, here you are back again after a long time; your son and your wife are upset; they are crying because they think you have certainly been the victim of the seven-day storm or of a wild animal. Animals and birds in great numbers have perished in the storm. How did you escape?” The man told him everything that had happened and the hunter said: “Friend, show me the cave where this bear is.” The man answered: “Friend, never will I go back into the forest, no matter how my life was saved.” But the man was so beguiled by the hunter who promised him two-thirds of the meat that he finally agreed and went with the hunter to show him the way. <2399> Gradually they reached the cave where the kind bear was and then, following his cruelty and ingratitude, he declared: “Here is the cave where the bear is.” At once the hunter, whose way of life it is to take the life of others, set fire to the cave. The kind bear, its mind disturbed by the smoke and its eyes clouded by tears, spoke this verse:

“From whom did I take anything while I lived in this cave in the mountain, eating fruits, roots and water, wishing for others’ benefit?

Now at the moment of death, what should I do? But corporeal beings must submit [to the fruits] of actions, whether these fruits are desirable or not.”

Having spoken these words, the bear died.

Then the two friends cut up the animal and shared the meat. The hunter said to the ungrateful man: “Take two-thirds of the meat.” The man stretched out his hands to grab it; they fell to the ground. Then the hunter cried: “O misfortune!” and abandoning even the share that belonged to him, went away.

Having heard about this great wonder, a great crowd gathered there; the king Brahmadatta, curious, went to that place. Somewhere on the mountain there was a monastery. His eyes wide open in amazement, the king took the bear’s skin and went to the monastery to tell the community of monks about the affair. He set the skin at a pool of blue rainstorm and. at sunset, he was hungry and cold. Poisonous insects and animals came to attack him and so he entered a cave in the rock. In this cave there was a big bear (rkṣa); seeing it, the man wanted to run out in fear. The bear said to him: “Don’t be afraid; this cave is warm, you can spend the night here.” The rain lotuses, sat down among the elders and told them the full story. The abbot of this community was an arhat. He spoke to the king thus:

“This was not a bear, O great king, but it was the bodhisattva Dyutimdharmā. He should be honored by the three worlds and by you too, O best of men.”

The king acknowledged that it was necessary to pay homage to him. The bhikṣus said: “Lord, this is a bodhisattva of the fortunate age; his worship should be organized.” Then Brahmadatta accompanied by his wives, princes, ministers and inhabitants of the city took all kinds of scented wood to the place of the miracle. Having piled up the flesh and bones of the bear, the king said: “Sirs, build a funeral pyre of all kinds of scented wood and set it on fire with great respect.” A great stūpa was erected at this place; parasols, standards and banners were placed on it; a lamp was set in place and those by whom these works had been accomplished were promised deliverance.

What do you think, O monks? I was that bear at that time and at that era; the ungrateful man was Devadatta at that time and that epoch. Then he was an ungrateful man not acknowledging kindnesses; even now he is an ungrateful man not acknowledging kindnesses.

Mañāvibhāṣā, T q1545, k. 114, p. 592b3-29. Almost the same story but with two hunters in place of one.

Kośabhāṣaya, ed. P. Pradhan, p. 270, l. 11-12: ṛṣyamrgajātakādyaḍāharaṇāt taking as examples of ingratitude the Jātakas of the antelope (ṛṣya) and the deer (mrga): but the reading is erroneous: ṛṣya should be corrected to rkṣa ‘bear’ as shown by the Chinese and Tibetan translations of the Kośa: hong lou teng pen cheng (T 1558, k. 18, p. 96b21) and dom dan ri dags sogs paḥi skyes pa (Tib. Trip. Vo. 115, no. 5591, fol. 260a7). The reading rkṣa appears elsewhere in the Kośavyākhyā, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 434, l. 23: rkṣamṛdajātakādi.

Las brgya tham pa, Tib. Trip., Vol. 39, no. 1007, summarized by L. Feer, Le Karmaṣataka, in JA. Taken from nos. Jan.-Feb, Mar.-Apr., May-June, 1901, p. 51-52.

Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā, T 201, k. 13, p. 332b11-12: When I was incarnated as a bear, <2340> I took pity on a man in danger. When the man whom I had saved betrayed my den to hunters, I was free of anger (transl. by E. Huber, Aśvaghōṣa Sūtrāḷamkāra, 1908, p. 383).

Lalitavistara, ed. S. Lefmann, p. 168, l. 15-18 (= T 187, k. 5, p. 566c1-2). Transl. – When, O lord, you were a bear in a den in the mountains, you gathered up a man fearing the snow-storm, you served him fruits and roots with great goodwill. When he soon afterwards brought the hunter to you, that also you endured.

Rāṣṭrapālapariṣcchā, ed. L. Finot, p. 25, l. 15-16 (= T 310, k. 80, p. 462b23-24): When I was a princely bear, a man caught in a snow-storm was sheltered by me for seven days in an inaccessible cave. When he brought a murderer to me, I made no resistance to him.

See also J. Ensink, The Question of Rāṣṭrapāla, 1952, p. 26.

Khotanese source in M. J. Dresden, The Jātakastava, 36th story, p. 438 and 451: Under the snow’s covering in winter, the man was like to die; was like to die by hunger also. You, as the bear, just as a father cares for his son, cared for him in your arms, precious as your life. This ungrateful, ignoble, avaricious man for greed spoke of you in the presence of huntsmen. Therefore they destroyed you and parceled out your flesh. For the ingratitude, at once his hands fell upon the ground.

Representations: Ajantā (cf. A. Foucher, Lettre d’Ajantā, J.A., 1921, I, p. 216): Central Asia (cf. E. Waldschmidt, Über die Darstellungen..., p. 53 and 54, fig. 164-167).

lasted for seven days. The bear constantly offered the man sweet fruits, excellent water and provided him with fresh supplies. After seven days the rain stopped. The bear guided the man, showed him the path and said to him: “I have been a sinner and have many enemies. If anybody asks you, don’t tell them that you have seen me.” The man agreed. But following on his path, this man saw some hunters (lubdhaka). One of the hunters asked him: “Where do you come from; have you seen any game?” The man answered: “I saw a big bear but <2401> this bear has done me favors; I cannot show him to you.” The hunter said: “You are a human and, among humans, we must help one another. Why spare this bear? You have lost your way once; when will you get back home? If you show me the bear, I will give you the biggest share [of the meat].” The man changed his mind, guided the hunter and showed him where the bear lived. The hunter killed the bear and offered him the biggest portion. But just when the man stretched out his hands to receive the meat (māṃsa), his two arms fell to the earth. The hunter asked him: “What wrong-doing have you committed?” The man answered: “This bear treated me like a father treats his son; it is for not being grateful for his kind deeds that I suffer this punishment.” Frightened, the hunter did not dare to eat the flesh of the bear and went to offer it to the saṅgha. The abbot (saṃghasthavira), an arhat possessing the six superknowledges (abhijñā) said to the monks: “This bear was a bodhisattva; in his future existence he will obtain abhisambodhi. Do not eat this meat.” Then the monks built a stūpa and paid homage to the bear. Hearing about this business, the king proclaimed an edict in his kingdom forbidding ungrateful people from living there any longer.

There are many reasons to praise grateful people. They are esteemed in all Jambudvīpa and people place their trust in them.

Moreover, the bodhisattva has the following thought: “Even if a man does me harm, I should save him; all the more reason I should save those who have done me a favor.”

*

3. Sūtra. – Kṣāntibalapratīṣṭhānām // yad bodhisattvasya sarvasattvānām antike ’vyāpādā-vihimsācittatā /

Basing oneself on the power of patience. – The bodhisattva has no thought of malice or harm towards beings.

Śāstra (p. 414a19). – See our lengthy explanation on the perfection of patience (kṣāntipāramitā) (p. 865-926F).

Question. – Patience appears in many aspects (prakāra); why is the sūtra limited here to presenting it as “non-malice and non-harming” (avyāpādāvihimsā)?

Answer. – Because [the absence of malice and harm] is the very essence of patience. [An injured person] first produces a thought of malice and then harms someone by voice <2402> or body (pūvaṃ vyāpādacittam utpādayati, pascāt kāyena cā vācā vā parān vihiṃsati).

Here, since it is a matter of a bodhisattva at the beginning of his career (ādikarmika), the sūtra speaks only of patience towards beings (sattvakṣānti) but does not speak of patience towards things.

*

4. Sūtra. – Prāmodyaprīṭyanubhavanatā // yad bodhisattvasya sarvasattvapariṣādanātāyām pramodanātā /

Feeling joy and contentment. – The bodhisattva feels joy in ripening all beings.

Śāstra (p. 414a23). – The bodhisattva sees that his body (kāya) and voice (vāc) have been purified by the observance of morality (śīla) and that his mind (manas) has been purified by his feelings of gratitude (prajñatā) and patience (kṣānti). Since the three kinds of action, [physical, vocal and mental (kāyavāṇmanaskarman)] are pure (pariśuddha) in him, “he experiences joy and contentment” (prāmodyaprīṭim anubhavati). A man bathed in perfumed water, clothed in new garments and adorned with necklaces, when he looks in the mirror (ādarśa), feels joy and contentment. In the same way also, the bodhisattva is very pleased at having obtained this good dharma (kuśaladharmā) of morality. He says to himself: “Morality is the root of concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā). Immense and infinite qualities will be easy to obtain by me who has just acquired this pure morality.” This is why he rejoices.

The bodhisattva established in this morality and this patience ripens (paripācayati) beings so that they are able to be reborn in the presence of the Buddhas of other regions or enjoy happiness among gods and men. Sometimes he even makes them obtain the Vehicles of the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and the Buddhas. He considers the attachment of beings as happiness and, just as an adult, seeing little children amusing themselves together plays with them first, then gives them other playthings to make them renounce their previous toys, so the bodhisattva disciplines beings by first making them obtain human and divine happiness, then leads them gradually to discover the three Vehicles. This is why the sūtra says here that “he experiences joy and contentment”.

*

5. Sūtra. – Sarvasattvāparitāgītā // yad bodhisattvasya sarvasattvānām paritrāṇatā / <2403>

Do not abandon anyone. – The bodhisattva saves all beings.

Śāstra (p. 414b6). – The bodhisattva who has cultivated well the mind of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta) has sworn to save beings and his resolve is strong. So as not to suffer the scorn of the Buddhas and āryas, so as not to forget his obligations to beings, he does not abandon them. The man who has promised something to someone and who then does not give it is guilty of deception. For these reasons the bodhisattva does not abandon beings.

*

6. Sūtra. – Mahākaruṇāyā āmukhībhāvaḥ // yad bodhisattvasyaivaṃ bhavati / ekaikasya sattvasyāhaṃ gaṅganadīvālukopamān kalpān nīraye pacanāny anubhaveyaṃ yāvan na sa sattvo buddhajñāne pratiṣṭhāpito bhaved nirvāṇādhigato vā bhavet / evaṃ yāvat sarveṣāṃ daśadiksattvānām kṛte ya utsāho ’yam ucyate mahākaruṇāyā āmukhībhāvaḥ /

The entry into great compassion. – The bodhisattva has the following thought: “May I, for each being, for periods as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, suffer in hell all the torments, as long as this being will not be established in the knowledge of the Buddhas or will not enter into nirvāṇa.” If the bodhisattva extends such an effort to all beings of the ten directions, that is his entry into great compassion.

Śāstra (p. 414b10). – On great compassion (mahākaruṇā), see what has been said above (p. 1705- 1717F). As the Buddha says here, from the beginning, the bodhisattva makes the following resolve concerning beings: “For such and such a person in particular, for innumerable periods, I will suffer in his place the torments of hell and I will pursue my effort until I have led him to accumulate the qualities (guṇa), to become Buddha or to enter into nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiṣeṣanirvāṇa).”

Question. – But there is no way of suffering a punishment in place of another;³⁵³ why then does the bodhisattva make such a vow (praṇidhāna)?

Answer. – [Without a doubt], but this bodhisattva has such strong resolve and loves beings so deeply that if he had the means of substituting himself for the guilty ones, he would do so without hesitation.

Moreover, the bodhisattva sees that, among people, there are sacrifices to the gods (devayajña) where human flesh is used, human blood <2404> and the five human internal organs are offered to the rakṣasas but where substitutions of people are authorized. Then the bodhisattva says: “In the hells there must be substitutions of this kind and I am determined to take the place of others there.” Learning that the bodhisattva’s great resolve is like that, beings honor him (gurūkurvanti) and respect him (satkurvanti). Why? Because the bodhisattva’s concern for beings is so profound that it surpasses even that of a loving mother.

7. Sūtra. – Guruśraddhāgauravaśūruṣā // yad bodhisattvasya gurūnām antike śāstrsaṃjñā /

Faith, respect and submissiveness to the teachers. – The bodhisattva produces the notion of teacher (i.e., he considers his teachers as being the Buddha in person) towards teachers.

Śāstra (p. 414b21). – Because of his teachers, the bodhisattva obtains supreme complete enlightenment: why then would he not believe them, respect them, honor them? High as his own knowledge (jñāna) and qualities (guṇa) may be, the bodhisattva would not derive great benefit from them if he lacked respect and veneration for his teachers.

The excellent water at the bottom of a well (udapāna) cannot be reached without a rope (raju); in the same way, destroying his pride (māna) and vanity (stambhacitta), the bodhisattva must be respectful and obedient [towards his teachers] so that the great benefits (mahārtha) resulting from his virtues (guṇa) may come to him. The rain (vṛṣṭi) that falls does not stay at the top of the mountain (giriyagra), but necessarily flows downward; in the same way, if the bodhisattva is prideful and haughty [towards his teachers], the water of the Dharma (dharmodaka) does not enter into him. But if he respects good teachers, the qualities due to him fall on him.

³⁵³ Because the fruits of action are strictly personal and not communicable: see above, p. 2312F, n. 1.

Finally, the Buddha has said that it is necessary to depend on good teachers so that morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā) and deliverance (vimukti) can increase (vrddhi); in the same way that the trees (vrkṣa) that grow on the Himālayas, their roots, trunk, branches, leaves, flowers and fruits are in full bloom. This is why the Buddha said that we must honor our teachers as if they were the Buddha in person.

Question. – But if it is a matter of bad teachers, how could one serve them and trust them? It is impossible to regard good teachers as the Buddha and all the more difficult to regard bad teachers as the Buddha. <2405> Then why does the Buddha here want us to “produce the idea of the Bhagavat toward teachers” (gurūnām antike śāstrsaṃjñā)?

Answer. –The bodhisattva should not conform to worldly judgments (lokadharma). Those who conform to them are attached to the good and turn away from the bad. The bodhisattva does not act in that way. If some teachers are able to explain to him the profound meaning (gambhīrārtha) and cut the knot of his doubts (saṃśayaśamdhī), he sees his benefit (hita) there, he honors them wholeheartedly and does not think about their defects. If a bad purse (bhastrikā) is full of jewels (ratna), one does not refuse to take the jewels under the pretext that the purse is bad; if you are traveling at night on a steep path and some thieves offer you a torch (ulkā), you would not refuse this light under the pretext that the thieves are bad. In the same way, the bodhisattva who finds the light of wisdom (prajñāprabhā) in his teachers does not care about their faults.

Furthermore, the disciple should say to himself; “My teacher uses the innumerable artifices (apramāṇopāya) of the Prajñāpāramitā; I do not know why he affects this fault.” Thus Sa-t’o-po-louen (Sadāprarudita) heard the voice of the Buddhas of the ten directions say to him from heaven: “Do not think about the deficiencies of the Dharma teacher (dharmabhāṇaka); always have respect and fear for him.”³⁵⁴

Finally, the bodhisattva has the following thought: “That the Dharma teacher likes what is bad is not my business; what I desire is only to hear the Dharma and derive benefit from it. A clay or wooden statue, without any real qualities, makes one gain immense merit only by evoking the idea of buddha (buddhasaṃjñā); what then should be said about this man capable of preaching the Dharma to people with the skillful means of wisdom (prajñopāya)? Consequently, although the Dharma teacher may have faults, that is not very important.”

Towards teachers, the bodhisattva produces “the idea of bhagavat” (bhagavatsaṃjñā). As I have said above, the bodhisattva is different from worldly people. Worldly people make distinctions between beauty and ugliness; they like honest people but do not see them <2406> as buddhas; they distrust bad people and ³⁵⁴ Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 929-930: Atha khalu Sadāprarudito bodhisattvaḥ punar api śabdam aśrauṣit ... Imāś tvayā kulaputrānuśaṃsāḥ paritulaṃyāmānena dharmabhāṇake bhikṣau śāstrsaṃjñotpādayitavyā na ca tvayā kulaputra lokāmiṣapratīsaṃyuktayā cittasaṃtatyā dharmabhāṇako bhikṣur anubaddhavyaḥ / dharmārthikena ca tvayā dharmagauraveṇa dharmabhāṇako bhikṣur anubaddhavyaḥ /

Transl. – Then the bodhisattva Sadāprarudita heard this voice: “O son of good family, weighing these advantages, you should produce the idea of Teacher in regard to all bhikṣus preaching the Dharma. A bhikṣu preaching the Dharma should not be followed by you for reasons of material order but out of interest and respect for the Dharma.”

do not take them into account. The bodhisattva himself is not like that: he contemplates the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā) of dharmas which from the very beginning (mūlata eva) are like nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa); he looks at all beings and sees them as equal to the Buddha. All the more reason that he sees as equal to the Buddha the Dharma teachers (dharmabhāṇaka) who possess the advantages of wisdom (prajñā) and who do the work of Buddha (buddhakārya).

*

8. Sūtra. – Pāramitāsūdyogaparyeṣṭiḥ // yad bodhisattvasyaikacittena pāramitānāṃ paryeṣaṇātānanyakarmatayā ime subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena dvitīyāyāṃ bhūmau vartamānēnāṣṭau dharmāḥ paripūrayitavayāḥ /

The energetic search for the perfections. – The bodhisattva seeks the perfections attentively, without doing anything else.

These are the eight dharmas to be fulfilled by the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who is in the second ground.

Śāstra (p. 414c24). – The bodhisattva has the following thought: “The six perfections are cause and condition for supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarā samyakṣambodhi). I will cultivate this cause and condition attentively (ekacittena).”

Merchants (vaṇij) who diligently search for the goods asked for by the lands through which they travel, farmers (kārṣaka) who diligently look for the seeds (bīja) needed for the soil which they are cultivating, cannot fail to succeed in their business. The person who, in the present lifetime, practices generosity (dāna), later obtains great wealth; the person who keeps the discipline (śīla) later obtains noble [rebirths]; the person who practices concentration (saṃādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) obtains bodhi. It is the same for the bodhisattva: if he practices the six perfections (pāramitā), he succeeds in becoming buddha.

It is a matter here of ‘energetic search’ (udyogaparyeṣṭi), i.e., of constant attentive and energetic search for the six perfections. Why? Because if slackness (ślakṣnacitta) creeps in, one is stifled by the passions (kleśa) and overcome by Māra. This is why the Buddha says here in the second ground not to relax ‘energetic search’ (udyogaparyeṣṭi). <2407>

Bhūmi III

1. Sūtra. – Punar aparaṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena tṛtīyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena pañcasu dharmeṣu sthātavyam / katameṣu pañcasu / yaduta bāhuśrutye ‘tṛptatāyāṃ // tatra karamā bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya bāhuśrutye ‘tṛptatā / yat kiṃcid buddhair bhagavadbhir bhāṣitam ihalokadhātau samantādaśasu diṁṣu lokadhātuṣu tat sarvaṃ ādhārayiṣyāmiti yātrptatā / iyaṃ bodhisattvasya bāhuśrutye ‘tṛptatā /

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the third bhūmi should devote himself to five dharmas. What are these five?

1) An insatiable desire for learning.

What is this insatiable desire for learning in the bodhisattva-mahāsattva? – The insatiable desire that makes him say: “I will remember everything that has been said by the blessed Buddhas in this universe and everywhere in the universes of the ten directions”; this is the insatiable desire for learning in the bodhisattva.

Śāstra (p. 415a5). – The bodhisattva knows that learning (bāhuśrutya) is the cause and condition for wisdom (prajñā) and that, possessing this wisdom, he will be able to follow the path (mārga) with discernment. Endowed with vision (cakṣuṣmat), this person travels without any obstacles. This is why the bodhisattva makes the wish to remember completely (antaśas) all the teachings preached by the Buddhas of the ten directions.

He remembers everything by the power of the śrutadharadhāraṇī, ‘the dhāraṇī of retaining what has been heard’, by the power of the very pure divine eye (pariśuddha-divyaśrotra) and by the power of the asaṃpramoṣadhāraṇī ‘the dhāraṇī of not forgetting’. Just as the great sea collects and retains all the waters flowing from the ten directions, so the bodhisattva collects and retains all the teachings preached by the Buddhas of the ten directions.

*

2. Sūtra. – Nirāmiṣadharmaḍānavivaraṇatāyāṃ tayā cāmanyānatayā // yad bodhisattvas tena dharmadānenānuttarāṃ samyakṣambodhim api na prātikāṅkṣati prāg evānyārtham /

Choosing the selfless gift of Dharma by preference without deriving any pride. – By way of this gift of Dharma, the bodhisattva does not even wish for supreme perfect enlightenment or any other thing for that matter.

Śāstra (p. 415a11). – Some bad weeds grow among the grain, but if one eliminates the rye grass, the grain flourishes. This is what the bodhisattva does: practicing the gift of the Dharma [in preference] <2408> over all the others, he desires neither fame (yaśas) nor gain (lābha) nor fruit of maturation (vipākaphala) in future lives; in the interest of others, he goes even so far as not to seek the nirvāṇa of the Lesser Vehicle (hīnayānika nirvāṇa); he limits himself in his great compassion (mahākaruṇā) for beings to turning the wheel of the Dharma (dharmacakrapravartana) following the Buddhas: this is the specific characteristic of generosity of the Dharma.

*

3. Sūtra. – Buddhakṣetrapariśodhanatāyāṃ tayā cāmanyānatayā // sarvakuśalamūlānāṃ buddhakṣetrapariśodhanāya pariṇāmanā /

The purification of the buddha-fields, without deriving pride from it. - Using all the roots of good for the purification of the buddha-fields.

*

4. Sūtra. – Aparimitasamsāraduḥkhānubhavāparikhedanatāyāṃ tayā cāmanyānatayā // evaṃvidhaiḥ kuśalamūlair upastabdhō yaiḥ sattvāṃs ca paripācayati buddhakṣetraṃ ca pariśodhayati bodhisattva na khedam āpadyate yāvan na sarvajñatām pariṇīrayati /

Śāstra (p. 415a15). – For the words buddhakṣetrapariśodhanatā, aparimitasamsāra-duḥkhānubhavanatā, hryapatrāpyasthānatā [appearing in items 3, 4 and 5 of bhūmi III], araṇya-vāsāparityāgitā, alpecchatā and saṃtuṣṭi [appearing in items 1, 2 and 3 of bhūmi IV], see what has been said above.

Question. – There are many reasons why the bodhisattva “does not tire” (na khedam āpadyate) of dwelling in saṃsāra; why then does the sūtra mention only two, [namely, his desires to ripen beings (sattvapariṇāna) and to purify his buddha-field (buddhakṣetra-pariśodhana)]??

Answer. – When the bodhisattva “dependent on his roots of good” (kuśalamūlair upastabdhah) dwells in saṃsāra, his sufferings and torments are diminished (tanūbhūta); he is like a wounded man (vraṇin) who has been given a good medicine (bhaiṣajya) and whose sufferings are thus decreased notably.

The bodhisattva has acquired roots of good so pure (pariśuddha) that the sadness (daurmansaya), jealousies (īrṣyā), malicious thoughts (duṣṭacitta) of the present existence are eliminated for him. <2409> When he assumes a new existence (ātmabhāvam ādadāti), he gathers the fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) of his roots of good, he himself enjoys happiness, works in many ways for the benefit (hita) of beings and “purifies his own buddha-field” (buddhakṣetraṃ pariśodhayati) as he wishes (yatheccham). The splendor of the [Buddha] universes surpasses that of the divine palaces (devavimāna); one never tires of contemplating them. They soothe the minds of the great bodhisattvas and, even more so, those of worldly people. This is why even though the bodhisattva has many reasons [for remaining in saṃsāra], the sūtra mentions only these two here.

*

5. Sūtra. – Hryapatrāpyasthānatāyāṃ tayā cāmanyānatayā // yā sarvaśrāvakapratyeka-buddhacittajugupsanatā / eṣu subhūte pañcadharmeṣu bodhisattvena mahāsattvena tṛtīyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena sthātavyam //

Settling into shame, but without deriving any pride from it. – The repulsion [that the bodhisattva should feel] for the state of mind of the śrāvaka and the pratyekabuddha.

The bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the third ground, O Subhūti, should hold to these five dharmas.

Śāstra (p. 415a25). – There are several types of shame (hryapatrāpya):³⁵⁵ here it is a matter of repulsion (jugupsanatā) for the state of mind of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha. The bodhisattva has made the resolution to save all beings in general. If, [like the śrāvakas] he accepted only a little suffering or, [like the ³⁵⁵ The meaning of hrī and apatrāpya, two mental events of broad meaning (mahābhūmika) are discussed in Kośa, II, p. 170-173.

pratyekabuddhas], he wanted to go alone to nirvāṇa, this would be shameful on his part. If, after having prepared a feast and invited a crowd of people, a man was seized by an attack of miserliness (mātsarya) and started to eat alone, that would be shameful.

Bhūmi IV

1. Sūtra. – Punar aparaṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena caturthyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena daśadharmān samādāya vartitavyaṃ tena ca na parityaktavyāḥ / katame daśa / yadutāraṇyavāsāprityāgitā / tatra katamā bodhisattvasyāraṇyavāsāparityāgitā / yā sarvaśrāvakapratyekabuddhabhūmer atikramaṇatā / iyaṃ bodhisattvasyāraṇya vāsāparityāgitā / <2410>

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the fourth bhūmi should take up the ten dharmas and never give them up. What are these ten?

1) Never giving up living in the forest.

In the bodhisattva, what is this faithfulness to staying in the forest? – Bypassing the stage of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas is not renouncing the stay in the forest.

Śāstra (p. 415a29). – “Staying in the forest” (araṇyavāsa) is staying away from crowds and dwelling alone. For the bodhisattva, bypassing the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha stage is staying away from crowds.

*

2. Sūtra. – Alpecchatā // yad bodhisattvo ‘nuttarāṃ samyaksambodhim api necchati prāg evānyārtham /

Little desire. – The bodhisattva does not even desire supreme complete enlightenment and, still less, any other thing.

Śāstra (p. 415b2) – By virtue of the emptiness consisting of the non-apprehension of dharmas (sarvadharmāṇām anupalabhaśūnyatā),³⁵⁶ the bodhisattva does not seize any characteristic marks (na nimittany udgrhṇāti) and does not become attached to them. It is the same up to anuttarā samyaksambodhi: he practices detachment of mind (niḥsaṅgacitta).

*

3. Sūtra. – Samtuṣṭiḥ // yaḥ sarvākārājñātāyāḥ pratilambhaḥ /

Satisfaction. – The acquiring of the knowledge of all the aspects.

³⁵⁶ The fifteenth emptiness, p. 2145F.

Śāstra (p. 415b4). – The bodhisattva who always accumulates the qualities (guṇa) without ever getting tired is “satisfied” (saṃtuṣṭa) when he has attained supreme enlightenment (anuttarā bodhi), for there is no dharma superior to it.³⁵⁷

As for satisfaction (saṃtuṣṭi) in regard to food, clothing, beds, seats (piṇḍapātavivara-śayanāsana), etc., it is a cause and condition of good dharmas, but, as it does not consider it to be important, the sūtra does not speak of it here.

*

4. Sūtra. - Dhūtaguṇānūtsarjanatā // yā gambhīreṣu dharmeṣu nidhyānakṣāntiḥ / <2411>

Not neglecting the ascetic rules. – Patience in meditating on the profound teachings.

Śāstra (p. 415b7). – In a following chapter, the Kiue-mo p'in (Mārāvabodhaparivarta),³⁵⁸ we will speak about the acquiescence that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti). In the present passage, the sūtra, by dhūta, means this anutpattikadharmakṣānti. During the course of the preparatory convictions (anulomikī kṣānti),³⁵⁹ the bodhisattva contemplates the anutpattikadharmakṣānti. The twelve dhūtas produce purity of morality (śīlapariśuddhi), purity of morality produces concentration (saṃādhi), and concentration produces wisdom (prajñā). But true wisdom is anutpattikadharmakṣānti. Therefore anutpattikadharmakṣānti is the fruit of maturation (vipākaphala) of the dhūtas. [Actually, here the sūtra metaphorically is designating the effect by the cause (kārye kāraṇopacārāt).³⁶⁰

*

5. Sūtra. - Śikṣāyā aparitṛyāgitā // yaḥ sarvaśikṣānām apracāraḥ /

The non-abandoning of the moral dictates. – This is the non-observance of all the moral regulations.

Śāstra (p. 415b12). – The bodhisattva who understands the true nature of dharmas (dharmāṇām dharmatā) sees neither morality (śīla) nor immorality (dauḥśīlya).³⁶¹ Although, for many reasons he does not violate ³⁵⁷ Only arrival at abhisambodhi is fully satisfying to the bodhisattva. The śrāvaka, on the other hand, is content with modest material advantages: Saṃyutta, II, p. 208; Anguttara, II, p. 27.

³⁵⁸ Chapter of the Pañcaviṃśati entitled Kiue-mo p'in in T 221, k. 10, p. 72c-74b; Mo-che p'in (Mārakarmaparivarta) in T 223, k. 13, p. 318b-320b. – Compare the Mārakarmaparivarta of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. U. Wogihara, p. 771-784.

³⁵⁹ Acquiescences favoring the seeing of the noble truths (cf. Divya, p. 80, l. 1: satyānulomāḥ kṣāntayaḥ) and being part of the four roots of good leading to penetration of the truth (kuśalamūla nirvedhabhāgiya): cf. Kośa, VI, p. 163-167.

³⁶⁰ For the expression kārye kāraṇopacārāt, see above, p. 1932F, n. 1. Not neglecting the ascetic rules is not neglecting the anutpattikadharmakṣānti resulting from the long-term observation of these rules.

³⁶¹ By means of the Prajñāpāramitā, the bodhisattva penetrates the true nature of things (dharmāṇām dharmatā), namely, the absence of any nature; by means of the śīlapāramitā, he makes no distinction between wrongdoing (āpatti) and its opposite (anāpatti): cf. p. 770F, 861F). In no way does it follow that he violates morality.

morality, what is important for him is to cross through the gate-of-deliverance called emptiness (śūnyatāvimokṣasamukha).³⁶²

*

6. Sūtra. – Kāmaguṇajugupsanatā // yaḥ kāmaccittasyānutpādaḥ /

Disgust for the [five] objects of desire. – Not producing even the idea of desire. <2412>

Śāstra (p. 415b15). – See above. Here the Buddha would say: When one knows that the nature of the mind (cittalakṣaṇa) is deceptive and unreal, one no longer produces even the idea of desire (kāmaccitta) and all the more so, one no longer experiences the [five] objects of desire (kāmaguṇa).

*

7. Sūtra. – Lokanirvedacittotpādaḥ // yaḥ sarvadharmāṇām anabhisamkāraḥ /

Śāstra (p. 415b17). – See what has been said above (p. 1457F and following) about the notion of displeasure in regard to the world (sarvaloke ‘nabhiratisamjñā). Here the Buddha wants to talk about the fruit of maturation (vipākaphala) resulting from disgust for the world (lokanirveda), namely, the gate-of-deliverance called wishlessness (apraṇihitavimokṣasamukha).³⁶³

*

8. Sūtra. – Sarvāstiparityāgitā // yādyaṃmikabāhyānām dharmāṇām agrahaṇatā /

The rejection of “everything exists”. Not holding either inner dharmas or outer dharmas.³⁶⁴

Śāstra (p. 45b18). See above (p. 2044).

*

9. Sūtra. – Anavalīnacittatā // yad dvivīdhāsu vijñānasthitiṣu bodhisattvasya cittaṃ na tiṣṭhati /

The mind without dullness. – The bodhisattva’s mind does not remain on duality levels of consciousness.

Śāstra (p. 415b19). – We have already spoken about this above several times. The bodhisattva is informed about the nature of this non-slackening (anavalīnatā) and this absence of fear (abhaya) and “does not remain (pou tchou, na tiṣṭhati) on twofold levels of consciousness (vijñānasthiti).” On these twofold planes of consciousness, in the sense that he does not produce <2413> visual consciousness (caḥsurvijñāna) in regard to the eye (caḥsus) and visibles (rūpa), and so on up to: in regard to the mind (manas) and dharmas, he does not produce mental consciousness (manovijñāna). The bodhisattva remains (tiṣṭhati) in the non-duality (advayamukha) [of subject and object]. Determining that the objects (jñeya) of the six consciousnesses (ṣaḍvijñāna) are false and deceptive, he makes the great vow to lead beings to remain in non-duality and to become separated from the six consciousnesses.

³⁶² See p. 1216F.

³⁶³ See p. 1219F.

³⁶⁴ Already in the canonical sources, the expression sarvam asti concerns the twelve āyatanas, six inner and six outer: Saṃyutta, IV, p. 15. The first three emptinesses (cf. p. 2044F) counteract them.

*

10. Sūtra. - Sarvavastvanepekṣatā // yā sarvavastūnām amanasikāratā // ime subhūte daśadharmā bodhisattvena mahāsattvena caturthyām bhūmau vartamānena na parityaktavyaḥ /

Disdain for everything. – The bodhisattva does not think about anything.

These ten dharmas must not be abandoned by the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the fourth ground.

Śāstra (p. 415b24). – There are many reasons for this disdain for everything, but here the main one is that the bodhisattva, knowing the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā)³⁶⁵ of all dharmas, no longer thinks about these dharmas and eliminates any grasping at characteristics (sarvanimittograhāṇa). This is why he does not expect any gratitude (kṛtajñatā) from those who are indebted to him (pratigrāhaka) and does not feel any pride (māna) in his own generosity. In this way he completely fulfills the pure perfection of generosity (pariśuddhā dānapāramitā).

Bhūmi V

1. Sūtra. – Punar aparāṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena pañcamyām bhūmau vartamānena dvādaśadharmāḥ parivarjayitavyāḥ / katame dvadaśa / gr̥hisamstavaḥ parivarjayitavyaḥ // tatra katamā bodhisattvasya gr̥hisamstavaparivarjanatā / yaduta bodhisattvasya pravrajitanmeṣu buddhakṣetrād buddhakṣetram samkramaṇatābhikṣṇaniḥkramaṇatā muṇdatā kāṣāyavastraprāvaraṇatā / iyaṃ bodhisattvasya gr̥hisamstavaparivarjanatā /

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the fifth bhūmi must avoid twelve dharmas. What are these twelve?

1) Avoiding the company of lay people.

In his monastic existences, the bodhisattva passes from buddha-field to buddha-field, each time goes forth from home, shaves his head and puts on the ochre robe: this is his way of avoiding the company of lay people. <2414>

Śāstra (p. 415b29). – In order to embrace the path (mārga), the yogin goes forth from home (pravrajati). If he continued to keep company with lay people (gr̥hin), nothing would be changed in his former way of life; this is why the yogin first seeks to save himself and then to save others. If he wanted to save others before saving himself, he would be like the man who, not knowing how to swim, wants to save a drowning person; he would be swept away along with the drowning person.

By avoiding being with lay people, the bodhisattva is able to accumulate the pure qualities (pariśuddhagūṇa). Recollecting the Buddha intensely, he transforms his body, goes into the buddha-fields, ³⁶⁵ The ninth emptiness: p. 2085F.

leaves home, shaves his head and puts on the yellow robe (kāṣāyvastra). Why? Because he always takes pleasure in the monastic condition and abhors meeting with lay people.

*

2. Sūtra. – Bhikṣuṇīsamstavaḥ parivarjayitavyaḥ // yad bhikṣuṇyā sārddham acchaṭāsamghātāmātram api na tiṣṭhati na ca tannidānaṃ paritarṣaṇācittam utpādayati /

Avoiding the company of nuns. – The bodhisattva does not stay near a nun even for as little time as a fingersnap, and he does not bemoan the fact.

Śāstra (p. 415c6). – See the first chapter.

Question. – The bodhisattva considers all beings with equanimity (samācittatā); why does he not stay [near a nun]?

Answer. – This bodhisattva is not yet non-regressing (avaivartika) and has not yet destroyed all the impurities (kṣiṇāsrava), but he has already accumulated qualities (guṇa) and is loved by men. This is why he does not stay near women.

Besides, he wants to avoid being slandered, for whoever slanders him would fall into hell.³⁶⁶

*

3. Sūtra. – Parakulamātsaryam parivarjayitavyam // iha bodhisattvenaivaṃ cittam utpādayitavyam / yan mayā sattvānām sukhopadhānaṃ kartavyam tad ete sattvā māṃ tasmai sukhopadhānāyopakurvanti nātra mayā mātsaryacittam utpādayitavyam /

Avoiding being envious of others' families. – The bodhisattva should make the following reflection: "I must make others happy and if those people help me in making this happiness, I do not have to feel jealous." <2415>

Śāstra (p. 415c11). – The bodhisattva makes the following reflection: "I have left my own family (kula) without greed or regret; why would I have greed and envy towards the families of others? It is a rule for the bodhisattvas to lead all beings to find happiness; why feel greed and envy for them? Because of merits (punya) from their previous lives, these beings are enjoying some comfort in the present lifetime and thus are making offerings to me; why would I be jealous of them and envy them?"

*

4. Sūtra. – Samgaṇikāsthānaṃ parivarjayitavyam // yatra śrāvakapratyekabuddhā bhaveyus tatpratīsamayuktā vā cittoṭpādā utpadyeran tatra bodhisattvena na śhātavyam /

Avoiding meeting places. – The bodhisattva should not go to meeting places where there are śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas and where comments would be made about them.

Śāstra (p. 415c15). – These useless conversations are idle speech (saṃbhinnapralāpa) intended to dissipate sadness (śoka) in one's own mind and in that of others. They tell stories about palaces or thieves, they speak about the sea or the mountains, trees, plants, jewels, foreign kingdoms or other similar things. These conversations are of no use to merits (puṇya), of no use to bodhi.

³⁶⁶ Thus Kokālika fell into hell for having slandered Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana: cf. p. 806-813F

The bodhisattva has pity for beings who have fallen into the fire of impermanence (anīyatā): “I want to save them,” he says. “How would I sit calmly chatting idly about useless things? In the case of a fire, people rush about; how would I remain inwardly calm holding forth on something else?”

Here the Buddha is saying that talking about things concerning the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas is already a useless conversation; what then could be said of talking about something [even more useless]?

*

5. Sūtra. – Vyāpādaḥ parivarjayitavyaḥ // yad vyāpādacittasya vihiṃsācittasya vīgrahacittasya vāvakāśaṃ na dadāti /

Avoiding maliciousness. – He does not give free rein to the mind of malice, to the mind of harmfulness, to the mind of hostility.

Śāstra (p. 415c23). – In the mind there first arises a feeling of maliciousness (vyāpāda) which is as yet vague (anīyata). The maliciousness increases, becomes specific, and then one strikes with a stick (daṇḍa) or an axe <2416> (kuṭhāra): this is a feeling of harmfulness (vihiṃsācitta). Insult (pāruṣyavāda) and gossip (paiśuṇyavāda) are feelings of quarrelsomeness (kalahacitta). Killing, torture, the stick and fetters come from a feeling of hostility (vīgrahacitta).

In his great loving-kindness (mahānaitṛī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā) for beings, the bodhisattva does not experience these feelings; he always curbs these bad thoughts and prevents them from having access (avakāśa).

*

7. Sūtra. – Parapaṃsanaṃ parivarjayitavyam // yaduta bāhyānāṃ dharmāṇāṃ asamanuṣāṣyanatā /

Avoiding exaltation of the self. – Not taking extreme dharmas into consideration.

Śāstra (p. 415c27). – The bodhisattva sees neither inner nor outer dharmas, namely the five aggregates (pañcaskandha) assumed (upātta) to be ‘me’ and the five aggregates not assumed (anupātta) to be ‘me’.

*

8. Sūtra. – Daśakuśalakarmapathāḥ parivarjayitvāḥ // tathā hy ete daśakuśalakarmapathā āryasyāṣṭāṅgikasya mārgasyāntarāyakarāḥ prāḡ evānuttarāyāḥ samyaksambodheḥ /

Avoiding the ten bad paths of action. – Actually, these ten bad paths of action are an obstacle to the noble eightfold path and even more so more to supreme complete enlightenment.

Śāstra (p. 415c29). – In these ten bad paths of action, the bodhisattva sees multiple causes and conditions of wrong-doings (āpatti), as has been said above.

In the present passage, the Buddha makes it known that the ten bad paths of actions already destroy the Lesser Vehicle (hīnayāna) and all the more so the Greater Vehicle (mahāyāna). <2417>

*

9. Sūtra. – Adhīmānaḥ parivarjayitavyaḥ // tathā hi bodhisattvo na kaṃcid dharmam samanupaśyati kutaḥ punar adhikam yenādhimanyeta /

Avoiding great pride. – Actually the bodhisattva does not see any dharma and still less a superior dharma in which he could take pride.

Śāstra (p. 416a2). – The bodhisattva who cultivates the eighteen emptinesses (śūnyatā) does not see a definite mark of big or small in any dharma.

*

10. Sūtra. – Stambhaḥ parivarjayitavyaḥ // tathā hi bodhisattvas tad vastu na samanupaśyati yatrāśya stambha utpadyeta /

Avoiding arrogance. – Actually the bodhisattva does not see anything on which arrogance could arise.

Śāstra (p. 416a3). – For the bodhisattva has eradicated the roots of the sevenfold pride (saptavidhamāna)³⁶⁷ and loves good dharmas deeply.

*

11. Sūtra. – Viparyāsāḥ parivarjayitavyāḥ // viparyāsavastūnām anupalabdhitām upādāya /

Avoiding mistakes. – By means of the non-apprehending of mistakes.³⁶⁸

Śāstra (p. 416a4). – Because in all dharmas there is nothing that is eternal (nitya), happy (sukha), pure (śuci), personal (ātman).

*

12. Sūtra. – Rāga dveṣa mohāḥ parivarjayitavyāḥ // tathā hi rāga dveṣa mohānāṃ vastu na samanupaśyati // ime subhūte dvādaśadharmā bodhisattvena mahāsattvena pañcamyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena parivarjayitavyāḥ /

Avoiding desire, hatred and delusion. – Actually, he sees nothing that could be the object of desire, hatred or delusion.

These are, O Subhūti, the twelve dharmas to be avoided by the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the fifth ground. <2418>

Śāstra (p. 416a5). – On the meaning of the triple poison (viśatraya), see what has been said above. Moreover, the objects (ālambana) of the three poisons have no fixed nature (niyatalakṣaṇa).

³⁶⁷ The seven minds of pride (māna) and listed or defined in Saṃyutta, T 99, k. 7, p. 49a10-11; Ekottara, T 125, k. 38, p. 760a29 (whereas the Anguttara, III, p. 430 lists six); Vibhaṅga, p. 383; Kośa, V, p. 26-27’ Kośabhāṣya, p. 284-285.

³⁶⁸ The four objects of error (viparyāsa) are the body, feeling, the mind and dharmas (cf. p. 1150F). Not grasping them is to eliminate belief in the individual (satkāyadrṣṭi) by this means.

Bhūmi VI

Sūtra. – Punar aparaṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena śaṣṭhyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena śaḍ dharmāḥ paripūrayitavyāḥ / katame śaṭ / yaduta śaṭ pāramitāḥ paripūrayitavāḥ // tathā hy āsu śaṣṭu pāramitāsu sthitvā buddhā bhagavantaḥ śrāvakapratyekabuddhāś ca pāraṃgatāḥ /

Apare śaḍ dharmāḥ parivarjayitavyāḥ / yad uta

1) śrāvakapratyekabuddhacittaṃ parivarjayitavyaṃ // yad bodhisattvasyaivaṃ bhavati / yad śrāvakapratyekabuddhacittaṃ naiṣa mārgo 'nuttarayai samyaksambodhaye /

2) dāne paritarṣaṇacittaṃ parivarjayitavyam // tata tasyaivaṃ bhavati / naiṣa mārgo 'nuttarayai samyaksambodhaye /

3) yācanakaṃ dṛṣṭvā nāvalīnacittam utpādayitavyam // tat tasyaivaṃ bhavati ' naiṣa mārgo 'nuttarai samyaksambodhaye /

4) sarvastūni parityajyāni // bodhisattvena prathamacittotpādam upādāya dānaṃ dadatā tad deyaṃ tan na deyaṃ iti na vaktavyam /

5) sarvastūni parityajya na daurmanasyacittam utpādayitavyam // maitrīkaruṇābalaṃ upādāya /

6) na gambhīreṣu dharmeṣu vicikitsācittam utpādayotavyam // śraddhāguṇabalaṃ upādāya / ime subhūte śaḍ dharmā bodhisattvena mahāsattvena śaṣṭhyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena paripūrayitavyāḥ / apare śaḍ dharmāḥ parivarjayitavyāḥ /

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the sixth ground should completely fulfill six dharmas. What are these six? They are the six perfections. – Indeed, it is by keeping these six perfections that the blessed Buddha, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have reached the other shore.

Six other dharmas are to be avoided, namely:

1) The bodhisattva should avoid thinking like the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. – The bodhisattva says to himself that the way of thinking of the śrāvaka and the pratyekabuddha is not the path that leads to supreme complete enlightenment.

2) By giving, he must avoid any sadness. – He says to himself that actually this is not the path that leads to supreme complete enlightenment.

3) Seeing a beggar, he must avoid any discouragement. – He actually says that this is not the path that leads to supreme complete enlightenment. <2419>

4) He must abandon all his possessions [without distinction]. – Practicing generosity since his first production of the mind of bodhi, the bodhisattva should not say: “This may be given away; that may not be given away”.

5) After having given away all his possessions, he must not feel any regret. He does this by the power of his loving-kindness and compassion.

6) He must not have any doubt about the profound teachings. – This due to the quality of his faith.

These, O Subhūti, are the six dharmas which the bodhisattva-mahāsattva must fulfill when he is on the sixth ground, and the other six dharmas that he should avoid.

Śāstra (p. 416a6). – For the six perfections (pāramitā), see above (chapters XVII-XXX). Here the Buddha specifies the six perfections by which the adepts of the three Vehicles all reach the other shore (pāra).³⁶⁹

Question. – But the present chapter deals with the grounds of the bodhisattva; why then does it speak of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha attaining the other shore?

Answer. – Here the Buddha is speaking of the great power held by the six perfections. The Mahāyāna in its system contains the whole Hīnyāna, but the Hīnayāna does not contain the whole Mahāyāna. Here the bodhisattva in the sixth ground completely fulfills (paripūrayati) the six perfections. He sees the emptiness of all dharmas (sarvadharmaśūnyatā), but, as he does not yet have the power of skillful means (upāyabala), he risks falling back into the rank of śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha. And so the Buddha, to protect him, orders him here “to avoid the manner of thinking of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.”

This bodhisattva thinks about beings profoundly, feels great compassion for them (mahākaruṇacitta) and understands the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā)³⁷⁰ of all dharmas. When he gives, he saves nothing; when he sees a beggar, he has neither anger (krodha) nor sadness (daurmanasya); after having given, he feels no regret. Since his merits are great, the power of his faith (śraddhābala) <2420> is great as well. In his profound pure faith, he venerates all the Buddhas and completely fulfills (paripūrayati) the six perfections.

Although he has not yet acquired [skill] in means (upāyakaūśalya), or the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti), or the concentration [of the visualization of the Buddhas] of the present (pratyutpannasamādhi), he feels no doubt (vicikitsā) about the profound Dharma (gambhīradharma).³⁷¹ He makes the following reflection: “All teachings (upadeśa) have faults (doṣa); only the wisdom of the Buddhas (buddhaprajñā) destroys the futile proliferation (prapañca) and has no lapses (vaikalya).” And so, thanks to skillful means (upāya), he cultivates the good dharmas (kuśaladharmā) and this is why he does not doubt.

³⁶⁹ The Śatasārikā, p. 1465, l. 14-17 is more detailed: Tathā hy āsu śaṣṭu pāramitāsu sthitvā buddhā bhagavantaḥ śrāvakapratyekabuddhāś ca pañcavidhasya jñeyārṇavasya pāraṃgatā gacchanti gamiṣyanti ca / katamasya pañcavidhasya / yadutāṭītasānāḍatasya pratyutpannasyaivavaktavyasyaśamskṛtasya / Actually, by keeping these six perfections, the blessed Buddha, the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas attain and will attain the other shore of the fivefold ocean of the knowable, namely, the past, the future the present, the unspeakable and the unconditioned.

This is the pañcavidhaṃ jñeyam, five categories of things capable of being known: cf. Kośa, IX, p. 237; Kośabhāṣya, p. 463, l. 1.

³⁷⁰ Ninth emptiness, p. 2085F.

³⁷¹ Upāyakaūśalya and complete anutpattikadharmakṣānti are acquired in the seventh and eighth grounds respectively.

The bodhisattva of the sixth ground does not yet possess them, but he uses the prajñāpāramitā by virtue of which he has no doubts about the profound teachings related to emptiness.

Bhūmi VII

Sūtra. – Punr aparaṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena saptamyāṃ bhūmau vartamāneṇa viṃśatidharmā na kartavyāḥ /

- 1) ātmagrāho na kartavyaḥ // tathā hy atyantatayātmā na saṃvidyate /
- 2) sattvagrāho na kartavyaḥ /
- 3) jīvagrāho na kartavyaḥ /
- 4) pudgalagrāho yāvaj jñānīpaśyakagrāho na kartavyaḥ // tathā hy ete dharmā atyantatayā na saṃvidyante /
- 5) ucchedagrāho na kartavyaḥ // tathā hi na kaścid dharma ucchidyate 'tvantatayānutpannatvāt sarvadharmāṇām /
- 6) śāśvatagrāho na kartavyaḥ // tathā hi yo dharmo notpadyate sa na śāśvato bhavati /
- 7) nimittasamjñā na kartavyā // tathā hy atyantatayā saṃkleśo na saṃ viyate /
- 8) hetuḍṣṭir na kartavyā / tathā hi sa tām ḍṛṣṭiṃ na samanupśyati /
- 9) nāmarūpābhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ / tathā hi nāmarūpaṃ vastulakṣaṇeṇa na saṃvidyate /
- 10) pañcaskandhābhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ /
- 11) aṣṭāśādhātvaabhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ /
- 12) dvadaśāyatanābhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ // tathā ho te dharmāḥ svabhāvena na saṃvidyante /
- 13) traidhātuke 'bhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ //
- 14) traidhātuke pratiṣṭhānaṃ na kartavyam /
- 15) traidhātuke 'dhyavasānaṃ na kartavyam /
- 16) traidhātuka ālayo na kartavyaḥ // tathā hi sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvena na saṃvidyante /
- 17) buddhaniśrayaḍṣṭyabhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ // tathā hi na buddhaḍṣṭitiniśrayāt buddhadharśanaṃ utpadyate /
- 18) dharmaniśrayaḍṣṭyabhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ // dharmasyāḍṣṭatvāt /
- 19) saṃghaniśrayaḍṣṭyabhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ // saṃghanimittasyāsaṃskṛtatvād anīśrayatvāc ca /
- 20) śīlaniśrayaḍṣṭyabhīniveśo na kartavyaḥ // āpattyanāpattitām anabhīniveśāt / ime viṃśatidharmā na kartavyāḥ /

Moreover, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the seventh ground must avoid twenty things.

- 1) Avoid belief in a self. – Actually, the self does not exist at all.

- 2) Avoid belief in existence.

- 3) Avoid belief in the living being.

- 4) Avoid belief in the individual, etc., on the subject of who is knowing, who is seeing. – Actually, these dharmas do not exist at all.

- 5) Avoid belief in extinction. – Actually, no dharma is extinguished since all dharmas are absolutely unborn.

- 6) Avoid belief in anything eternal. – Actually, a dharma that is unborn is not eternal.

- 7) Reject the notion of characteristic mark. – Actually, purification [like defilement] does not exist at all.

- 8) Reject the view of causes. – Actually, the bodhisattva does not consider this view to be correct.

- 9) Not to be attached to name and form – Actually, name and form do not really exist.

- 10) Not to be attached to the five aggregates.

- 11) Not to be attached to the eighteen elements.

- 12) Not to be attached to the twelve bases of consciousness. – Actually, these dharmas do not exist as inherent nature.

- 13) Not to be attached to the triple world.

- 14) Not to take it as a foundation.

- 15) Not to take it as a term.

- 16) Not to take it as a home. – Actually, dharmas do not exist as inherent nature.

- 17) Not to be attached to the view of resorting to the Buddha. – Actually, the [true] seeing of the Buddha does not come from this view. <2422>

- 18) Not to be attached to the view of resorting to the Dharma. – For the Dharma is invisible.

- 19) Not to be attached to the view of resorting to the saṃgha. – For the saṃgha is unconditioned in itself and does not constitute a support.

- 20) Not to be attached to the view of resorting to [high] disciplines. – For the bodhisattva is not attached to [distinguishing arbitrarily] between guilt and innocence.

These are the twenty things to be avoided.

Śāstra (p. 417a25). – There are twenty things, the ātman, etc., to which the bodhisattva is not attached (nābhīniviśate) because they do not exist. The reasons they do not exist have been explained above in many ways.

The views (ḍṛṣṭi) about the ātman, the subject that knows and the subject that sees (numbers 1 to 4), as well as the views about the Buddha and the saṃgha (numbers 17 and 19) are derived from the emptiness of beings (satvaśūnyatā) and cannot be accepted. All the others, from the view of extinction and of eternity (numbers 5 and 6) up to the view about the disciplines (number 20) cannot be accepted because of the emptiness of phenomena (dharmāśūnyatā).³⁷²

Question. – The other views are well-known, but what is the view of causes (number 8)?

Answer. – All conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) are cause (hetu) and fruit (phala) in turn. But the mind, being attached to these dharmas and grasping at their characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇa), gives rise to the wrong view here called ‘view of causes’ (hetudṛṣṭi); thus for example, one speaks of fruit without cause, or one claims that cause and fruit are identical, different, etc.³⁷³

*

1. Sūtra. – Tena viṃśatir eva dharmāḥ paripūrayitavyāḥ / katame viṃśatir / yad uta Śūnyatāparipūrītā // svalakṣaṇaśūnyatāparipūrīḥ /

This bodhisattva [of the seventh ground] must completely fulfill <2423> twenty things. What are they? Completely fulfilling emptiness. – This is completely fulfilling the emptiness of specific characteristics.

Śāstra (p. 417b2). – The bodhisattva who practices the eighteen emptinesses completely “completely fulfills emptiness” (śūnyatām paripūrayati). Moreover, practicing the two kinds of emptiness, the emptiness of beings (satvaśūnyatā) and the emptiness of phenomena (dharmāśūnyatā), is “to completely fulfill emptiness”. Finally, the bodhisattva who practices the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā)³⁷⁴ but is not attached to it (nābhiniśīṣate) “completely fulfills emptiness”.

Question. – If that is so, why does the Buddha not speak about the emptiness of specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā) here?³⁷⁵

Answer. – Because the three kinds of emptiness of which we have just spoken are the emptiness of specific characteristics.

When he was in the sixth ground, thanks to his merits (punya), the bodhisattva had keen faculties (tīkṣhendriya) and, by means of these keen faculties, he still distinguished dharmas and grasped their characteristics: that is why, now that he is in the seventh ground, the emptiness of specific characteristics constitutes for him “the fullness of emptiness” (śūnyatāparipūrī).

³⁷² Items 17 to 20 are a subtle criticism against the noble disciple inspired by faith in regard to the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṃgha and endowed with disciplines dear to the saints (āryaśrāvako buddhe dharme saṃghe veyyaprasādena samanvāgataḥ, āryakāntaiḥ śīlaiḥ samanvāghataḥ); Saṃyutta, IV, p. 272-273; V, p. 364; Anguttara, IV, p. 406-407; V, p. 183; Avadānaśataka, II, p. 92, l. 6-8; Kośa, VI, p. 292-294. – The aveyyaprasāda is defined in Kośabhāṣya, p. 387, l. 9: yathābhūtaṃ satyāny avabudhya sampratīyayaḥ, the faith following upon correct understanding of the truths.

³⁷³ The problem of causality has been fully discussed above, p. 2170-81F.

³⁷⁴ Ninth emptiness, p. 2085F.

³⁷⁵ Thirteenth emptiness, p. 2121F.

Sometimes the bodhisattva sets out the emptiness of the conditioned (saṃskāraśūnyatā) and the emptiness of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛtaśūnyatā) as being the “fullness of emptiness”; sometimes he propounds the emptiness consisting of non-perception (anupalambhaśūnyatā) as being the “fullness of emptiness”.

*

2. Sūtra. – Ānimittasākṣātkriyā // yaduta sarvanimittānām amanasikāraḥ /

Attesting to signlessness. That is to say, not thinking about any mark.

Śāstra (p. 417b11). – Signlessness (ānimitta) is nirvāṇa. It can be vouched for (sākṣātkṛta), but it cannot be meditated on (bhāvita). Since it cannot be meditated on, one cannot pretend to know it; since it is immense (aprameya), infinite (ananta) and unimaginable, one cannot claim to fulfill it completely.

*

3. Sūtra. – Apraṇihitajñānam // yat traidhātuke cittaṃ na pravartate / <2424>

Knowing what does not deserve to be thought about. – The fact that the bodhisattva’s mind does not function in regard to the triple world.

Śāstra (p. 417b13). – The three things [śūnyatā, ānimitta and apraṇihita], although they are penetrations, are knowledges (jñāna); but here the sūtra brings up a modification for the first two and, [in place of calling them knowledges (jñāna)], calls them [‘fullness’ (paripūrītā) and ‘attestation’ (sākṣātkāra) respectively]. Here apraṇihita is the only one to be called ‘knowledge’ (jñāna).

Above (p. 1216-1232F) I spoke about the three gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha); I will not repeat it here.³⁷⁶

*

4. Sūtra. – Trimaṇḍalapariśuddhiḥ // yaduta daśakuśalakarmapathapariśuddhiḥ /

Purifying the three groups completely. – That is to say, purifying entirely the ten good paths of action.

Śāstra (p. 417b15). – The “three groups” (trimaṇḍala) are the ten good paths of action (daśakuśalakarmapatha); the first three are physical (kāyika), the next four are vocal (vācika) and the last three are mental (caitasika).

It is a matter of “purifying them completely” (pariśuddhi). In some people, the physical acts are pure and the vocal acts impure; in others, the vocal acts are pure and the physical acts are impure; in others still, the physical and vocal acts are pure and the mental acts impure; in yet others, the three kinds of acts are pure but they have not rejected the prejudices (abhiniveśa) about them.

Here in the bodhisattva [of the seventh ground], the three kinds of action are pure and he has rejected prejudices about them. This is why it is said that “he has purified the three groups”.

*

³⁷⁶ In the Taishō edition, this phrase appears in line 16 of p. 417b while it ought to appear in line 15 of the same page.

5. Sūtra. – Sarvasattveṣu kṛpākāruṇyaparipāūrīḥ // yaduta mahākaruṇāpratīlanhaḥ /

Completely fulfilling pity and compassion towards beings. – And he does this by taking possession of great compassion.

Śāstra (p. 417b21). – There are three kinds of compassion (karuṇā): i) that which has beings as object (sattvāmbana), ii) that which has <2425> things as object (dharmāmbana), iii) that which has no object (anāmbana).³⁷⁷ Here it is a matter of great compassion without an object, which is the “fulfillment” (paripūri) of compassion. Since dharmas are empty of inherent nature (svabhāvaśūnyatā) and the true nature of things (dharmatā) itself is empty, the compassion [of the bodhisattva] is called “great compassion without object” (anāmbanā mahākaruṇā).

The bodhisattva [of the seventh ground] has deeply penetrated the true nature (dharmatā) and then has compassion for beings. He is like a man, father of a single son, who, having found a precious object, wants to give it as a gift to his son out of his profound affection.

*

6. Sūtra. – Sarvasattvāmananam // yaduta buddhakṣetrapariśodhanaparipūryā /

Not thinking of any being. – And he does this by completely fulfilling his buddha-field.

Śāstra (p. 417b27). – Question. – If the bodhisattva does not think of beings, how can he purify his buddhafield?

Answer. – By leading beings to establish themselves in the ten good paths of action (daśakuśalakarmapatha), the bodhisattva had already purified his buddhafield, but such an adornment was not yet an obstacle-free (anāvaraṇa) adornment. Now [in the seventh ground], the bodhisattva ripens (paripācayati) beings but does not grasp the characteristic of being (na sattvanimitam udgrhṇati). His roots of good (kuśalamūla) and his merits (punya) are pure and, because of this purity, he adorns [his buddhafield] without obstacle.

*

7. Sūtra. – Sarvadharmasamatādarśanaṃ tatra cānabhīniveśaḥ // yadutānukṣepo 'prakṣepaḥ sarvadharmāṇām /

Seeing the equality of all dharmas without being attached to it. – This is not adding anything to and not taking away anything from dharmas.

Śāstra (p. 417c2). – See what has been said above (p. 327F) about dharmasamatākṣānti. Here the Buddha himself says that it is not adding anything to (anutkṣepa) and not subtracting anything (aprakṣepa) from dharmas. <2426>

*

³⁷⁷ The three kinds of maitrī and karuṇā are a Mahāyānist invention: see above, p. 1245F, 1250F, n.1, and 2372F.

8. Sūtra. – Sarvadharmabhūtanayapratiśedhas tena cāmanantā // yaḥ sarvadharmāṇām bhūtanāyapratiśedhaḥ /

Penetrating the true principle of all dharmas, but not thinking about it. – This is not penetrating the true principle of all dharmas.

Śāstra (p. 417c4). – This has already been fully developed above in many ways.

*

9. Sūtra. – Anutpādakṣāntiḥ // yā sarvadharmāṇām anutpādāya, aniroddhāya, anabhisamṣkārya kṣāntiḥ /

Adherence to non-production. – This is adherence to non-production, non-destruction, non-formation of all dharmas.

Śāstra (p. 417c5). – It is believing and understanding, without hindrance (āvaraṇa) or regression (vivartana), the true nature (dharmatā) of dharmas, having neither production nor destruction.

*

10. Sūtra. – Anutpādajñānam // yaṃ nāmarūpānutpādajñānam /

Knowing non-production. – This is knowing the non-production of name and form.

Śāstra (p. 417c6) – The sūtra first mentions adherence (kṣānti); next it speaks of knowledge (jñāna) here. Adherence is coarse (audārika) whereas knowledge is subtle (sūkṣma).³⁷⁸ Here the Buddha himself says that is a question of “knowledge” about the non-production of name and form (nāmarūpa).³⁷⁹

*

11. Sūtra. – Sarvadharmāṇām ekanayanirdeśāḥ // yā cittasya dvayāsamudācārātā /

Declaring the single dharacteristic of all dharmas. – This is because the bodhisattva’s mind does not move into duality.

Śāstra (p. 417c8). – The bodhisattva knows that the twelve bases of consciousness (dvādaśāyatana), both internal (ādhyātmika) and external (bāhya), are the net of Māra (mārajāla), deceivers (vañcana) and unrealities (abhūta); the six kinds of consciousness (viññāna) arising from these twelve bases are themselves the net of Māra as well and deceivers. Then what <2427> is real? Only non-duality (advaya). The absence of the eye (cakṣus) and visibles (rūpa) etc., up to and including the absence of the mind (manas) and phenomena (dharmā): that is reality (bhūta). In order to lead beings away from the twelve bases of consciousness, the bodhisattva constantly speaks to them of this non-duality in many ways.

*

12. Sūtra. – Kalpanāsamudghātaḥ // yā sarvadharmāṇām avikapanatā /

Destroying the imaginations. – This is not conceptualizing any dharma.

³⁷⁸ For more detail, see Kośa, VI, p. 190.

³⁷⁹ Nāmarūpa is a synonym for the five skandhas.

Śāstra (p. 417c12). – The bodhisattva established in this non-duality destroys the differentiations [falsely attributed] to objects (ālambana): the qualities of male (puruṣa) or female (strī), long (dīrgha) or short (hrasva), big (mahat) or small (alpa), etc.

*

13. Sūtra. – Samjñāvivartaḥ // yāpramāṇānām saṃkalpānām vivartanātā /

The reversal of notions. – This is the reversal of the innumerable false notions.

Śāstra (p. 417c14). – Destroying the false conceptualizations (saṃkalpa) of the inner mind differentiating dharmas.

*

14. Sūtra. – Drṣṭivivartaḥ // yā śrāvakabhūmeḥ pratyekabuddhabhūmeś ca drṣṭivivartanātā /

The reversal of [false] views. – This is the reversal of the views formed at the stage of śrāvaka and the stage of pratyekabuddha.

Śāstra (p. 417c15). – This bodhisattva has first reversed the wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), such as the view of the self (ātmadrṣṭi), the view of the extremes (antagrāhadṛṣṭi), etc.; next, he has entered into the Path (mārga). Now, [in the seventh ground], he reverses the view of phenomena (dharmadrṣṭi) and the view of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇadrṣṭi). [He reverses dharmadrṣṭi] because dharmas have no fixed nature (niyatalakṣaṇa); he reverses nirvāṇadrṣṭi because in reversing the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha views he goes directly to the bodhi of the Buddhas (abhisambodhi).

*

15. Sūtra. – Kleśavivartaḥ // yaḥ sarvakleśayaḥ /

Reversing the passions. – This is destroying all the passions. <2428>

Śāstra (p. 417c18). – By the power of his merit (puṇya) and his morality (śīla), the bodhisattva has first broken up his coarse passions (audārikakleśa) and easily followed the Path (mārga); only the subtle passions (sūkṣmakleśa) – affection (anunaya), views (drṣṭi), pride (māna), etc. – remain in him. Now [in the seventh ground] he also eliminates the subtle passions.³⁸⁰

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who uses the true wisdom (bhūtaprajñā) sees these passions as being the same as the true nature (dharmatā).³⁸¹ He is like a man endowed with the superknowledges (abhijñā) who can change impure things (aśuci) into pure things (śuci).³⁸²

*

16. Sūtra. – Śāmathavipaśyanāsamatābhūmiḥ // yaduta savākārajñatāpratīlambhaḥ /

³⁸⁰ See Traité, T 1509, k. 39, p. 345c27-346a4.

³⁸¹ This theme is fully developed in the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, French transl., p. 2875-291.

³⁸² This is the abhijñā of magical powers described above, p. 1819-1822F.

[Attaining] the state of balance between quietude and introspection. – This is the [gradual] taking possession of the knowledge of things in all their aspects.

Śāstra (p. 417c22). – When the bodhisattva was in the first three grounds, introspection (vipaśyana) was predominant over quietude (śamatha) because he was not yet able to concentrate his mind (cittasamgrahana); in the following three grounds, quietude was predominant over introspection: this is why he had not had the assurance of attaining bodhisattvahood (bodhisattvanīyāma). Now [in the seventh ground], his quietude and introspection in regard to the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā) and the emptiness of phenomena (dharmāśūnyatā) are perfectly balanced (amatā); this is why he can easily (kṣema) travel on his career of [great] bodhisattva.

Starting [from the seventh ground], the level called “non-regressing” (avaivartikabhūmi), he will gradually (kramaśas) attain the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā).³⁸³ <2429> ³⁸³ According to the canonical sources, śamathā (ting houe in Kumaārajīva), tche kouan in Hiaun-tsang) is derived directly from the teaching of the four noble truths: 1) five dharmas should be completely known (parijñeya), the five aggregates of attachment (upādānaskandha); 2) two dharmas should be eliminated (prahāṭavya), ignorance (avidyā) and the thirst for existence (bhavatṛṣṇā); 3) two dharmas should be realized (sākṣātkaratavya), knowledge (vidyā) and deliverance (vimukti); 4) two dharmas should be cultivated (bhāvayitavya), tranquility (śamatha) and introspection (vipaśyanā). All of these processes result from abhijñā or superknowledge (Saṃyutta, V, p. 52).

*

Śamatha and vipaśyanā constitute the fourth truth, the truth of the Path. Actually the Path arises in the person who practices them (Anguttara, II, p. 157) and they lead to the penetration of a multitude of things: anekadhātuprativedha (Majjhima, I, p. 494), to the absorption of the cessation of concept and feeling: saṃjñāvedāntanirodhasamāpatti (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 295), to nirvāṇa. A parable (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 194-195) compares them to a pair of speedy messengers (śīghraṃ dūṭayugam) communicating the message of truth (yathābhūtam vacanam), namely nirvāṇa, to the mind (vijñāna).

Although śamatha and vipaśyanā are intimately joined, they can be practiced separately or, preferentially, simultaneously (yuganaddham); by following the Path in this way, the fetters (saṃyojana) are destroyed and the perverse tendencies (anuśaya) eliminated (Anguttara, II, p. 157).

The passage of the Pañcaviṃśati commented on here transposes the entire system into the Mahāyānist view. The bodhisattva cultivates vipaśyanā in particular in the first three grounds and śamatha in the three following grounds. In the seventh, śamatha and vipaśyanā are perfectly balanced, and the bodhisattva penetrates correctly the twofold emptiness of beings and phenomena. The goal, the final result, will no longer be nirvāṇa but the knowledge of things in all their aspects (sarvākārajñāna) belonging to the fully and completely enlightened Buddhas.

Tranquility and introspection play a great part in the controversy which, in the 7th century, at the Council of Lhasa or bSam yas, opposed the Chinese Sudden school with the Indian Gradualists. Kamalaśīla's third Bhāvanākrama is dedicated almost entirely to it: cf. the edition by G. Tucci in Minor Buddhist Texts, Part III, Third Bhāvanākrama, Serie Orientale Roma, XLIII, 1971, and the annotated translation by C. Pensa, Il terzo Bhāvanākrama di Kamalaśīla, Rivista degli Studi Orientali, XXXIX, 1964, p. 211-242.

Interest in this question has not yet flagged and we now have an excellent English translation of it from Tsoṅ-kha-pa's Lam rin chen mo (1357-1419) in A. Wayman, Calming the Mind and Discerning the Real, 1978.

17. Sūtra. – Dāntacittatā // yā traidhātuke 'nabhiratiḥ /

Taming the mind. – This is not taking delight in the threefold world.

Śāstra (p. 417c26). – Previously the bodhisattva thought about old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa), the three bad destinies (durgati), and it is out of loving-kindness (maitrī) and pity (kṛpā) for beings that he tamed his mind. Now that, [on the seventh ground], he knows the true nature (dharmatā) of phenomena, he is no longer attached to the threefold world (traidhātukaṃ nābhiviśate) and, out of this detachment (anabhiniveśa) he “tames his mind”.

*

18. Sūtra. – Śāntacittatā // yā saṇṇāṃ indriyāṇāṃ pratisaṃharaṇatā /

Pacifying the mind. – This is withdrawing the six organs.

Śāstra (p. 417c29). – Previously, the bodhisattva, in view of nirvāṇa, had only tamed the first five organs (indriya), <2430> namely, the eye, ear, nose, tongue and body, by withdrawing them from the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) – [namely, color, sound, smell, taste and touch] since, at that time [the sixth organ], the organ of mind (mana-indriya), was too hard to tame. Now, in the seventh ground, he also pacifies the organ of mind [by withdrawing it from dharmas].

*

19. Sūtra. – Apratihatajñānam // yaduta buddhacakṣuḥpratilambhaḥ /

Unobstructed knowledge. – This is the attainment of the buddha eye.

Śāstra (p. 418a2). – The bodhisattva attains the prajñāpāramitā and is unobstructed (pratigha) about everything, true or false. He acquires the wisdom of the Path (mārga) and guides beings to make them enter into the truths. He obtains unhindered deliverance (apratihatavimokṣa) and possesses the eye of the buddhas (buddhacakṣus). He has no obstacles over anything.

Question. – How can the sūtra say that the bodhisattva obtains the eye of the buddhas in this seventh ground?

Answer. – Here one should refer to the buddha-eye (p. 2263F): the bodhisattva has no obstacle to any dharma and this is equivalent [to having] the eye of the buddhas.

*

20. Sūtra. – Akliṣṭo 'munayaḥ / yā ṣaḍviśayeṣūpekṣā /

Unafflicted affection. – This is indifference in regard to the six sense objects.

Śāstra (p. 418a7). – Although in the seventh ground he has obtained the power of wisdom (prajñābala), this bodhisattva still keeps his fleshly body (māṃsakāya) out of consideration of his former existences (pūrvanivāsa). Having entered into concentration (samādhi), he is detached (nirāsaṅga); but when he comes out, he has flashes of attachment and, conforming to the visions of his fleshly eye (māṃsacakṣus), when he sees a beautiful person he loves him tenderly. Sometimes also he is attached to wisdom (prajñā), to the reality (tattva) of the seventh ground. This is why the Buddha tells him here to practice indifference (upekṣācitta) in regard to the six sense objects (ṣaḍviśaya).

Bhūmi VIII

1. Sūtra. – Punar aparāṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvenāṣṭamyām bhūmau vartamānena pañca dharmāḥ paripūrayaitavyāḥ. katame <2431> pañca. yaduta sarvasattvacittānupraveśaḥ // yad bodhisattva ekacittena sarvasattvānāṃ cittacaitasikāni pratijānāti /

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the eighth bhūmi must completely fulfill five dharmas What are these five?

1) Penetrating the minds of all beings. – In a single moment of mind, the bodhisattva reveals the minds and mental events of all beings.

Śāstra (p. 418a12). – The bodhisattva in the eighth ground reveals the ways of mind of all beings: he reveals the agitated, reflective or profound minds.

By this knowledge, he distinguishes the beings who will never fulfill the causes and conditions for finding salvation (trāṇa); those who will be saved after innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa); those who will be saved after one, two and up to ten kalpas; those who will be saved after one or two lifetimes or even in the course of the present lifetime; those who will be saved at this very instant; those who are ripe for salvation (paripakva) and those who are not; those who will be saved by the Vehicle of the śrāvakas or those who will be saved by that of the pratyekabuddhas.

The bodhisattva is like a good physician (vaidya) who, on examining the sick person, knows whether his cure is far off or near at hand, or if he incurable.

*

2. Sūtra. – Abhijñāvikrīḍanatā // yābhir abhijñābhir vikrīḍan buddhakṣetrād buddhakṣetram saṃkrāmati buddhadarśanāya / na cāsya buddhakṣetrasaṃjñā bhavati /

Playing with the superknowledges. – Playing with these superknowledges, the bodhisattva passes from buddha-field to buddha-field to see the buddhas, but he has no notion of buddha-field.

Śāstra (p. 418a26). – Previously, the bodhisattva already possessed the superknowledges (abhijñā), but now that he plays supremely with them, he can go to immense and infinite universes (lokadhātu).

When the bodhisattva was in the seventh ground, sometimes he wanted to attain nirvāṇa. Now, for several reasons and because the Buddhas of the ten directions escort him and protect him, he changes his mind and wants to save beings. Skillful in the superknowledges, he goes at will (vyatheccham) and spontaneously (svatas) to immense and infinite universes without encountering any obstacles. He sees <2432> the buddha-fields, but he does not grasp the mark of buddha-field (buddhakṣetranimitam nodgrhṇāti).

*

3. Sūtra. – Buddhakṣetradarśanatā // yad ekasminn eva buddhakṣetre sthitvāparimāṇāni buddhakṣetrāni paśyati / na cāsyā buddhakṣetrasamjñā bhavati /

Seeing the buddha-fields. – Staying in his own buddha-field, the bodhisattva sees the immense buddha-fields but has no notion of buddha-field.

Śāstra (p. 418a25). – There are bodhisattvas who, by the power of their superknowledges (abhiññābala), fly in the ten directions looking at the pure universes (parisuddhalokadhātu) and grasping their marks (nimitta) in order to adorn their own field.

There are bodhisattvas whom a Buddha conducts through the ten directions in order to show them the pure universes; they grasp the marks of these pure fields and make the vow (prañidhāna) to reproduce them. Thus the Buddha Che-tseu-tsai-wang (Lokeśvara) guided the bhikṣu Fa-tseu (Dharmākara) across the ten directions and showed him the pure universes.³⁸⁴ Sometimes there are bodhisattvas who, remaining in their own original field (maulakṣetra) use the divine eye (divyacakṣus) and see the pure universes in the ten directions; at first they grasp their pure marks, then, conceiving a mind of detachment (asaṅgacitta), they return to indifference (upekṣa).

*

4. Sūtra. – Teṣāṃ buddhakṣetrāṇāṃ yathādr̥ṣṭāṇāṃ svakṣetraparinīṣḍānatā // yad bodhisattva īśvaracakravartibhūmau sthitas trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātuṃ saṃkrāmati svakṣetraṃ ca parinīṣḍayati /

Constructing his own field on the model of the buddha-fields previously seen. – The bodhisattva in the level of the cakravartin king goes everywhere in the trisāhasramahāsāhasra-lokadhātu and constructs his own field.

Śāstra (p. 418b3). – As has previously been said (p. 1923F), the eighth ground is called the level of the cakravartin. Just as the precious wheel (ratnackara) of the cakravartin king goes everywhere without <2433> encountering any obstacle (āvaraṇa) or hindrance (nīvaraṇa) or enemy (amitra), so the bodhisattva in this [eighth] ground can cause the Jewel of the Dharma (dharmaratna) to rain down and fulfill the wishes of beings without anything obstructing him.

He is also able to grasp the marks (nimitta) of the pure fields that he has seen and build (parinīṣḍayati) his own field on their model.

*

5. Sūtra. – Buddhakāyayathābhūtapratyavekṣaṇatā // yā dharmakāyayathābhūtapratyavekṣaṇatā /

ime pañca dharmāḥ paripūrayitavyāḥ //

³⁸⁴ An allusion to the wanderings of the bhikṣu Dharmākara, the future Amitābha, whom the buddha Lokeśvara led through the ten directions to show him the pure lands: this is the subject of the Sukhāvativyūha; see above, p. 601F, n. 1.

Seeing the body of the Buddhas in conformity with reality. – It is seeing in conformity with the reality of the dharmakāya.

Those are the five dharmas to be completely fulfilled.

Śāstra (p. 418b7). – The bodhisattva sees the bodies of the Buddhas like a magic show (māyā), like a metamorphosis (nirmāṇa). This body is not part (na saṃgrhīta) of the five skandhas (pañcaskandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (dvādaśāyatana), the eighteen elements (aṣṭādaśadhātu); his dimensions, his various colors [are purely subjective]: they are adjusted to the visions which beings have as a result of actions of their previous lives (pūrvajanmakarman).

In the present passage, the Buddha himself says that “seeing the Buddha is seeing the dharmakāya”.³⁸⁵

1. Sūtra. – Punar aparāṃ subūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvenāṣṭamyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena pañca dharmāḥ paripūrayitavyāḥ / yaduta indriyaparārajñānatā // yā daśasu buddhabaleṣu sthitvā sarvasattvānāṃ indriyaparārajñānatā /

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the eighth ground should completely fulfill five dharmas, namely: <2434> knowing the extent of the spiritual faculties. – Established in the ten powers of the Buddha, the bodhisattva knows the faculties of all beings, superior or inferior.

Śāstra (p. 418b12). – As has been said in regard to the ten powers (1541-1545F), the bodhisattva knows first the functioning of the minds (cittapravṛtti) of all beings: he knows those who are of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), those who are of keen faculties (tikṣṇendriya), those in whom generosity (dāna) predominates and those in whom wisdom (prajñā) predominates. Basing himself on these predominances, he saves beings.

*

2. Sūtra. – Buddhakṣetrapariśodhanatā // yā sattvacittapariśodhanatā /

Purifying the buddha-field. – This is purifying the minds of beings.

Śāstra (p. 418b14). – There are two ways of purifying: i) the bodhisattva purifies himself; ii) he purifies the minds of beings to make them follow the pure Path (parisuddhamārga). By means of this twofold purification of others and himself, the bodhisattva can purify his buddha-field as he wishes (yathecccham).

*

3. Sūtra. – Māyopamasamādher samāpādanam // yatra samādhau sthitvā bodhisattvaḥ sarvāḥ kriyāḥ karoti / na cāsyā cittam kvacid dharme pravartate /

³⁸⁵ In Saṃyutta, III, p. 120, the Buddha says to Vakkali: Alaṃ Vakkali kiṃ te iminā pūtikāyṛna diṭṭhena. Yo kho Vakkali dhammaṃ passati so maṃ passati; yo maṃ passati so dhammaṃ passati. – What would be the use of seeing this body of rottenness? He who sees the Dharma, sees me; he who sees me, sees the Dharma.

There are many analogous texts in the Āgamas and especially in Ekottara; cf. Hobogirin, II, p. 176-177, s.v. Buṣṣhin.

Concentrating oneself in the magic-like concentration. – Staying in this concentration, the bodhisattva accomplishes all activities, but his mind bears upon none.

Śāstra (p. 418b17). – The magician (māyākara) to some extent fills the universe with magical fictive objects: armies consisting of the four elements (caturāṅgabala), palaces and cities, food and drink, singing and dancing, killings and calamities, etc.

In the same way also, the bodhisattva established in this concentration fills the universes of the ten directions with his metamorphoses: first he makes gifts (dāna) and satisfies beings; then he preaches the Dharma (dharmam deśayati), makes conversions (paripācayati) and destroys the three bad destinies (durgati); finally he establishes beings in the Three Vehicles (yānatrāya): in all these beneficent activities, not a single one fails.

The mind of the bodhisattva remains motionless (acala) and he no longer grasps objects of the mind (cittanimitāni nodgrhṇāti). <2435>

*

4. Sūtra. – Abhikṣaṇaḥ samādhiḥ // yo bodhisattvasya vipakajaḥ samādhiḥ /

Perpetual concentration. – In the bodhisattva, it is the concentration resulting from retribution.

Śāstra (p. 418b24). – Having obtained the concentration like a magic show (māyopamasamādhi), the bodhisattva accomplishes all his activities [by means of effort] and with its help. Now it is a matter of the [innate] concentration resulting from retribution (vipākaja) at the moment of passing into a [new] existence (bhavaśaṃkrānti).³⁸⁶ In the same way that a person sees visibles (rūpa) without having recourse to the power of the mind, so the bodhisattva who is established in this [innate] concentration saves beings. It easily surpasses the concentration like a magic show, for it spontaneously (svatas) accomplishes its role without any help. Thus, among those who seek for wealth, some obtain it thanks to some help, but others obtain it spontaneously.

*

5. Sūtra. – Yathā yathā sattvānāṃ kuśalamūlapariniṣpattir bhavati tathā tathātmabhāvaṃ parigrhṇāti // yad bodhisattvo yathā yathā sattvānāṃ kuśalamūlapariniṣpattir bhavati tathā tathā śaṃcintyātmabhāvaṃ parigrhṇāti sattvaṃś ca paripācayati // ime subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvenāṣṭamyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena pañca dharmāḥ paripūrayitavyāḥ /

According to such and such a degree of achievement that the roots of good of beings have, the bodhisattva assumes such and such a form of existence. – According to whether the roots of good of beings have such and such a degree of achievement, the bodhisattva knowingly assumes such and such a form of existence and ripens beings.

³⁸⁶ This is the place to distinguish the samādhis acquired by effort (prāyogika) in the course of the present existence from the innate samādhis (upapattipratilambhika) inherited from earlier existences as fruits of retribution (vipākaja).

These, O Subhūti, are the five dharmas which the bodhisattva-mahāsattva residing in the eighth ground must fulfill completely.

Śāstra (p. 318b29). – The bodhisattva has thus acquired the two kinds of concentration (samādhi) and the two kinds of superknowledge (abhijñā): those that are acquired by practice (bhāvanāpratilambhika) and those that are acquired by retribution (vipākapatilambhika). He knows that henceforth he will assume a [new] form of existence (ātmabhāva) with such a body, such a voice, such nidāna, by such a path and by such means (upāya). He will even go so far as to assume an animal form of existence in order to convert and save beings. <2436>

Bhūmi IX

1. Sūtra. – Punar aparāṃ subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena navamyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena dvādaśadharmāḥ paripūrayitavyāḥ. Katame dvādaśa ...

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the ninth ground must completely fulfill twelve dharmas. What are these twelve? In universes infinite in number, the bodhisattva takes hold of the class of beings capable of being converted (vineyabhāga). – In the innumerable universes of the ten directions, the bodhisattva liberates (vimocayati) the beings capable of being saved in accord with the Buddha's teachings.

Śāstra (p. 418c4). – In the innumerable incalculable universes (lokadhātu) of the ten directions there are beings in the six destinies (śaḍgati); the bodhisattva [of the ninth ground] ripens (paripācayati) those who are capable of being saved and saves them.

There are three kinds of universes (lokadhātu): the pure (parisuddha), the impure (aparisuddha) and the mixed ones (miśra). Of the beings living in these three types of universe, some have the privilege of being able to be saved; it is those that the bodhisattva takes hold of. One lights a lamp (dīpa) for those who have eyes and not for blind people (andha); in the same way, the bodhisattva [ripens only] those who already fulfill the causes and conditions [of salvation] or who are beginning to fulfill them.

Furthermore, a trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu [containing a billion universes of four continents (cāturdvīpa)³⁸⁷] constitutes one single lokadhātu. These universes arise and disappear at the same time.

Lokadhātus of the same type present in the ten directions, in number equal to the sands of the Ganges, form one single buddhalokadhātu.

Buddhalokadhātus of the same type, in number equal to that of the sands of the Ganges, form an ocean (samudra) of buddhalokadhātus.

Oceans of buddhalokadhātus of the same type, present in the ten directions in number equal to that of the sands of the Ganges, form a seed (bīja) of buddhalokadhātus.

³⁸⁷ See Kośa, III, p. 170.

Seeds of the same type, innumerable in the ten directions, form a buddhakṣetra.

In all these lokadhātus, the bodhisattva “takes hold of a class of beings”, the class of those who are to be saved by a Buddha. <2437>

*

2. Sūtra. – Prañidhānapariḡrahaḥ // śaṇṇāṃ pāramitānāṃ paripūrṇatvāt /

All obtain according their wishes. – Because of the fullness of the perfections of the bodhisattva.

Śāstra (p. 418c16). – Merits (puṇya) and wisdom (prajñā) are complete (paripūrṇa) in this bodhisattva; this is why there is no aspiration (prañidhāna) that he does not realize. Learning that in immense and infinite universes there are masses of beings to be saved, one is afraid of not succeeding in doing so. This is why the sūtra here is speaking of the success in aspirations (prañidhānasamṛddhi). [The bodhisattva is assured of success] since, as the Buddha says here the bodhisattva “fulfills the six perfections completely” (śaṇṇāṃ pāramitānāṃ paripūrṇatvāt). The first five perfections represent the fulfillment of merits (puṇyapariṇipūri); wisdom (prajñā) represents the fulfillment of wisdom (prajñāparipūri).

*

3. Sūtra. – Devanāgaksagandharvarutajñānam // yaduta niruktipratisaṃvidā /

The knowledge of the languages spoken by the devas, nāgas, yakṣas and gandharvas. – This is by virtue of the unhindered modes of expression.

*

4. Sūtra. – *Pratibhānanirdeśajñānam*³⁸⁸ // yaduta pratibhānapratisaṃvidā /

The talent of eloquence. – This is by virtue of the unhindered knowledge of eloquence.

Śāstra (p. 418c21). – I have spoken above of the fulfillment of merits (puṇyapariṇipūri), the fulfillment of wisdom (prajñāparipūri) and success in aspirations (prañidhānasamṛddhi). Knowing foreign languages is precisely one of the bodhisattva’s wishes.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva whose knowledge of former abodes (pūrvanivāśajñāna)³⁸⁹ is very pure knows the languages of all the places he has taken rebirth in. Furthermore, possessing the knowledge resulting from resolution (prañidhijñāna), <2438> he knows the nomenclature (nāmavidhāna?) and deliberately makes up all kinds of words (akṣara) and expressions (vāc).

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who has obtained the concentration explaining the language of beings (sattvābhiḡapanirmocanasamādhī) penetrates all languages without hindrance.

³⁸⁸ Article omitted in the Chinese version, but appearing in the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 217, l. 14. The pratisaṃvids alluded to here are defined above, p. 1616-1624F.

³⁸⁹ Cf. p. 1555F.

Finally, the bodhisattva has himself obtained the four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid) or he practices the four unhindered knowledges of the Buddha. This is why he knows the languages (abhiḡāpa) and the sounds (śabda) of beings.

*

5. Sūtra. – *Garbhāvakrāntisampat*³⁹⁰ // iha bodhisattvaḥ sarvāsu jātiṣūpapāduka upapadyate /

The excellence of the descent into the womb. – In all his births, the Bodhisattva is born apparitionally.

Śāstra (p. 418c28). – According to some, the Bodhisattva mounted on a white elephant (śvetahastyabhirūḡha), surrounded (parivṛta), venerated (satkṛta), respected (gurukṛta), esteemed (māṇita) and served (pūjita) by innumerable Tuṣita gods, penetrated along with them into the belly of his mother (mātṛkukṣi).

According to others, the Bodhisattva’s mother, possessing the concentration like a magic show (māyopamasamādhī) caused her belly to expand inordinately; all the bodhisattvas of the trisāhasramahāsāhasradlokadhātu, the devas, nāgas and asuras were able to enter into it and come out. In this belly there is a palace and a platform. [The deities] set a bed (khaṡvā) there, hung banners (patākā), spread it with flowers and burned incense; all this was the result of the meritorious actions (puṇyakarman) of the Bodhisattva. Next the Bodhisattva comes down and takes his place there and, by the power of his concentration (samādhī), enters <2439> into the womb while staying as previously in the heaven of the Tuṣita gods.

*

6. Sūtra. – Janmasampat // jātamātra eva bodhisattvo ‘prameyānantalokadhātūn avabhāṣena sphurati / na tu nimitāny udgrhṇati /

The excellence of the birth. – As soon as he is born, the Bodhisattva illumines immense and infinite universes with his brilliance but does not grasp the marks.

Śāstra (p. 419a7). – When the Bodhisattva is about to be born, the devas, nāgas and asuras adorn the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu. Then lotus seats made of the seven jewels (saptaratnamaya padmāsana) arise spontaneously (svatas). From the belly of the mother (mātṛkukṣi) come forth innumerable bodhisattvas first who go to sit on the lotuses: they join their palms, make praises and wait. The ³⁹⁰ The eight sampads of the bodhisattva of the ninth ground are fully described in the biographies of the Buddha, especially in the Lalitavistara. Two biographies in archaic Chinese, the Sieou hing pen k’i king (T 184) and the Tchong pen k’i king (T 196), used but little up to now, have recently been translated into Dutch by E. Zürcher, Het leven van de Boeddha vertaald uit vroegste Chinese overlevering, 1978. These texts show much of linguistic and historical interest. They inform us about the hybrid language, semi-scholarly, semi-popular, used at the time of the later Han by the Buddhist propaganda in China, and we learn what the first missionaries thought was proper to reveal of the life of the Buddha to people foreign not only in mind but in speech. For this language, see also E. Zürcher, Late Han Vernacular Elements in the Earliest Buddhist translations, 1977, p. 177-203.

bodhisattvas and also the devas, nāgas, asuras, ṛṣis, āryas and noble ladies join their palms and wholeheartedly wish to see the birth of the Bodhisattva.

Next, the Bodhisattva comes out of the right side of his mother like the full moon emerging from the clouds. He emits a great brilliance that lights up immense universes. At the same moment, a great voice is heard in the universes of the ten directions that proclaims: “In that place, the Bodhisattva is in his last lifetime (caramabhavika).”

Sometimes there are bodhisattvas who arise apparitionally (upapāduka) on the lotuses.

In regard to the four wombs (yonī),³⁹¹ the Bodhisattva is born from the chorion (jarāyuja) or he is of apparitional birth (upapāduka). In regard to the four castes of men (jāti), the Bodhisattva is born either into the kṣatriya caste or in that of the brāhmaṇa, for these two castes are honored by men.

*

7. Sūtra. – Kulasampat // yad bodhisattvaḥ kṣatriyakuleṣu brāhmaṇakuleṣu vā pratyājāyate /

The excellence of the family. – The Bodhisattva takes birth into a kṣatriya family or a brāhmaṇa family.

Śāstra (p. 419a17). – Brāhmaṇa families have wisdom (prajñā); kṣatriya families have power (bala). <2440> The brāhmaṇa favors the future life (paraloka); the kṣatriya favors the present life (ihaloka): both families are useful in the world; this is why the Bodhisattva is born among them.

There is also the worthy family of the Dharma (dharmakula), that of the non-regressing adepts (avaivartika).³⁹²

Taking birth in these families is the excellence of the family.

*

8. Sūtra. – Gotrasampat // yad bodhisattvo yasmād gotrāt pūrvakā bodhisattvā abhūvaṃs tatra gotre pratyājāyate /

The excellence of the clan. – The Bodhisattva is born into the clan coming from the Bodhisattvas of the past.

Śāstra (p. 419a21). – When the Bodhisattva is still in the Tuṣita heaven, he examines (vilokayati) the world, asking himself which clan is the most noble in order to welcome a being; this is the clan in which he takes birth. Thus, among the last seven Buddhas, the first three were born into the Kaundinya clan, the following three into the Kāśyapa clan and the Buddha Śākyamuni into the Gautama clan.

³⁹¹ Beings are born from an egg (aṇḍa), chorion (jarāya), exudation (saṃsveda) or are of apparitional birth (upapāduka): Dīgha, III, p. 230; Majjhima, I, p. 73, etc.

³⁹² The bodhisattvas of the eighth ground.

Furthermore, the Bodhisattva who begins with the strength of high aspiration (adhyāśayadṛḍhatā)³⁹³ [is born] into the clan of the Buddhas (buddhagotra). For the others, acquiring the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anupattikadharmakṣāntipratilābdha) would be the “clan of the Buddha” for it is then that the Bodhisattva acquires a partial influx of the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñatā). Compare this stage with the gotrabhūmi in the śrāvaka system.

*

9. Sūtra. – Parivārasampat // yad bodhisattvo mahāsattvo bodhisattvaparivāra eva bhavati /

Excellence of the entourage. – The Bodhisattva-mahāsattva has an entourage consisting only of bodhisattvas.

Śāstra (p. 419a28). – [Those who surround the bodhisattva of the ninth ground] are wise men, good men who, from lifetime to lifetime have accumulated merit. In the present passage, the Buddha himself says that the entourage is composed solely of bodhisattvas. Thus, it is said in the Pou-k'o-sseu-yi king <2441> [Acintyaśūtra, or Gaṇḍavyūha] that Kiu-p'i-ye (Gopiyā or Gopā) was a great bodhisattva.³⁹⁴ The whole entourage is in the level of the non-regressing bodhisattvas (avaivartikabhūmi). These bodhisattvas, by the magical power (vikurvaṇabala) of the concentration of means (upāyabala), change into men (puruṣa) or women (stri) and together form the entourage of the bodhisattva of the ninth ground]. They are like the treasurer-jewel (grhapatiratna)³⁹⁵ of a cakravartin king: he is a yakṣa or an asura, but he takes the form of a man in order to work with men.³⁹⁶

³⁹³ As we have seen, high aspiration (adhyāśaya) is the first of ten preparations (parikarma) to be fulfilled in the first bhūmi.

³⁹⁴ Sudhana, son of a notable man who had produced the mind of anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi, wanted to know how to attain it definitively, so he traveled through various Indian lands and consulted a large number of sages. At Kapilavastī he met Gopā, a daughter of the śākyas, who gave him some precious information about the practices of the bodhisattva. This meeting is mentioned in the Gaṇḍavyūha, ed. D. T. Suzuki, p. 390 (= Avatamsaka, T 279, k. 75, p. 406c7-10): Atha khalu Sudhanaḥ śreṣṭhīdāraka yena Gopā śākyakanyā tenopasaṃkramya Gopāyāḥ śākyakanyāyāḥ kramatalayoh śarīrena praṇipatothāya purataḥ prāñjalīḥ sthitvevam āha / mayārye 'nuttarāyām samyaksaṃbodhau cittam utpāditaṃ na ca jānāmi katham bodhisattvāḥ saṃsāre saṃsaranti saṃsāradosatī ca na lipyante /

Gopā (Gopī, Gopikā) knew Śākyamuni when the latter was still living at home and was indulging in pleasure. According to some sources, notably the Traité (above, p. 1003F), she was one of Śākyamuni's wives. After her death, she was reborn in the Trāyastriṃśa heaven where she was known by the name of the devaputra Gopaka. It was in this form that she appears in the Śūraṃgamasamādhisūtra, French transl., p. 172-178. To Dṛḍhamatī, who asks her why she has changed her woman's body, she answers that the distinctions between the sexes is purely imaginary, all dharmas being of one taste and without duality. The precise teachings that she gave Sudhana on the ten qualities of the bodhisattva are evidence that she herself was a great bodhisattva of the ninth ground. Having shed her body of flesh, she was clothed with a body born of the fundamental element (dharmathānuja kāya), free of marks and particularly of sexual characteristics. But for the good of beings and out of skillful means (upāya), this great bodhisattva appears under the most varied of forms.

³⁹⁵ The grhapatiratna, rendered here by the characters kiu-che-pao, is the sixth of the seven jewels of a cakravartin king (Dīgha, II, p. 173-177; Majjhima, II, p. 134; III, p. 172-176; Mahāvastu, II, p. 158, l. 16). This was not strictly speaking

*

10. Sūtra. – Abhiniṣkaramaṇasampat // yad bodhisattvaḥ pravrajyāsamaye 'nekaiḥ sattvakoṇiṇiyutaśatasahasraiḥ sārđham abhiniṣkrāmati grhāt / te ca sattvā niyatā bhavanti triṣu yāneṣu / <2442>

Excellence of departure. – The bodhisattva leaving the world goes forth from home with innumerable hundreds of thousands of millions of beings, and these beings are predestined to the Three Vehicles.

Śāstra (p. 419b4). – Thus one night in his palace, the Bodhisattva Śākyamuni saw that his courtesans were like corpses. The devas and the asuras of the ten directions, bearing banners (patāka) and flowers (puṣpa) came to offer them to him and, bearing themselves respectfully on meeting him, escorted him outside.

Then Tch'ò-ni (Chāṇḍaka), despite the orders he had previously received from king Tsing-fan (Śuddhodana), acceded to the wishes of the Bodhisattva and brought him his horse [Kaṇṭhaka].

The four kings, messengers of the gods (devadūta), held the horse's hoofs in their hands while it leaped over the ramparts and left the city.

It is to destroy the passions (kleśa) and Māra in person that the Bodhisattva, before all the beings, in this way demonstrated his dislike for the householder life, for, if an individual as meritorious and noble as he is abandons his home, what should ordinary people not do?

Episodes (nidāna) of this kind illustrate “the excellence of the departure” (abhiniṣkramaṇa-sampad).

*

11. Sūtra. – Bodhivṛkṣavyūhasampat // yad bodhivṛkṣasya mūlaṃ sauvarṇaṃ bhavati saptaratnamayāni skandhaśākhāpatrāni yeṣāṃ skandhaśākhāpatrāṇāṃ avabhāso daśasu dikṣv asaṃkhyeyān trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātūn sphurati /

The excellence of the splendor of the tree of enlightenment. – The root of the tree of enlightenment is of gold; its trunk, branches and leaves are made of the seven jewels; the brilliance of the trunk, branches and leaves illumines, in each of the ten directions, incalculable trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātus.

Śāstra (p. 419b11). – For the ornamentation of the tree of enlightenment see above (p. 2321-2322F). In the present passage, the Buddha himself says that the root of this tree is made of gold; its trunk, branches and leaves are made of the seven jewels, and the brilliance of the trunk, branches and leaves illumines innumerable incalculable Buddha universes in each of the ten directions.

a ‘householder’ but a treasurer, as certain Chinese translations suggest: tien-tsang-pao (t 125, p. 552a18), cheou-tsang-tche-pao (T 125, p. 788a12, tchou-tsang-pao (T 125, p. 807a4). Dīgha, II, p. 176 and Majjhima, III, p. 175 attribute to him supernatural powers: Tassa kammavipākajam dibbam cakkhu pātubhavati yena nidhiṃ passati sassāmikam pi assāmikam pi. - There appears in him a divine eye by which he finds the treasures which may or may not have a possessor.

³⁹⁶ Thus, a number of devas, maruts and nāgas were in the service of Aśoka and obeyed his orders: cf. Mahāvamsa, V, v. 24-33.

Some Buddhas adorn the Buddha tree with the seven jewels of the Bodhisattva, but sometimes this is not the case. Why? Because the magical power (ṛddhibala) of the Buddhas is inconceivable (acintya): <2443> it is for beings that they manifest all kinds of splendors (vyūha).

*

12. Sūtra. – Sarvaṇaṇaparpūrisampat // yo bodhisattvasya sattvapariṇāśa ca buddhakṣetra-pariśuddhiś ca / ime subhūte bodhisattvena mahāsattvena navamyāṃ bhūmau vartamānena dvādaśadharmāḥ paripūrayitvāḥ /

Excellence in the complete accomplishment of all the qualities. – In the Bodhisattva, this is the ripening of beings and the complete purification of the Buddha-field.

These, O Subhūti, are the twelve dharma which the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the ninth ground must fulfill completely.

Śāstra (p. 419b17). – In the seventh ground, the bodhisattva destroys all the passions (kleśa)³⁹⁷ [and thus assures his own interest]: that is the “excellence of one's own interest” (svārthasampad); in the eighth and ninth ground, he assures the interest of others (parārtha) insofar as he “ripens beings and purifies completely his buddha-field”. In respect to the depth and breadth of the two interests thus assured, the Bodhisattva “excels in the accomplishment of all the qualities” (sarvaṇaṇapariṇā).

The arhats and pratyekabuddhas assure their own interest greatly but neglect the interest of others; therefore they are not complete. The devas and the minor bodhisattvas³⁹⁸ are useful to others but have not destroyed their own passions: therefore they too are not complete. [The great Bodhisattvas alone have] “fulfilled completely all the qualities.”

Bhūmi X

Sūtra. – Daśamyāṃ punaḥ subhūte bhūmau vartamāno bodhisattvas tathāgata eveti vaktavyaḥ // tattha katham bodhisattvo daśamyāṃ bhūmau sthitaḥ saṃs tathāgata eveti vaktavyaḥ / yadā bodhisattvasya mahāsattvasya ṣaṭpāramitāḥ paripūrṇā bhavanti / catvāri smṛtyupasthānāni yāvad aṣṭādaśāveṇikā buddhadharmāḥ paripūrṇā bhavati / sarākārājñatā paripūrṇā bhavati / sarvakleśānāṃ tadvāsanānāṃ ca prahāṇaṃ bhavati / evaṃ hi bodhisattvo mahāsattvo daśamyāṃ bhūmau sthitas tathāgata eveti vaktavyaḥ // iha subhūte bodhisattvo <2444> mahāsattvo daśamyāṃ bhūmau sthita upāyakaūsalyena ṣaṭsu pāramitāsu caramś / caturṣu smṛtyupasthāneṣu yāvad aṣṭādaśāveṇikeṣu buddhadharmeṣu cara / śuṣkavidarśanā-bhūmiṃ gotrabhūmiṃ aṣṭamakabhūmiṃ darśanabhūmiṃ tanubhūmiṃ vitarāgabhūmiṃ kṛtāvibhūmiṃ pratyekabuddhabhūmiṃ bodhisattvabhūmi atikrāmati / etā navabhūmir atikramya buddhabhūmau pratiṣṭhate / iyaṃ bodhisattvasya daśami bhūmiḥ / evaṃ hi subhūte bodhisattvo mahāsattvo mahāyāna-saṃprastito bhavati //

³⁹⁷ The kleśavivarta mentioned above, p. 2427F.

³⁹⁸ Those of the first six bhumis.

Furthermore, O Subhūti, the Bodhisattva on the tenth ground should simply be called Tathāgata. – Why should the Bodhisattva on the tenth ground be called simply Tathāgata? When he completely fulfills the six perfections, when he completely fulfills the four foundations of mindfulness up to and including the eighteen special attributes of the Buddhas, when he completely fulfills the knowledge of all the aspects and when he destroys all the passions and their traces,³⁹⁹ the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the tenth ground should be called simply Tathāgata. Now, O Subhūti, the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva on the tenth ground who, by his skillful means, is practicing the six perfections as well as the four foundations of mindfulness up to including the eighteen special attributes of the Buddha, this Bodhisattva, I say, exceeds: 1) the ground of the dry view; 2) the ground of the spiritual lineage; 3) the ground of the eighth saint; 4) the ground of seeing; 5) the ground of the diminution of the passions; 6) the ground of the saint freed from desire; 7) the ground of the saint who has done what had to be done; 8) the grounds of the pratyekbuddha; 9) the grounds of the bodhisattva. Having exceeded these nine levels, the Bodhisattva is established in the ground of the Buddhas. This is the tenth ground of the Bodhisattva. Therefore, O Subhūti, the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva has “set off well for the Great Vehicle.”

Śāstra (p. 419b23). – The Bodhisattva seated under the tree of enlightenment (bodhivṛkṣa) penetrates into the tenth ground called ground of the Cloud of Dharma (dharmameghā bhūmi). Like a great cloud uninterruptedly pouring out torrential rain, the Bodhisattva’s mind produces by itself (svatas), from moment to moment and infinite in number, <2445> immense (aparimita), infinite (ananta) and very pure (pariśuddha) Buddha attributes.

Then, noticing that the mind of Māra, king of the desire realm (kāmadhāturāja), has not yet been tamed, the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva shoots forth light from his ūṛṇā so that Māra’s palaces, ten million in number, become darkened and disappear. Māra, irritated and vexed, gathers his troops and comes to attack the Bodhisattva.

After the Bodhisattva has vanquished Māra, the Buddhas of the ten directions congratulate him for his deeds; they emit rays from their ūṛṇās which penetrate into the Bodhisattva through the top of his head,

At this moment, the merits (puṇya) acquired by the Bodhisattva in the ten grounds are changed into Buddha attributes. The Bodhisattva destroys all the traces of the passions (kleśavāśana), obtains the unfailing deliverances (apratihatavimokṣa) and acquires the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid), the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā), great ³⁹⁹ In his translation (T 1509, p. 417a18), Kumārajīva carefully distinguishes kleśa (fan-nao) from vāsanā (si) by joining them by the conjunction ki, for, according to the Traité, p. 1781-81F, the kleśas are destroyed in the eighth ground by the acquisition of the anupattikadharmakṣānti, whereas the vāsanās disappear entirely only in the tenth ground, at the moment of abhisambodhi.

This distinction appears clearly in the original Sanskrit and their Tibetan versions:

Pañcaviṃśati, p. 225, l. 10-11: Śāstamahāsrikā, p. 1427, l. 11-12: sarvavāsanānusandhikleśaprahāṇa.

Tib. Trip., vol 18, no. 731, p. 146, fol. 265b6-7: bag chags kyi mtshams sbyor baḥi ñon moṅs pa tams cad spaṅs pa.

loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī), great compassion (mahākaruṇa) and the other Buddha attributes, immense and infinite.

At this moment, the earth trembles in six ways (ṣaḍvikāraṃ kampate); the heaven rains down flowers and perfumes; the bodhisattvas, devas and manuṣyas, joining their palms, utter praises.

At this moment, the Bodhisattva emits a great brilliance (mahāprabhā) that illumines the innumerable universes everywhere in the ten directions. The Buddhas, bodhisattvas, devas and manuṣyas of the ten directions proclaim in a loud voice that in that place, in that land and in that year the Bodhisattva, seated on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍa) has realized buddhahood and that this light is his. Thus, in the tenth ground, the Bodhisattva “should be recognized as Buddha”.

Moreover, in the present passage, the Buddha has specified the characteristics of the tenth ground by saying: “By practicing the six perfections and by his skillful means (upāyakaūśalya), the Bodhisattva has exceeded [the nine shared grounds] from the level of dry vision (śuṣkavidarśanābhūmi) up to and including the bodhisattva grounds and is now in the ground of the Buddhas.” This ground of the Buddhas is the tenth ground. The Bodhisattva who thus travels through the ten grounds is said to be “well set out on the Great Vehicle” (mahāyānasamprasthita).